Section 3 of the Senate engrossed amendment agreed to in conference respecting local contributions is the similar provision for levees and reservoirs for the Mississippi River flood-control bill, and is as follows:

"SEC. 3. That hereafter no money appropriated under authority of this act shall be expended on the construction of any project until States, political subdivisions thereof, or other responsible local agencies have given assurances satisfactory to the Secretary of War that they will (a) provide without cost to the United States all lands, easements, and rights-of-way necessary for the construction of the project, except as otherwise provided herein; (b) hold and save the United States free from damages due to the construction works; (c) maintain and operate all the works after completion in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the construction of any dam authorized herein may be undertaken without delay when the dam site has been acquired and the assurances prescribed herein have been furnished, without awaiting the acquisition of the easements and rights-of-way required for the reservoir area: And provided further, That whenever expenditures for lands, easements, and rights-of-way by States, political subdivisions thereof, or responsible local agencies for any individual project or useful part thereof shall have exceeded the present estimated construction cost therefor, the local agency concerned may be reimbursed one-half of its excess expenditures over said estimated construction cost: And provided further, That when benefits of any project or useful part thereof accrue to lands and property outside of the State in which said project or part thereof is located, the Secretary of War with the consent of the State wherein the same are located may acquire the necessary lands, easements, and rights-of-way for said project or part thereof after he has received from the States, political subdivisions thereof, or responsible local agencies benefited the present estimated cost of said lands, easements, and rights-of-way, less one-half the amount by which the estimated cost of these lands, easements, and rights-of-way exceeds the estimated construction cost corresponding thereto: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall determine the proportion of the present estimated cost of said lands, easements, and rights-of-way that each State, political subdivision thereof, or responsible local agency should contribute in consideration for the benefits to be received by such agencies: And provided further, That whenever not less than 75 percent of the benefits as estimated by the Secretary of War of any project or useful part thereof accrue to lands and property outside of the State in which said project or part thereof is located, provision (c) of this section shall not apply thereto; nothing herein shall impair or abridge the powers now existing in the Department of War with respect to navigable streams: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the completion of any reservoir or flood-control work authorized by the Congress and now under way."

ADDITIONAL AMENDMENTS

The conferees agreed to the amendments to the Senate engrossed amendment, as shown in the conference report, by inserting a proviso at the end of section 2 that reclamation projects are not to be interfered with, by substituting a project for Logansport without increasing the costs, by striking out the St. Francis and Yazoo projects and by correcting two errors, as set forth in the conference report.

The bill as it passed the House carried authorizations amounting to $370,929,000. The bill as approved by the conferees carries authorizations aggregating $300,572,300. There is thus a net decrease of $70,356,700. The decrease is largely composed of the eliminations of the St. Francis and the Yazoo projects, which are in the said Mississippi River bill.

The differences in the project items included in the House bill and included in the agreement of the conferees are tabulated and are as follows:

RILEY J. WILSON,
WILL M. WHITTINGTON,
ROBERT P. RICH,
GLENN GRISWOLD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to announce to the House that this comprehensive flood-control program, authorized in the bill we have under consideration has the unanimous approval of the conferees on the part of the House and Senate.

In my judgment this is the most important undertaking in this direction that has ever been authorized by this or any other Congress and promises more for the future of our Nation in the protection of life and property and in avoiding disastrous floods than any measure heretofore enacted, while at the same time preserving opportunities for towns, cities, and rural districts to have protection from such floods in the future.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. There is nothing in any of the amendments that restricts the rights of the Army Engineers to have full control of this work?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; that matter was considered and the first amendment of the House bill was a declaration of policy.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. GRANFIELD. As I understand it, this report contains an item with reference to flood control of the Connecticut River.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Has that item been changed in any way from what was contained in the bill as it came from the Senate?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Not at all. Every item in here has the approval of the Chief of Engineers as being economically justified and it is contended that the projects will have a value averaging one dollar for every dollar expended by the Government.

Mr. GRANFIELD. And the Connecticut River item of $10,028,000 is the amount agreed upon for our relief?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. GRANFIELD. I wish to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Louisiana for his splendid cooperation in behalf of the flood sufferers of the Connecticut Valley. He will recall that his Committee on Flood Control approved my bill, H. R. 8562, to provide for a preliminary examination of the Connecticut River, with a view to the control of its floods, back in 1934. At last the people of the Connecticut Valley are receiving action on the part of our Government in connection with flood relief, and I am particularly pleased to have been a part in the movement to bring about this relief.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Any items that were taken out of the bill were not taken out at the request of the Members, but on account of the fact that the Army Engineers would not consider them because they were for power rather than for flood control, and that is the reason that any such project was stricken from the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; the recommendation of the engineers was that the main object of the item was flood control and not power development.

Mr. RICH. And the Army Engineers recommended those projects that were fundamentally sound insofar as the expenditures were for the purpose of preventing destruction in the localities where they are to be located.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. CITRON. To mention the Connecticut River, have the Army engineers any discretion to change their plans in any way? For instance, I understand the plans that were made for the Connecticut River were based on studies following the flood of 1927. During the spring of this year there was another flood in this river, and I understand the Army engineers are making certain studies taking into consideration the recent floods. Under this bill, as it appears before us now, have the Army Engineers a certain amount of discretion to take into consideration any new matters that may have risen as a result of the studies they are now making?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They will be confined, of course, in their expenditures to the provisions of this act, but there are further authorizations for surveys and reports, and the projects may be enlarged as the work progresses wherever it is deemed advisable.

Mr. CITRON. Can they change or alter some of the projects if they keep within the amount of the authorization?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They have certain discretion in carrying out the projects if they keep within the expenditure authorized, and if there is a need for a further project, of course, you can come back from time to time, as is done in connection with river and harbor works, and get additional appropriations.

Mr. CITRON. And if the Army Engineers keep within the amount of their authorization, they have a certain discretion to change or alter the present plans?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. There is an item in the measure for the Merrimack River?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. And that has not been changed since it was originally authorized?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Not since it passed the Senate. After the bill passed the House we had the disastrous floods that have been referred to. I think the House had a great deal of foresight in taking up this program before the floods came. Following the floods we went through the State of New York and authorized $200,000 for surveys there, and the Corps of Engineers have gone forward and made additional surveys and additional recommendations, which have been approved and placed in the bill in the Senate. We have approved those items.

Mr. CONNERY. My colleague the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] and I have been working on this matter for the past 14 years, and we are pleased that it is now in the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I am pleased that we have made some progress, and I congratulate the Members from Massachusetts, Mrs. ROGERS and Mr. CONNERY, for their splendid services. [Applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman, and I understand that a certain sum can be used for flood control locally. For instance, in the district of my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], at the city of Lawrence and the city of Haverhill, Congressman ANDREW's district, and at the city of Lowell in my own district, some money can be taken for use in flood protection there as well as in connection with the reservoirs in New Hampshire.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I am not sure I understand the gentlewoman from Massachusetts. Does she mean within the project?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; within the project and the estimate.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It could be taken from the total amount appropriated and some of it used locally, because the reservoirs in New Hampshire alone will not afford enough protection for the cities. The engineers made this report a number of years ago as a result of a meeting I held in Lowell, but the recent flood exceeded in severity their estimates.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If they are included in the projects, adjustments can be made, of course, with the approval of the engineers.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. For the information of the membership of the House, it is true, is it not, that the statement of the managers on the part of the House in connection with the conference report contains in one column a list of the projects in the bill as it passed the House and in an opposite column a list of the projects as approved by the conferees?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. So that the Members can see the projects included in this bill.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There is full information about the projects; yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks on this bill and the Overton bill at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT S. 3531

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the statement on the part of the managers of the House explains the effect of the conference report.

Amendment no. 1 inserted by the House provided for the construction of 13 reservoirs each along the Arkansas and White Rivers at Federal expense. The amendment was really nullified by amendment no. 2 adopted by the House, inserted as section 8a, and known as the Jenkins amendment.

It has been stated that the Chief of Engineers recommended the construction of the 26 reservoirs. This statement is misleading. The Chief of Engineers never at any time or in any place recommended that the 26 reservoirs along the Arkansas and White Rivers be constructed at Federal expense, but did state that the 26 reservoirs along the Arkansas and White were the best reservoirs when constructed for flood control with respect to the lower Mississippi River of any of the 157 reservoirs studied and investigated. He said that if any reservoirs were to be constructed for flood control along the lower Mississippi River, the 26 reservoirs should be constructed. He said he would recommend that they be constructed as additional factors of safety, but that he could not recommend that they be constructed at Federal expense, or that they be substituted for either the Boeuf or the Eudora diversion. Moreover, the Chief of Engineers stated that if the said reservoirs were constructed for the reduction of floods along the lower Mississippi River, they would not be beneficial for local flood control in the areas in which they were located. He also stated that if the 26 reservoirs were constructed for flood control for local purposes they would not be beneficial for the reduction of floods in the lower Mississippi River.

While he recommended, if the local interests so desired, that they construct the 26 reservoirs as additional factors of safety, the Chief of Engineers repeatedly stated that he could not and would not recommend that they be included in the Overton or Mississippi River flood-control bill, inasmuch as they would add $126,000,000 to the cost and inasmuch as they could not be substituted for either the Eudora or the Boeuf diversion. He repeatedly stated that the 26 reservoirs would not provide for more than one-third of the required reduction in flood heights in the vicinity of the mouth of the Arkansas River and that the Eudora diversion, at a cost of $103,000,000, would give three times the benefit that would accrue from the expenditure of $126,000,000 for the 26 reservoirs along the Arkansas and White Rivers; he took the position that it was necessary to divert a million cubic feet per second at the mouth of the Arkansas, and that the said 26 reservoirs would only be a substitute for from 330,000 to 360,000 cubic feet per second, and that only when the floods came out of the Arkansas River.

The conferees eliminated the 26 reservoirs from the said Mississippi River bill.

Section 8a, providing for local contribution as modified, is retained in the bill. This is the so-called Jenkins amendment. As was stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], when he proposed it, it was not original with him; it was the identical section that the Senate had inserted in the omnibus flood-control bill, known as H. R. 8455. It was not original in the Senate. Substantially the same provisions obtained in the omnibus bill when it was passed by the House; moreover, the same provisions obtained in the Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, for the control of floods along the lower Mississippi River. Under section 3 of the act of May 15, 1928, for the control of floods along the lower Mississippi River, the local interests are required to provide rights-of-way along the main stem of the Mississippi River and to maintain the flood-control works when constructed.

The Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, required that the Federal Government bear the costs of spillways and floodways. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] very frankly admitted that it was not the intention of his amendment to cover floodways. The conferees thereupon retained the so-called Jenkins amendment and modified it so as to require the local interests to furnish rights-of-way for reservoirs and levees. It has no application to floodways; it would only be applicable to the reservoirs along the St. Francis and Yazoo Rivers. Like the similar section in the so-called omnibus bill, section 8a was amended so that it would not apply to the Sardis Reservoir in Mississippi. This reservoir was previously authorized. By use of the word "previously" in this statement and in the statement of the managers, I mean previously authorized in the bill. Section 8a is an amendment following section 8. The Sardis Reservoir was authorized by section 1 and by section 4 of the bill. Under the authorization the United States was to provide all lands, easements, and rights-of-way necessary for the construction of the project. The initial allocation of $1,000,000 for the Sardis Reservoir, as recommended by the Chief of Engineers and as carried in sections 1 and 4 of the bill, was made by the President out of the Relief and Emergency Appropriation Act of 1935. During the present session the annual War Department appropriation bill carried an appropriation of $2,500,000 for the construction of the work during the next fiscal year. The so-called Jenkins amendment has no application to the said Sardis Reservoir, and the amendment, as modified, provides that nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the completion of the said reservoir authorized by Congress and now under way. It is fair to say that a proviso in the exact words was inserted in the so-called omnibus bill and that this proviso eliminates the Blue Stone Reservoir in the Ohio Valley and the Conchas Reservoir in New Mexico along a tributary of the Arkansas River from the comparable section of the omnibus flood-control bill with respect to local contribution; in other words, the Sardis Reservoir, the Blue Stone Reservoir, and the Conchas Reservoir are eliminated from the provisions of section 8a inasmuch as they are authorized and under way.

The effect of the so-called Jenkins amendment on the Mississippi River bill will not in reality modify the project along either the St. Francis or the Yazoo Rivers. Forty-eight million dollars under sections 1 and 4 of the bill are authorized for flood-control works along the Yazoo River. The probability is that the seven detention reservoirs would cost the Federal Government in excess of the $48,000,000. Of course, the local interests are required to provide for highway relocations and for maintenance, but under section 4 the Chief of Engineers is authorized to substitute levees for any or all of the reservoirs. Without the insertion of the so-called Jenkins amendment, inasmuch as under the terms of the act the local interests were required to furnish the rights-of-way for levees, and inasmuch as the Chief of Engineers was given the power to substitute, the probability is that for the remaining six reservoirs the Chief of Engineers will substitute diversions, floodways, or auxiliary channels, as authorized by section 4.

In the St. Francis River, under the provisions of section 4, the Chief of Engineers could not have substituted reservoirs if the cost to the Government had been in excess of $16,000,000, the amount authorized to be expended by the Government for reservoirs.

In the circumstances, therefore, the Jenkins amendment made no substantial change in the Mississippi River bill. It will require as much money for the building of levees, with local contribution, as for the building of reservoirs under the terms of the act.

CONFERENCE REPORT, H. R. 8455

I call attention to the statement of the managers on the part of the House. It is a clear explanation of the bill as agreed to in conference. For the first time an act has been passed by Congress declaring a policy of national flood control. Investigations are provided for so as to include watersheds and soil erosion; a definite policy respecting local contributions that is applicable to all of the rivers and watersheds of the country is adopted. The provisions for levees and reservoirs in the said H. R. 8455, known as the omnibus bill, are identical with the provisions for local contributions in the Overton or Mississippi River flood-control bill. The Conchas Reservoir and the Blue Stone Reservoir are excepted from the provisions of the act inasmuch as they are under way and previously appropriated for.

Section 4 provides for contracts between the States respecting flood control. Hereafter the omnibus bill will be known as the Flood Control Act of 1936. Additional provisions are made for control investigations, in order that the studies may embrace run-offs and water retardation and soil erosion, under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture. The bill has no reference to the Mississippi River, and it so states.

Under the declared policy of the bill, only such projects were embraced as the Chief of Engineers recommended to be in compliance with the declaration of policy. The policy was that the benefits should exceed the costs.

For the first time, along all rivers and streams, a uniform policy for local contribution has been announced. The omnibus bill provides for flood control in 40 States. As I have stated, the Mississippi River and legislation dealing therewith are excluded. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] has substantially no projects in the omnibus bill. The Big Black River is largely located in the districts of my colleagues, Representatives FORD and MCGEHEE. The other projects in Mississippi are not located in any part of the district that I represent.

The omnibus bill therefore contains the same yardstick for reservoirs and for levees that is provided in the Mississippi River Overton bill. I direct particular attention to the comparison of the projects contained in the bill as it passed the House and in the bill as agreed to by conference, set forth in the statement of the managers. When the bill passed the House the authorizations amounted to $371,000,000. Projects were included on the floor and otherwise that were not recommended by the Chief of Engineers and that did not comply with the declaration of policy now contained in the act. These projects, including the reservoirs along the White River and including a majority of the reservoirs along the Arkansas River, were therefore eliminated from the bill by the Senate and in conference.

Personally, I have repeatedly stated I should like to see the 26 reservoirs constructed, but it is fair to say that the Wild Cat Shoals Reservoir along the White River is primarily a power project and if constructed for flood control alone is not economically justified. The Chief of Engineers reported that the same situation obtained as to other reservoirs along the White River. Two of the 13 reservoirs along the Arkansas River are retained in the bill. Four other reservoirs along tributaries of the Arkansas are retained in the bill. All reservoirs on the White and Arkansas Rivers, as well as all other reservoirs that did not come within the announced and declared policy to show they were economically justified, were eliminated from the bill.

I believe the time will come when the Government will adopt the policy of constructing reservoirs at Federal cost. This will enable the utilization of such reservoirs for flood control, reclamation, and power. It is a natural resource of the people. The pending measure, however, deals only with flood control and the conferees only adopted those projects recommended by the Chief of Engineers as economically justified for flood control.

The bill provides for projects aggregating $300,000,000. Such is the amount of the authorization; it is $70,000,000 less than the amount carried in the bill when it passed the House.

For the first time Congress recognizes a Federal interest and a Federal responsibility in flood control and the conference report on the so-called omnibus bill should be promptly adopted.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill and the Mississippi Valley bill for 5 legislative days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in this work on the flood-control bill the chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], has been untiring in his work for the benefit of flood control in this country. I also want to say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] have also been untiring in their efforts for flood-control work. They were diligent in working for real flood-control legislation. They showed a knowledge of the requirements and stood by sound principles of good laws. No men on this side of the House have done more than these two Members for national flood-control legislation, and I do congratulate them on their accomplishment.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I appreciate what has been said, and I wish to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], for the services he has rendered for flood control, also Mr. CARLSON.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I desire to ask if there is any restrictive legislation placed in the bill as amended by the Senate that will prevent the beginning of the project when the money is made available?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Not if the local requirements are met.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. It is left to the Army Engineers and the President of the United States.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Under the Secretary of War, if the requirements are met and the money is appropriated.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I notice that there is an item for the Black River, and I want to express my appreciation to the chairman and others for including that item in the bill.

Mr. HAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. HAINES. I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Louisiana for including the item with reference to York, where we had such a disastrous flood in 1933. I also want to ask the gentleman what local contribution must be made?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is set out in the act. Rights-of-way, assurances to the Government in waiving all claims for any damage that might occur.

Mr. HAINES. And the site for flood-control dams acquired by local authorities?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should like to ask the gentleman whether or not it is a fact that the projects included in the bill were first approved by the Army Engineers, and only those included in the bill?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; by authorization of the engineers.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. My question is probably irrelevant to the report, but I am wondering whether or not, in the deliberations and consideration of these flood-control projects, the gentleman had in mind anything in the Blackstone Valley of Massachusetts, which takes in part of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, at the time of the discussion?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not know whether any surveys have been made there or not. I do not recall.

Mr. HOLMES. They have been authorized in a bill which we passed here a year ago.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The surveys?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If they are not in there, then I take it the surveys have not been completed.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I understood the gentleman to say that all of these projects have been approved by the Army Engineers?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. There is one here for $109,000, including the Tombigbee River.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. And that has all been approved by the Army Engineers?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; as being economically justified and as being a feasible project. They have recommended it, and the committee has adopted it and placed it in the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. What is necessary to be done by the people in that area, if anything, in order to get the improvement carried out?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They must furnish the rights-of-way and the easements necessary for the Government to go in and complete the work.

Mr. GILDEA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. GILDEA. On August 22 of last year my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] said that he had put in a request for an expenditure of $1,880,000 in this bill, just to show how easy it is to get it. He said it was not approved by the Army Engineers.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Everything that is in the bill was approved by the Army Engineers.

Mr. GILDEA. Has it been approved since August 22 of last year?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not know the date of approval. I spent days with the Army Engineers, and all of the things in the bill are recommended by them.

Mr. GILDEA. I want to point out the north and west branches of the Susquehanna join at Sunbury, and the flood damage was caused at the juncture of those rivers. The appropriation in this bill is merely for levees along Shamokin Creek, and if we build the levees in this bill we will dam the river rather than relieve the situation.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That may be modified by the Corps of Engineers or an additional survey may extend the project and secure more money, but we cannot settle that at this time.

Mr. GILDEA. The question in my mind is this. We are always asked, Where are we going to get the money? That increased the amount $500,000. We could get the money for Sunbury by taking it from Williamsport.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The committee could not approve that.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. Is the gentleman going to yield any time to those who are opposed to the bill?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If they request it.

Mr. FULLER. I want a little time.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I did not know that anybody was opposed to the bill.

Mr. FULLER. I am.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FULLER. Oh, a short time.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Arkansas 5 minutes.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that amounts to nothing to Members who are going home with it. The provisions surrounding this bill are such that hardly any of the reservoirs can be built. This is a case in which the members of the committee have got what they wanted and have made an abject surrender to the wishes and demands of the House, and they put it on the frivolous ground that the Army Engineers have said so-and-so, and they are listening to the dictates of these self-annointed Army Engineers. You can take any of their testimony at any session of Congress and prove the converse of it at the next session of Congress. You can take the record in this case, and it is not based on the engineers' report from the War Department in the truest sense of the word. It is based upon political influence that has been brought to bear upon the Army Engineers.

Some members of this committee have projects in this bill and they are going to go back home and tell the people they have gotten this for them, where the Government is to spend a million and a half dollars for the purpose of building a dam for reservoir purposes, when, as a matter of fact, it will require two million and a half dollars to buy the rights-of-way and to pay for the damages in communities where the people cannot afford it. The great State of Pennsylvania has been offered a lot of slop in this matter, and it is nothing but slop. They were allotted many reservoirs in this bill, and not one of them will be built, and you know it, if you have sense enough to know the terms and conditions of the bill. Without an exception, that is the truth. This committee surrendered in view of the fact that these Army Engineers last year approved 26 projects that the House put in—3 of them in my congressional district. The House put these same 26 projects in the bill this year and the same committee abjectly surrendered. But they got theirs while the getting was good. They are bringing back to us now a bill that is useless and will be of no benefit for flood control. There is not a man in this House who does not know that is true. When you tell me you are going to make the local community put up half of the expenses for a reservoir to take care of a flood three or four hundred miles down the stream, with no local benefits at home, you are just talking tommyrot. No people will do it.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I certainly will.

Mr. DRIVER. Does the gentleman not recall that this House by a record vote approved an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] in the exact language now contained in this bill with respect to local projects?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly I know it; but the gentleman was against it.

Mr. DRIVER. I was.

Mr. FULLER. And so was I. Now, please do not take up my time.

Mr. DRIVER. I am against it yet; but the House voted that way.

Mr. FULLER. Certainly. I know that is true, but at the same time let me tell the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER], who got his pet measure through a little while ago——

Mr. DRIVER. And we have put up more than the amount that is levied under this bill.

Mr. FULLER. Do not get me away from my remarks. This same House at the same time put 26 other projects in this bill. This committee abjectly surrendered and never stood up for these provisions nor for the wish of the House. When you gentlemen go back home and tell your constituents that you got a reservoir because of the influence you had up here, wait until after election and see whether they say what kind of a liar you are. [Laughter.] They know, and you know, that you cannot buy the lands for these reservoirs. This is simply a starter and will later have to be changed so the Government will pay all, or at least materially contribute, for damages. That is why the conferees should not have so readily agreed. You know and I know that if the Government puts up the money for building only the reservoirs that the local people could not and would not put up that much money for the purpose of paying for the lands taken and all damages. This amendment was offered by our Republican Member from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] for the purpose of killing the bill. In their great desire to get this relief for flood control in another measure, and to save any argument, the committee conferees surrendered without a fight and without regard to the House. Next session, if any dams are to be built, an effort will be made to eliminate the political Jenkins amendment.

In the meantime, the Power Trust will probably acquire the power sites in my district. They have an application pending for the same. The Army Engineers, who show more dictatorship than Hitler, will not stand for any dams which include power, although connected with flood control. These same Army Engineers have loaned engineers to the Power Commission to pass upon such matters as the application of the White River Power Co. for the electric-power permits in my district.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. FULLER. I want to thank the gentleman for that 5 minutes. He can have the other 40 minutes.

[Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma, [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I presume the House will probably adopt this conference report. I have seen this House on several occasions send conference reports back with instructions from the House to insist on certain things being put in which were contained in the original bill by the House. On two different occasions in the Seventy-fourth Congress, the House has put into legislation these 26 reservoirs. I am told that the reason they have not remained in the bill is because the Army Engineers have said something. I have never found out what, but the Army Engineers have said something, and therefore these reservoirs, or any part of them, could not remain in the bill.

I happen to know it would have done a great deal of good had 8 or 10 of these reservoirs been permitted to remain in the bill and the balance taken out, but the Army Engineers say they cannot stay in, despite the fact that there is testimony in abundance, given before this same Flood Control Committee, wherein the Army Engineers said these reservoirs were most important. At one point in the recent speech I quoted from the record from the testimony of one of the generals of the Army Engineers, where he said that the construction of these 26 reservoirs would do more to control the floodwaters on the Mississippi River than any other one thing. Despite that, we find our conferees coming back here, after having made no more than a passive fight to keep in the bill the thing that the House of Representatives had twice put in the bill, overridden by the conferees from another body.

Of course, as I say, you will probably adopt this conference report, but what we should do is to send it back to conference and instruct the conferees of this House to insist on the provisions put in the bill by the House of Representatives, or at least that they fight long enough to reach a compromise with those of another body, instead of permitting them to put in the bill what they want and saying to the House, "You do not count. It does not make any difference what you fellows in the lower branch of this Congress want, we are running this show." If you will look at the papers of a few days ago you will find that the great dust bowl out there where about 6 or 7 months of the year the citizens are all covered with dust, driven from their homes, only 3 or 4 days ago was flooded. Now the flood waters are driving them from their homes. The construction of these new reservoirs in this dust bowl would protect those people from these same floods. That is just as important today as is the construction of levees on the lower Mississippi River. In addition to that, it would also contribute something to controlling the flood waters on the lower Mississippi River. The Arkansas and White Rivers continue to be the forgotten intercoastal streams of all our great rivers. It is now time that we demand recognition for them.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Why does not the gentleman make a motion to instruct the conferees so that we can get the desired results on this proposition?

Mr. NICHOLS. The proper motion will be made.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. I may say to the House on behalf of the conferees, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], that they have nothing in this omnibus bill that applied to their districts, and I may say to my colleague from Oklahoma that we were very much interested in trying to have some of those 26 dams placed in this omnibus bill. I think every member of the committee would have been glad to have included some of those dams, but the whole policy of the President and of the Senate was to have a flood-control bill. When the conferees met on Friday, Senator COPELAND asked the Army representative, Captain Clay, to check up and see if it would not be possible to include some of these reservoirs in the bill as flood-control items. They have four of them in the bill. On Monday he returned to the committee and said that the Army Engineers considered the remainder of these projects to be power projects—not flood-control projects. I make this statement in fairness to the members of the committee who tried to do everything they could to support the Miller amendment, and I think they would have stood by the Miller amendment to a man because they were interested in it. If the Army Engineers had not made that adverse report they would have included them in the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I have read the record of what occurred in the Senate on the Overton bill, and I agree that what the gentleman has said is the present attitude of the Army Engineers as expressed to the conferees, but I should like for this House to know this one thing, that the Army Engineers came before the conferees on both the Overton bill and the omnibus bill, H. R. 8455, and said to the conferees, "Now, you cannot put in any of those reservoirs on the Arkansas and the White." Just a few months ago, however, they filed a solemn written statement with the Flood Control Committee of the House in which they said that these 26 reservoirs were the best reservoirs in the Mississippi Valley and would contribute more to the control of flood waters in the Mississippi River than any other reservoirs that could be built. A few months later they made the statement the gentleman from Pennsylvania told you they made. I just wanted the RECORD to show the inconsistency of the Army Engineers.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. Of the 26 reservoirs, the 3 in my district are the only exceptions for power purposes. The others are not for the generation of power. I am not in the flood territory, I live in the mountains. They recommended last year that they were the greatest power sites in the whole country, where electricity could be generated at 8 mills per kilowatt-hour to be sold to the public. In addition it would be one of the greatest aids toward flood control for all that territory. They put them in last year but left them out this year. They gave the gentleman one this year, did they not?

Mr. RICH. No; they were in the bill last year, flood-control dikes; no reservoirs.

Mr. FULLER. But with this provision in the bill the reservoirs cannot be built in the gentleman's district, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman means because the local interests have to buy the rights-of-way?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I realize that the people of my district are going to fight that; but I want to say to the gentleman that somebody has got to establish a policy of who will pay for sites for flood control. Certainly the Army Engineers are qualified to make recommendations as to what should be done for flood control; and if we do not take their recommendation, whose shall we take? General Markham and his assistants are honest men and qualified engineers. The point is we must give consideration to the recommendations of some organization, and if we cannot trust the Army Engineers, whom can we trust? They are in my judgment most qualified. We might change the name of the Army Engineers to that of Government engineers.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, the House conferees have been accused of changing the policy of this omnibus bill. The bill as it passed the House last year required local interests to pay for the rights-of-way, to maintain and to operate these projects. This bill as it comes from the conference committee contains exactly that provision. This bill has never carried any provision that would require the Federal Government to pay for land and rights-of-way. That is why every project that is in this bill will be worthy, will be justified, will carry sufficient benefit to justify its being built, because the local interests will have to put up the money to buy the rights-of-way before the reservoirs can be constructed.

We never have had a Nation-wide flood-control policy. We have had river and harbor bills providing that rivers could be dredged for navigation; and we had the Flood Control Act of 1928 covering the lower Mississippi; but the rest of the streams in the United States have never been embraced within a general-policy bill. There has never been empowering legislation which would give the Federal Government the right to erect flood-control works on tributaries.

The pending bill—H. R. 8455—the conference report on which we are considering now, is the enabling legislation which recognizes the interest of the Federal Government in tributary flood control. If this bill does not carry every project some Member thinks is necessary and that is probably justified, it can be put in the bill in some future year. All the river and harbor projects were not included in the first river and harbor bill.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman says we are laying down the policy. The whole bill is simply an authorization.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is right.

Mr. DISNEY. Why not add to the policy the authorization for the projects that the engineers say are the most important, the 26 that have to do with flood control of the Arkansas and White Rivers? Since we have the policy, why not add the authorization? They will all have to stand on their own bottoms so far as an appropriation later is concerned.

Mr. FERGUSON. They tried to confine this bill to strictly flood-control projects.

Mr. DISNEY. Yes; but in only 3 or 4 out of the 26 is there the element of power value. Flood control is coupled with them.

Mr. FERGUSON. I may say to the gentleman that the Army Engineers decided what were strictly flood-control projects. Every other project that was in the original House bill is to be resurveyed to establish whether they are flood-control projects or not.

Let me impress one thing on the membership. When you say a dam can be built to cover both power and flood control, let me say that the only way a dam can hold water back is to have some empty space, and the only way a dam can be used for the manufacture of power is to keep it full of water and use the water for the generation of power.

Mr. DISNEY. No; that is not so.

Mr. FERGUSON. When the statement is made that you can combine flood-control and power projects it would necessitate building the dam that much higher in order to maintain a space to hold the water.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. NICHOLS. May I ask the gentleman this question, since he bases all of his statement on what the Army Engineers have stated: Would it not be a pretty good idea just to pass a bill turning over to the Army Engineers the power to legislate on flood control?

Mr. FERGUSON. We have to have some authority to go by. We have to have something to base flood-control legislation on. If we do not agree to this conference report and accept this bill, we are tearing down the foundation on which we could build a house.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the bill presently under consideration provides for rivers and streams in 40 States of the Union and does not embrace any in the lower Mississippi Valley, the alluvial region?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is right. If we do not pass this bill, we lose our only chance of taking care of tributary flood control.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to review, if I may, what has been done.

The conference report on the Overton flood-control bill has been approved by this House. That bill deals with the lower Mississippi. In that conference report you struck out the 26 reservoirs on the Arkansas and White Rivers.

I should like to point out, if I may, what we are doing by the adoption of the report on the Overton bill and the adoption of this report insofar as the amount of local contribution to the costs of the work is concerned. The same rule of local contribution is laid down in the Overton bill as is laid down in H. R. 8455, which is that the local interests must supply rights-of-way for levees and reservoirs and the flowage rights for all reservoirs, as well as maintain and operate the works after completion, and hold the Government harmless insofar as damages may occur. That rule, upon its face, looks all right, but let us consider it for a moment.

I call attention now to H. R. 8455. There are some local projects and some reservoirs to which the rule ought to apply, while it should not apply to reservoirs built solely for flood-control purposes. However, you are laying down the same rule for all of them.

Mr. Speaker, I am not criticizing the conferees, because they did the best they could in view of the attitude of the Army Engineers. Let me remind you of what the Army Engineers are doing. I have a great respect for their engineering ability, but so far as their management of national affairs is concerned, I would rather put our national affairs in the hands of hundreds and hundreds of men whom I could name than into the hands of the Army Engineers, and they should not be permitted to dictate or even say what should be done insofar as policy is concerned. Turn to page 71 of this bill, and it will be noted that the first reservoir authorized is one in New Mexico to be used for irrigation and water-supply purposes, as well as incidental flood-control work. The local interests ought to furnish that right-of-way, because there is a direct local benefit. The rule adopted in this bill is just in such cases. They go on and provide for reservoirs in Pennsylvania and other places which will be used for flood-control purposes only, and the local interests are required to furnish the rights-of-way. That is not right. It is wrong. In such a case you take for reservoir purposes 50,000 or 100,000 acres of land and use it for flood-control purposes. You take the land from the tax rolls and still require that community to pay for the land that is to be flooded by the building of the reservoir.

Mr. Speaker, we should not adopt any such general rule but it is the rule that has been adopted in connection with the Overton bill. I do not think there is anything that can be done now except to adopt the conference report. But let it be understood, Mr. Speaker, with the adoption of this conference report, the determination of the question of local contribution to reservoir costs, in future legislation will not be foreclosed. Let it be thoroughly understood that the next session will iron this matter out as it ought to be, so that justice may be done to every community where a project may be located.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. When all is said and done the fact is that the same yardstick with respect to reservoirs applies to every river in the United States, without exception?

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is correct, but the point I make is that some of these reservoirs are used for local purposes, for irrigation purposes, and for water benefits, and I do not want to go on record as approving this rule. However, I am going to vote for the conference report because it is apparently the best that can be done now.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to foreclose myself, and I do not want to be bound by any such rule in the future.

If I come back here I do not want to be told in the future that I supported a bill laying down a certain rule and be charged with trying to change it. The time is coming when we are going to have to change this rule in order to do justice to all the communities affected.

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to my colleague from Arkansas.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman does not have any idea that if we spend hundreds of millions of dollars on this proposition the people are going to stand for a future Congress coming here and passing another "pork barrel" bill such as this?

Mr. MILLER. No.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman does not think any of them will be built, does he?

Mr. MILLER. I do not see how flood-control reservoirs can be built under this rule of local contribution; but I am going to say this to the gentleman, as I stated the other day in my argument for the 26 reservoirs on the Arkansas and the White, if you and I are in Congress 5 years from today we are going to vote for a comprehensive flood-control plan that embraces every watershed in the United States. [Applause.] When we do this, and thus constructively solve the flood-control problems of the Nation, I do not want anyone contending that the local interests should pay for the lands and rights-of-way embraced in the reservoirs, unless the dams are used to promote local interests such as irrigation and water supply for the local community. Sometime a sufficient number of reservoirs will be built on the Arkansas and White Rivers to solve our flood-control problem, and when we do this, I want it done at the expense of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY].

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is simply an authorization bill—not an appropriation resolution. It authorizes these projects. You can go through this bill and look it over, with the result that you will find that nearly every flood-control project in here is simply picked bodily out of the 308 report which Congress provided for several years ago. The Army engineers have simply looked at these projects. They have the work yet to do, and the money has yet to be appropriated.

We have a policy laid down in the bill providing that local benefits must be paid by the local communities, yet you are leaving out the 26 reservoirs in the White and Arkansas Basins that correspond exactly, so far as the Engineers' report is concerned, as the projects in the bill. In other words, they had a general survey by the Army Engineers in the 308 report. When you lay down a policy and authorize other projects, what good reason is to be provided why we should not authorize these 26 reservoirs, except that because, forsooth, the Army Engineers say "nay, nay"?

This is all that is involved. The Army Engineers have approved a vast number of projects in the bill that are in the same shape technically, or so far as mechanical feasibility may be concerned. The Army Engineers have said that they are mechanically feasible, but they do not know what they amount to so far as economic feasibility is concerned.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. MAY. And many of the projects that have not been approved may be considered by them hereafter.

Mr. DISNEY. Yes; and all it amounts to strategically is that if we let the 26 reservoirs go now, we are making a mistake. This big, comprehensive program is going to be the program, and we will have the same old fight about the matter later on if we do not complete the job here and now.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. With reference to the dam in Arkansas, as well as the one the gentleman has in mind, the Power Trust is now making an application to the Federal Power Commission and they are going to get it, and the Army Engineers are working with them and going along with them.

Mr. DISNEY. The hand of the Power Trust is involved everywhere, adversely to all power projects, of course. The Grand River items are left in for a survey only, when they should have been allowed to stay in as we passed House bill 8455 originally. Grand River has enormous hydroelectric potentiality, which fits in with the President's program for rural electrification. I am trying to impress on the House the fact that the 26 reservoirs are exactly like all the other reservoirs in the bill, and there is no logical reason why the 26 should not be in here except the Army Engineers served notice on the conference committee that it cannot be done or shall not be done. Now, who controls? The Army Engineers or the Congress? Who determines the policy, who passes the appropriation bills to pay the bills finally? Congress.

The Army Engineers do not know any more about these projects than they did in 1928. I defy any member of the Flood Control Committee to deny the statement that the projects in the bill are simply under the 308 report designated as mechanically feasible. As to their economic feasibility, the Engineers have not gone into that, and they have just as good and sound reasons to say that nearly every project in the bill should be omitted as to say that the 26 reservoirs should be stricken.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that in this bill, on the Arkansas River, six reservoirs are carried in this omnibus bill?

Mr. FULLER. No; only four.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Six on the Arkansas and its tributaries, and 2 of the 13 on the Arkansas that you have been contending for.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. DISNEY. Further answering the gentleman from Mississippi, there is no more reason for the nine to be taken out of the bill than there is for the four to be in the bill. No one of them is particularly better than the other and they ought all to be in. There cannot be a definite reason furnished why they should not be put in.

I would hate to see the bill defeated. I have fought for it for 3 years. I think the House ought to have some rights, some place, sometimes, without some bureau directing not only the policy, but the exact details of the legislation. I hope the conference report will not be adopted and that the committee be forced to include the 26 projects.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say in conclusion that the policy adopted was whether or not the project was economical and would bring the benefit of a dollar for every dollar expended. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. THOMPSON) there were 117 ayes and 18 noes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-eight Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 297, nays 51, not voting 76, as follows:

EFFICIENCY OF THE AIR CORPS

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11920) to increase the efficiency of the Air Corps, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments as follows:

Page 3, line 4, strike out "that" and insert: "such temporary appointments may be vacated at any time upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War: Provided further, That."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11140) to provide more effectively for the national defense by further increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, with Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. HILL of Alabama, Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire, and Mr. MCLEAN.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. GASSAWAY] is ill and necessarily absent. If he were here, he would have voted yea on the adoption of the conference report upon the flood-control bill.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10919) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year 1937, with Senate amendments thereto, that the House insist upon its amendment to Senate amendment numbered 49 and further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendments numbered 48 and 52, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees:

Mr. LUDLOW, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. GRANFIELD, Mr. O'NEAL, Mr. TABER, Mr. MCLEOD.

THE FLORIDA SHIP CANAL

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, by reason of action in the Senate on Saturday last, the House again will be called upon to decide whether or not it will be a party to proceeding with the construction of the Florida ship canal.

This project was begun under an allotment of $5,200,000 of the emergency relief appropriation, 1935, and will require, to complete, an additional $138,000,000. These figures were supplied to the Appropriations Committee by the Chief of Engineers.

This project has never been authorized by Congress, and it was for that reason that the House refused to appropriate for it in the War Department appropriation bill. Here is what was said in the House hearings about the Florida ship canal:

Mr. POWERS. General Pillsbury, just to clear up something in my own mind, will you tell me this about the Florida ship canal? Was that approved by the same type of board that the Passamaquoddy project was approved by?

General PILLSBURY. No; to the best of my recollection, that was not recommended by any board. The report is now before the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and, upon the request of Members of Congress from Florida, the Board has adjourned the hearing on the proposition until interested parties should have a further opportunity to assemble data in support of it.

Mr. POWERS. Do I understand, then, that the Florida ship canal has never been approved by any board of the Army Engineers or anyone else?

General PILLSBURY. I do not recollect any.

Captain CLAY. There was a special board, and they did point out that, although it lacked complete economic justification with a part of its cost charged to relief, it would be suitable as a relief project.

At the time the War Department appropriation bill was presented to the House on February 10, 1936—4 months ago—it was stated to the House in the committee's report that there was ample time for the appropriate legislative committee to study the project in order that the House might at least have the views of such committee before being called upon for the first time to appropriate money for continuing with the project, and it was stated then that the appropriation could be made later in a deficiency measure if favorably endorsed.

After the lapse of 4 months there has been no effort made to get legislative authorization in the usual way. Instead, the proposition is to let three unnamed engineers—not Army engineers, upon whom we have always relied in the past—to determine whether or not the Government shall proceed with this costly undertaking, which lacks economic justification, and which will mean and can only mean the indefinite postponement of the commencement of meritorious regularly authorized projects all over the country, simply because there will not be enough money to proceed with this Florida ship-canal project at an economical rate of progress and to undertake those projects which are awaiting Federal funds in the usual way for their commencement.

As to these projects, I quote the following from the report of the Senate Committee on Appropriations on the War Department appropriation bill:

A list of authorized river and harbor projects follows. They are widely distributed, and the committee believes the unemployment situation in many localities will be relieved by these useful public works.

Each of these projects has been approved by the Army engineers, endorsed by the appropriate committees, and adopted by the Congress. The following report has been presented by the Army engineers:

Amounts which can be profitably expended during the fiscal year 1937 on projects authorized by Congress necessary in the interest of commerce and navigation and on which no substantial delay is expected in the fulfillment of conditions of local cooperation

The War Department appropriation bill makes available $14,750,000 for going ahead with the projects on that list. Those not fortunate enough to share in that relatively small amount must await their chances of a future appropriation for their commencement.

The river and harbor appropriations are now at an all-time high and should be reduced and not added to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee report on House Joint Resolution 619 may be filed at any time before midnight tonight, and also the minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JEFFERSON DAVIS

The SPEAKER. Under special order, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] for 15 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, today is the one hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the birth of Jefferson Davis.

I realize the anxiety of Congress to dispose of pending business without undue delay and adjourn. In that purpose I heartily concur. But even under such conditions I am not unreasonable when I ask you to pause for a brief interval and to pay tribute, in which all unbiased and intelligent people can now wholeheartedly join, to an outstanding soldier, statesman, and patriot, whose memory is entitled to equal veneration with that of other great men whose lives and accomplishments have been interwoven with crucial events of our Nation's history.

The time allowed me is too short for me to enter upon any extended discussion of his life and character. Indeed, it is unnecessary that anyone should do so, for those who desire to be fair have long ago sought impartial sources of information available in libraries throughout the country and have become convinced not only of his great ability but of the purity of his purposes and the nobility of his mind and heart. If there still are those in this modern day, more than 70 years after the end of the War between the States, who cannot lay aside the memories of the bitterness of that struggle and be fair to those on both sides who participated in it, no statement that I or anyone else could make would possibly affect their mental attitude. I prefer to believe that the viewpoint of most people of other sections than the South is represented by the statement of Charles Francis Adams, made more than a quarter of a century ago in a review of a life of Jefferson Davis then recently issued from the press. He said:

> No fatal mistake, either of administration or strategy, was made which can be fairly laid to his account. * * * He did the best that was possible with the means that he had at command. Merely the opposing forces were too many and too strong for him. Of his austerity, earnestness, and fidelity, it seems to me there can be no more question than can be entertained of his capacity.

The people of the South have always been in accord, and there is no reason why the people of other sections should not accord as well, with the sentiments ably expressed by Senator Benjamin H. Hill, of my own State, when he said:

> I know Jefferson Davis as I know few men. I have been near him in his public duties. I have seen him by his private fireside; I have witnessed his humble Christian devotions, and I challenge the judgment of history when I say no people were ever led through the fiery struggle for liberty by a nobler, truer patriot, while the carnage of war and the trials of public life never revealed a purer and more beautiful Christian character.

Jefferson Davis' father, Samuel Davis, was a native of Georgia, where he served his country with distinction during the Revolutionary War. His ancestors had been among those to receive grants from William Penn. His great-grandfather had a brother David, who was the father of Samuel Davies—note the different spelling of the name—who became the fourth president of the College of New Jersey, now Princeton University. I mention these facts to show that the North as well as the South has reason to be proud of the family of the former President of the ill-fated Confederacy; and that honor and courage, fidelity and ability are not indigenous alone to any particular soil, although the obligations of men as they conceive them to be may be affected by their surroundings and the rights and interests of those about them.

That statement is further illustrated by the fact that Kentucky was the birthplace of both Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln, the one growing to manhood in Mississippi and the other in Illinois. Who can believe that if the chance that sent Lincoln to Illinois had directed him to Mississippi instead, and if Jefferson Davis had emigrated from Kentucky to Illinois, the one would have directed the Union in the War between the States and the other presided over the destinies of the Confederacy? Even the greatest of men are to a large extent the creatures of circumstance. It is well to credit men with fine traits of character developed by adherence to high ideals, and which are commendable, whether they are developed in an Abraham Lincoln or a Jefferson Davis. It is not well either to credit or charge men with the results of influences in their lives which they could no more resist than the floating leaf could resist the action of the whirlpool.

Whether the conception had by Jefferson Davis of his duties and responsibilities as a citizen of Mississippi when his State seceded from the Union was right or wrong is beside the question in trying to arrive at a correct estimate of his character. I believe he was right. Doubtless many of you believe he was wrong. But I also believe—and I think every reason of logic sustains the belief—that if Abraham Lincoln had grown to manhood in Mississippi, instead of Illinois, he, too, would have been alined on the side of the Confederacy.

Every act of Davis' life was consistent with the highest ideals and the noblest of characters. Many portions of his career are little known, or, at least, not often mentioned. Graduating from West Point in 1828, he spent the 7 years immediately following as an officer in the United States Army, during which time he distinguished himself in the Black Hawk War. In 1835 he resigned from the Army, married the daughter of Gen. Zachary Taylor, and retired to civil life in Mississippi. The untimely death of his bride in a few months brought great sorrow, which for a time retarded his hopes and aspirations.

In 1844 he became a Member of this body and from that time on until after the war was identified with the public life of the Nation, serving during this period as United States Senator with distinction in a body which numbered among its membership some of the great names in American history: John C. Calhoun, Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Thomas H. Benton, Lewis Cass, Salmon P. Chase, Stephen A. Douglas, and many others. Among all of these brilliant men, he took rank with the foremost, and by some, including the historian Prescott, he was referred to as the most accomplished Member of that body.

In the interim between his service in the House of Representatives and his service in the Senate, he commanded a regiment of Mississippi volunteers in the Mexican War, resigning his seat in Congress for that purpose. At the Battle of Buena Vista he and his regiment were largely responsible for turning the tide. In that battle he was severely wounded. Gen. Zachary Taylor said of him: "Napoleon never had a marshal who behaved more superbly than did Colonel Davis today." Thus did he demonstrate the glorious patriotism of a man, who, so far from weighing consequences to himself of devotion to his country, was willing to sacrifice life itself if necessary in its defense. It is impossible to read of the Jefferson Davis of the Black Hawk and Mexican Wars, the Jefferson Davis whose voice rang out so many times in the halls of the House of Representatives and the Senate in efforts to compose the bitter sectional differences that existed and prevent the fratricidal strife of the sixties, without realizing that the man who responded so nobly to patriotic impulses in those times of trial could not have been actuated by other than the highest and purest motives in the part he thereafter took in the War between the States.

His term of service during the administration of President Franklin Pierce as Secretary of War further disclosed those same qualities of lofty character, high patriotism, and able statesmanship which distinguished his later service as President of the Confederacy.

I shall not discuss at length that service. The blazing spotlights of every history in the land are upon it. Because I thought they would furnish a measure of interpretation of his acts in that capacity, I have sought to stress the facts with regard to parts of his career which are too little discussed. Not only the period of his life's history before the War between the States should be studied in this connection but the long and honorable record of good citizenship which he had after the war and until the time of his death in 1889.

That his every act and utterance while he served as President of the Confederate States—a position which, by the way, he did not seek—was influenced and dictated by the same pure impulses and emotions that distinguished his entire career cannot be doubted. Had he led a successful cause, his name would now be chronicled in the world's history alongside that of Washington. In the minds of fair-minded Americans who, I confidently believe, are in the great majority, he ranks with the greatest men of our Nation who have distinguished themselves either in victory or defeat. While he was accorded harsher and more cruel treatment after the war than other leaders of the Confederacy, and efforts were made to attach stigmas to his name that none would consider for a moment in connection with such men as Lee, Jackson, Stephens, and Gordon, yet it cannot be successfully denied that he served with as pure motives and with as great ability in his particular field the same cause in which they won undying glory, and must always have with them a place in the hearts of his people.

It required nearly 250 years for the people of England to recognize the greatness of Cromwell and to erect a monument to him near where his body was gibbeted and his head thereafter exposed to the jeers of every passerby. Thank God, it has not required so long for America to forget the bitterness of the sixties and pay tribute where it is due.

There may still be some who object to the recognition of great traits of character in one with whom they or their ancestors once entertained bitter differences of opinion. It is to the credit of the American people that they constitute a small and unimportant minority. When such as these are inclined to give vent to unthinking prejudices and bitter reflections, may I not suggest to them that they endeavor to emulate the example of Jefferson Davis, of whom it has truly been said:

He was an archer regal,
Who laid the mighty low,
But his arrows were fledged by the eagle
And sought not a fallen foe.

FISCAL POLICIES OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KOPPLEMANN). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it may have been noticed that I have been rather insistent for 2 or 3 days in asking for time under a special order. So many special orders have been granted on the other side that I felt we had the right to insist upon one on this side. Certainly I do not wish to continue the embarrassment by any objection from our side to those who may want a few moments to speak, but a short time ago I made a few remarks on the floor relating to the advantages and disadvantages of the deflation of the currency and I did wish to discuss with my colleagues a little further the present fiscal policies of our Government and what has been aptly termed of late "nervous money." I shall now be content to ask permission that I may extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on Memorial Day a great patriot, Gen. John J. Pershing, issued a warning of the real danger of dictatorship in these United States. As the occasion demanded, his words were carefully guarded. We can only assume the persons and the organizations he may have had in mind.

The following is a brief quotation from his address:

It is almost axiomatic to say that a people who complacently submit to unreasonable demands of a clamorous minority will certainly become the prey of a dictator.

In effect, he urged us to pledge anew our faith in our democracy, but he painted a gloomy picture. I have been reading of so-called giants of the present day who are now molding public opinion. The following were mentioned by the writer: Tugwell, Coughlin, Townsend, and Father Divine. It may have been minorities swayed by such as these that General Pershing had in mind. But there have been other successful minorities that have gained their ends which, of course, he did not see fit to mention on such an occasion.

Of these "giants", by far the most able, patient, and apparently successful in the gradual attainment of his philosophy is Professor Tugwell. He knows what he wants, and is extremely clear in his statements, when allowed to discuss his doctrines. He seems to adhere resolutely to his early statement of a few years ago. I quote:

We have a century and more of development to undo—the first series of changes will have to do with statutes, with constitutions, and with government. It will require the laying of rough hands, unholy hands on many a sacred precedent, doubtless calling on an enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement. A kind of civil-service loyalty and fervor will need to grow gradually into acceptance.

In his famous Los Angeles speech of rather recent date, he declared that he wanted a disciplined state and hoped to bring it about by the ballot or a so-called peaceful revolution. He desires a submission of the people under leadership, as he expressed it. This was, indeed, a purely Fascist speech. Father Coughlin also seems to desire to bring about a revolution by the ballot, although he apparently wishes to achieve economic changes merely. He well knows that such a revolution invariably goes much further and affects also the morals and religion of a people and probably fears that this would result. Certainly these abrupt changes in our economic life would most naturally affect our present viewpoints as to moral dealings and would mean opposition to the power of the clergy if the new viewpoint should run counter to their codes.

As a warning of the results of the various "isms" now in complete control of other nations, I would read an excerpt as follows:

Perhaps it is sufficient to say, very briefly and incompletely, that all three—fascism, nazi-ism, and communism—are negations of democracy, that all three go on the assumption that government is omnipotent, that the individual has no rights which government need respect, that government has unlimited power to compel the individual to do what government demands; that all three include enormous concentration of power in an individual or group, going so far as fairly to be called dictatorship; that all three include suspension, partial or complete, of the legislative branch of government; that all three look upon the existence of any minority party, any organization of any kind opposed to the group holding power, as treason. And to American minds it will help if we add that all three variations of the European conception deny those principles which in America are incorporated into the Bill of Rights and the rest of the Constitution. All three deny freedom of opinion and freedom of the press, because freedom of the press turns minorities into majorities and therefore cannot be endured; all three deny the independence of the courts; all three deny the right of habeas corpus and the right of trial by jury; two of the three deny freedom of religion.

There is little cause for wonder that the general paints a gloomy picture.

Immediately ahead of us is an election, at which time our people will be called upon to choose between candidates and platforms which will either lead us nearer to submission under leadership or will reassert that liberty is still more to be desired than regimentation. Apparently secure behind the scenes, Dr. Tugwell will probably be heard from but little in this campaign. Well does he know that, although a conciliatory platform will be written and plausible speeches in explanation of the carrying out of his so-called doctrines under the pleas of emergency will be made, he nevertheless has good cause to believe that the path already taken under his direction will be resumed should his candidate be successful. Of course, he must now realize that any platform adopted by the so-called Democratic Party can, and probably will, be thrown into the Potomac immediately after the election. Although gloriously supported by the electorate, such was the fate of the 1932 platform.

Even with the costly so-called social reforms carried on by this administration, the severest critics appear to be those who should seemingly be most favorable. Recent pronouncements of Coughlin and Townsend are indeed rather surprising. Can they regard the President as being insincere? Until recently it was supposed that the overtures of this administration would serve to secure the support of these "giants" of public opinion.

However, I shall for the present pass over the effects of the doctrines of regimentation, social justice, and the getting-something-for-nothing schemes. I find the financial picture a gloomy one, not only when we look ahead to what is facing us in the future but even when we view the present unfortunate prevailing conditions. In matters of finance no man now feels safe. As time goes on he will feel less safe. That moment must come when citizens may hesitate to finance further huge governmental spendings. We now not only carry on vastly increased ordinary expenditures of Government, including wasteful and nonliquidating projects of little permanent value, but have also embarked upon vast socialistic experiments under the name of social security, regarding the results of which no economist dares express opinion. It is unnecessary to depict conditions which will result at that moment when Government financing meets with such resistance. Lest I may again be classed as a prophet of the Jeremiah type, I would say that I am simply following the warnings of the large number of those who have been connected with the finances of this administration, but who have severed such connection and, because of their acquired knowledge, are now thundering their warnings in widely read magazines and the columns of the newspapers. It is hoped that these warnings will be heeded by an aroused electorate.

I have been greatly interested in reading, of late, of nervous money, so-called. Owing to wars, rumors of wars, and the chaotic conditions in so many nations, possessors of wealth desire to keep liquid their assets and transfer them, at pleasure, to those nations which at the time seem to be the safest havens. In 1934 more than $1,000,000,000 in gold and silver was sent for safekeeping to the United States. In 1935 more than $2,000,000,000 was received. Previous to this some $7,000,000,000, and possibly a much greater amount, was deposited or invested here for the benefit of foreigners. No one can possibly predict the moment when this wealth may be quietly withdrawn. It has great potentialities of causing us financial trouble, as was exemplified in the crash of 1929, when not only foreigners but our own nationals withdrew funds for safer havens or for hoarding. In passing, may I call attention to the extraordinarily profitable opportunity presented to foreigners to bring in gold, receive $35 per ounce, and invest in our securities, thus securing an advantage over our own people who are forced to use a 59-cent dollar. They would also be entitled to sell these same securities and have the privilege of converting their dollars into gold, if they live in countries which are still on the gold standard, and send it back home again. This privilege is, of course, denied our own citizens. What is to be done about this situation? Certainly it would appear that before any drastic action could be taken more complete actual knowledge of the character and amount of these transactions should be obtained. Of course, it may be suggested that foreigners who purchased our securities before devaluation may have suffered losses and that the present discrimination in their favor may serve as a salve to this discrimination.

Heretofore, investments by universities, hospitals, and other endowed organizations could be made for reasonably long terms and with reasonable safety in mortgages and first-class bonds providing a dependable and even return. Plans for regular activities and future development could be formulated. Today mortgages and bonds seem to be regarded as perhaps a greater gamble than common stocks, commodities, and real estate. Short-term bonds, callable almost at will when interest rates might be more favorable, now present a real problem for investors. The banks, of course, welcome these more frequent commissions. The investor must give up his profitable investment and seek another. Either way he is left holding the bag.

The little fellows with their $22,000,000,000 in investments in life-insurance companies and the some 15,000,000 small depositors, aggregating $10,000,000,000 in savings banks, have also noted with misgiving the attitude of their own Government toward them. The devaluation of their dollar, the seizure of their gold, the granting of moratoria on mortgages, the assistance and apparent encouragement given even to municipalities in the matter of going into bankruptcy, the frantic attempts to raise prices on their purchases—all these, when fully realized, will undoubtedly tend to excite their interest when they are again to deposit their ballots. These conditions are practically new to our American life. Often have we endured business crashes, bank failures, and business rascalities without resorting to such governmental interventions carrying the seeds of worse conditions sure to follow. These acts of our own Government have shocked the conscience of those who reposed confidence in it and who even assisted in their beginnings. In short, we are now enforced gamblers in an attempt to secure return on investment.

Little consideration is given to those who have been thrifty and saved their earnings. All efforts seem to be directed to take from those who have and distribute to those who have not. Low returns on investment reduce proportionally the value of the investment itself. We hesitate to believe it, but wealth actually vanishes in the process of distribution. Profits, or so-called income, are taxed to the extreme point. They are not allowed to be used to reduce the investment. Only until the entire investment is returned should profits possibly be assessed. Even sales of properties acquired by investment could then be classed as income for taxable purposes, but the investor has been made secure from the vagaries of our tax processors. Another example: An investment of $150,000 has quickly been reduced to a value of $50,000. The income has amounted to only $5,000 but a deduction of $100,000 could, of course, be taken. If during the next year the same should recoup in value to the original $150,000, would this be regarded as profit? Certainly a tax of perhaps 40 percent would be demanded if the securities representing the $50,000 were sold and reinvested in other securities which climb to the value of $150,000. It seems like a ridiculous situation, but is not too uncommon. Such methods of plundering the taxpayer, combined with extravagant expenditures and huge borrowings, are viewed with alarm; confidence is to a large extent destroyed.

If these conditions are not checked very, very soon, we are led to the inexorable condition of inflation, the results of which have been amply and fully exemplified by many other nations formerly acknowledged to have been of great financial stability. Are there any signs of these warnings being heeded? Small wonder that many formerly connected with the financial policies of this Government have taken almost precipitate flight, anxious to avoid association with the results that they feel sure are to ensue. We may well ask, "Who is now advising the Executive on fiscal policies?" We can only suspect them to be those who will bend to his will or desires. Even though business is claimed to have reached a 90-percent recovery, Congress finds itself called upon to spend $600,000,000 more than last year and to inflict upon the Nation a new tax bill of even larger dimensions. Business recovery was bound to come. Replacements had to be made. The Government has doubtless aided recovery to some extent by many of its activities. However, it has proceeded beyond the bounds of reason, and the huge debt of the Government and its constant urging of its citizens to borrow and go into debt carry possibilities of worse depressions. Business would have recovered in a large degree without all this, and any boast of the administration that it has been the full cause of recovery must, indeed, remind us of chanticleer crowing because of the sunrise he had caused.

The day of payment must come. What further sacrifices will be demanded of those who have risked their savings? Small wonder that recklessness of spending for one's own pleasure, rather than the exercise of thrift, is now so plainly evident among our citizens. Just now, this profligate administration may be expecting to harvest the votes of those who have not. But perhaps more of these than is now anticipated will, before the election, awaken to the sad truth. They may come to the full realization that even though they may have little now, a continuance of these present extravagances can only mean the further postponement of the desired day when they can hope to secure a worth-while livelihood by their own initiative and endeavor and no longer be dependent upon governmental charity.

Your candidate for President in 1932, with great emphasis, promised retrenchment, a balanced Budget, less borrowing, and all other necessary measures leading to a sound fiscal policy. He has completely repudiated these promises and done the most extreme opposite. Yet it is with apparent confidence that he will go before the same electorate again, pouring honey into the microphone in the form of new promises, and in effect reminding the voters of the Santa Claus which he has been to so many of them. The slogan "Do not bite the hand that feeds you" has been adopted. Ah, but do they really believe in such a Santa Claus? We await the answer in November.

JAPANESE COMPETITION IN THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Speaker, a short time ago the administration, through the Secretary of State, announced that, effective June 20, imports of cotton fabrics from Japan would be subject to an increase of 42 percent in tariff duties. This action, under authority of section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, which granted the President the right to increase duties up to 50 percent, was belatedly taken after many appeals and protests had been made by Members of Congress representing sections of the country whose textile industries had been suffering tragically from the competition of goods manufactured in Japan.

Within the industry it was hailed as a step in the right direction, but there is no real likelihood that it will effect a real solution of the problem. Indeed, it appears to many that the action is merely in the nature of a sop or gesture, perhaps for political purposes, in an effort to conciliate the textile-manufacturing sections. In any event it would appear to be a case of supplying the stable door with a very flimsy lock after many horses had been stolen, since the number of mills which have already succumbed in part, at least, as a result of this unfair competition constitutes an American tragedy.

Secretary Hull predicted that this new arrangement would constitute a more "definite, adequate, and satisfactory" undertaking, which is probably incontrovertible, for certainly the former so-called voluntary gentleman's agreement was in no sense definite, adequate, or satisfactory. Under that the Japanese Government had, in effect, promised that there would be no abnormal increase in the amount of cotton cloth exported to the United States. Yet statistics show that during the first quarter of this year more than twenty-one and a half million square yards came into this country from Japan, as compared with less than 13,000,000 for the corresponding period a year ago. But even if the new arrangement is more definite and satisfactory than the former one, can anybody really believe that it will prove adequate in placing a curb on such importations, a curb sufficient to check this disastrous competition? Our manufacturers say not.

Speakers supporting the administration's policy in these matters have endeavored to make much of the alleged fact that, even with that marked increase of imports, they constituted only about one-half of 1 percent of the total yardage of American production. In the matter of mere percentage this is admittedly not large, but the statement begs the real question. As I have previously stated on many occasions, domestic prices are, to a very great degree, determined by the price charged for competing goods, regardless of the amount thereof. And so long as any textile goods are allowed to come into competition with those of American manufacture, carrying a tariff which will permit of their being sold for less than our concerns can create and market them, they will adversely affect the price range of such domestic goods. Bear in mind the fact that Japanese goods are produced by women forced to tend more spindles per person than is permitted under our system and yet the highest paid of them receive but the equivalent of 23 cents a day, as compared with the 23 cents and more per hour paid to our operatives and made necessary by the American standard of living for labor.

To me it is inconceivable that even the newly established rate of duties can be effective in materially equalizing the difference and checking the flow of competing goods into this country. All it will do is to some slight extent cut down the profits—which must have been enormous—to the Japanese manufacturers.

Heretofore the administration has been exceedingly kind to Japan in this matter, with serious and at times fatal consequences to our own industry. Reliance was placed upon that gentleman's agreement that the Nipponese Government would not permit any abnormal increase of cotton imports, yet during the month of March of this year, the importation of Japanese-made cotton cloth reached the all-time high of 8,666,687 square yards, according to a statement of the Department of Agriculture.

And recently Shingo Tsuda, the president of a big Japanese spinning concern and one of that nation's leading industrialists, frankly served notice on America and the world that no amount of tariff increases—he mentioned the figures of 70 to 80 percent ad valorem against Japanese goods—would keep their goods out of our markets. He stated in effect that the foreign demand for Japanese cotton goods will increase in proportion to increases in tariff rates against them, and even limitless increases in tariff rates will be utterly ineffective to prevent the movement of goods. It is a strong statement, and perhaps goes further than the facts would warrant in his concluding assertion, but it is obviously based on the theory which I have enunciated that Japan holds an absolutely commanding position in the matter of cost of production, and also that any lower price to the consuming public, no matter how small the margin may be, will result in a demand for the cheaper goods. And this inevitably establishes, or seriously affects, the prices which can be charged for American-made goods. How contradictory is the administration's attitude. On the one hand the President asserts that prices must be raised in order to protect and preserve the standard of living and give more jobs and better wages to American industry. On the other hand the administration asserts that reciprocal trade demands that we accept goods from Japan and elsewhere, the effect of the admission of which is to defeat that other object.

Of course, I am well aware that in matters of this nature there are inevitably conflicts of interest, and that sometimes compromises have to be made to serve the interests of all the parties involved. This point was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] in his defense of the administration's procedure on May 29. He made much of the fact that, apparently as a result of the reciprocal trade agreement, we sold Japan a million and a half bales of raw cotton last year, this resulting in a favorable trade balance for the United States. But had that trade agreement anything real to do with the matter? If the administration contends that the increased exports were the result of these newly consummated trade agreements, how does it account for the fact that during the first quarter of this year our exports also increased to Germany by 50 percent, to the Union of South Africa by 34 percent, to the United Kingdom by 10 percent, and to Soviet Russia by no less than 262 percent? We have no trade agreements with any of those countries?

No, gentlemen, Japan did not buy our cotton in an increased amount as a return favor for what amounted to an invitation to her to send us more manufactured textile goods. She bought it because she had to have it and for the time being could obtain it from us at something approximating the world price, thanks to the methods pursued by the administration to subsidize the cotton producers for raw cotton sold above. But that this subsidy was not sufficient to move the entire stock of surplus raw cotton is clearly evidenced by the fact that we have many millions of pounds still on hand in Government warehouses. Moreover, it should be clear that even this increase in our cotton export to Japan was a temporary thing, resulting from the laws of supply and demand. And that the whole policy which has been adopted by the Government regarding the raising of farm prices through the restriction of acreage carries within it the seeds of destruction is nowhere more clearly evidenced than in the matter of cotton. Once we had almost a monopoly of that important commodity. The world had to come to us for it. But as a result of the artificial raising of prices through lessened production, several other nations have been encouraged to go into cotton growing on a steadily increasing major scale. Parts of South America, India, and Egypt are now well on the road to becoming sources of world supply in the cotton field and they will be able to sell the commodity for less than we can—unless the Government is for all time to grant increasingly large equalizing subsidies. The probabilities are that due to their lower labor costs and standards of living they will in time be in a position to undersell us as drastically as the Japanese can and do in the matter of manufactured textiles. Then you may be very sure that, as the supply available for export in these other countries increases and the cost goes down, Japan will buy from them, rather than from us. They are essentially businessmen and no sentiment engendered of friendly reciprocal treaties will be allowed to stand in the way of securing the best possible buy.

I am entirely sincere in my repeated statement that I, as much as anyone, wish to see the American farmer made prosperous, and if that can be achieved by a reasonable cooperation by the textile industry, it is only fair that the latter should make its proportionate contribution for the benefit of the Nation as a whole. But I cannot believe that the methods at present being pursued can bring more than a very temporary alleviation to the cotton grower and that if persisted in they will utterly destroy his foreign market, and "the last state will be worse than the first." And most emphatically I believe that the contribution which the textile industry, in the North and South alike, has been called upon to make—small as it may appear in the matter of percentage—has been, and is, utterly unreasonable. The very existence of a great industry with a huge amount of invested capital and employing millions of workers is threatened, just as a huge building may be threatened by a thing no larger than a termite.

When the subject of national defense is before us we are all emphatic on one point. While we refuse to be the aggressor we are determined to have a defense wholly adequate to protect America and American home interests against any invasion. Yet something in the nature of an invasion has been and is occurring right now, which threatens our national well-being and the jobs, if not the lives, of countless of our countrymen. If it continues more and more mills must close, more and more men and women be forced into the ranks of the unemployed and onto the relief rolls.

The administration seems to have become belatedly aware that there is really a serious situation and has taken at least a step in the right direction. I believe, however, that what has been done is not nearly enough. The President apparently is unwilling to take stern measures and probably under the authority improperly delegated to him he does not have the power to set up safeguards which could be made adequate. It is the duty of the Congress to resume its own proper functions and provide such an adequate national defense against the threat which continues to exist against the well-being—if not the very existence—of one of its most important industries.

THE NATION'S YOUTH

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address by Dr. Brown, assistant to the Director of the Emergency Conservation Work.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following statement by Dr. Edgar G. Brown, special assistant to the Director of Emergency Conservation Work, given at the thirtieth general conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City, May 16, 1936:

President Roosevelt, in a recent speech, said:

"There are none of us who do not hope that our children get a better break than we have had. We want them to have an opportunity for profitable character building; decent, wholesome living; good work; and good play."

This stement is exemplary of the inclusiveness of the spirit and practice of the New Deal administration.

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, addressing a group of colored educators under the auspices of the national conference on "Fundamentals in the Education of Negroes", in Washington, D. C., May 9, 1933, said:

"I noticed in the papers this morning the figures given of the cost in certain States per capita for the education of a colored child and of a white child, and I could not help but think as I read that item how stupid we are in some ways, for, of course, in any democracy the one important thing is to see, as far as possible, that every child receives at least the best education that child is able to assimilate. I feel that, while we have been fortunate in this country in having many fine men and women interested in the education of the Negro race, we have also been slow, many of us of the white race, in realizing how important it is that your people should have the best educational advantages, important not only to your race, but to ours as well."

June 26, 1935, by Executive Order 7036, President Roosevelt created the National Youth Administration. August 1, 1935, Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune, of Daytona, Fla., for many years one of the leading educators of the colored race, and Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson, president of Howard University, were appointed by the President as members of the N. Y. A. national advisory committee.

April 29, 1936, in the drawing room of the White House, from 9 p. m. until nearly midnight, the President reviewed with members of the national advisory committee the phenomenal progress made to date in this new social project, which guarantees greater security to the Nation's youth and an abiding faith in themselves and their elders.

Aubrey Williams, the inspired genius and executive secretary of the N. Y. A., presented each member of the committee. In her turn Mrs. Bethune recited the accomplishments of the colored youth as reflected in the statistical records of the organization.

Mrs. Bethune made particular mention of the excellent work of Miss Juanita Sadler, of the national Y. W. C. A., who had been loaned to the N. Y. A. to act as special adviser on the program for the colored youth. She spoke of Miss Sadler's administrative ability, tact, and firmness in pressing forward in the extension and effective solution of race adjustment.

Mrs. Bethune's report to the President can be summarized as follows:

Twenty-eight colored leaders are members of the State N. Y. A. advisory committees, North and South. An equal number of colored assistant State directors and trained college men and women of the colored race are filling high executive positions in New York, Pennsylvania, Florida, Virginia, Kentucky, Illinois, Tennessee, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri, Georgia, Colorado, California, and Texas, whose State programs include the largest number of young colored men and women.

The N. Y. A. is helping approximately 26,500 colored youth to continue in school through payments for part-time work under supervision of school authorities. These young people range in age from 16 to 25. There are approximately 5,000 of these students in undergraduate classes. Seventy graduate college students are enrolled. The average monthly rate per college student is $15, while the graduate students receive from $25 to $30 monthly. The remaining 14,000 of high-school class are being paid a maximum of $6 monthly.

Of the $50,000,000 expended by the N. Y. A. during the past year, it is conservatively estimated that the financial benefits to the colored youth of the country has been more than one-tenth of the total.

Dr. Ambrose Caliver, former dean of Fiske University and a specialist in Negro education, United States Office of Education, was loaned to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. He recommended to Administrator Hopkins the appointment of James A. Atkins as assistant to direct the field activities of the emergency-education program as it concerned colored men and women. It is estimated that about 30,000 otherwise unemployed colored school teachers have been given work at better salaries on the average, especially in the South, than they had ever received before. It should be noted that the minimum salary set by Administrator Hopkins has meant a much higher scale of wages of the hundreds of thousands of colored persons on W. P. A. projects throughout the country. Likewise the largest number of colored citizens have been employed under the Administration's Federal work program in capacities commensurate with their special training than ever in the history of private employment. Hundreds of research experts, administrative officials, supervisors, skilled workmen, and white-collar workers of the Negro race have been given an equal opportunity under the Federal program.

On November 1, 1935, there were 61 colored C. C. C. companies on soil-conservation work under the United States Department of Agriculture. Reforestation was second and recreational improvement in State parks was third. These C. C. C. youths are engaged in doing levee work, drainage, flood control, and fire prevention. Millions of dollars have been saved the country by the activities of the C. C. C. enrollees in flood control, fire prevention, and the like.

One of the most interesting projects undertaken by the C. C. C., in my opinion, is the archeological work done by the enrollees at Yorktown, Va. This was done by colored C. C. C. boys.

Reflecting the general improvement in conditions throughout the country among colored people is the statement of Dr. J. E. Walker, president of a life-insurance company of Memphis, Tenn. Practically all of the business of the company is among colored people in Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, and Tennessee. The company suffered the usual loss of business during the dark days prior to 1932. In 1930 officials were forced to borrow from the R. F. C. to continue in business. Early in 1932, Dr. Walker reports, it was found necessary to take over a number of farms on whom the company held mortgages. Things were dark indeed. But, to quote Dr. Walker:

"Better conditions were reflected shortly after beginning of the A. A. A. program and have continued to improve. In 1934, in fact, our business was better than in any year of the existence of our company. In March 1935 we were able to pay our loan to the R. F. C."

In addition to the temporal gain for our race, we must not overlook the great revival of the spirit of religion that has swept our people. I doubt if there is any problem, social, political, or economic, that would not yield under the fire of such an awakening. At our neighbor's fireside we find new fuel for the fires of faith on our own hearthside.

My vote is all for the New Deal and my unswerving and enthusiastic approval of the President's leadership is a source of inexpressible joy to me.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two short newspaper extracts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, we are not permitted to put newspaper articles in the RECORD. I object.

YOUTH STRIKES BACK

Mr. FENERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a radio address which I delivered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FENERTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I insert the following stenographic report of address by me to young Republicans of the Nation over the Columbia network, Philadelphia, Saturday, May 23, 1936:

It is in every sense appropriate that this summons of the Young Republicans of the Nation should resound with a mighty call from this old city where American constitutional freedom was born and from the belfry of whose Independence Hall, as from Pharos, the light of an ordered liberty streamed to the uttermost rims of the earth.

For the issue that this year confronts the American people involves not merely the selection of a President, but the vastly more vital question as to whether or not America, as the last defender of constitutional liberty in a desolate world, will surrender to the imported theories of men who, like Mr. Tugwell, insolently deride what they call our hysterical adherence to the Constitution—or who, like Mr. Wallace, arrogantly assert that the time has come when you Americans must submit to having your thinking done for you.

I have called this issue vital for the reason that victory for the New Deal in November may be the last act of the drama of democratic government in America, for it is quite conceivable that 4 more years of socialism and political corruption may permanently render the youth of the Nation unfit for self-government by burning up the spiritual oases in which popular government must nourish itself if it would continue to live.

The battle lines are today clearly and distinctly drawn. The conflict is not between Democrats and Republicans, but between right and wrong theories of government, between government by the people and government by dictation, between the old liberalism, which emphasized free opportunity and the natural dignity of man, and the new regimentation that would reduce him to the level of a communized high-powered beast.

During the past 3 years the processes of government, as we know them, have been perverted to strange and alarming uses. We have seen our Government, under the dominance of men whose ideas are born in the secretariats of foreign lands, build up what they call "new instruments of public power", instruments which President Roosevelt, with charming modesty, admits would be dangerous in the hands of anyone but himself.

We have beheld our people driven to the extremity of panic and fear, because an administration, sworn to be their servant, has entered into business competition with the citizens and forced them into bankruptcy. We have observed hundreds of thousands of ambitious men and women reduced to poverty in the name of planned economy and have witnessed the hunger and sufferings of millions, because those who dictate the policies of government have created such an extensive artificial food shortage that it is now necessary for the New Deal to spend your money for foodstuffs imported from the farmers of other lands.

Juggled statistics and dishonest bookkeeping and deliberate misstatements are mustered to support the President's claim that we are coming back better than ever before "because we planned it that way." It might be uncharitable to ask the President if he foresaw the defeat of his favorite schemes by the people's highest Court, or if he planned to increase our hunger until we were obliged to call foreign farmers to our aid, or if he planned to increase our taxes and the national debt to the total of thirty-five thousands of millions, or even if it were part of his plan so to increase unemployment that there are now over 3,000,000 more people out of work than there were 5 years ago.

As the workers and increasing unemployed of the Nation bend almost to the breaking point beneath the wastefulness which taxes the sweat of their brows so that nearly a million Federal employees may batten on the Public Treasury, there has been created a tremendous spoils system without an example in history—a system that places a premium on dishonesty and makes phonograph records of hundreds of thousands of its victims who dare not do else than abjectly repeat their master's voice.

Such is the government of reform gone mad under the New Deal—reform of business and of agriculture; reform of the lives of the people, of the Constitution, of the Supreme Court—reform of everything but the New Deal politicians themselves, who most need it, and who do not realize that their very mania for reform is not a remedy but itself the symptom of a new disease.

But when the New Deal has died and history has impartially weighed its good and its bad, heaviest in the balance of un-American evil will be its persistent agitation, as evidenced by the President's Baltimore address a few weeks ago, to inflame American youth against its ancestry, the shameful attempt to drive a cleavage between the young and the old and array youth on the side of the social revolution, as we see an American President take to his heart the pink propaganda of the irresponsibles and aline himself with them as an inciter of discontent and revolt among the youth of the land.

Are we, sons of a new generation, ready, under the threat of a New Deal lash, to concede that for 300 years all the wisest of men have been wrong in aiming at a complete realization of individual liberties and rights, and that we must now timidly turn back to paternalism, bureaucratic discipline, and Executive orders?

Perhaps the most amazing and amusing of the delusions that have obsessed this present administration is the assumption that all who do not weakly surrender to its dictatorship are traitors to the Nation. Under other administrations a political antagonist was called an opponent. But under the young men who lay the flattering unction to their souls that they have a monopoly on the brains of America—if you differ with the radical theories which they have garnered from the slopes of the Ural Mountains of Russia—you are condemned in such terms as "rascal", "leech", "bloodsucker", "Tory", "representative of entrenched greed"—or by names so much more wildly picturesque that one suspects the "brain trust" of spending its office hours in a searching perusal of the old dime novels and penny dreadfuls.

It is a rather silly and ludicrous procedure. But even President Roosevelt, who imagines that everybody is against him, in his most volatile and emotional effusions can scarcely accuse you young men and women as having (to use his own words) "ganged up" on him simply because you will not placidly submit to being made the instruments of a politician's pet hates, and you probably object to having your young lives mortgaged to pay old men's bills.

And what does the President offer us as a substitute for the America of our fathers which he thus so summarily and airily dismisses into the limbo of forgotten things? United to the opportunity to despise our elders, he suggests the right to hold fast to our dreams. He calls upon us to escape from ourselves and our own generation by imputing to our fathers the blame for all the sorrows and tribulations of this earthly vale of tears.

With the same adroit technique which he has repeatedly employed in his incitement to class unrest, the President, in a spirit of defeat and desperation, seeks to turn us against our own fathers. But we are not to be fooled by that. We have known that procedure before. We saw the President use it when he encouraged the resentment of the debtor against his creditor; when he fostered the enmity of the worker against his employer; when he fomented the bitterness of the farmer against the processor; when he aroused the hatred of the unemployed against the taxpayer. And, with the artfulness of the master politician, he never fails to cater to the prejudice of the group with the larger number of votes.

So, in alluding to the achievements of the men who made America and enabled her in less than a century to develop high spiritual and social concepts side by side with a material progress that created for our people three times as much wealth as had been amassed by all other nations since the dawn of time—the customary Rooseveltian smile curved into a cynical dismissal of all the wisdom of the past in his single sneering observation: "You have a right to expect something better than that."

Better than what, Mr. President? Better than the Washingtons, the Jeffersons, the Lincolns? Better than the teachings of the men who fearlessly cast off the yoke of just such a dictatorship as that which you now seek to impose upon us? Shall we exchange the liberty of our fathers for your alphabetical regulations? Shall we barter our freedom of the press for the restraint by which you sought to shackle it? Shall we surrender our freedom of speech and of communication to your Black investigating committee, with its unreasonable seizure of private telegrams? Are we to substitute your Tugwells and Frankfurters and Ezekiels and Wallaces for the "Men who matched the mountains,

Men who matched the plains;
Men with empires in their purpose
And new eras in their brains"?

The generation you laugh at, Mr. President, may have used the horse and buggy, but it carried the ark of liberty in its covered wagons. And you forget that every older generation was once a younger generation with courage to translate its ideals into reality, because it spurned the blandishments with which you would now reduce to flabbishness the generation to which we belong. When we ask for work, you give us a dole; when we ask for bread, you throw us a stone; and, in a counsel of cowardice and of enervation, you would leave flaming youth to flicker and sputter in its socket when it yearns to burn with the ardor of true Americanism. You would take the red blood from our American veins to attempt a transfusion into the anemic arteries of your dying New Deal.

But we do not want someone to hate. We want someone to help. We want nothing from any older generation that we do not merit by our own work and vigor and self-reliance. We do demand freedom and American opportunity for our individual enterprise, the same opportunity that enabled other generations to carve out their own destinies. But we refuse to be cogs in a New Deal bureaucratic machine. And we must not be reduced to poverty and regimentation in the furtherance of any man's ambition or in the name of anybody's scheme. Let those who counsel despair and cringe in cowardice follow the will-o'-the-wisp of collectivism and New Deal sophistry, if they will. Let them continue to cry to your Democratic money changers for the corrupting, vote-getting subsidies with which it is hoped to transform free America into the trodden fodder for dictatorship. They will never know the thrill of patriotism; they are blind to the beauty of sacrifice.

But there is a niche in history beside Washington and Lincoln for the man who will summon our youth into a cohesive national entity forged together by a common impulse for the salvation of America, a man who has the character to lead, and the imagination and intelligence to rebuild the awakened forces of Republicanism—a man who can foresee our luminous future in the afterglow of our glorious past—and who, with Sinai's thunders on his tongue, can make vocal the aspirations of the heart of America's young and recall them from the bogs of Democratic confusion to the certain and secure moorings of constitutional liberty.

And as a Republican American, who believes in America and her destiny and makes apologies to nobody, I assert that I would rather see the Republican Party go down to eternal defeat in defense of the principles of American constitutional liberty than prolong its existence by a base betrayal to those alien-minded theorists who, if they could, would destroy all that has made America great and beloved among the nations of the earth.

So, men and women of America, we give you a leadership that will not retreat but will face fundamentals. There is no place in our ranks for the waverers who, judging the future by their own cowardly consciences, are too timorous to follow us into battle for the reemancipation of the people. For ours is no campaign of negative grievances. It is not merely a repudiation of New Deal venom and vindictiveness against American traditions. No; it is a masterful leadership that scorns the little Americans who would be recreant to the valor and sacrifice of our fathers—a leadership that realizes that our Constitution is no more lifeless because those who wrote it have gone from our midst than a Gothic cathedral is less beautiful because its master builders have joined the immortals.

So, out of the darkness of New Deal stupidity and wantonness must come the clear determination of our people. Let no man stampede you into uprooting old landmarks, into destroying proven ideals. Remember whose children we are, whose inheritance we possess, as, with swords uplifted in defense of the citizens' rights, with souls attuned to the throbbings of the Nation's heart, our eyes newly agleam with reborn Republican hope, we march on shoulder to shoulder to redeem our people from Democratic perfidy and injustice, as we face the light that filters through the clouds of depression, to lead our America onward into the radiance of the new Republican day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

THE THOMAS JEFFERSON MEMORIAL

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, as one who has profound faith in the philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, and who prides himself on being called "a Jeffersonian Democrat", I am glad that, at last, a memorial to this great statesman is to be erected in the Capital of the country which, thanks largely to his wisdom and vision, is, and for all ages to come will be, the common man's greatest land of opportunity.

I am sure the people of America will cordially approve the Jefferson Memorial, for sentiment is not yet dead and gratitude, though sometimes hesitant to manifest itself, is not a lost virtue; and I think the people ought to know that this deserved recognition of the greatest of all of the founding fathers is mainly due to a modest Member of this body who is cast in the Jeffersonian mold.

I refer to our colleague, JOHN J. BOYLAN, of New York. The worthy concept represented in this memorial, embodying in visual form a Nation's love for the man who, above all others, erected the ideals of popular government in the Western Hemisphere, is a product of the splendid mind and the splendid heart of the gentleman from New York, Mr. BOYLAN, who has labored for this project year after year, in season and out of season, and whose cup of happiness surely must be flowing over, now that he is about to witness the realization of his dream. Through long association with the gentleman from New York in the committee room and on the floor of this House, I have come to know him and to love him as a real humanitarian and a devoted friend of the common people who comprise the warp and woof of our citizenry.

The district in New York which he represents is to be congratulated on having made a real contribution to the public service of our country, and I hope he will be kept here as long as he lives because the Nation needs him. I do not know of anyone who, in the breadth of his sympathy for the poor, the humble, and unfortunate, more worthily typifies the ideals of Jefferson than Mr. BOYLAN does.

At a time when tyrannical dictatorships are rising to the zenith all over the world and popular government is sinking to the nadir everywhere, it is particularly appropriate that we should erect in the city of Washington, the political center of the Western Hemisphere, this memorial to Jefferson so that the whole world may know that in America, at least, the ideals of humanity are still our ideals and that we have not lost nor in any degree surrendered our appreciation of the value of the franchise of freedom.

Thus it may prove that what we are doing now in erecting this memorial to the great protagonist of liberty will have a greater significance than any of us can envision—a world significance. It will have, if by directing attention to the ideals of America, conceived and fashioned by the genius of Jefferson, it serves to kindle fresh fires on the altars of freedom throughout the world.

I wish devoutly that the erection of this Jefferson Memorial might bring to every human being in the world a mental picture of the difference between dictatorships and rule by the people—between tyrants like Napoleon and patriots like Jefferson. I think these two great world characters are properly comparable, for they lived in the same era and typified the extremes of leadership which still exist and which are being brought into ever bolder relief as dictators grab the thrones of power in other countries, thus drawing the contrast between governments where individual liberty is dead and our own land of opportunity, where the ideals woven into the fabric of government by Jefferson still guarantee to every individual under our flag the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Some time ago I stood at the tomb of the old Napoleon on the banks of the Seine he said he loved so well, and looked down over the balustrade at the sarcophagus where rest the remains of that incarnation of force and murder, surrounded in magnificent panoply by the battle flags he had captured in his amazing career of conquest and of violence. Somehow I could not become enthused even amid those surroundings of imperial majesty, because I had a sickening sense of the widows and orphans he had made and how he had brought grief and sorrow and desolation into nearly every household in Europe.

As I stood there I resolved that when I returned home I would visit another shrine where I knew my emotions would be quite different. I would visit the tomb of Thomas Jefferson, the friend of man, who wrote into the great Declaration the precious doctrine that "all men are created equal."

A little while ago I made that resolution good. I made my first visit to the tomb of Jefferson.

As I stood on that Virginia mountain side while the rays of early morning gilded the shaft where rest the remains of the greatest humanitarian since Jesus of Nazareth, I was thrilled as I think I never had been thrilled before.

Here—

I said to myself—

lies the great champion and defender of human rights, whose passion was to save and to serve and not, like Napoleon's, to destroy humanity. Let no one say in this presence that the common man is of no importance.

And I was impressed beyond my feeble powers of language to describe by the inscription which he himself wrote for his tombstone and commanded to be placed there.

Here—

was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and father of the University of Virginia.

That inscription, it seems to me, is more eloquent for what it does not say than for what it says. There is not one word in it to indicate that he had been a Member of the Congress of the United States; that he had been Secretary of State of the United States and Minister to France; and that he had held the highest office in the gift of the Republic—the Presidency of the United States.

He wanted to be known not for the positions of distinction he had held but for the service he had rendered to humanity. That was Thomas Jefferson, in my opinion the most incomparably grand figure in American history. We do well to honor him by erecting this memorial in his memory, a memorial which by its stateliness and impressiveness will help to carry the ideals of liberty down to the remotest generation.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILLS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, Thursday evening has been set aside for the consideration of omnibus claims bills. The bills will be found on the Private Calendar. There are five such bills on the calendar. Included in the bills are many meritorious claims, but, as I have pointed out before, there are many bills that this House should not pass.

The President has vetoed many private claims bills, and outside of those coming from the Military and Naval Affairs Committees I have opposed practically every bill vetoed.

Let me call the Members' attention to the speech of Senator BAILEY, which will be found on pages 8624–8625 of the RECORD of June 2. Senator BAILEY is chairman of the Committee on Claims of the Senate. The veto messages of the President on the bills for the relief of Henry Bibus and others, the Collier Manufacturing Co., William W. Danenhower, and Zelma Halverson, four bills originating in the Senate, had just been read.

Senator BAILEY said he was in agreement with the President despite the fact that his committee had favorably reported the four bills. Senator BAILEY said:

Mr. President, I should like to be heard briefly with reference to the veto messages which have just been received from the President. I am in agreement with the President in these matters. I wish to say, as chairman of the Committee on Claims, that I believe it would be a good policy for all Members of the House and Senate who intend to introduce bills asking for relief against the Government to obtain first from the department a report tending to show that the department itself will approve such claims.

For the remainder of this session I think no one should ask us to approve a claim against which the statute of limitations has run, nor should we be asked to report favorably any claim which has not been approved by the department. I think the President's course is one to be commended. Of course, there will be no effort on my part, and I am sure no effort on the part of the committee, to report the measures back with a view to overriding the vetoes.

In view of this statement I think it is a waste of time to even consider the omnibus bills so late in the session, other than Senate bills.

I regret, because my doctor has advised against it, I am not going to be able to personally oppose bills as I have in the past.

Some of the bills that should be defeated are listed below:

H. R. 11215 (OMNIBUS)

TITLE I—H. R. 653—GEORGE R. BROWN

This is a bill to authorize payment of pay and allowances to George R. Brown, a former second lieutenant in the National Guard, to cover a period during which it is claimed he was illegally placed in a discharge status from the service of the United States.

Lieutenant Brown rendered no services during the period in question, never reported to a military post or station, and was not ordered to do so. The accounting officers of the Government in 1918 and the Court of Claims in 1924 found no merit in the claim, and the War Department, in agreement therewith, has reported adversely. Amount claimed, $689.90.

TITLE IV—H. R. 2115—FIRST LT. R. G. CUNO

This bill would reimburse First Lt. R. G. Cuno for damages to his personal property which were sustained by reason of a storm which flooded a warehouse at Langley Field, Va., August 23, 1933, where the Government had stored the property during the officer's absence as a patient at Walter Reed General Hospital. The property was stored free of charge, and, at most, the Government was merely a gratuitous bailee, requiring the exercise of only ordinary care and certainly not liable for damages resulting from unforeseeable causes. The damages to the property may be considered as the result of an act of God, any consequent losses necessarily resting on the owner of the property.

Since as early as 1885 (23 Stat. 350) the Government has accepted only a limited liability for loss, destruction, or damage of property of personnel of the military services (see act of Mar. 4, 1921, 41 Stat. 1436), but it has never gone so far as to insure personal property of an Army officer against loss, damage, and destruction when the custody by the Government was for convenience of the owner of the property.

Hundreds of enlisted men and officers at Langley Field, Fort Monroe, and the navy yard and hospital at Langley Field lost their personal belongings in the flood of 1933.

Is Congress to reimburse this man to the extent of $351.61 and not recognize the others?

TITLE VIII—H. R. 3179—JESSE ASHBY

The claim of Jesse Ashby arose out of work required to be performed under contract dated April 28, 1931, for painting plaster walls in the new Department of Commerce Building, Washington, D. C., and the provisions of this title VIII have for their purpose a reference of his claim to the United States Court of Claims with jurisdiction to hear the same notwithstanding the failure of any Government officer to give proper written orders for additional work with instructions to adjudicate the same upon the basis set forth in the bill. If the Government is going to guarantee a realization of the profit estimated by a contractor, then the protection accorded the Government by the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, will be practically nullified. No amount is estimated.

TITLE XIII—H. R. 6105—FOR THE RELIEF OF THE NEW AMSTERDAM CASUALTY CO.

This bill is for the relief of the New Amsterdam Casualty Co. This company furnished the bond for one Zangwell Engelsher, who had been indicted on six counts for counterfeiting. You have hundreds of similar cases where forfeited bail bonds will be demanded when bills of this character pass.

TITLE XVII—S. 895—TO CARRY OUT THE FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS IN THE CASE OF THE ATLANTIC WORKS, OF BOSTON, MASS.

The claim of the Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass., is a more or less ancient one, the basis thereof being predicated upon construction of the revenue cutter Daniel Manning, under the terms of a contract with the United States dated June 27, 1895. The vessel was completed October 7, 1897, was delivered to and accepted by the United States, and the full contract price, plus the cost of extra work, was paid and received by the contractor as payment in full.

This claim thus appears to be merely another case where the Government is asked to donate or give to a contractor moneys of the taxpayer to partly reimburse such contractor for losses due to errors in estimating its costs and profits on Government work. The amount involved is $22,170.30.

TITLE XVIII—S. 2119—FOR THE RELIEF OF AMOS D. CARVER, S. E. TURNER, CLIFFORD N. CARVER, SCOTT BLANCHARD, P. B. BLANCHARD, JAMES B. PARSE, A. N. BLANCHARD, AND W. A. BLANCHARD AND/OR THE WIDOWS OF SUCH OF THEM AS MAY BE DECEASED

The claim of Amos D. Carver et al., in the sum of $35,916.68, is stated to represent losses incurred by the owners of the schooner Betsy Ross by reason of interference with, delays to, and forced cancelation of a private charter of and the appropriation of the use of said vessel by the United States Shipping Board on or about April 5, 1918. The basis for the claim appears to be that the loss was incurred in handling a shipment of wheat for the United States Food Administration from Australia to New York instead of a shipment of chrome ore to the west coast of the United States under a private charter. The United States Shipping Board has denied appropriation of the use of the vessel and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed the contention of the Government on the merits to the effect that no liability attached to the United States, this action being on writ of certiorari after judgment by the Court of Claims against the United States.

Is Congress going to overrule the actions of the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court?

TITLE I—H. R. 1369—R. L. TANKERSLEY

This bill would grant to the beneficiary $5,000 from the United States Treasury as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained in an encounter with one Capt. John C. Luikhart, commanding officer of Service Troop, One Hundred and Eleventh Cavalry, New Mexico National Guard, while the organization was in attendance at an encampment at Fort Bliss, Tex. The trouble appears to have been the result of an argument between Mr. Tankersley and the captain regarding the taking of watermelons from the former's patch by certain undisclosed enlisted members of the New Mexico National Guard. The law is clear that members of the National Guard in time of peace are administered, uniformed, equipped, and trained in their status as National Guards of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and the fact that the Federal Government appropriates money for allotment to the States in assisting them in the training of their troops does not shift the liability either legally, equitably, or morally upon the Federal Government for damages which may have been caused by these State troops.

TITLE II—H. R. 1868—MARY E. RONEY

Five thousand dollars has already been paid to the claimant under the act of Congress of February 11, 1929, as amended by the act of Congress of June 5, 1930 (46 Stat. 500). The accident that resulted in this payment occurred in the District of Columbia, and the passage of this bill would amount to a special exception to the general law made and provided for just such cases, not only by increasing the amount beyond the $5,000 limitation but also by authorizing the entire payment above $5,000 from the Federal Treasury rather than from funds of the District of Columbia.

TITLE III.—H. R. 2148—TO CONFER JURISDICTION ON THE COURT OF CLAIMS TO HEAR, DETERMINE, AND RENDER JUDGMENT UPON THE CLAIMS OF THE ITALIAN STAR LINE, INC., AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

This bill would provide another legal avenue through which the corporation can again bring suit against the United States for recovery of approximately a half a million dollars of the taxpayers' money for the admitted purpose of paying dividends to the Italian-American stockholders in the corporation. This corporation has already tried numerous times to impress several Federal courts with the merits of its claim, but its claims have uniformly been turned down. The memorandum from the Director, Shipping Board Bureau, included in the committee's report, indicates that most of the Government's important witnesses have since died and that the expense of summoning the remaining witnesses in behalf of the Government would entail a tremendous cost.

It is stated further that the Government already has suffered a loss of approximately $1,500,000 out of the transaction. It is submitted that to require the Government to defend another suit at this time, after the death of so many of its principal witnesses, after the statute of limitations has long since run against the claimant, would place the Government at a decided disadvantage and entail an unnecessary and burdensome cost.

This corporation, once indicted for conspiracy to defraud the United States, should not be placed in a position superior to that of an individual litigant who has sued and lost to another private litigant instead of to the Government.

TITLE IV—H. R. 2644—KRIKOR HAROUTUNIAN

There appears to be absolutely no reason, legal, equitable, or moral, why this claimant should be paid $1,000. Haroutunian posted a bond conditioned upon the voluntary departure from the United States of two Turkish nationals temporarily admitted to this country, who by a series of delays, hindrances, and obstacles have to all intents and purposes flouted the immigration laws and still remain in this country.

Why should the United States return a forfeiture exacted under the bond under more or less vicious circumstances enumerated by the Department of Labor in its letter which will be found in the report. A subterfuge undoubtedly was perpetrated in solving and surmounting the immigration hurdles erected by the Congress and the surety certainly should not be rewarded for the success of the enterprise. This title undoubtedly should be stricken from the bill.

TITLE V—H. R. 4500—FRANK LEE BORNEY

The wording of this title would lead to the inference that injuries were sustained by the claimant as a result of innocently coming into contact with a dynamite cap used by the Civil Works Administration contractors. Actually, however, it appears that the Negro youth stole the cap from the cache where they had been placed by the dynamite workers for safety and subsequently in experimenting therewith caused the explosion which resulted in the loss of two fingers. The situation is the same as though he had stolen a loaded revolver and accidently shot himself and then made claim upon the owner of the gun for damages for his injury. There is absolutely no liability on the part of the Government, and it is not believed that Congress should ratify or approve his larceny by rewarding him for his illegal act which accidently resulted in the injury.

TITLE VI—H. R. 4695—STERLING BRONZE CO.

See report of the Comptroller General of the United States, dated April 26, 1934, on pages 34, 35, and 36 of Report No. 2416 of the Committee on Claims, accompanying this omnibus claims bill, H. R. 12322. This bill has to do with the New House Office Building. The report is lengthy and not favorable.

TITLE VIII—H. R. 5826—MISSISSIPPI BARGE CORPORATION

This is a claim by the disputed owner of the steamboat Dandelion, claimed to have been sunk by a Government vessel in February 1929, over 7 years ago. The amount of the claim is now $20,000. It appears that this old ship was built in 1893 and was sold by the United States Lighthouse Service to the alleged vendee of the claimant for $2,500. The committee report, while admitting that the purchaser of the vessel from the Lighthouse Service paid only a small sum for the ship, states "There is nothing to show that he did not make repairs before he sold it." It may also be stated that there is nothing to show that he did make any repairs. There seems to be much confusion as to ownership and value of this old crate at the time it was sunk, and it is significant to note that the alleged owners have never pursued their remedies, if any they had, in a court of competent jurisdiction capable of hearing both sides, of viewing the witnesses, and of submitting them to cross-examination by the opposing counsel. Neither is it shown that any attempt was ever made to minimize the damages by salvage operations. The Government agency, the Inland Waterways Corporation, denies liability.

TITLE IX—H. R. 6273—J. H. KNOTT

The only report of the facts in this case is that of the Navy Department, quoted from a report of the driver of the Navy automobile, from which it may be concluded that the victim of the accident negligently walked into the path of the moving machine.

There appearing no negligence attributable to the driver, authorization of payment of this claim by the Congress must be on the theory that the Government is an insurer against injury to those who walk the streets where its vehicles are driven.

TITLE X—S. 427—AUTHORIZING THE REIMBURSEMENT OF EDWARD B. WHEELER AND THE STATE INVESTMENT CO. FOR THE LOSS OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE MORA GRANT, NEW MEXICO

S. 427 passed the House May 5, 1936.

H. R. 12323 (OMNIBUS)

TITLE I—H. R. 2415—FOR THE RELIEF OF STANDARD OIL CO. FOR LOSSES SUSTAINED BY PAYMENT OF DISCRIMINATORY EXCESS TONNAGE TAXES AND LIGHT MONEYS

This bill involves $60,283. In going over the report I found the Court of Claims held that the taxes imposed were legally assessed and collected. Despite this decision I found a letter from the Secretary of Commerce in the committee report directly in contrast to that of the Attorney General. I immediately wrote the Secretary of Commerce, requesting an explanation.

For the information of Members I submit a letter received from the Secretary of Commerce:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 22, 1936.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
Chairman, Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your letter of the 18th instant, calling my attention to a conflict between my letter of June 10, 1935, with reference to H. R. 2415, a bill for the relief of the Standard Oil Co., and a communication of the Attorney General dated July 1, 1935, on the same subject.

In my letter of June 10, 1935, it was said in part:

"Immediately after the closing of the World War hostilities there were collected by collectors of customs, acting under orders of this Department, from the vessels of the Standard Oil Co. penal taxes under sections 4219 and 4225 of the Revised Statutes, inasmuch as it was considered that the commercial treaty between Germany and the United States had been suspended or abrogated by the war, in which case the said penal taxes would be incurred.

"The Standard Oil Co., however, brought action against the Government on the ground that the collection of these penal taxes was not in accordance with the law. The Government defended the case and the decision of the court was against the Government.

"Inasmuch as under the decision of the court the above collection was erroneous, it appears to the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection that the Department should not object to the payment of the sum found due the Standard Oil Co."

These statements are incorrect and are based upon a misconception of the decision of the Court of Claims dated May 13, 1933 (77 Ct. Cls. 206), formed by officials of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection who made the preparatory study for the letter of June 10, 1935.

As is stated in the letter of the Attorney General above referred to, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey brought suit in the Court of Claims for refund of tonnage duties and light money collected on certain vessels under the provisions of sections 4219 and 4225, Revised Statutes, respectively (U. S. C., title 46, secs. 121, 128). The Court of Claims decided that the moneys collected from the Standard Oil Co. under the provisions had been lawfully collected and that, therefore, the claim of the Standard Oil Co. had no merit. It is therefore felt that, since the Standard Oil Co. has had its day in court and the determination of its claim on the merits, there is no reason for extending legislative relief which would in effect be a refund of the aforementioned collections.

I regret the error and the resultant confusion arising in this matter. I am addressing a letter under the same date to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, calling his attention to this matter and requesting his approval for the withdrawal of my letter of June 10, 1935.

Sincerely yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
Secretary of Commerce.

In view of the letter of the Secretary of Commerce as well as the report of the Attorney General, I feel the committee should ask that the title be stricken from the bill.

There can be no doubt but that the favorable letter from the Secretary of Commerce resulted in the favorable report on the bill.

TITLE II—H. R. 4789—COAST FIR & CEDAR PRODUCTS CO., INC.

This title covers a case where the contractor asserts a claim for payment for cross ties claimed to have been shipped under a contract dated April 18, 1928, with the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior. The cross ties—five carloads—as a matter of fact, were in excess of the amount required to be furnished; the Government had no use for them; they were placed upon a railroad siding for disposition by the contractor; the contractor was promptly notified, and subsequently he sold some of this excess to other parties. Both the Department of the Interior and the Comptroller General of the United States have reported adversely on the merits, and the claimant has tacitly admitted the correctness of these reports by never having pursued his remedy in the Court of Claims, where a judicial determination of his rights could have been obtained.

TITLE VIII—S. 373—CONFERRING JURISDICTION UPON THE COURT OF CLAIMS TO HEAR, DETERMINE, AND RENDER JUDGMENT ON THE CLAIM OF ROBERT A. WATSON

This claimant was dealing in the sugar market for the primary purpose of realizing a profit from the transactions and his chief concern appears to have revolved around the possible effect of the Lever Act, upon the profit believed to be necessary in order to meet the risks involved and the necessary financing. Due to an unforeseen break in the price of sugar, the contemplated profits of the claimant apparently were not realized, and it is the purpose of the title to permit suit to be instituted in the Court of Claims for the damage or loss sustained. The financial institutions with which credit apparently was established by Mr. Watson to purchase the sugar took the same chances as any other person in buying with the object of selling their commodities at a profit, and when unforeseeable losses are incurred, such losses properly should fall upon them and not upon the taxpayers of the country.

TITLE IX—S. 1960—FOR THE RELIEF OF THE FLORIDA NATIONAL BANK & TRUST CO., A NATIONAL BANKING CORPORATION, AS SUCCESSOR TRUSTEE FOR THE ESTATE OF PHILIP ULLENDORF, DECEASED

This bill sets aside the statute of limitations and delegates the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to consider a claim for refund of inheritance taxes. The President has time and again vetoed such bills. Why send him another that will meet a similar fate? The Treasury Department strongly opposes passage of the bill.

H. R. 12772 (OMNIBUS)

TITLE I—S. 2268—FOR THE RELIEF OF BAUSCH & LOMB OPTICAL CO.

This is a direct appropriation from the Treasury. The bill does not send the case back to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims has already decided the case in favor of the Government.

I quote from the decision of the court:

CONCLUSION OF LAW

Upon the foregoing special findings of fact, which are made a part of the judgment herein, the court decides as a conclusion of law that plaintiff is entitled to recover $707.89.

It is therefore adjudged and ordered that the plaintiff recover of and from the United States the sum of $707.89.

The amount asked in this bill is $33,487.34. An amendment should be offered reducing amount to $707.80.

TITLE II—H. R. 10436—FOR THE RELIEF OF THE HEIRS OF MARGARETTA D. FENN

This is a Civil War claim and is based upon stores and supplies alleged to have been furnished the Army of the United States, as well as to damages done to property.

Under the amendment in the omnibus claims bill of 1913, the Congress laid down the policy that it would no longer consider Civil War claims by sending them to the Court of Claims.

I see no reason for resurrecting claims of this character now. To recognize one would mean that the Congress would be justified in recognizing thousands.

H. R. 12788 (OMNIBUS)

TITLE III—H. R. 4655—FOR THE RELIEF OF THE SACHS MERCANTILE CO., INC.

This bill is to pay direct from the Treasury $68,073.47 for alleged losses incurred by reason of a purchase from the Navy Department at a sale by auction. The report asserts the claim is favorably reported by reason of an opinion of the Court of Claims dated February 5, 1934. The opinion referred to is not included in the report.

The letter from the Secretary of the Navy, however, is in the report. I quote the last sentence from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy:

The Navy Department is of the opinion that the enactment into law of H. R. 9294 would be prejudicial to the public interests in that it would create a dangerous precedent that would be cited by persons and corporations seeking congressional relief to cover losses sustained in transactions with the Government when such losses were due to their own poor judgment, negligence, or ordinary business hazards, and therefore recommends against the enactment of the bill H. R. 9294.

H. R. 12788 (OMNIBUS)

TITLE IV—H. R. 4915—FOR THE RELIEF OF GUIDEO BISCARDO, GIOVANNI POLIN, SPIRONELLO ANTONIO, ARTURO BETTIO, CARLO BISCARDO, AND ANTONIO VANNIN

This is another claim for a refund amounting to $3,500 for a forfeited immigration bond. It is true that the aliens were apprehended and deported, but the Department of Labor says that the bondsman in no way assisted the Government in the apprehension of the aliens or furnished any information leading to their apprehension.

TITLE X—S. 918—TO CARRY OUT THE FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS IN THE CASE OF THE UNION IRON WORKS

The title said that this is to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims. If we adhere to the findings of the Court of Claims, the House will defeat this bill. I invite the Members to read the opinion of the Court of Claims, which will be found in the committee report.

As to the conclusion of law, I quote from the Court of Claims:

Upon the foregoing special findings of fact, which are made part of the judgment herein, the court decides, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and its petition is dismissed.

Judgment is rendered against the plaintiff for the cost of printing the record herein, the amount thereof to be ascertained by the clerk and collected by him according to law, which amount is found to be $2,159.82.

I now quote briefly from the opinion of the Court of Claims:

The claim is one founded upon a contract with the Government of the United States (sec. 145, Judicial Code), and within the general jurisdiction of this court. The cause or causes of action accrued more than 6 years before either the claim was transmitted to the court by the Senate or petition was filed in court, and the claim is therefore barred by section 156 of the Judicial Code. Were the court to base its judgment on the merits, the petition would still have to be dismissed, since the facts show no breach of contract, and none is alleged. The plaintiff is not entitled to either legal or equitable relief. The claim is one for a gratuity.

In view of this, I recommend to the Members of the House that they carry out the findings of the Court of Claims and save the taxpayers $165,284.53.

TITLE XI—S. 1041—FOR THE RELIEF OF COHEN, GOLDMAN & CO., INC.

This is a direct payment from the Treasury and comes to the Congress after an unfavorable decision by the Court of Claims. The amount involved is $19,030.20. I quote from the report of the Court of Claims, under the heading "Conclusion of Law."

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, which are made a part of the judgment herein, the court decides as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover and its petition is therefore dismissed.

Judgment is rendered against plaintiff for the cost of printing the record herein, the amount thereof to be entered by the clerk and collected by him according to law.

The opinion of the Court of Claims states that in one of the audits of the General Accounting Office on June 29, 1924, within 6 years after the completion of the contracts, issued a certificate of settlement showing $136,526.45 due the Government after allowing the plaintiff a 20-percent bonus of $17,820.35.

There is absolutely nothing in the Court of Claims decision that warrants the Congress in passing this bill.

TITLE XII—S. 2719—FOR THE RELIEF OF CAPT. GUY D. HARTMAN

This is to pay $20,000 out of the Treasury to Captain Hartman as reimbursement for a loss suffered upon forfeiture of appearance bonds in a United States court. This is another bond-forfeiture case and grows out of a violation of the prohibition law.

Captain Hartman maintains that he became sick while in Mexico and was unable to return to this country.

I quote the last two paragraphs of the letter from the Department of Justice:

The prosecutions against Captain Hartman were nolle prossed and it seems that the extent of his punishment was the $20,000 bond forfeiture. Undoubtedly the dismissal of the criminal charges was in consideration of his valiant military record and also his valuable services to the Government in furnishing information relative to the distillery operations resulting in the collection of over $100,000 in taxes and the conviction of most of the defendants. It does not appear that any effort was made to have the default on the fine set aside pursuant to statutory method provided when circumstances justify it. On the other hand, indications are that when the criminal prosecutions were disposed of the fact that the defendant Hartman had suffered a $20,000 forfeiture was taken into consideration. One of his co-defendants, who also avoided a penitentiary sentence, made a $100,000 settlement on tax liability.

There is no question about Captain Hartman having been engaged in the gigantic, illicit whisky enterprise. His going to Mexico was not only to avoid what to him seemed his certain conviction, but was to make himself unavailable as a material witness as to other defendants. Therefore, his claim seems to be without merit.

TITLE XIII—S. 2747—CONFERRING JURISDICTION UPON THE UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS TO HEAR THE CLAIM OF THE CANAL DREDGING CO.

This is to refer a case to the Court of Claims growing out of a contract that amounted to $649,432. I quote in part from the report of the War Department:

The contractor began work on August 15, 1932, and the rate of progress was such that up until April 4, 1934, only 2,486,950 cubic yards of material had been placed in the levee. On numerous occasions, the matter of delay or lack of progress on the work was brought to the attention of the contractor, but without material results. The delay was due entirely to the lack of adequate and suitable plant for hydraulic work, proper superintendence, and financial responsibility.

After it was determined that the work would not be completed within the contract time, the supplemental agreement of June 14, 1934, was entered into providing for the termination of the contract and the payment to the contractor of the sum of $80,230.46 in full settlement under the contract. The contractor voluntarily agreed without any coercion by the Department to a settlement on this basis and to release the Government from any and all claims under the contract and supplemental agreements thereto. The contractor was released from the performance of any further work under the contract.

The Department feels that the Canal Dredging Co. has been adequately compensated for the work performed under the contract in question and therefore recommends that the proposed legislation be not enacted into law.

TITLE XIV—S. 3090—FOR THE RELIEF OF JOSEPH M. CACACE, CHARLES M. CACACE, AND MARY E. CLIBOURNE

This is another bond-forfeiture case.

TITLE XV—S. J. RES. 196—TO CORRECT ERRORS IN THE ENROLLMENT OF PRIVATE ACT NO. 349, SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, APPROVED AUGUST 29, 1935, AND TO CLARIFY THE DUTIES OF THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL IN CONNECTION WITH SAID ACT

I made a speech on this resolution before the House some time ago. In order to properly understand the resolution it is necessary to get the act of August 29, 1935, referred to. This is an old navy-yard claim, and after pending in the House for about 20 years it was passed in the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress and provided for the payment of $332,950 to navy-yard workers throughout the United States for overtime, and so forth. Provisions were made in that resolution to pay the attorneys of record who appeared before the Court of Claims in the cases 10 percent of the amount, or $33,295.

The Comptroller General is paying the claims now, where he can find the claimants, but it develops that only about 1 out of 15 claimants is alive, and the money is being paid to the heirs of the claimants.

Under the terms of this resolution Clarence W. DeKnight, an attorney in Washington, is to receive $33,295 for securing the passage of the act. In other words, if this becomes a law, while it is not going to cost the Government any additional money, as it will be taken away from the amount to be paid the claimants by Congress, it is saying that this attorney was responsible for Congress passing the original act.

I well recall that the minority leader, Mr. SNELL, tried over a period of many years to secure the passage of the original claim without success, but Mr. SNELL told me he never heard of nor ever saw Mr. Clarence W. DeKnight during the years that he was working for the passage of this claim.

In my judgment, if we pass this resolution the Congress will be admitting that the original act became law through the influence of an attorney.

I might say that I understand Mr. DeKnight represented a number of claimants before the Court of Claims, and under the terms of the original resolution as signed by the President he will receive 10 percent of the amount paid to the claimants he represented.

I do not think that the Members of Congress are willing to concede that this bill was passed as the result of the work of Mr. DeKnight, but those who did vote for it, I feel, will want to take the position now that they supported it because they thought it was a meritorious claim.

It has been the policy of the Congress to allow 10 percent to attorneys in connection with claims of this character, and why should we set aside that policy now and increase the amount that will be taken from the claimants 10 additional percent?

A CHARGE AGAINST MICHIGAN AUTHORITIES WHICH IS WITHOUT FOUNDATION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, just what prompted the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI], on June 2, 1936, to charge, in substance and to the effect that the attorney general of the State of Michigan, the State police of that State, and the Governor of Michigan, representing the State of Michigan, had failed to take proper steps to prosecute members of the Black Legion for violations of the law because the men so accused "have been affiliated with the Wolverine Republican Club and other Republican organizations * * * and have been the backbone of the Republican Party in those four counties", is not apparent on the face of the record.

The present Governor of the State of Michigan has always stood for law enforcement. The commissioner of public safety, Oscar G. Olander, head of the State police department of Michigan, has held that office through Democratic and Republican administrations. His reputation as a fearless, efficient, law-enforcing officer is more than State-wide. The department, since he came in charge of it, has never been accused of being used for political purposes. No one has questioned the motives of its commanding officers and none has criticized the method in which they have performed their duties until the gentleman from Detroit arose.

He does not present any facts to justify the charge he makes. He fails to put into the RECORD any evidence whatever that the Republican State organization or any Republican county organization has been a party to, or even aware of, any of the activities of the Black Legion. If he has such evidence, he should present it to the proper authorities.

He did fail to call the attention of the House to the fact that the activities of the legion seem to be centered in Wayne County, democracy's stronghold. He should have told the House that the prosecuting attorney of Wayne County is a Democrat and that, so far as we have been informed, and this came through the public press, that prosecutor is the only public official of prominence in an executive position whose name appeared on an application blank for admission to the Black Legion.

He should have told the House that it was the Democratic prosecutor's duty, in Wayne County at least, to bring action against the members of this body and, if the public press is giving us the picture with its usual accuracy, that prosecutor is performing his duty, as is the Republican attorney general of the State and Republican prosecutors in other counties of the State.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI], if he desired to be fair about the matter, should have told the House that this same prosecuting attorney failed to prosecute Democratic officials charged with election frauds and that, under the direction of the attorney general of the State, 18 persons so charged were later convicted by Republican prosecuting officials.

He might have added that one of those convicted was the then chairman of the Democratic State central committee; that another so convicted, and who was later sentenced to serve 5 years in prison and whose case is now pending on appeal, is a delegate to the Democratic convention at Philadelphia and comes from the same district as does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI], who is also a delegate to that convention.

Apparently, the motive actuating the gentleman from Detroit [Mr. SADOWSKI], is that of resentment against these public officials who happen to be in office and who performed their duty when the election frauds of his fellow Democrats were uncovered and brought before the court.

It is with regret that these matters are called to the attention of the Members of the House. But, when a Member arises upon the floor and, without any facts whatever to support his statement, accuses the Governor of our State, the attorney general of our State, and the head of our State police force with countenancing the unlawful acts of the Black Legion, with failing to prosecute violations of the law by members of that body, and when that charge is known, or should be known, by every member of the delegation from Michigan, to be false, I would be lacking in my duty to my State to permit it to be spread upon the RECORD without contradiction.

It is unfortunate that the gentleman's state of mind should lead him to make such an unfair and ridiculous charge. It is to be hoped that, upon reflection, he will advise the House of his error.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE NEW DEAL

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by me to the Young Republican Group of the National Capital Republican Club on Tuesday, May 19, 1936:

Eighteen months ago it was my privilege to accept the responsibilities and duties of a representative of the people in the Congress of the United States. To my mind the individual Congressman should, in the exercise of his prerogatives, consider, first, the welfare of the entire Nation; second, that of his own State; and, third, that of the district from which he is chosen. Before entering upon his legislative duties he must stand in the Hall of Representatives in our Nation's Capitol, and with his right hand uplifted assume the following oath:

"I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

His fealty to the Constitution is not, or should not be, something to be discarded at pleasure. That historic document is the written expression of the will of the people concerning the form of their government. Only they can legally change, modify, or repeal it; and rightfully so, because its observance guarantees to them the blessings of liberty, to gain which so many valiant lives have been sacrificed and so much innocent blood has been spilled.

When 149 years ago those true American patriots met in Philadelphia and formulated that document which was to become the fundamental law of this land, they reasoned wisely and well. They judged the future by the past. They had seen governments fail because of oppressions perpetrated by those who ruled against those who were being ruled. They had seen others crumble because their rulers lacked the power or the ability to adequately administer the functions of statesmanship. They saw in their own Government under the Articles of Confederation, an absence of authority, which paralyzed the hands of the Continental Congress and rendered it impotent and helpless before the governing bodies of 13 independent, jealous, selfish, and none too friendly States. They determined that the new Government must be one in which adequate power would be granted to make, execute, and administer law, establish justice, provide for the common defense, and secure without the danger of oppression the blessings of liberty for which they, their fathers, their brothers, and their sons had so nobly fought. Accordingly, a constitution was drafted in which the affairs of state were divided into three parts, legislative, executive, and judicial. While each was made independent of the other, certain checks and balances were provided so that neither branch might ever become so powerful that it could obliterate either or both of the remaining two. Without these checks and balances, the legislative branch might develop into a despotism, the executive into a dictatorship, or the judicial into an oligarchy. As the result, democracy would be destroyed and autocracy would reign.

So they provided that all legislative power should vest in Congress which should consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives; that the membership of the House should be apportioned according to population and that each State should have equal representation in the Senate; that each House should be a check upon the other in legislative measures except that all revenue matters must originate in the House; that the Representatives, being closer to the people, should serve but 2 years, while the Senators being further removed, and, at that time, elected by the State legislatures, should serve for 6 years. They provided that the executive power should vest in the President, who should be elected indirectly by the people and serve for 4 years. They provided that the judicial power should vest in the Supreme Court, who should hold office during good behavior and should be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The House of Representatives was given authority to bring impeachment proceedings against the President, Supreme Court Justices, and all court officers for misconduct, and if found guilty by the Senate, such officials would be removed from office. The President was given authority to veto legislative acts of the Congress, but such acts, if subsequently passed by a two-thirds vote of both legislative branches, would become law, the President's veto notwithstanding. He was authorized to appoint ambassadors, ministers, consuls, judges, and other public officers of the United States, but only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He was empowered to make treaties with foreign countries, but again only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and providing that two-thirds of that body must concur therein.

Thus it can be seen that each of the three branches of our Government could maintain its individual dignity and independence and prevent the others from arbitrary control of the affairs of state. The whole Federal structure, however, was merely a grant of power from the States and so jealous were they of the liberties of their citizens that before the Constitution was ratified it was agreed that 10 amendments, known as the Bill of Rights, be immediately added thereto, which, among other things, would insure freedom of religion, speech, and press; the right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, the right of security against unreasonable searches and seizures, the right of a fair trial by jury, and the prohibition of excessive bail and cruel and unusual punishments. The great British statesman, Gladstone, once said that the American Constitution was the greatest document ever conceived by the mind of man. Benjamin Franklin, the oldest member of the Constitutional Convention, when being asked on the day following the completion of its work as to whether the new Government was to be a monarchy or a republic, replied, "A republic, if you keep it." The same old sage warningly observed, "They that give up essential liberty to obtain a little safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Service in the lower House of Congress during the past session has made me realize more forcibly than ever before three dangerous tendencies of our Federal Government, tendencies which in my judgment seek to undermine the very foundation of our national structure. First, the continual enactment of legislation wherein the Government at Washington seeks to encroach upon the rights and powers of the States; second, the passage of laws that tend to curb and restrict the fundamental liberties of the people as preserved in the Bill of Rights; and third, the delegation by Congress of its constitutional powers and prerogatives to the Executive.

Almost every important act passed by the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress was subject to one or more of these three criticisms. The Congress which preceded it had passed a great deal of legislation of a new and startling nature. One of the laws it enacted gave to the executive branch of our Government almost complete control over every industry in the United States. It assumed the power of prescribing to businessmen the Nation over conditions of employment, hours of labor, methods of business procedure, and prices at which goods could be bought or sold. Under the Federal Constitution the power of Congress is limited to the regulation of commerce between the States and with foreign nations. No privilege exists in our National Government to come within the confines of a State and regulate its purely internal affairs. The N. R. A., when it sought to regulate commerce within the States, violated the Constitution of the United States. Who can argue with any degree of conviction or sincerity that the regulation of the hours of work for manicurists and hairdressers could rightfully be declared interstate commerce, and who can convince us that the employment of men in a chicken yard, or the manner in which chicken crates should be opened, comes within the purview of commerce between the States?

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the celebrated Schechter case, decided once and for all that the so-called National Recovery Act was an invasion of the rights and powers of the States and that Congress, in enacting this legislation, had gone far beyond the confines of its authority as limited by the Federal Constitution. Yet, in the face of that decision the Seventy-fourth Congress, during one of the last few days of the life of its first session, passed the so-called Guffey-Snyder coal bill which, in effect, set up a little N. R. A. for the bituminous-coal industry; sought to regulate prices, hours of labor, and business methods for the entire bituminous-coal industry of the Nation whether it were local, interstate, or with foreign nations. This law was so clearly unconstitutional that the President himself in a letter to the chairman of the subcommittee of the House having this bill in charge, said in urging its passage, "I hope your committee will not permit doubts as to constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation." The bill was passed, approved by the President, and took its place as a part of the statute law of this land. Its unconstitutionality was apparent to the leading lawyers of the Nation and yet, in spite of the warning given by our Supreme Court in the Schecter case, businessmen of the United States were subjected to the provisions of this unconstitutional statute until yesterday when that tribunal had an opportunity to pass upon its validity and forever free them from the regulations it sought to impose.

One piece of legislation enacted by the present Congress, and which was subject to publicity the Nation over, was the so-called Wheeler-Rayburn Act, wherein it was sought by the Federal Government, under the guise of regulating public-utility companies, to pass a so-called "death sentence" to holding companies. It is conceded that there have been abuses in the organization and operations of such holding companies and that these abuses should be eliminated, but it is just like the old saying concerning the method by which to cut off a cat's tail. You may cut it off close to the body or you may cut it off at the neck. Of course, in the latter instance you kill the cat, but some of our friends who were proponents of this measure argued, "What matters that; we cut off the tail anyway." Without going into the merits or demerits of that legislation, which finally in a modified form passed the House and Senate and was approved by the President, let me quote you one paragraph of that law:

"It shall be unlawful for any person employed or retained by any registered holding company, or any subsidiary company thereof, to present, advocate, or oppose any matter affecting any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof before the Congress or any Member or committee thereof * * * unless such person shall file with the Commission, in such form and detail and at such time as the Commission shall by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, a statement of the subject matter in respect of which such person is retained or employed, the nature and character of such retainer or employment * * *."

Another paragraph of this law provides that such a violation should be punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment of not more than 2 years, or both. If employees of such utility companies are dissatisfied with their wages or working conditions or the administration of the law as it affects them and wish to write or communicate with their Congressman concerning a change in the law or any matter affecting the corporation they must first obtain permission from an established bureaucracy at Washington before they can legally do so. Is not this a direct violation of the right guaranteed by the Constitution to any citizen to petition his Government at any time for a redress of his grievances, a right that was placed therein by our forefathers because of the intolerance of the mother country against the colonists, when, after they petitioned the government setting forth the oppression and injustice they had suffered, the King called them traitors and ordered them arrested forthwith?

I spoke a little while ago about delegation of power. Let me give you an instance of that which occurred before this Congress was 3 weeks old. I believe it was the 18th day of January 1935, when there appeared on the floor of the House of Representatives a bill providing for an appropriation of $4,880,000,000 for various projects to be inaugurated and controlled by the President of the United States, ostensibly for the relief of the unemployed. This bill was brought before the House under a so-called "gag" rule whereby certain sections thereof were not subject to amendment. It turned over this huge amount of money to the President, authorizing him specifically to expend the same in any manner that he should see fit. He had the sole and unlimited right to appoint persons to Government service without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws, and, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, to fix the compensation of any officers and employees so appointed, without any limitation whatsoever.

The hearings before the committee which reported this bill, which was the largest peacetime appropriation in the history of this Nation, were limited to the examination of three witnesses, all of them employees of the Government. Section 6 of the bill authorized the President to prescribe such rules and regulations as would be necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, and any violation of such rule or regulation would be punishable by a fine of not to exceed $5,000 or by imprisonment for not to exceed 2 years, or both. Businessmen in the conduct of their business affairs, if in doubt as to their rights under the law, usually consult their lawyers, who, if not cognizant with the particular statute that applies to the state of facts presented to him, has the facilities in his office for finding the law and so advising his client. If it be a question of State law, he consults the statutes of his own State containing the enactments of the State legislature; if it involves Federal law, he consults the statutes of the United States containing the enactments of Congress. With these volumes at his disposal, he is enabled to advise his client as to his rights and privileges concerning the matter about which he is consulted. But there is no place in the statutes of the United States or in the periodicals accessible to the legal profession wherein rules and regulations promulgated by the Executive of the Nation are available for perusal. The $4,880,000,000 appropriation bill contained no provision for the publication of such rules and regulations or for their distribution to persons interested in obtaining them. Obviously the President might write a rule or regulation tonight in the city of Washington and tomorrow a businessman residing in Illinois, California, or Nebraska, not knowing of its existence and having no means by which its existence could be brought to his attention, might easily violate the same and subject himself to the penalty prescribed by this act.

The Constitution of the United States in the first paragraph of article I provides that all legislative power shall be vested in the Congress of the United States * * *. Yet before the first session of the present Congress was 1 month old the representatives of the people passed this bill delegating to the President of the United States the right to make law—a privilege which was solely theirs—law which their constituents had little or no opportunity to ascertain; law which might through innocent nonobservance subject them to severe and undeserving penalties.

For many years this Nation has prospered under a protective tariff. No longer do we hear any serious advocacy of free trade such as was a political issue three or four decades ago. The great political parties have recognized the force and effect of protection of American industry and in subsequence American workmen and the American standard of living. Under the Constitution, Congress, and Congress alone, has the power to fix tariffs and duties on goods manufactured or grown in foreign countries. The President and the United States Senate have the joint authority to negotiate treaties. The Seventy-third Congress, however, disregarding these patent provisions of our fundamental law and abrogating the authority and right it possessed under the Constitution, passed what is known as the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, a law permitting the President, upon his own initiative and without the consent of Congress, to enter into negotiations with foreign nations whereby import duties on goods grown or manufactured in such countries may be lowered or abolished in return for similar concessions from that nation to us.

As a representative of the people of Illinois, I am naturally interested in the welfare of all industries located therein, because they affect the prosperity and everyday life of the citizens I represent. One of the great industries of the district I represent is the Elgin National Watch Co. Its product is known the world over and is equal, if not superior, to that produced by any manufacturer on the face of the globe. It pays decent wages and its existence is essential to the welfare and prosperity not only of the people of Elgin but of the citizens of the entire Fox River Valley wherein it is located. A few years ago there were in the United States 50 flourishing watch factories. Today there are only three. They are worth the protection of the American Government. A few months ago our Government entered into a trade agreement with Switzerland. The Swiss, as we know, manufacture watches in great quantities. Their standard of living is not comparable to ours. The wages they receive are far below those received by the poorest paid watch worker of the United States. Under that agreement material reductions were made in the tariffs on watches, watch movements, and clocks. And this, in spite of the fact that Switzerland was then supplying us with 55 percent of our watch requirements.

Incidentally, the watch industry is an important factor of national defense. Our Government depends on it to supply it with time fuses for antiaircraft guns. It is equipped to manufacture them as can no other industry in the Nation. In case of emergency, do we wish to turn to Switzerland to supply us with that which is so essential for the protection of human life and property? Or if war does come, must we be at the mercy of foreign air marauders until we can establish in our own country plants of sufficient capacity to supply us with the immediate needs of our Army and Navy? If foreign competition is both encouraged and promoted by our Government, the three remaining watch factories must go the path of those whom they have thus far survived. Then, such a situation will surely exist.

As an economic proposition, the reduction of American-made goods merely swells the ranks of the unemployed. Every business enterprise, every trade, and every profession is seriously affected by the prosperity or lack of prosperity of their local manufacturers.

Our Government cannot consistently urge American industry that it is its patriotic duty to employ more men when at the same time it permits and encourages a flood of foreign-made goods created by cheap labor to compete with its home products.

Again we are reminded that to a large extent the fault lies in a Congress which delegated to one man the right and authority to do the things that the Constitution said it should do itself, and that this man has in turn redelegated that power to others whose sole ambition seems to be the policy of world equality rather than that of "America first." The dream of a utopian state composed of the whole world without trade barriers necessarily means that the standards of living must be equal the world around. It means that our standard must be lowered to meet that of the Chinese, the Egyptian, the Cuban, and the Russian or that theirs must be raised to coincide with ours. Without doubt ours is the highest of any people, civilized or not, on the face of the globe. For years we have had the opportunity to own our own homes, have received higher wages and enjoyed more of the luxuries and comforts of life than have the people of any other nation in the world. It is because our Government in the past protected us commercially from such nations. It must be apparent, then, that this present-day communistic world trade policy of the administration means that, should it be put into effect our standard of living would go down to their level rather than that theirs could possibly come up to ours. I am not willing to subscribe to that doctrine for 1936, whether or not it be born in the minds of Stalin, Trotsky, Lenin, or the most learned of our modern American university professors.

Business principles are just as essential in the conduct of our Nation's affairs as they are in the management of private enterprises. Sound businessmen do not encourage competition in their commercial pursuits. Neither should our Government. Sound businessmen do not spend their resources without careful investigation and consideration. Neither should our Government. Sound businessmen do not spend $2 for every $1 of their income. Neither should our Government. While the unemployment problem must be met and liberal Government expenditures must be voted to meet it, yet the tearing down of legitimate business by suspending above the heads of American industry the Damocles sword of proposed foreign competition through reciprocal-trade treaties is, in my judgment, the most damning force that has retarded recovery and prolonged unemployment ever enacted by an American Congress. Years ago businessmen of the United States gave a sigh of relief when they heard that Congress had adjourned. Then they knew that a breathing space until the next session awaited them. Now, when our lawmakers give away their lawmaking power to someone else to be redelegated and exercised at will, there can be no breathing space. Adherence to sound business methods, the replacement of practical men for theorists in Federal service, the encouragement of reemployment in private industry rather than on Government pay rolls, and, in short, strict compliance with the principles laid down in that great document promulgated by Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and Hamilton will speed us on our way to an America greater than that ever dreamed by man.

VETERANS CAUTIONED ABOUT SPENDING THEIR MONEY

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this early opportunity to issue a word of warning to the 3,518,191 American war veterans who are to receive their adjusted-service certificate bonds from the United States Government on Monday, June 15.

My warning to each of these men is to beware of the crafty chiselers and scandalous schemers who are busily engaged throughout the country in devising shyster ways and means of getting their clutches on the veterans' bonus money.

The $1,924,000,000 that will shortly flow from the Treasury into the hands of ex-service men is a luscious lure that is attracting the unscrupulous, who regard it as a field enormously rich and overflowingly ripe for their picking.

I am humbly grateful for the privilege of fighting 8 long years for the veterans; for the joy of living to see that day dawn when our Federal Government issues payment of its debt to the soldiers, sailors, and marines.

By that same token I am fired with a strong fraternal desire to warn these, my buddies, against the blandishments of business bandits who would snatch the veteran's purse and flee with it.

Now is the time to pause and consider the steps that will be taken by veterans and to urge caution in the disposal of their bonus bonds.

My strongest counsel is for each veteran to go to the bank with which he does business and discuss his personal problem with his banker.

I say the bank, because it is the safest place for (1) the deposit of revenue yield of bonds that have been cashed, and (2) because the United States Government today stands back of the thousands of banks that have insured deposits up to $5,000 through the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

CAUTION IN CASHING BONDS

To those veterans who are obliged to cash in their bonds for needed immediate payment of obligations, I say: Consult your banker first and then cash in only such number of bonds as may be actually needed to meet the individual financial emergency.

This word of counsel is given in warmest friendship for every veteran and for the cause that we have championed together. And it is because I have a firmly grounded faith in our American community banker that I say to the ex-service men, "See your banker first."

Unless veterans are wise in the disposal of their bonus bonds there will be such a titanic torrent of money as to disintegrate the dam of common sense and economy, flood the thirsty sands of greed, and leave nothing but a memory of things that might have been.

The primrose path of summer spending leads straight to poverty. But the man of common sense and vision will bank his bonds against the bitter cold of coming winter.

NOT ORDINARY BONDS

These are not plain or ordinary bonds. They are sound and valuable. They may be redeemed at their face value at any time during the first year, but no interest will be paid if redeemed within a year. Those veterans who hold their bonds for 1 year or more from the date of issue—June 15, 1936—can redeem them at any time thereafter, not only for the face value but plus an additional 3 percent interest. This is extraordinary protection against fluctuation in value. All of these bonds will be dated June 15, 1936.

The bonds are not transferable and not assignable. They are not subject to attachment by legal proceedings. Every bond will run to June 15, 1945. Each bond is redeemable by the Treasury of the United States.

A LARGE AMOUNT DISBURSED

Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, has told me that if the bonds to be issued were laid end to end they would reach from New York City across the dark Atlantic to London and thence almost to Moscow.

The amount of money represented in the ultimate settlements will approximate the pay of 500 men who received $40 a week continuously for the past 1,935 years. I believe the average payment will amount to $536.

To hundreds of thousands of veterans this will represent a nest egg from which, if properly guarded, a new start in life can be hatched, and I cannot refrain from taking this timely opportunity to reiterate my urgent plea to each veteran who will receive a bonus bond: Spend cautiously. See your banker first.

THE BLIND OF THE COUNTRY WILL BECOME SELF-SUSTAINING BY EMPLOYMENT AT WORK THEY CAN DO

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which will become a law as soon as the President affixes his signature to it, will be a godsend to the blind of the United States. As the House of Representatives has unanimously acted today, I want to take this opportunity to thank each and every Member for his sympathetic understanding of the blind man's problems, and for making it possible for this legislation to become a law.

I would like to briefly outline the objectives of this bill in order to show how it will benefit the blind of the United States.

This bill, which permits the blind to operate news, candy, and tobacco stands in Federal buildings, makes it possible for the blind stand operator not only to earn his own living but to demonstrate to the public that a person without sight can earn his own way through life if only given the opportunity to do so.

It has been said that the greatest handicap of the blind is not physical blindness but rather the fact that the public does not understand what a blind person can do if only given a chance. Thus, each stand in a Federal building operated by a blind person wll serve as a model lesson to society. This legislation also provides for a national survey to be made of all kinds of buildings wherein the blind might be given an opportunity to operate vending stands. The Federal building experiment will thus pave the way, so to speak, for thousands of such opportunities to be given to our blind citizens in every part of the country.

Thus, the taxpayers of the United States will save millions of dollars annually by the removal of thousands of rehabilitated blind persons from relief rolls. But, what is really more important, a new light will beam from the darkened eyes of many thousands of our sightless citizens whom this bill will benefit directly, and to them a new lease on life will have come into being. The ambitious blind man who is able to earn his own way through life, if given a chance, despises the dole.

Idleness is another great handicap for the blind. To them, being actively engaged in earning a livelihood for themselves and for their dependents is, like beauty, a joy forever.

A survey will be made, through provisions of this measure, which will show the positions in industries of our Nation in which blind persons can be gainfully and properly employed. There are far-reaching possibilities for good from this information. It will be the dawning of a new and better day for those who cannot see but who desire to earn a living for themselves and their dear ones.

Rehabilitating the blind has always been the greatest problem which agencies for the blind of this country have had to face. This bill will bring about a national, uniform, and coordinate plan of rehabilitating the blind of this country. This will be accomplished by bringing into closer cooperation the Federal Vocational Rehabilitation Service and its affiliated State divisions of rehabilitation with the State agencies for the blind. The benefits and experiments of one State will be carried over to other States, and thus greater efficiency and economy in the work to be done will result.

I am happy to have had the privilege and honor to sponsor this most worthy bill in this branch of Congress, and I know that Senator SHEPPARD, who worked so diligently in its behalf in the Senate, feels the same about it as I do. I also am deeply grateful for the excellent help given me by Leonard A. Robinson, blind attorney of Cleveland, Ohio. To all those who aided, I am most appreciative.

I am quite confident that every Federal agency and department will cooperate to the fullest extent to make this rehabilitation project for the blind a great success. It would be an act of charity for them to do so. The greatest charity is that which enables one's fellowman to earn his own living so he will not have to depend on relief rolls. Such an act of charity today is regarded as a duty. In this connection, and in conclusion, I think it fitting to quote from Pope's Essay on Man:

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administer'd is best.
> For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
> His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.
> In faith and hope the world will disagree,
> But all mankind's concern is charity.

STATUS OF SOCIAL-SECURITY LEGISLATION

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for permission to revise and extend my remarks in order to furnish information regarding the status of the social-security legislation insofar as it affects the people of Texas. As is well known, Congress passed the Social Security Act last session and it was approved on August 14, 1935. As stated by the Ways and Means Committee in its report, this bill provides for various grants-in-aid to the States; establishes a Federal old-age-benefit system and a Social Security Board; and imposes certain taxes hereinafter described.

Title 1 of the act provides for Federal grants to be made to the States for old-age pensions to persons who have reached the age of 65. In making these grants the Federal Government will match what the States put up within certain limits. The money is to be paid to States whose old-age-assistance plans have been approved by the Social Security Board in compliance with the requirements of section 2, such as:

(a) The plan must be State-wide in operation.

(b) An individual who is denied old-age assistance must be given a fair hearing before the State agency.

(c) The methods of administration of the State plan must be approved by the Board and reports made to the Board.

(d) If the State, using Federal money granted to it, pays pensions to aged persons, and later collects back from their estates some or all of the money so paid, the State must pay one-half of the amount collected to the Federal Government.

(e) A person shall not be denied assistance on the ground that he is not old enough to be eligible for it if, in fact, he has reached the age of 65.

(f) A person shall not be denied assistance on the ground that he has not been a resident long enough if, in fact, he has lived in the State for 1 year immediately preceding his application, and for any 5 years out of the 9 years immediately preceding his application.

(g) A person shall not be denied assistance on the ground that he has not been a United States citizen for a number of years if, in fact, when he receives assistance he is a United States citizen.

SECURITY FOR CHILDREN

Titles 4 and 5 of the bill deal with security for children. As the committee said in its report, children are perhaps the most tragic victims of the depression. More than 40 percent of all persons on relief—approximately 9,000,000 individuals—are children under 16 years in contrast to 28 percent of the population falling in this age group. There are now approximately 7,500,000 men and women over 65 years of age in the United States as compared with 9,000,000 children who are on relief. Nearly 10 percent of all families on relief are without a breadwinner other than a mother whose time might best be devoted to the care of her young children. Forty-five States now have laws providing public aid with respect to dependent children in homes. In many of these States the laws are only partially operative or not at all. Under section 403 of the Federal law, from the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for aid to dependent children, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing July 1, 1935, an amount, which shall be used exclusively for carrying out the State plan, equal to one-third of the total sums expended during such quarter under such plan, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any dependent child for any month as exceeds $18, or if there is more than one dependent child in the same home, as exceeds $18 for any month with respect to one such dependent child and $12 for such month with respect to each of the other dependent children. Any State can submit a proper plan to the Social Security Board and receive approval and the dependent children of that State will immediately begin to receive public aid in accordance with the act. The requirements are similar to those in the case of aged persons under the old-age-assistance provision discussed above.

SERVICES FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN

Federal aid is also given for hospitalization and aftercare of crippled children. There are between 300,000 and 500,000 physically handicapped children in this country, a large percentage of them the victims of infantile paralysis. Eighteen States are now using public funds for this purpose, and it is for the purpose of stimulating an expansion of this work that Federal aid is given to the States.

AID TO THE BLIND

Section 1003 of the Federal law provides that from the sums appropriated therefor the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for aid to the blind, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing July 1, 1935, (1) an amount which shall be used exclusively as aid to the blind, equal to one-half of the total of the sums expended during such quarter as aid to the blind under the State plan with respect to each individual who is blind and is not an inmate of a public institution, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $30. Any State which submits a proper plan can secure its approval and begin receiving Federal aid for the blind within its borders. The requirements are very much the same as in the case of old-age assistance. There are many blind people in Texas who would be greatly helped by this act if the State of Texas would comply with its provisions.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The Federal law provides for unemployment compensation. It is generally conceded that unemployment is the most serious problem that confronts us. Even during the years 1922–29 an average of 8 percent of the industrial workers in this country were unemployed, and in the four depression years, 1930–33, the unemployment rate was above 25 percent. Titles 3 and 9 of the Federal act seek to encourage States to set up systems of unemployment insurance and to keep them from being handicapped if they do so. The purpose of the act is the accumulation of reserves in times of employment, from which partial compensation may be paid to workers who became unemployed and are unable to find work. A number of European countries have had unemployment laws for some time, and no nation has ever abandoned such laws when once established. The failure of the States to enact unemployment-insurance laws is largely due to the fact that to do so would handicap their industries in competition with the industries of other States. Title 9 of this bill removes this handicap, because it imposes a tax upon employers throughout the country, against which a credit is allowed of up to 90 percent of the tax for contributions made by employers to unemployment-compensation funds established pursuant to State law. The scale of benefits which States will be able to pay from a 3-percent rate of contributions on pay rolls will carry the great majority of unemployed workers through normal years until they are able to secure employment again. This bill gives to the States wide discretion with regard to the kind of unemployment compensation they wish to enact. In order for any State to secure the benefits of this law for its own citizens the unemployment law of such State must be approved by the Board. Before the Board will approve a State law it must find that:

(a) All compensation is to be paid through employment office in the State.

(b) No compensation shall be payable with respect to any day of unemployment occurring within 2 years after the first day of the first period with respect to which contributions are required.

(c) All money received in the unemployment fund shall immediately, upon such receipt, be paid over to the Secretary of the Treasury to the credit of the unemployment trust fund.

(d) All money withdrawn from the unemployment trust fund by the State agency shall be used in the payment of compensation.

(e) Compensation shall not be denied in such State to any otherwise eligible individual for refusing to accept new work under such conditions as due to strike or labor disputes, and so forth.

TEXAS AND THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

I have briefly described the principal provisions of the Social Security Act. I have used the report of the Committee on Ways and Means because it is very excellent and is authoritative. The State of Texas has complied with one provision of the Social Security Act; namely, the old-age-assistance plan. As I recall, Texas passed an old-age-pension plan in November 1935, but due to the fact that the bill did not secure the necessary majority it did not become effective until February 14, 1936.

As I recall, immediately upon passage of the State law the Governor appointed the members of the Texas Old Age Assistance Commission. On February 10, 1936, which was 4 days before the Texas law become effective, but nearly 90 days after its passage and after the members of the commission were appointed, I wired Mr. Carpenter, chairman of the old-age-assistance board, and told him that the Social Security Board had advised me that the Federal Government had done everything it could and was ready to allocate to Texas necessary funds as soon as the board submitted its program to the commission in accordance with the law. In this telegram I told Mr. Carpenter that there were hundreds of very needy people in my district who were in distress and that I wondered when we might expect the State pension plan to be submitted to the Social Security Board for approval. In this same telegram I told him that as soon as this plan was submitted I would do everything in my power to secure immediate approval, as it was imperative that this pension be begun at once and that necessary steps be taken to carry out the intention of Congress. Mr. Carpenter immediately answered my telegram and said that the Social Security Board had advised that State plans would not be considered by them until the law is effective, which, in the case of Texas, was February 14. He stated that he had been advised by the Board that the Texas law complied with the Federal requirements and that he anticipated no difficulty in securing approval when submitted. He said that the commission had worked day and night since this law was passed in setting up an organization necessary to carry it into effect the minute it was effective and that application blanks on old-age assistance would be available on Friday.

Thereafter I kept in touch with the Social Security Board to find out from time to time if the Texas plan had been received. Having been informed every time that it had not, I again wired Mr. Carpenter on April 7 and told him that I had been advised that the plan had not yet been received in Washington; that many of my constituents were writing about it and that I was most anxious to have the plan submitted so that pension checks could be started without delay; that it was my desire to cooperate in every possible way to see that the Texas plan was approved when received here. On April 8 Mr. Carpenter answered my telegram and assured me that the State plan would be submitted in ample time for payments to be made in Texas on July 1.

Mr. Speaker, I am giving these facts to expose some of the propaganda that is being spread throughout my district for the purpose of deceiving some of my constituents into believing that their failure to receive their pension checks is due to some fault on the part of the Federal Government. As a matter of fact, the Federal Government has done everything that it could do. On February 11 we appropriated ample money to match dollars with the State of Texas in the payment of old-age assistance. While we did not appropriate this money until February 11, 1936, the money was effective as of February 1, so that any State which expended funds for old-age assistance under an approved plan during February could have received Federal funds as of February 1, 1936.

If assistance was being administered during February 1936 to aged individuals in the State of Texas in accordance with an approvable plan, Texas would have received Federal grants as of February 1. It is true that the State of Texas could not have secured approval of its plan until after February 14, 1936. But if the State had been in a position to submit its plan to the Social Security Board and had it approved during February, after February 14, and begun the expenditure of State funds for old-age assistance, the eligible aged people of the State of Texas would have begun receiving their Federal assistance as of February 1. Congress appropriated on February 11, $24,660,000 for grants to States for old-age assistance under title I of the Social Security Act for the period February 1 to June 30, 1936. Twenty-six States received grants during the quarter ending March 31, and a few weeks ago I was advised that 17 States have had grants authorized for the quarter ending June 30. Several weeks ago the Social Security Board advised me that 32 States had old-age-assistance plans approved; that 19 States had their plans to aid the blind approved; and that 18 States had their plans to aid dependent children approved. I do not have the information as to the number of States that have complied with the Federal unemployment compensation law.

The method of computing and paying the Federal aid is as follows:

The Board shall, prior to the beginning of each quarter, estimate the amount to be paid to each State under the provisions of clause 1 of subsection (a), such estimate to be based on a report filed by the State containing its estimate of the total sum to be expended in such quarter in accordance with the provisions of such clause and stating the amount appropriated or made available by the State for such expenditures in such quarter, and if such amount is less than one-half of the total sum of such estimated expenditure, the source or sources from which the difference is expected to be derived, records showing the number of individuals in the State and such other investigation as the Board may find necessary. The Board shall then certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount so estimated by the Board, reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any sum by which it finds that its estimate for any prior quarter was greater or less than the amount which should have been paid to the State for such quarter, and so forth.

Several weeks ago the Social Security Board advised me that the State of Texas had not as yet submitted to the Social Security Board a certified statement of the amount of money actually available for the payment of old-age assistance. Before any Federal funds are actually granted to the State the Board said such a statement would be required from the State treasury. In the letter to me the Board said that it had the certification of the executive director of the Texas Old Age Assistance Commission that more than $700,000 was available at that time for the payment of old-age assistance for the quarter ending June 30, and that it anticipated expenditures from State funds would not exceed that amount. The Board also stated that it had been given to understand that before the Social Security Board would be called upon to make a grant to Texas for the quarter beginning July 1, the Texas Old Age Assistance Commission would furnish evidence as to the amount of State money actually available for the payment of aid for the period subsequent to that date. In this same letter the Board said that since many States are in the process of securing new revenue legislation which will be used as a basis for financing the State's share of the cost of old-age assistance, the Social Security Board has not so far required the States to submit evidence of their ability to provide assistance from State funds for a period beyond the quarter for which the grant was made.

It is, therefore, important to remember that the State must make adequate provisions to raise the necessary funds in accordance with this law.

A number of people have asked me if the Federal law made it necessary for the State to set up certain property and income qualifications. Under the Texas law, as I understand it, a single person who has an income from any and all sources exceeding $360 per year, or if married, a combined income from any and all sources exceeding $720 per year cannot receive old-age assistance. Likewise, a person who owns property, real, personal, or mixed other than cash or marketable securities, the fair value of which, taking into consideration assessed valuations for State and county tax purposes less all incumbrances and liens, which exceeds, if single, $5,000 or, if married, $7,500 cannot receive old-age assistance. There is also the property qualifications in regard to cash or marketable securities, the fair value of which exceeds $500, if single, or, if married, $1,000.

Some of the aged people in my district have been told that these provisions were put into the Texas law because it was necessary under the Social Security Act passed by us. This is absolutely untrue. While section 1 of the Social Security Act authorizes the expenditure of the Federal funds for the purpose of enabling each State to furnish financial assistance to aged needy individuals, the act did not define "need", and left largely to the discretion of the State the determination of the question of need. I have been informed by the Social Security Board that wide latitude is left to the State to determine the question of need. So that those who say that these property and income qualifications, as contained in the Texas law, were made necessary by the Federal law are misstating the facts and misrepresenting the truth. This is within reasonable bounds a question for the State to determine. One legislature might think that $370 per year was enough for an aged individual, and that such individual was not entitled to old-age assistance. Another legislature might put the limit at $600 and still come within the Federal law. A Government bureau has heretofore held that a family needs $2,100 a year to live with any degree of comfort in the United States. It is, therefore, certain that so long as the State is not unreasonable it will be given wide latitude in determining who shall receive the benefits of the old-age-assistance laws insofar as the question of need is concerned.

TEXAS AND THE OTHER BENEFITS OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

As is generally known, Texas has not complied with the other provisions of the Social Security Act, such as aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, and unemployment insurance. I sincerely hope that the State will comply with these provisions at the earliest possible date. Dependent children in other States that have complied with the Federal law are now receiving this Federal aid. The same is true in reference to the blind people. We must not neglect the thousands of dependent children in the State of Texas. We must remember that in less than a generation these children will constitute a large part of the adults who must carry the burdens of our Government. As stated by the Committee on Economic Security, "The core of any social plan must be the child." The aid to dependent children and the blind in the State of Texas is just as important as old-age assistance. Neither can we afford to neglect the unemployment-compensation law.

The unfortunate victims of the depression should be given every security that can be soundly provided. Many forward-looking and progressive States have already enacted unemployment-compensation laws. Every day that the State of Texas delays action to comply with the provisions of the Social Security Act is costing our own citizens the taxes which they must pay for the benefit of the citizens in other States. For instance, a State that had complied with the Social Security Act with respect to aged individuals, dependent children, and the blind during November has already received thousands of dollars from the Federal Treasury. The taxpayers of Texas must help furnish this money without having the satisfaction of knowing that our aged people, our blind, and our dependent children are receiving the benefits of this act. An aged individual in a State which expended money for old-age assistance beginning in February 1936 has already received substantial aid from the Federal Government.

With the great natural resources in the State of Texas and our tremendous wealth, there is no reason why the aged individuals, the dependent children, the blind, and unemployed shall not receive the full benefits of the Social Security Act.

THE YOUGHIOGHENY WATERSHED DEVELOPMENT—FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the floods of 1936 throughout the Nation, eastern and southern United States, again impressed upon our people and Congress the necessity of flood control.

If the Nation had spent $5,000,000,000 for flood control 5 to 10 years ago we would have saved the $10,000,000,000 destruction of floods and erosion that has taken place in the United States since that time. In other words, if we would have spent $5,000,000,000 we would be at least $5,000,000,000 better off.

China was at one time as rich and prosperous in soil and national resources as we were 40 or 50 years ago. China destroyed her timberlands, and thus heavy rains and erosion has given China hundreds of thousands of acres of barren land. The United States to date has been pursuing the same course as China pursued a thousand years ago.

For example, in my own district 50 or 75 years ago, we had ample timberland to protect our soil and absorb our rainfall so as not to have destructive floods. This spring, in my district and the districts surrounding mine, not only my people, but everyone sees that something must be done quickly to save what we have left of our soil and to protect our homes and our industries.

Three years ago I introduced a bill known as the Youghiogheny-watershed development. The survey of the Army Engineers show that by building one big dam between Ohiopyle and Confluence, Pa., on the Youghiogheny River, and from four to seven smaller dams on the upper Youghiogheny River, the Casselman River, and Lower Hill Creek, we could not only hold the water so it would not flood the Pittsburgh district in time of heavy rains and snows, but conserve the water in these dams for domestic purposes in time of drought. Furthermore, the big dam on the Youghiogheny River, referred to above, would be built so as it could be used for power purposes when desired.

In the flood-control bill that passed the House an item of $1,580,000 was carried to build some of the smaller dams referred to. However, the graveness of the recent floods caused the Army Engineers to check more closely on the surveys already made and with the result that we are now asking for a resurvey of the entire Youghiogheny watershed. The people of the Pittsburgh district realize that if this watershed is developed to its fullest capacity that will have greater protection against floods and will have access to fine mountain water for domestic purposes. It is encouraging to the people of my district to know that the Government is interested in developing and protecting the land, the streams, and the homes.

I appreciate very much the consideration given the Youghiogheny water project by the Flood Control Committee, the Army Engineers, and the Members of the House who voted to pass the $1,580,000 unit embodied in the flood-control bill, and I am now asking you to hold in reserve for this measure when the resurvey by the Army Engineers is completed.

Already the Federal recreational park development program has purchased some 5,000 acres on the headwaters of the Laurel Hill Creek, and with the aid of the C. C. C. boys and the W. P. A. program it has been improved to a degree that some 100 cabins will be ready for occupation by the first of August.

This development means much to the farmers, laborers, and businessmen of not only Somerset County but the entire Pittsburgh, Connellsville, and Johnstown district. In 10 or 15 years from now we will all be doubly proud that we had an active part in this citizenship and Nation-building development. The next generation will sing our praises for handing down to them this improvement.

GREAT BRITAIN'S DUTY IN PALESTINE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, for the past 5 weeks an ever-increasing stream of grave news is reaching this country from Palestine. A veritable reign of terror has descended upon the Holy Land. Cowardly and unprovoked assaults upon the indomitable Jewish settlers of Palestine have been occurring with ever greater frequency, in which 28 Jews have been brutally assassinated. Jewish property is being pillaged and wantonly destroyed.

The authorities are either unable or unwilling to adopt stringent measures to protect the flourishing Jewish community in Palestine. Not a single assassin has been apprehended. The Government flatly refused to come to the aid of several Jewish colonies that have been surrounded by savage mobs and are in imminent danger of being wiped out.

This news is regarded with deep concern not only by American citizens of Jewish origin but by all those who have been watching with sympathy the incomparable progress made by the Jews in the reestablishment of their ancient homeland in the land of their fathers.

Be it remembered that Great Britain was entrusted with a mandate by the League of Nations to govern Palestine and to establish there such conditions that would facilitate the creation of a Jewish homeland in the Holy Land. If I am not mistaken, it was David Lloyd George, wartime Prime Minister of Britain, who expressed the view that one of the major achievements of the World War was the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. This sentiment, that the regeneration of Palestine is to be considered one of the few eminently moral and ethical accomplishments of the carnage of the war, has been voiced by leading statesmen in practically all civilized countries of the world.

Great Britain eagerly sought and freely accepted the mandate over Palestine, with its unequivocal provisions relating to the Jewish homeland policy. The project received the unanimous endorsement of the Congress of the United States of America in a joint resolution of both Houses. It was signed by President Harding and received unqualified approval by American public opinion.

Spurred on by the conviction that Great Britain would institute in Palestine a beneficent and vigorous and enlightening administration, assuring protection to life and property, a substantial amount of American capital has been invested in Palestine and a number of American citizens are residing at present there in the pursuit of peaceful enterprise.

Not only did Americans trust to the ability of Great Britain to assure a reign of law and order in the Holy Land but they have confidently expected that Great Britain would strictly adhere to the policy expressed in the mandate of the League of Nations, which policy is by the terms of the congressional resolution the policy of this country.

It is superfluous to remind the House of the unparalleled plight in which large sections of Jewry find themselves at the present time due to the recrudescence of the spirit of intolerance, bigotry, and racial oppression in certain countries of Europe. These sorely tried people have been looking to Palestine as their only refuge from the intolerable conditions in their countries of birth. They have been coming to Palestine in considerable numbers, transforming what was, up to recently, a veritable desert into one of the most prosperous and one of the most progressive countries in the world. They have truly converted the country into "a land flowing with milk and honey." To paraphrase an old saying concerning the Austria-Hungarian Empire:

If there were no Palestine, it would have to be invented.

In view of all that, is it not natural that people everywhere should expect that the mandatory power would at least vigorously discharge the most elementary and primary duties of government, and that is the protection of life and property?

In conclusion may I read from an editorial in the New York Times of Saturday, May 23:

> • • • Tension throughout Palestine remains dangerously acute. Already the dead number 26 Jews, most of these assassinated; 16 Arabs, most of these killed by the police during riots, and an Austrian catholic, shot while walking the streets of Jerusalem. Despite the stern orders of the Government, the Arab attacks on the Jew continue.
> • • • But there will be slight chance of real peace in Palestine unless and until the British Government has convinced both Jews and Arabs of its unalterable determination to carry out the obligations it voluntarily assumed under the mandate.

I sincerely hope that Great Britain will firmly surpress lawless bands of assassins roaming the country, to whom it seemed, for a while, to have surrendered. This country views with concern the recent developments in the Holy Land and earnestly hopes that the mandatory power will proceed in the spirit suggested by the New York Times editorial.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered another "horse and buggy" decision. The growing number of such decisions fairly raises the question whether the horse-and-buggy decisions could emanate from a present-day source.

The latest 5-to-4 decision, knocking out the New York State minimum-wage law for women and children, caps the climax of a series of decisions which hold—and where they do not hold, indicate—that the whole body of social-justice and human-welfare legislation enacted by this administration, and not only by this administration but by the States, is unconstitutional and void.

The Court had already separately decided that agriculture and manufacturing and mining are local industries, and that interstate commerce does not take place until the product begins its movement across State lines. This has the effect of excluding almost the entire economic field from Federal control.

THE QUESTION IS

A writer in the Washington Post, whose daily column has invariably been highly critical of the New Deal and all its works, speaking of the decision in the New York minimum-wage case, states the situation in a nutshell when he says:

> The Court, by a 5-to-4 decision, ruled that the State legislatures are without authority to fix minimum wages of workers in a given industry.
> A week ago the Court ruled in the Guffey decision that the relationship between employer and employee constituted a local transaction and thus was outside the authority of Congress and the Federal Government.

And he follows with this question:

> Thus who can regulate the relationship of employers and employees?

NATION POWERLESS

In the N. R. A. decision the Court said:

> We are of the opinion that the attempt through the provisions of the code to fix the hours and wages of employees of defendants in their intrastate business was not a valid exercise of Federal power.

Thus labor went out the window on the attempt of Congress to reduce hours and raise wages within the States. Now comes a decision that the State itself has no such power.

In the A. A. A. decision the Court said:

> Its stated purpose is the control of agricultural production, a purely local activity, in an effort to raise the prices paid the farmer.

Thus the farmer went out the window on the attempt of Congress to raise prices. May we not look for a decision in due course that the State also has no such power?

At any rate, these continuing decisions have one merit: they are teaching us what we cannot do, or rather why we cannot do it. It is not a question whether what we attempt to do is necessary or is good: it is only a question whether it is constitutional.

GRIM IRONY

Presumably, maximum hours and minimum wages would be good for women and children; also for men. Reasonable prices, meaning the cost of production and a reasonable profit, would be good for farmers. Pensions would be good for the aged, and so would insurance for the unemployed. All these would be good for society as a whole, making it more stable, more equitable, more civilized. But, says the Court, once again and finally, laws, whether State or National, effecting these beneficent ends violate the freedom of contract guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

To which four of the nine Justices rejoin:

There is grim irony in speaking of the freedom of contract of those who, because of their economic necessities, give their services for less than is needful to keep body and soul together.

CLOSES THE DOOR

Here is some more irony, from an editorial in the conservative Washington Star of June 2:

The 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court yesterday invalidating the New York minimum-wage law for women and children is peculiarly devastating in its effect. It not only throws out the New York law but will kill 16 State laws modeled on the New York statute. It presumably closes the door for some time to come to legislation of this type.

Nor does the irony of this devastating decision end here. It develops that this case involved the laundry business in the State of New York; but I again quote the same editorial—

The law was not contested by the laundry employers' organization, which, at the time of the law's test in the lower court, appeared as friend of the court and petitioned that the law be allowed to remain in effect.

And to fill labor's cup with joy, the editorial concludes:

Yesterday's opinion seems to cast its shadow, along with that of the decision in the Guffey coal case, over coming events in connection with the Wagner labor relations law, which might be considered as doomed.

STATE POWERLESS

In its news review of the decision the same paper says:

The decision and the reasoning upon which it rests clearly show that the State is without power by any form of legislation to prohibit, change, or nullify contracts between employers and adult women workers as to the amount of wages to be paid.

In order that the layman may see at a glance upon what the decision and the reasoning rest, I shall quote the organic law as found in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, section 1:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

This is the constitutional provision guaranteeing freedom of contract, referred to in the dissenting opinion of the four Justices in its application to labor as grim irony. Says the fourteenth amendment to labor, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here."

THE JUDICIAL POTTER'S FIELD

The Washington News tells the story in cartoon. A row of new-made graves are marked "N. R. A.", "A. A. A.", "Various farm acts", "Guffey Coal Act", "Railroad Pension Act", "New York minimum-wage law", and so forth. Walking away from the burial plot is a bulky figure in judicial robes, long-handled shovel on shoulder.

Mr. Speaker, it is small wonder that conservative commentators, who hope for the political overthrow of the New Deal, stand aghast at this latest decision of the Supreme Court, and treat the decision under such headings as "Roosevelt gets a break in the Supreme Court wage ruling", and that it may be the turning point.

NEW DRED SCOTT DECISION

There must be a turning point somewhere. It was only 5 years from the Dred Scott decision to the emancipation proclamation. The President of the United States, by proclamation issued under his military powers, reversed the Supreme Court, and his action was made final at Appomattox.

The distinguished Republican Member from New York [Mr. FISH], who has been active in the campaign of Senator BORAH, the only progressive Republican candidate for President, stated on the floor of the House following the decision, and I quote him with his permission:

The Supreme Court has presented the American people with a new Dred Scott decision condemning millions of Americans to economic slavery, and the issue will not down until it has been righted in the public interest.

COURT BARRIER TO SOCIAL PROGRESS

Mr. Speaker, condemnation of this decision seems almost universal. The Supreme Court now occupies the status of a barrier across the stream of social progress. Both the express pronouncements of these decisions, and the obiter dicta and forewarnings, reflecting the viewpoint of the judges, leave little hope that anything will be saved. The T. V. A. decision, in which the administration claimed a "dog-fall", was narrowed to the proposition that Wilson Dam was a national-defense and wartime project, and that the Government had the right to dispose of the surplus electric energy produced by it and to acquire the necessary instrumentalities for its disposal. The decision leaves the door wide open to invalidate the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The decision on the Railroad Retirement Act lays the foundation for invalidating title 2 of the Social Security Act, establishing a system of contributory old-age pensions, and title 3, establishing a system of unemployment insurance. It does, indeed, lay the foundation for invalidating the entire act.

THE TWILIGHT ZONE

Bryan once proposed the Federal licensing of corporations to bridge what is called the "twilight zone" between the Federal Government and the States. It would appear that after 40 years of alleged progress, the twilight zone has expanded until it has swallowed up both States and Nation. After each of these decisions the forces of progress, of social security, and justice have searched its language for a way out, salvaging expeditions, so to speak, but they now find themselves in such a labyrinth of adverse decisions that the ways out appear to have narrowed to two—a change in the personnel of the Court or a change in the Constitution.

DECISIONS DETERMINED BY ECONOMIC VIEWS

Apropos of a change in personnel, I want to recall at this time a statement made by me on the floor of the House on February 6 of this year, when, in discussing the A. A. A. decision and in answer to an observation made by the distinguished minority floor leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], I said:

I want to speak respectfully and carefully in this matter. I cannot help but feel that the majority of the Supreme Court were influenced in that decision by their own economic views and sympathies.

And on Monday, June 1, of this year, the writer of the able dissenting opinion on the New York minimum-wage-law case said:

It is difficult to imagine any grounds, other than our own personal economic predilections, for saying that the contract of employment is any the less an appropriate subject of legislation than are scores of others, in dealing with which this Court has held that legislatures may curtail individual freedom in the public interest.

BACKGROUND OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. Speaker, a humble Member of Congress and homemade lawyer may properly find reassurance in the fact that a criticism made by him on the floor of this House nearly 6 months ago with respect to decisions of the Supreme Court is now stated in better legal form by a most able and eminent member of that distinguished body.

It is not necessary to impugn the honesty or the humanity of the five judges who have given their assent to the devastating decisions of the Supreme Court in the past 6 months. It is wholly a matter of viewpoint. Given a man's viewpoint, it will be seen that his acts, his record, fit into it. No finer breed of men ever trod the soil of America than the planters of the ante-bellum era. They were cultured, they were humane, they were hospitable, but they inherited their estate, and their inheritance conditioned their outlook on life and all its related problems. Human slavery was natural, not repugnant, to them. They no more questioned it than they questioned the trees or the sunshine.

The same may be said of the great majority of the men who sit on the Federal benches of this country. They form a class apart. They are cloistered from the strife of the world. They live "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife." Their education, their training and environment, if not their birth, have far removed them from the common lot of men and women and children who must struggle, and often in vain, for the bare necessities of life. They see life through the glasses of their environment, the environment of the man with a university education; then a successful law practice, most often in the service of special interests; and then a life position of great power and with no personal concern for the wants of the future.

It is fitting that this latest decision should have been written by a jurist who at the time of his elevation to the Supreme Bench was growing gray in the service of the corporations. He is not the only such on that tribunal, and this type predominates in the make-up of the Federal judiciary generally. As a class, they are men whose background before elevation to the Bench gave them an antipathetic viewpoint on the problems of the workers and farmers, who constitute the great bulk of our population.

WHICH WAY OUT?

But, Mr. Speaker, we cannot predicate basic reforms upon the views or predilections of persons temporarily holding office. While it is true that the change of one man, and at most two, would have resulted in sustaining most of the laws which have been swept from the statute books during the past year, no thinking man would propose such a change as a permanent method of solving the great question to which these decisions have given rise. This is a government of laws, not of men—at least, we accept this in theory. The question, therefore, is, Is the organic law sufficiently flexible to meet the needs of an economic system which not only did not exist but was not even dreamed of at the time the organic law was framed? Is it, as it now reads, the last word?

The decision of the Supreme Court in the New York minimum-wage case has greatly enlarged the scope of this question. It goes far beyond the constitutional questions which proved fatal to N. R. A. and A. A. A. This decision did not invalidate an act of Congress as in violation of the Federal Constitution. It invalidated a State law as in violation of the Federal Constitution. It was not a question whether the State law was in violation of the Constitution of the State of New York; it was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. This means that, even though the law were valid under the State constitution, it would be void under the Federal Constitution. This decision killed similar laws in 16 States. In effect it forbids the enactment of any such law in all States. The States have no power to legislate. The Congress has no power to legislate. If the Congress undertakes to legislate, it brings up against the fifth amendment. The fifth amendment to the Constitution, limiting the Federal power, provides that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." This applies to the Federal Government. The same language in the fourteenth amendment limits the State power. Between the two provisions both Federal and State Governments are bound hand and foot.

It is this situation that gives point to the editorial observation that the decision presumably closes the door for some time to come to legislation of this type. Until what time to come? the question may be asked. In the light of the widespread pressing conditions, involving millions, which this type of legislation is meant to remedy, and is needed to remedy, we may well ask, "What time to come?" We may further insist that some element in addition to time enters the picture. Time alone, no matter how much time, will not solve it. Time will only make a bad situation worse. The women and children of the country must go back to the sweatshops and take what they get, modified by such amelioration as they may obtain through organized efforts.

I have suggested two alternatives to meet the situation—a change in the personnel of the Court or a change in the Constitution. I have indicated that the latter method only can give permanent and lasting results; and still I have not said that we must change the Constitution. I shall now say this: That either we must decide that social-justice legislation, both National and State, is not necessary, or that the Constitution must be amended.

There is a school of thought holding the view that no change in either the Constitution or the laws is necessary; that these problems will work themselves out; that the worker and the farmer will achieve their own salvation. I do not belong to that school of thought. I do not believe that the conflicting economic forces of the country can themselves voluntarily establish social justice and security for all the people. It has never yet been done and we have not progressed to the point where it may now be done. The preamble to the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States.

The forces of progress seek to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, and promote the general welfare. These are the sole objectives of every act of Congress which has been nullified by the Supreme Court. We now find ourselves deprived of the power to achieve these objectives, because it is said, by a divided Court, that such power is not resident in the organic law of the land. If it be conceded that it should reside somewhere, it seems to me the method is clear.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a House joint resolution providing for the submission of a constitutional amendment giving Congress the power to legislate upon the economic problems, upon the solution of which depends not only the welfare but the perpetuity of this form of government. I claim no credit of authorship. It is only a copy of the resolution introduced in the Senate in the first days of the Seventy-fourth Congress by the brilliant and distinguished senior Senator from Colorado, Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN, who has long enjoyed a national reputation as a progressive thinker and humanitarian in the field of political economics and social betterment. Excluding prefatory recitals, the proposed amendment is as follows:

SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to regulate hours and conditions of labor and to establish minimum wages in any employment and to regulate production, industry, business, trade, and commerce to prevent unfair methods and practices therein.

SEC. 2. The due process of law clauses of the fifth and fourteenth amendments shall be construed to impose no limitations upon legislation by the Congress or by the several States with respect to any of the subjects referred to in section 1, except as to the methods or the procedure for the enforcement of such legislation.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this article shall be construed to impair the regulatory power of the several States with respect to any of the subjects referred to in section 1, except to the extent that the exercise of such power by a State is in conflict with legislation enacted by the Congress pursuant to this article.

BRASS TACKS, BY DAVID CUSHM'N COYLE, NATIONAL HOME LIBRARY FOUNDATION—BOOK REVIEW

BRASS TACKS—SHOOT FROM THE HIP—BULL'S-EYE

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, a cowpuncher once spoke of experts. He said: "They know all about windage, trajectories, ballistics, velocities, and such like. But I shoot from the hip."

When asked how he always succeeded in making a bull's-eye he said, "I know how to shoot."

David Cushman Coyle, in Brass Tacks, knows how to shoot. The book is published by the National Home Library Foundation, Washington, D. C., and costs 25 cents.

Ever since the depression started I have been reading books about it, and they are all too long and written in a language which somehow I do not comprehend, much less understand. For instance, the other day I tried to read a book written by the most conscientious people imaginable, on a very important subject, but such a mumbo-jumbo of professorial gibberish never twisted my eyes before.

As a matter of fact, by laborious study, I finally understood a few chapters; but had the book been 150 pages instead of 600, and had the language used been in ordinary terminology and not obscurely and quite unnecessarily technical, and in a sort of university jargon, I could have finished reading it.

I did finish reading Brass Tacks. That is because it is not too long; it is plainly written. I feel as though I understand it. That does not mean that I thoroughly understand everything in it, nor that I agree with everything; but it is about our world and is written in our language.

Sherman Mittell, editor and president of the National Home Library Foundation, which published Brass Tacks, says, "It is the most exciting and informative new work by any American writing today." Some experts will not like that, but I think that the average American jury would say he was right.

BELIEVE IT OR NOT, AN ENGINEER WRITES BOOK THAT CAN BE READ

I do not suppose Mr. Coyle's book is the last one to be written in this world, but his accomplishment is to be an engineer and still write with some social consciousness. Coyle is not classed as an "economist", nor a "political scientist." Nor does he deal in the superficial aspects of our civilization like (such as being) a stock-market "analyst", nor as an "expert" who knows all about everything. For many years he has been designing shiny new factories—many which closed up soon after being finished, others which never opened. He has helped plan 50-story office buildings in New York, which are 80 percent empty.

He built so many things that were not used that he finally began to wonder why. So he got to going around, and, according to what he says, he has talked to "New Dealers and Old Dealers, fishermen and cowboys, 'brain trusters' and Congressmen, conservatives and Communists, professors and bankers, stodgy experts and wild-eyed cranks."

SHIRT FRONTS HISS—AND COLLAPSE

The book Brass Tacks is the result. He says:

> The times are ripe, the hiss of collapsing shirt fronts is all about us, the crisis is upon us; we must play up now or give way to those who will. This book is a vote for playing up.

These lines sound all right to me. Talk about Jefferson! Let Liberty Leaguers weep and gnash their teeth. I have an idea that were Jefferson alive he would get on the side lines and cheer such words to beat the band.

IDEAS NO LONGER FIT THE FACTS

What did Jefferson and Franklin face? They faced a new world in which it was necessary to have new methods and new ideas. So the old rules were obsolete. What did they do? They took the old set of rules apart, pitched out of the window what they did not need, saved what was worth saving, added new ones, and started a new system. That system has worked in tolerable fashion for over a century.

Coyle says:

> The American people are perplexed and disturbed. Their affairs are in a mess. Millions are unemployed; others suffer from depleted incomes and insecurity. Savings have been used up; investments have been wiped out. Debts, public and private, pile up faster than they can be paid.
> And in the midst of this distress stands the absurd and paradoxical fact that America can easily produce more wealth per capita than ever before in her history. For a situation of this kind—for starvation in the midst of plenty—there must be an answer.

Then Coyle says:

> All that is the matter with us is the fact our past history has left us with a set of ideas that no longer fit the facts.

Jefferson found that to be true in his time. Coyle simply suggests that we do what our Revolutionary forefathers did: Look the situation over, find out what is the matter and what is keeping us from getting what we want, and then remove the cause. That seems obvious and reasonable.

THE NEW IDEA OF THRIFT

He says that one of the first things blocking our way is the old idea of thrift as expressed by Franklin. That may sound silly to some, but Coyle explains that when Franklin praised thrift as one of the highest moral virtues we needed capital and needed it bad. He explains further that every man in our infant Republic who saved out of his earnings and added to his equipment increased by so much the amount of goods we could produce next year. But "now we have come to a time when the insistent demand is not for capital nor for labor, but for buyers to carry away the goods."

It seems to me that what Coyle is saying is that what we need today is not more dead factories, railroads, office buildings, farms, mines, and oil wells. This seems true, because we are not using half of what we now have. What we need is people to buy goods; purchasing power, money to take beans off grocers' shelves, not money to put more beans or shoes or hats which cannot be sold on the shelves.

OLD THINKING—NEW FACTS

What I now state is trite: We have reached an age of plenty. Our thinking is based, however, on scarcity and hardship; we cannot begin to realize what's come over us. Because goods were scarce the owner could demand a price. But goods are no longer scarce. In this picture we dreamed of labor-saving devices and when we should be delivered from back-breaking toil, and, coupling that with our scarcity psychology, we have made ourselves hungry and ill-clad instead of well-fed and well-clothed.

So it looks like our old ideas need checking against actual modern conditions. We can produce a flood of oil, coal, automobiles, and shoes. But we cannot sell. Coyle says the reason we cannot is that we insist on saving all we can, putting our savings into more oil wells, coal mines, and factories so we can produce more stuff that cannot be sold.

SPENDING AND SAVING

Coyle says that we need more income taxes; more inheritance taxes; more corporate surplus taxes; higher wages; old-age pensions; unemployment and sickness insurance; better roads, schools, parks, playgrounds, and other public services; and more profits for the farmer and small-business man—who will spend them. He says it means that we need less sales taxes and consumption taxes and tariffs, lower interest rates, and less profits to the Wall Street bankers.

If we went too far with this program we might get too much spending and too little saving. But anybody who thinks we are apt to do this just does not know the power of the Wall Street bankers, who oppose every single item on this program.

When all our factories are humming, all our farms producing to their limit, all our oil wells running open, all our merchants selling their goods, and all our workmen in jobs we will have to put more money into stores and factories to take care of the expanded demand; then will be the time to say we are spending too much and saving too little.

MAKE THE RICH POORER?—NO

This is not Huey Long's argument for leveling up or sharing the wealth. As Coyle says it:

> Redistribution is not to make the poor richer by making the rich poorer but to increase the total income of the American people by changing the ratio between spending and saving. * * * Most of the additional income for the poor will not come out of the rich; it will come out of not sitting idle. The great reservoir of wealth in this country is the unemployed. By hiring the unemployed to make useful goods and services we can get that wealth for all the people.

Some people argue that if you do not let the wealthy alone they will all get mad and quit. In other words, personal initiative will be ruined for 127,000,000 people unless they each and everyone can try to be multimillionaires. However, I have in my acquaintance a large number of good, intelligent people who will not get to be multis.

We work for a living, but we cannot make a living if there is nobody to sell to. And certainly we cannot make a living if the central controllers of wealth sit tight on the money bags and moan and groan about what they call thrift.

PREVENTING THE NEXT DEPRESSION

Coyle, like all book writers, talks about preventing the next depression. He drags out skeletons from the clothes closets. He seems to enjoy razzing us—and he puts us to thinking.

Now, for several years our smug-mugs have insisted we need capital-goods recovery—possibly I believed it myself, maybe I have said it. They point out that factories which produce heavy machinery, locomotives, freight cars, plant equipment, structural steel, are mostly closed—except in the matter of preparing for war, in which business is quite prosperous. Naturally the workmen are unemployed.

And they say the New Deal is trying to get even more money away from these capital-goods industries and into the consumer markets. This may be true, but suppose we made a big new Reconstruction Finance Corporation and made more locomotives, freight cars, oil refineries, shoe factories—what would we do with them when we cannot use what we have? The point is, if we can only get somebody to buy the products, we would not have any trouble in building the factories, freight cars, and so on. Coyle shows that capital-goods recovery comes after there is a market for consumer goods and not before.

LESS MONEY FOR WALL, AND MORE FOR MAIN STREET, BROADWAY

It seems that we must face the fact that we have certain economic ideas, and we differ upon those. The New Deal program is designed to put less money into Wall Street and more up and down Main Street, Broadway—and out in the Bronx, Brooklyn, Oshkosh, Los Angeles, and Podunk.

The bright boys in Wall Street want inflation—both industrial and financial—for themselves. In other words, they want private inflation at the expense of the people; but inflation for the farmer, the small merchant, laborer, and consumer is both horrible and sinful to contemplate.

Says our doughty engineer:

Recovery by new investment means recovery by adding more debts on top of the old ones.

In order to set off a capital-goods recovery, we should have to be so drunk that we would forget what happened before. For that we need a Wall Street boom.

Mr. Coyle discusses at length the psychology of some people in big business who seem to think that if the Government would just turn its back "something would be doing" and confidence might return, with a few billion dollars added to security prices. But, he says:

Then a new flock of skyscrapers would join the gaunt procession along the New York skyline, new oil derricks would arise to thumb their noses at Mr. Ickes, and new automatic factories would come to free the industrial managers from dependence on labor.

Then the new skyscrapers would begin to draw tenants out of Radio City; the price of oil would begin to have sinking spells; the new automatic factories would begin forcing the old factories into receiverships and their men into the streets.

Suddenly everyone would realize that a crash was coming. Then the deluge, a repossession notice in every garage, and an American in every pot, same as before, only quicker and more of it.

But all that is a dream. The chance that the Government will turn its back and let Wall Street have its fun is small. The President of the United States appears to have an objection to walking under the same pile driver that landed on his unfortunate predecessor.

SOAKING THE CONSUMER IS SOAKING BUSINESS

So that is that. Then, surely, self-liquidating public works will save us.

The name "self-liquidating", like so many other relics of the years before 1933, has that fine nutty flavor that characterized the period. The idea was that such projects paid for themselves, because the people who paid for them were not visible—to the conservative eye. The consumer, however, though microscopic in size, is all the businessman has to live on.

Soaking the consumer is soaking business. Self-liquidating public works help business with one hand and hurt business with the other. They are a boot-strap plan.

Then let us try local self-help.

Local projects can be paid for by local taxes or assessments, borne mainly by the people with small incomes. This has been called local self-help, and meant simply that local taxing bodies, which cannot levy income taxes, ought to be the ones to pay for relief work rather than the Federal Government, which might tax the higher brackets. Here, again, the idea was to help business with one hand and hurt business with the other. More boot straps.

IDLE MEN, DESERTED FACTORIES; PUBLIC WORKS, NO COST; SO?

From these quotations we might conclude that Mr. Coyle does not favor public works. This is not so. What he objects to is public works which take money out of the consumer market and put it in the investment market. How can we stand the expense of a great public-works program? What does it cost? Absolutely nothing, he says; and explains there are millions of idle workmen. The steel mills, cement factories, and lumber camps are deserted. The mills are rotting in idleness. The men are being fed on a dole. If we can use those mills and men to build a bridge, that bridge costs us zero.

TEN MILLION DISEMPLOYED—COSTS TOO MUCH

If we had used all the idle men and factories during the past 7 years to build homes, we could have had a $7,000 home for every family in America—at no cost. As it is, the men and machines have been idle, and we do not have the homes, and roads, and schools, and parks, and playgrounds that they might have produced. Men lose skill and rot; machines rust and fall to pieces.

The cost which even this richest nation in the world cannot stand any longer is 10,000,000 idle men and billions of dollars' worth of idle machines, factories, farms, and oil wells.

And here comes the point which is the real cause of the feeling of dread held by the Liberty League boys and the Wall Street bankers. They say, who is going to pay these horrible debts of the Federal Government? And are we not damning our children and the coming generation to perpetual slavery (to Wall Street) to pay those debts? Mr. Hoover, with his dour countenance lit up with glee for once, has pointed out that it will cost the next generation $2,000,000,000 a year to pay the debt.

Mr. Coyle gives some illuminating studies which might lead to this conclusion: If two billions a year has to be collected in taxes to pay the debt, it goes back to the people who hold the bonds. If taxation were made accordingly, the boys who hold the bonds may have to pay the taxes to pay themselves the Government bonds they hold. In the past the people have always paid these taxes on the bonds held, but that situation might be different in the future.

Hence, having this real thought in their minds, they naturally oppose every progressive move—public works, relief, agricultural legislation, resettlement, old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and wage legislation of any kind—because of the old thing that has always been the bug under the chip, to wit, percent, or usury, or interest, or what you will.

That is why the same groups speak constantly of "capital-goods recovery", "self-liquidating public works", "local self-help" for relief, and the eternal God-given liberty of the worker, small-business man, and farmer—to starve to death. These central power groups hate the Federal Government and President Roosevelt because they have power to levy income taxes. The local governments, on the other hand, State, municipal, and school, depend on sales taxes, taxes on small business, homes, real estate, and improvements on it. And the small body of the American people do the paying.

The mumbo-jumbo of legalistic phrases, princely paid lawyers, and decisions wherein the Federal Government cannot protect the laborer, and neither can any other government, make them praise "rugged individualism"—the kind of rugged individualism which really stamps out the heart and soul plus the individuality of the American citizen.

FREEBOOTERS SHOUT FOR FREEDOM

Verily the freebooters are shouting for freedom. In truth and in fact they are fooling a good many fine people who really are concerned about liberty. For instance, I saw a small-business man the other day whose every interest is the opposite of the Liberty League send $25 up to help out the Du Ponts. Dumb. But let our engineer speak:

Regimentation is viewed with alarm by conservative writers. The conservatives fear simply that the American people may establish control over the financial group. The value of freedom depends a lot on whose freedom it is. A hundred and sixty years ago our forefathers were engaged in a war to destroy freedom—freedom of the king—and to create a new freedom for themselves. Today the American people are gunning for freedom again—they are out to take away the liberty of the kings of finance and have it for their own use. Hence the tears about dying liberty.

Oh, oh, oh!

REGIMENTATION—PUBLIC OR PRIVATE

Let us mention this business of regimenting. The regimenting that has been done in this country has been done by big industry, and any one big industrialist alone, like John D., has done more regimenting a dozen times than Roosevelt ever dreamed of.

These are things which some American people do not understand; that the standardization, the regimentation, has been in the hands of these Moscow Tories, these Private Dollar Communists, who have enjoyed all the benefits of monopoly with none of its duties. They simply do not want the Government to have any chance to protect its own people.

Here I say a word for Congressmen—any of them. You can kick us out almost by the time we really get in office. Can you kick out these invisible emperors like Insull, Hopson, Mellon, Morgan, and the rest? Not yet. And that is what they are worried about.

TINTINNABULATION OF BELLS, BELLS—RING OUT THE OLD, RING IN THE NEW

National policies, in these fast-moving times, need to be constantly checked and revised under the pressure of men who are fully awake. From somewhere there must come new men, wild men, who have no respect for "ideologies", who will smash the windows and yell raucously at the comfortable, drowsy bankers. They will annoy the bankers, who are apt to call them bad names, such as "sons of the wild jackass", but the effect is salutary.

And whence shall come the wild men, the prophets, the wakeful men? Same place they have always come from—from the free hills, where a man can make a place for himself without asking anyone, without "yessing" any master mind, without conforming to any plans but his own. Though reactionaries shout for liberty and try to suppress free speech, and though radicals curse the reactionaries and plan to follow their example, the fact remains that no way is known for getting good sense into human affairs except to have somewhere a reservoir of free men.

Americans have a sentimental longing for freedom, and that is well, because freedom, desirable in the past, has now become a vital necessity. Only by enlarging the area of freedom can we hope to develop the necessary intelligence to steer our country safely in the swift traffic of the modern world.

ENCOURAGE SMALL BUSINESS

And speaking of small business and a free country in general, he says:

If the American people can be led to adopt policies that will first of all encourage small business rather than big business, and that will reluctantly but firmly drive the remaining big business into public ownership, they will be able to maintain and protect a system of free prices.

Free men we must have in order to keep our Government awake. Free initiative in business we must have as a nursery for free men. A free price system we must have, because the price of free initiative is free prices.

Laissez faire is as dead as the feudal system, but individualism is only in its infancy. Business is apparently developing in two opposite directions, both of them leading toward an enlarged distribution of freedom.

One kind of industry, the so-called natural monopoly, is headed for gradual absorption into full public control. The effect of this development will be to destroy the liberty of action of certain promoters of holding companies, but it will enlarge the freedom of the common people by removing the hand of big business from their necks.

The other kind of industry, that in which there is no mechanical advantage in large operations, is in the long run apparently headed for decentralization. All these developments are making possible an expansion of the area within which free action will be allowable.

Mr. Coyle tells us of what any person with eyes can see. It is merely that a lot of snags and old wrecks and sand bars are cluttering up the channels of progress. Our ship of state is still a good ship, and democracy is, in my opinion, the only proper pilot; but if democracy is to succeed and the ship go down the channel safely, the channel has got to be clear. Concerning this, Mr. Coyle says:

The next step is to find out which of the old axioms, old economic laws, old moral standards, and old valuations have ceased to be valid and need to be revised.

Of course, any change in the old set of rules will be vigorously protested by the people who have their hands on the money bags.

The defenders of the old order are well entrenched. They own newspapers and newsreels; they have money to hire speakers and to buy expert testimony. They can flood the mails with lies and with statistics that would make any common lie hide its face on George Washington's shoulder. They have power to make the very dead send telegrams to Senators. They can hire lawyers to say that no man may be deprived of his racket without violating the Constitution.

From this it seems that if we are to use our matchless power to produce more than plenty, we must have more freedom for the average man; less stock-market hijackers; less for concentration in a few industries and more for spending; more consumer goods and service; less idle farms, mines, and factories; more economic security for everybody; more income, inheritance, surplus, and excess-profits taxes; less tariffs, sales taxes, processing taxes, and taxes on homes, farms, and small businesses—to leave money in the consumers' markets; more Government control of monopolized industries; less control over competitive industries. That is Coyle's story.

How are we to get all this? How can we retain a maximum of freedom without leaving some group free to wreck the place? How are we to change the rules without stopping the game? By what procedure can all this be done? By democratic political action. Coyle's faith in democracy is profound.

Even if the people were to make a mistake, the Presidency could not be held for long against their interests. The fate of the old order is that the old leaders cannot steer the ship of state anywhere except onto the rocks, as they did last time. They are in the unfortunate condition of the goat in the express car—"he done et up whar he gwine." This is no time for nonsense. The pilot house will be too hot for any man whose only idea is to stop the ship against the nearest cliff.

After years of Tweedledum and Tweedledee the people are again coming to take a vital interest in politics. Politics is the key to power. As the people become more certain of what they want, they will grasp more firmly the political situation. The possibility of plenty lies ahead; behind is the unsatisfied desire of a thousand generations. Slowly and with false starts, advancing and retreating, but with gradually increasing understanding, the American people begin to move toward the promised land.

Read that book, everybody.

And let us get going.

FEDERAL AID FOR STATE HIGHWAY—BENEFIT TO MICHIGAN HIGHWAY SYSTEM—MICHIGAN GRATEFUL TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS, STATE HIGHWAY COMMISSIONER VAN WAGONER

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is well that we consider carefully each bill that is placed before us so that we may look into the future and see just what will be the effect of the measure should it become law. At the same time it is well that we occasionally check back to see how these same measures have fulfilled our expectations.

This Congress has been confronted with problems that at times seemed impossible of solution. Not the least of these has been to determine a program that would be effective in restoring prosperity to the Nation. One of the major phases of our answer to this problem has been a program of public works. The idea in every case was to provide jobs for the unemployed, while at the same time providing worthwhile improvements for the public's use. An important phase of this public-works program has been the improvements made possible on our highway systems. Mr. Speaker, I submit that these funds which have been devoted to this type of improvement have most admirably filled their purpose.

In my own State of Michigan, improvements on the highway system have been outstanding for the thousands of men they have returned to a self-supporting basis and for the permanent improvements that have been made in the roads themselves.

Altogether the Michigan State Highway Department has received some $40,000,000 in Federal funds for road construction since July 1, 1933. This has meant employment for approximately 125,000 men and the improvement of 1,341 miles of roads.

Men who were formerly on relief have been given a new hope in life in the knowledge that they were once more earning a living for themselves and their families. Benefits along this line need little explanation on my part. You have all witnessed a similar transformation in persons of your own acquaintance.

Michigan always has been keenly aware of the importance of its highway system. In the past State funds have always been available in one form or another for highway construction in Michigan. A weight tax on all vehicles and a 3-cent gasoline tax have furnished revenues for highway building. With the depression, however, this situation changed. Local governmental units found their local tax revenues rapidly dwindling and in some cases stopping entirely. They had to have help of some kind and that immediately.

A sympathetic Democratic State legislature turned immediately to the revenues of the State highway department to supply this relief. At the same time, Michigan's State highway commissioner, Murray D. Van Wagoner, recommended a reduction of 36 percent in the weight tax as an additional measure of relief. The result of this process is shown by the fact that approximately three-fifths of all State-highway revenues in Michigan are now returned directly to the counties for use on their own road systems.

Other contractual and legal obligations have reduced the revenues of the State highway department to such an extent that it has required the utmost economy on the part of Commissioner Van Wagoner to get together sufficient funds to match Federal-aid appropriations.

In view of this, it is obvious that Michigan would today be almost entirely without a construction program had it not been for funds granted by the Federal Government. The first program in Michigan with Federal funds provided some $12,000,000 worth of projects. They were allocated to every county in Michigan so that the benefits of this program might be as widespread as possible. Federal regulations provided that this work be allocated to only 75 percent of the counties. Work relief was the major consideration and road construction secondary.

In allocating these funds to the counties, Commissioner Van Wagoner used the same plan as was followed by the Federal Government in distributing the $400,000,000 fund to the various States—one-third according to population, one-third according to area, and one-third according to trunk-line mileage. All projects under this program were either completed or under contract in October of 1934. On July 1, 1934, it was estimated that approximately 10,000 men were at work on this program of highway improvement.

The Hayden-Cartwright Act, which was passed in June 1934, provided the Michigan State Highway Department with $6,452,568. Projects under this program were allocated to 61 of Michigan's 83 counties. Final contracts were awarded in September of 1935.

When it became known early in 1935 that the Federal administration planned one more great blow against unemployment in the form of a $4,880,000,000 program of public works, Commissioner Van Wagoner made extensive preparations so that the Michigan program of highway construction could be placed under way at a moment's notice. When Congress approved this program of public works Commissioner Van Wagoner was here in Washington ready to present a group of highway projects for Federal approval. He had anticipated the regulations that would be laid down by Federal authorities and had taken every possible precaution to prevent any delay in putting the Michigan program under way.

When he found that several minor changes would be required, the entire engineering staff went into an all-night session and emerged with a complete program that easily met with Federal approval. I wish to point out very emphatically that the Michigan program was the first in the Nation to be approved by President Roosevelt and the first in the Nation to be actually launched. Bids were taken on the first group of projects on August 1.

Michigan has been far ahead of every other State in the Union in placing the current program of highway construction under way. In fact, in November of last year, Michigan had more of the Federal funds under contract than all the other States in the Nation. This, indeed, is the type of cooperation that will make Federal public-works programs most effective from the standpoint of relieving unemployment and assisting in the recovery of this Nation.

Of the $20,600,000 allocated to Michigan under this program, less than $2,000,000 remains to be placed under contract at the present time. And perhaps even more surprising is the fact that some $4,500,000 worth of projects have already been completed.

But Commissioner Van Wagoner has not stopped with this program. He has obtained approval from the Works Progress Administration in Washington of an $8,000,000 oil-aggregate program on farm-to-market highways and a $6,000,000 program of tourist and shore road relocation projects. Under the arrangement worked out with the W. P. A. authorities in Michigan, the State highway department will provide the engineering, specifications, and a part of the cost of the project as the State sponsor. All other details are handled by the W. P. A.

May I take a few moments, Mr. Speaker, to outline just what these programs will mean to Michigan in addition to their value as a means of taking men from the relief rolls? The oil-aggregate surface which is to be applied on farm-to-market roads is a new, inexpensive hard surface that can be applied for one-fourth of the cost of concrete. Although it does not stand up under the heaviest traffic, this type of highway will provide many of the advantages of concrete. Probably most important of all is the fact that it completely eliminates the dust evil. In fact, maintenance costs for a road surfaced with oil aggregate are little more than on an ordinary concrete highway.

The program of tourist-road relocations is important because of the benefits it will bring to an industry that is now the chief means of livelihood for a large part of Michigan's population. As a summer playground Michigan is outstanding among all the States of the Union. One of the chief attractions for visitors from other States as well as for Michigan's residents are the Great Lakes. This State has 1,624 miles of shore line on these beautiful lakes and it is the aim of the State highway department to make as much of this shore line accessible by trunk-line highway as is reasonably possible. A large share of the projects to be included in the $6,000,000 W. P. A. program will be designed to accomplish this purpose. Thus, this program will not only give security for those who are employed on the projects but it will result in improvements that will help to bring permanent security to a much larger proportion of Michigan's population.

Another project is in progress in Michigan which would have been entirely impossible had it not been for Federal funds. This one is not concerned with the construction of new roads but its result will be just as worthy. Last fall the Michigan State Highway Department was granted more than $900,000, to be used in a highway-planning survey to be carried out in cooperation with the United States Bureau of Public Roads.

This survey is being carried out in three main phases. The first is a survey of every mile of road in the State, including a complete recording of every feature of the roadway. The exact location of special traffic hazards, schools, churches, and other public-gathering places will be carefully noted. Road surfaces, widths, and conditions will also be carefully recorded.

The second phase of the project involves a fiscal study that will determine the total amount of money invested in the road system and the amounts required to keep these roads in condition. Investigators will also inquire into the proportion of the total tax dollar that is spent on Michigan roads.

This step is necessary to a complete picture of highway financing.

The third phase of the survey is a traffic count. This will involve a study of traffic movement on all roads. Commercial traffic will be studied to determine its destination, point of origin, and type of commodity carried. Weight recordings will also be made for truck and bus traffic.

Public safety will be an important part of all phases of the survey. Data gathered will permit the analysis of accident causes from the highway standpoint on a truly scientific basis.

When this project is finally completed the information which it will furnish should provide a basis for highway planning for the next 15 to 20 years. With the increase in traffic which the past few years has witnessed, it is not longer efficient to plan highway programs in a hit-or-miss fashion. Improvements should be selected on a basis of present and future needs if highway funds are to be used to the best advantage.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the experience in Michigan with respect to public-works programs carried forward by the State highway department indicates strongly that road projects are one of the most effective means of distributing Federal funds so that they will bring the maximum benefits. Federal authorities have cooperated with an alert, fair-minded, and efficient highway administration to put thousands of men to work while providing highway improvements for which Michigan citizens will be eternally grateful.

The State of Michigan is the automobile center of the world. It is proper and fitting that Michigan lead the Nation in the development of good highways. It has taken this lead. The citizens of Michigan will be ever grateful to our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, this Democratic Congress, and our Democratic State highway commissioner, Murray D. Van Wagoner, for the improvement and development of the highway system in our State.

THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL—A BILL WHOSE ONLY PURPOSE WAS TO HELP THE HOME OWNER AND FARM OWNER BY REDUCING THE UNFAIR AND INTOLERABLE BURDEN OF SWOLLEN INTEREST RATES WHICH THREATENED CONFISCATION OF HOME AND FARM—THE LABEL OF INFLATION WAS FALSE AND MERE CAMOUFLAGE

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, when this House defeated the Frazier-Lemke bill it defeated a bill to lighten an intolerable burden which has been placed upon the backs of the farm owners and home owners of this country. It defeated a bill whose only purpose was to reduce the unfair swollen interest rates on property which have brought home owner and farm owner alike to the point of foreclosure and ruin. It defeated a bill whose sole purpose was to present to these worthy and industrious people, who are the backbone of this country, a perfectly sound financial basis for refinancing mortgages on their properties—mortgages based on swollen and false valuations which no longer exist. It defeated a bill which would have given the farm owner a chance to rid himself of an iniquitous interest burden.

It defeated a bill which wanted to call a halt to an evil financial set-up which is leading us, inevitably, to the confiscation of our homes and farms because of a burden of debt unfairly and unwisely saddled upon them and which must be lifted if foreclosure and bankruptcy are not to follow.

VERY FEW PEOPLE HAVE A TRUE UNDERSTANDING OF THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL—ITS PROVISIONS HAVE NOT BEEN PROPERLY EXPLAINED

Very few people in this country had any intelligent idea of the contents of this bill. They were the victims of the false and misleading propaganda that had been circulated to defeat this measure. In order to defeat this bill self-seeking interests placed upon it the false label "inflation." I protest against this misleading and fraudulent "inflation" label that has been placed upon this bill.

The aim of the Frazier-Lemke bill was to reduce the rate of interest on farm mortgages. Those of us who favored reducing the farmer's burden of debt voted for this bill. Those who wanted the farmer to continue to bear the burden of 6 percent and more on his swollen debts voted against this bill. That was the important issue; that was the only issue.

Mr. Speaker, I say that the Frazier-Lemke bill was distinctly, definitely, and clearly not an inflation bill. It was solely and exclusively a measure intended to refinance farm mortgages.

GOVERNMENT BONDS HAVE CIRCULATION PRIVILEGE

The Government bonds which are out today have the circulation privilege; this means that the Federal Reserve banks can deposit the bonds with the Treasurer of the United States and receive for them Federal Reserve notes—commonly called currency or bank notes—equivalent to the face value of the bonds.

The farm-loan bonds provided for in the Frazier-Lemke bill are also Government bonds, and therefore the bill proposed to give these bonds a similar privilege.

THESE FARM-LOAN BONDS WERE ADEQUATELY SECURED

These farm-loan bonds were to be secured by at least 120 percent of the present value of farm lands and buildings. Unlike other Government bonds, they would have this specified additional security behind them.

Certainly no fair-minded person can say that Federal Reserve notes—currency—issued on the basis of such farm-loan bonds and also secured by a gold reserve of at least 40 percent—exactly like other Federal Reserve notes—can be labeled "inflationary currency expansion."

CURRENCY ISSUE NOT NECESSARY

I believe it would not have been necessary to issue any currency under this bill. But if any currency would have been issued it would have been in the form of Federal Reserve notes, which were to be no different than any others now in circulation.

But, as I have said, it was not likely that any Federal Reserve notes would be issued under the bill, because these farm-loan bonds could be sold on the regular financial markets.

NO INFLATION

When people talk about inflation they are thinking about what occurred in the post-war period in Russia, Germany, and other countries.

But there was not a single critic or opponent of the bill who even dared to assert that it followed a procedure similar to the one which had been used in those countries. In the European countries the currency issued had no value, because it had no backing; but in this bill every single dollar would have been more than adequately secured in the same orthodox and regular way which backs up every dollar in circulation in the United States today.

As security there were offered the farms and farm lands of this country—the greatest security in the world—the land from which comes the sustenance of human life. The opponents of farm relief should remember that America lent $20,000,000,000 of our money to Europe without any security at all—and still no one raised the false cry of inflation at that time. Why raise this false cry now when we are attempting to lend a fraction of this sum to our own farmers, and are sure that all of the money will be returned to us with interest and not defaulted, as our European debtors had done?

I AM OPPOSED TO INFLATION

I am personally opposed to inflation. There are very few Members of the House of Representatives who believe in inflation. I am confident that a bill contemplating real inflation would not receive 20 votes in this House. I voted for the Frazier-Lemke bill because I am convinced that the burden of debt must be reduced before we can advance farther on the road to recovery.

The irrefutable facts are that the vast majority of farm owners and home owners are being slowly and steadily choked to death by inflated mortgages against their homes and farms. The burden of these mortgages can be reduced or lightened in three ways:

HOW CAN THE BURDEN OF FARM AND HOME MORTGAGES BE REDUCED?

(a) The home owner or farm owner can go into bankruptcy. This method is unthinkable as a mass remedy. Our home owners and farm owners want to pay their honest debts. All they need is a little "lift"—a little assistance from the Government, and then they will be able to take care of themselves.

Further, if they go into bankruptcy, it would, of course, mean the loss of their homes and farms, the dispossession of several million farm owners and home owners, the eviction of millions of our most valuable citizens, and the concentration of the ownership of a majority of our homes and farms in the hands of a few large financial institutions. There is no one who wants this to happen. No one wants an additional million of our citizens placed on the relief rolls at the expense of the public. The financial institutions do not want to take over these homes and farms, and the home owners and farmers do not want to lose them.

(b) Another way to deal with this problem would be to scale down the debts. This cannot be done by law, because of provisions in our State and Federal Constitutions. It can only be done voluntarily—and that to a very limited extent.

(c) The only remaining remedy is to scale down the rate of interest which is demanded on mortgage indebtedness. The debts were incurred during the boom days on inflated values and are therefore excessively high.

WHAT EXCESSIVE INTEREST RATES HAVE DONE TO THE FARMER

As an example of these excessive debts on inflated values, let me cite these figures:

In 1920 the farms of this Nation were appraised at $79,000,000,000, but in 1934 these same farms were appraised at only $31,000,000,000.

The interest paid by the farmers in 1920 was $250,000,000; in 1934 they paid $800,000,000 in interest. Is not this a startling and shocking revelation? The farmers paid two and one-half times as much interest on $31,000,000,000 of farm values as they paid on $79,000,000,000. Is it any wonder that the farmer is always "in the red"—that he is operating at continual deficits? The only remedy to extricate him from the depths of debt is to reduce his interest burden.

Remember this: While the values of farms had been reduced in half, the number and the amount of farm mortgages and the interest burden thereon had more than doubled, and the percentage of his other debts had substantially increased. This compels the farmer to produce about four times as much to pay off his debts as when he incurred them.

The farmers in most cases are now being charged 6 percent—and often more—on their inflated farm mortgages. It was proposed, in the Frazier-Lemke bill, to reduce that interest to 1½ percent and to add another 1½ percent for annual installment payments on account of principal, so that after a number of years the entire mortgage would be paid off. The bill provided that for this purpose the Farm Credit Administration should issue bonds—not currency—to obtain the money with which to refinance these farm mortgages.

The plain fact is that practically the entire income of the farmer now goes for the payment of taxes and interest on his mortgage and other debts. He has nothing left with which to buy shoes, clothing, machinery, and other products of the cities and industries. It is clear to every honest person that industry cannot prosper and that the industrial worker cannot have employment, unless the farmer has enough money left after the payment of interest and taxes with which to buy industrial and city products.

WHO MISREPRESENTED THE FACTS?

Mr. Speaker, somebody misrepresented the facts. The opponents of the bill asserted that they were not opposed to reducing the farmer's burden of debt, but were opposed to the inflationary method of reaching this goal. The supporters of this bill asserted that they were not inflationists—that they did not favor or contemplate inflation—but were merely interested in reducing the farmers' burden of debt.

When the Frazier-Lemke bill was being considered in this House, both the opponents and supporters of this bill had the opportunity to prove their assertions; both sides were given the chance to prove their contention and to fly their true colors. While the opponents of the bill uttered the parrot cry of "inflation", the supporters of the bill called their bluff and offered amendment after amendment that would have taken every so-called inflationary phase out of the bill and left only the sections required to reduce the debt burden.

But did the opponents of farm relief accept any of the amendments to eliminate so-called inflation? Did they prove true to their contention that they would gladly support a farm-relief bill were it not for the so-called inflationary methods? Emphatically they did not. They used the inflation label as a smoke screen to cover up their opposition to a program calculated to reduce the farmers' burden of debt.

THE PROOF OF THE AIMS OF THE SUPPORTERS OF THIS BILL—REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES THEIR ONLY PURPOSE

Here is the proof that the supporters of the bill were interested solely in reducing the rate of interest on mortgages to a level that the majority of the farmers would be able to pay. Here are the amendments that were offered and which would have taken the tinge of inflation definitely out of this bill and still left a good farm-debt-reduction measure—one which the opponents of the Frazier-Lemke bill should have helped to adopt if they had been honestly opposed to inflation and honestly in favor of reducing the farm debts:

First. The amendment to require the same gold reserve behind any Rederal Reserve notes issued pursuant to this bill as that now required to back up Federal Reserve notes now in circulation. In other words, there would be just as much gold reserve and gold backing behind these notes as behind the currency now in circulation and issued in a strictly orthodox and conventional manner.

How can we talk of inflation when we have a gold reserve in excess of $10,000,000,000 and only about $5,800,000,000 of currency outstanding? This does not even include the more than $2,000,000,000 in our silver hoard.

Second. The amendment to increase the rate of interest of the bonds to be issued under the bill from 1½ percent to 2¾ percent.

This amendment was offered despite the fact that bonds bearing an interest rate of 1½ percent could easily be sold, if they would be confined to short-term obligations and renewed from time to time.

For instance, on March 12 the Secretary of the Treasury offered for sale 1½-percent Treasury notes and received total cash subscriptions in excess of three and one-quarter billion dollars. That was a definite answer to those who claimed that bonds bearing 1½ percent interest could not be sold in the regular channels of finance.

But to make absolutely certain that these Farm Credit Administration bonds would be sold in the regular and normal financial markets the amendment to increase the interest rate to 2¾ percent was offered. That, it must be admitted by every fair-minded person, would have given positive and absolute assurance that these bonds would be sold and not a single dollar of currency would have been issued under the Frazier-Lemke bill.

That was definite and unmistakable proof that the supporters of the Frazier-Lemke bill were not interested in inflation, but in relief of the farmer from an unbearable burden of debt incurred during a period of excessive credit inflation.

Third. The amendment to eliminate loans for chattel goods or livestock and personal property which had been included in the original bill.

This amendment made certain that only real estate, land, and buildings would have formed the security for these loans.

Fourth. The amendment to limit the loans to 80 percent of the present appraised value of the farms and buildings, which is the same percentage used as the basis for nearly $3,000,000,000 of loans made by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

WHO VOTED FOR AND WHO VOTED AGAINST

While the assertion was made that those who voted for the Frazier-Lemke bill were inflationists and those who opposed it were opposed to inflation, these amendments and other factors that I have enumerated must place the division among this House as follows: Those who favored reducing the interest rate on the staggering debt burden of the farmers voted for this bill, and those who favored the continuation of the policy of compelling the farmer to pay 6 percent and more on his excessive debts opposed the bill.

That was the only division. That is why I voted for this bill. I am today, and have been for a number of years, an advocate of the reduction of the rates of interest on mortgages not only for the farmer but for the home owner in the urban areas.

THE BILLS I HAVE INTRODUCED TO REDUCE INTEREST RATES ON H. O. L. C. MORTGAGES

On January 16, 1935, I introduced H. R. 3974, which provides for the reduction of the rate of interest on home-loan mortgages from 5 percent to 3½ percent and for an extension of the period of maturity from 15 years to 25 years, both of which features would enable the home owner to pay off his mortgage in smaller monthly payments.

The monthly payments under the H. O. L. C.—including payments to reduce the amount of the mortgage—now amount to $7.91 for each thousand dollars of the mortgage. Under my bill this would be reduced to $5.01 for each thousand dollars of mortgaged debt.

My bill has since been reintroduced and is now known as H. R. 10368.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation now sells its bonds for 2¼ percent but still continues to charge 5 and 6 percent to the home owner. Considering the fact that the home owners are forced by the H. O. L. C. to amortize the principal amount of the mortgage debt, it appears that the total monthly payments of interest and principal often exceed the payments that they were compelled to make prior to the H. O. L. C. Therefore, instead of the H. O. L. C. granting them relief from their distressed mortgage indebtedness, the home owners are being dragged deeper and deeper into debt, which must in the end be reduced or result in foreclosures—the very thing that the H. O. L. C. was created to prevent.

THE NEED FOR THE LEGISLATION I HAVE INTRODUCED GROWS DAILY

We need only look at our own newspapers to realize that mortgage foreclosures are again alarmingly increasing. The only sensible remedy is the reduction of the rate of interest and the extension of the period of maturity as proposed in my bill. Despite the obvious need for this legislation, I have been unable to even get this bill out of committee since early in January 1935.

The 6-percent fetish must be smashed. It retards and endangers recovery. It discriminates between giant corporations and small merchants and farmers. While big business can borrow all the money it wants at about three-fourths of 1 percent, or less, the small merchant must still pay in excess of 6 percent for the same money.

DISTORTED INTEREST RATES ARE DISTORTING OUR ECONOMIC STRUCTURE

We have talked about the need for consumption and buying since the depression started, and we meet that problem by unmitigated stupidity in which governmental lending agencies take a leading part. The Government borrows H. O. L. C. money at 2¼ percent and lends it at 5 percent, plus such a heavy schedule of amortization that the total carrying charge is brought to $7.91. Under the F. H. A. plan the charge is a 5-percent discount, but the entire loan is discounted in advance and the monthly payments which reduce the principal are not taken into account, so that the true interest rate is 9.7 percent.

The manufacturer borrows money at three-fourths percent to manufacture his goods, the dealer or retailer pays 6 percent to retail these same goods, but the home owner pays 9.7 percent to buy them. This high interest rate fallacy encourages the manufacturer of goods but discourages the sale and purchase of them, thus leading to continued unemployment and underconsumption.

WITHOUT LIGHTENING THE DEBT BURDEN WE CANNOT HAVE PERMANENT RECOVERY

Our interest rates are distorting our economic system by giving production the edge over consumption. There is only one way out—to reduce interest rates to the little fellow, to the small merchant, farmer, home owner, and consumer.

We cannot have permanent recovery unless the burden of debts is lightened by reducing the rate of interest, so that the home owner will have some money left with which to buy the farm goods and the farm owners will have some money left with which to buy the goods of the city.

INFLATION NOT AN ISSUE

Mr. Speaker, inflation was not an issue in the passage of this measure. I am opposed to inflation as such and would never vote for it, but I did vote for the Frazier-Lemke bill, because it was definitely anti-inflation and intended solely to reduce the staggering burden of debt now carried by our mortgage debtors.

The advocates of lower interest rates may have been repulsed by the defeat of the Frazier-Lemke bill, but the tremendous sentiment in favor of such a measure will eventually result in the passage of a sound bill for the reduction of the interest load upon the farmer, the home owner, and the small merchant and tradesman.

WEST VIRGINIA FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS DECLARES FOR PEACE AMENDMENT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, thousands of women of the State of West Virginia want this Congress before it adjourns to take action that will prevent our boys from being dragged into the slaughter pens of foreign wars.

They are sick of war's horrors and heartaches and of the misery that is the inevitable aftermath of war.

They want this Congress to do something to save our sons from being thrown into the hell of other peoples' wars.

They cannot see any justice, or right, or sense in crucifying our fine young men on foreign battlefields to settle other peoples' quarrels.

They are for the peace amendment I have introduced, House Joint Resolution No. 167, which is designed to keep America out of foreign wars without interfering in the least with adequate national defense.

My resolution provides that, except in the case of attack or invasion, America cannot go to war unless a majority of its citizens vote for a declaration of war in a national referendum. It also provides for taking the profit out of war. Take the profit out of war and there will be few wars.

I believe that if the constitutional amendment I propose is adopted America will never enter another war except righteous wars of self-defense.

It will not be possible, under that proposed amendment, to tear our boys from their homes and send them into foreign lands to kill or to be killed by persons they have never seen, against whom they have no grievance, and whose language they do not speak.

The women of West Virginia know their minds on this subject and at Wheeling recently they expressed themselves in clear and unequivocal language. The West Virginia Federation of Women's Clubs, representing 10,000 women of that State, met at Wheeling May 13 to 16. On motion of Mrs. Franklin E. Cooper, State chairman of international relations of that Federation, the following resolution was adopted unanimously:

Whereas we believe the American people are tired of war, its heartaches, its toll of lives, the starvation, unemployment, and economic collapse that follow war, and

Whereas House Joint Resolution No. 167 (known as the Ludlow bill) was introduced for the purpose of providing a popular vote on the declaration of war and for taking the profit out of war; therefore

Resolved, That the West Virginia Federation of Women's Clubs, now assembled, go on record as favoring the passage of this bill and, as a body, request the Representatives of our State to sign discharge petition no. 28, which will release it from the Judiciary Committee for action.

If I were to make a prognostication in regard to future trends I would say that in my opinion it will not be long until the views of these forelooking West Virginia women are supported by women throughout the Union. If women become aroused to the perils of the situation they can be a great factor in protecting America from the danger of involvement in foreign wars.

Good Housekeeping, a magazine for women, with millions of readers, is pointing out to women the service they can render to humanity by supporting my peace amendment.

THE FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE BILL PASSED BY THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION HAS BEEN A BOON TO THE NATION

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, the Federal deposit insurance law has been a boon to this Nation. I am sorry that Governor Landon, the Republican candidate for President, saw fit, at about the time we were passing the bill, to oppose it at the Chicago Bankers' Convention, where he said, among other things (see p. 9357, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD):

The guaranty of bank deposits is the start of a vicious circle that is ruinous to the depositor and stockholder alike.

It has been about 3 years now since Congress passed the Banking Act of 1933, thus establishing an agency the operation of which has been far reaching in its beneficial effects upon every phase of our national well-being. Although its creation was opposed by some, there was a universal demand from the bank depositors of the country for an arm of the Federal Government to perform the work which the Members of Congress delegated to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The fact that we have found it necessary to make few changes in the law of deposit insurance during the time which has since elapsed speaks highly for the effective and far-sighted draftsmanship of my colleagues at both ends of the Capitol. I was a newly appointed member of the Banking and Currency Committee of this House at the time of the law's passage and consequently could lend it little more than my moral and voting support, but it struck me then, and has been increasingly apparent to me since, that in this measure we have something of concrete good to offer the people of the country.

Although I have watched with interest the growth of the young Deposit Insurance Corporation, it was not until Mr. Leo T. Crowley, its able chairman, came before our committee a few sessions ago that I realized just how successfully its business is being conducted. In the course of his testimony concerning the extension of certain powers of title I of the Banking Act of 1935, and in answer to a question about the financial status of the F. D. I. C., Mr. Crowley stated that the Corporation could today pay back the approximately $300,000,000 of its capital stock to the Treasury and the Federal Reserve banks, return to the insured banks the money they have paid in assessments, another $30,000,000, and pay a 3-percent dividend to all of them.

My own first reaction to that startling statement was, naturally, one of pleasure. But later reflection caused me to wonder whether the young Corporation could make as favorable a report on the fulfillment of its lawful duty, the protection of depositors, as on its financial status. Investigation has satisfied me that the chairman was very modest in his claims for the accomplishments of the F. D. I. C. I believe my discoveries will also be of the greatest interest to you as well.

For example, I found that 60,000 depositors have been paid more than $9,000,000 as a result of the first 60 closings of insured banks. The income of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is well over $35,000,000 annually, so that the payments were easily met without touching the capital of the Corporation. Its reserves continue to increase, as they should.

No one contends that this brief experience proves with finality the soundness of deposit insurance, but it does furnish important testimony. We can learn from the first 60 failures whether the procedure for payment of depositors and liquidation, as provided in the law administered by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, functions efficiently. We naturally want to know what has been the effect of the operations of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation upon public confidence and business activity in the communities where these bank failures have occurred. A bank failure in any community, however small, is a local crisis, and, while different in dimensions, is the same psychologically as a national crisis.

In short, if deposit insurance as we now have it is reassuring to 1 community, it probably would be to 10 or 20. The test is: Does it work? Does it check fear? Do the depositors get their money promptly? And even before they get it, do they know positively that they are going to get it? At such a time, days, and even hours, are important. Do they get their money promptly? Here is the record:

Agents of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation have arrived in the affected community in every case immediately after the closing of the bank, or before, with the publicly announced purpose of making payments promptly. And in every case the promise has been fulfilled. You are aware that payments cannot begin until receivership becomes final. The average time elapsing after that date has been 10 days. We all know the danger of panic at the time of a bank closing, and it is therefore worth remarking that no closing of an insured bank has led to a run on another bank. Thus we know from experience that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has proved completely effective in meeting one of the most important tests of its usefulness.

The purpose behind the insuring of bank deposits, however, is not alone to pay losses but to prevent them. Prompt payment is only one means of prevention; it localizes the trouble and restores confidence. But broad powers were delegated to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation so that it might take other preventive measures. A review of what it has done under the mandate of Congress is timely, because it bears upon the fundamental question of whether or not we have established this insurance upon a sound basis so that it can endure permanently as the Congress intended that it should. You will recall that the Banking Act of 1933, which made the first provision for this insurance, extended its protection automatically to all licensed banks that were members of the Federal Reserve System. State nonmember banks were required to apply for the insurance and submit to examination to determine whether they were reasonable risks. In round numbers, 7,800 State banks were examined during the latter half of 1933. This task was completed on time, and the resulting restoration of public confidence marked an important step forward on the road to recovery. More than 14,000 banks obtained deposit insurance. Less than 2,000 did not, either because they did not apply or because their applications were refused. Immediately deposits began to register tremendous gains.

During the depression, however, many banks had suffered severe losses that had impaired their capital, and these losses had not adequately been written off. The examinations disclosed that one-tenth of the banks in question had no net sound capital left if adequate offsets were made because of loss items. One-third of the banks examined had net sound capital in a proportion of less than 10 percent of deposits. Obviously such conditions affected the soundness of the banking structure. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation addressed its efforts to the rehabilitation of the capital structure of the banks. It will continue to do this for a long time because their deposits have increased so enormously that even after the soundness of their capital is completely restored it is, in many cases, not as large as it should be in proportion to deposits. Here we may note with appropriate satisfaction an instance where business and two agencies of the Government, namely, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, have cooperated without friction in the statesmanlike performance of a gigantic task for the welfare of the entire Nation.

We confront here a new development in governmental supervision of banking, and I pause to invite a closer examination of its significance. If you are a depositor the capital of the bank is your margin of safety. And the same applies almost as directly if you are a borrower, for every borrower may be affected adversely when the lender fails. Now we find the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation intervening to urge and insist upon sound banking practice with the full force and effect that naturally arise from the fact that it has such a large financial stake in the soundness of its insured risks. Moreover, we find it intervening to correct conditions before trouble starts.

In view of what this country experienced during 1932 and early 1933 we can no longer doubt that the Federal Government will always have to come to the rescue of the banking system eventually if it gets into trouble. But we have now reversed the order of our intervention. Instead of coming to the rescue after the holocaust, we have created in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation an agency admirably equipped to prevent disaster. It cannot afford to insure unsound risks. All of its resources, as provided under the existing law, amount to about one and a quarter billion dollars. This is an adequate sum for an efficient rescue squad and police force; it is not a sufficient treasure chest for a major war. Therefore, the ability of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to do preventive work is the real test of its permanence, and we may view with satisfaction the excellent use it has made of the power conferred upon it.

Our banking system is in better condition today than it has been for many years, but we may dismiss that statement as faint praise. Far more important is the fact that its improvement proceeds apace under wise guidance. The lessons of the calamitous period, through which we have passed, are before us, and we have authorized and instructed the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to heed them for our future safety. We have not set up an agency lavishly to bestow the protection of insurance without consideration of the risk. We have authorized that agency to refuse insurance of unsound risks and to cancel insurance for just cause. It thus becomes a tower of strength supporting both the Federal and the State supervising agencies.

Our banking crisis became acute in 1932, but that was not when it began; it began in 1921, when we had 30,000 banks, which was certainly at least 10,000 more than we needed. Between 1921 and 1929, inclusive, about 5,000 banks closed their doors. This is an appalling fact, and clearly warns us that we must not again return to the over-banked condition that resulted in such heavy losses to depositors during prosperous years. But even today we confront a condition that would readily allow an excessive number of banks. Many State laws confer very limited powers upon State banking commissioners to refuse charters. But the Congress has wisely instructed the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to consider whether a bank applying for insurance is needed and has a reasonable expectancy of survival. The judicious exercise of this power will alone be sufficient to protect millions of prospective depositors.

The stability of the entire banking system is and must continue to be the primary concern of the Corporation. I can best emphasize this point by calling your attention to what the insurance problem would be if we simply made a table showing the losses to depositors during the past 70 years, then assume that they would be about the same in the future, and attempt to set up an agency adequately financed to meet them. Proceeding on that basis, I assume that such an agency would insure any bank whose doors were open or that was certified to be solvent at the time of applying for insurance. I assume also that there would be no subsequent examinations. Let us begin with the losses. We know, beyond any doubt, that from 1865 to 1934 more than 20,000 commercial banks holding deposits of $11,000,000,000 closed and that the net losses of the depositors amounted to upward of three and a half billions of dollars. With such statistics as a basis, it is clear that the cost of deposit insurance would be too heavy for the banks, especially the smaller ones, to bear. But we also know that by far the greater part of the losses are suffered during periods of panic. Obviously, then, the wise course is the one we have followed—to set up an agency with adequate influence and power to act effectively for the maintenance of sound banking practices and adequate resources to deal with each local difficulty while it is yet local. When crop failure or some other disaster afflicts a State or several States where there are many small banks, it will spread, unless checked, to the larger banks. When disaster comes to a large bank holding the reserves of many small banks in the outlying trade territory it will spread far and wide unless promptly halted.

We have in theory a unit banking system. Our thousands of banks are each independent of the other. But in time of stress it turns out that they are not. Trouble in the big ones spreads to the little ones, and trouble in the little ones spreads to the big ones. The problem before Congress was how to prevent the trouble in either place from spreading to the other, and I believe we have solved it through the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Problems remain, but we can face the future with confidence. Under the present banking laws there is much less uncertainty. The reports of our banks, both State and National, indicate a healthier condition and better earnings. Recovery is clearly disclosed in the news of each day from farm and factory. We should have no fear of another banking crisis, certainly not for many years. There is happily no threat of one on the horizon.

In the tranquil years of increasing prosperity that are before us the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation will proceed to build up its reserves. It has urged the banks to increase their capital so that they can write off their losses currently, and it will follow its own advice and do likewise. That is the expressed intention of its directors and should meet the hearty approval of the Congress. In the course of human events there may some day arise new difficulties not now foreseen. These unpredictable troubles are to be taken care of with cash; the predictable ones with wise foresight. And on the basis of its performance thus far we have reason to repose our faith in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Fifty-nine insured banks, with deposits of about $14,492,000, suspended within the 29-month period between January 1, 1934, and May 31, 1936. This includes one bank, with deposits of $85,000, which was recapitalized and reopened as an insured bank. Two banks have suspended since May 25, 1936, and preparations for payments to their depositors are in progress. In 56 of these banks the Corporation had started making payments to depositors by May 31, 1936. The amount of deposits and the progress made in the payment of

MERIT OR CIVIL SERVICE VERSUS SPOILS SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, theoretically, the merit or civil-service system of government sounds good; practically, it does not work; and leaders of both parties know it, whatever they say. The Republicans since the Civil War, increasingly in later days, since their opponents control the Government, have advocated the merit system, but generally practiced putting in office people of their own party stamp as indemnity for the past and security for their future.

The Democratic Party under Cleveland departed much from this spoils system and probably hurt the party, as also did Wilson. As a matter of fact, both Cleveland and Wilson and the present Roosevelt administration have been much less partisan than their Republican colleagues have averaged since the Civil War, and it has made the "old line" Democrats very mad.

What is true nationally is true in the State of Maine. Democratic Gov. Harris M. Plaisted, Frederick Plaisted, and Oakley C. Curtis tried somewhat to keep to what many would call the merit system. The present Governor Brann appoints many Republicans, perhaps influenced somewhat from the fact that he has a Republican council which confirms.

I hear much here in Congress from my Republican colleagues about the civil service of the past and the spoils system now, yet I have not found one Democratic postmaster in the First Congressional District thus far in 2 years. When I do, I shall expect to find an office which does not pay in money nor politics. As a matter of fact, both parties talk before election the merit system and then after election proceed to put in the important offices, at least, their political friends. No fair-minded and well-informed man would claim that nationally or in Maine since the Civil War the Republican Party has appointed Democrats in nearly the same proportion as Democratic Presidents and Governors have appointed Republicans.

Call it what you may, the spoils system if you wish, but I believe that two parties will and should govern this country with policies and personnel; will compete, if you please, for the governing with their platforms, and men and women, of course, to carry them out, and there is some question whether men or women do not come first as dictating policies whatever the platforms, which generally are made only to stand on during campaigns to get votes with, and forget after the elections.

I am a great believer in a Democratic or Republican administration administered by its real friends, Democrats or Republicans, respectively, and since in either party enough good men can be found, barring greenness, to administer the Government, I believe that when the people by their votes say, "We want a Democratic or Republican administration", why, let them have it, with Democratic or Republican administrators, as soon as they may practically be appointed. This is my honest belief relative to the spoils system versus the merit or civil service, so-called, which is as much a misnomer as wets and drys. Andrew Jackson had his theory; he preached and practiced it to the advantage of America. Later hypocrites have practiced what he did largely, but have preached something different, especially when their opponents got into office.

In Maine next Monday, June 15, comes our primary election. Our papers are full of the weasel words of many—yes; the most of the candidates who will be voted for in the 16 counties of Maine.

After nominated these candidates will work for their election, and after election I venture to say that 99 percent of the elected will find among those who voted and worked for them or their party that one whose rank, whose brains and character, entitled him to an appointment. What I am trying to say is that no matter what candidates may say before election to satisfy the so-called civil-service or merit-system promoters, and these are mostly on paper Republicans in Maine, after election it is another matter. Good and efficient men and women can be found in both parties to administer our laws. Let us tell the truth about governmental patronage and practice what we preach.

THE GRAND RIVER DAM IN NORTHEAST OKLAHOMA

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, through the last two sessions of Congress the question of the development of hydroelectric projects by the Federal Government has been constantly before this body. Many of the opponents of the present administration group the power question with the other emergency measures fostered by the New Deal. In reality the Federal Government's interest in power long antedated the depression, and, in my opinion, power will be a paramount question before this body long after the passing of the present emergency.

Following the late war the Government had the Muscle Shoals Dam on its hands with two courses of action from which to choose. Either Muscle Shoals could be turned over to private interests to be exploited at the expense of an already abused public or it could be operated by the Government through some designated agency for the benefit of the public. The Government acted wisely and justly in that case. With that decision the entire Tennessee Valley Authority had its inception. That decision blazed the trail along which we now travel.

Since that beginning much has been done to point the way for our future course of action. Engineering, economic, and financial studies have been made by the Federal Government and by State governments to determine what electric energy now costs the consumer, to what extent people in all areas have access to electric energy, and at what prices electric energy is available, not only to the dwellers in cities and towns but also to farmers.

Various agencies of the Government have acquired data on the undeveloped hydroelectric power sites in the Nation.

Under the authority of Congress the Federal Power Commission has made studies and surveys and has compiled data, the accuracy of which cannot be questioned and which are now available to all of us. Nationally known engineers, under the direction of the National Resources Board, have presented plans for a long-range development of our power resources and have set out in detail the method by which we may develop a grid system hooking up the power systems of this country in a manner comparable to that now in effect in England.

The New York State Power Authority has completed a survey continuing over several years, and in a thorough and voluminous report tells us how much electric energy costs the people of New York State, both in the cities and in the country, and what it should cost them. Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, has made numerous speeches before this body presenting the facts relative to the Tennessee Valley Authority. There is already sufficient history back of the Tennessee Valley Authority's activities for it to serve as a guide in comparing the activities of private interests with those of the Government.

The Federal Power Commission has acquired all the pertinent data relative to the financial structures of all the power companies in the United States.

A study of the numerous reports of these several agencies develops a number of outstanding facts.

First. The electric industry is owned by a few great power systems. These systems usually monopolize great areas, consequently there is little or no competition. These power companies are often referred to as the Power Trust. Most of them are controlled in Wall Street.

Second. These power companies have already obtained control of nearly all of the valuable hydroelectric power sites in the United States.

Third. Almost all of these power companies have inflated their assets, issued stock on the inflated values, and have sold this stock to an unsuspecting public or have issued it to insiders for promotion purposes or at reduced prices.

Fourth. On the average the power companies are charging the public at least twice what the charges should be. This is done in order to maintain dividends on their greatly watered stock issues.

Fifth. In the United States less than 10 percent of the farms are served with electricity. In Holland practically 100 percent are served, and in Germany 90 percent. The percentage of farms electrified in the United States is the lowest in any first-class nation in the world.

Sixth. The power companies have made little effort to develop rural electrification. This is probably due to the fact that in order to make rural electrification successful it would be necessary to revise their entire rate structure, since it is impossible for farmers to pay prices comparable to city rates.

Seventh. It has been demonstrated in the power industry that consumption of electricity increases almost in direct ratio as the price decreases.

This rule has been demonstrated in many places in the United States and in Canada. An analogous illustration is in the railroad business, which, after all, is a utility. When, under orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad recently reduced its passenger rates from 3.6 cents per mile to 2 cents per mile, immediately the number of passengers carried increased approximately 50 percent.

In the light of these facts it is unthinkable that this Nation should continue its abject surrender to the Power Trust. The corporate policies of these great power companies have been corrupt in that they have sold hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of watered stock to the public, making the consumer carry the burden in the form of exorbitant charges for electricity. Their economic policies have been unsound in that they have failed to recognize that they can increase their business profitably by lowering rates. Their moral policies have been bad in that they have a moral obligation by reason of the monopolistic type of their industry to supply electric energy to farming and rural communities as well as to cities within range of their plants, consistent with reasonable cost, and they have failed to do so.

The power industry has always operated with a comparatively free hand, and it has always been possible for it to meet changing conditions if it so desired. Whatever may be said in criticism of the acts and policies of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., it cannot be said that it has failed to supply service to any area or any community in the United States except in the most extremely isolated areas. In comparison with the telephone company, the power industry has been grossly negligent of its duties.

The power industry has had its chance and it has failed in its duty to the American public. As we face a program of farm electrification and a policy of reasonable and just rates for electricity, consistent with the cost of production, I, for one, feel that the electric companies should go along with modern trends.

If there are any of these companies which are willing to admit the errors of their past, and which are willing to go along on a program fair and reasonable to the public, I say the Government should keep hands off, or, where necessary or desirable, work with them. Where there are companies which cannot because of unsound financial structure, or will not because they fail to recognize their public duty, join in a program of electrical advancement, I say we should ignore them. They shall not stand in the way of intelligent, sound progress. Farms shall not go without electricity and the public shall not be charged exorbitant rates because of their past mistakes or because their present managements are unprogressive or stubborn.

We now come to the heart of this whole question. In the past the Government has carelessly let most of the valuable hydroelectric power sites fall into the hands of the Power Trust. We failed to realize that these sites belonged to the people and were of great value to the people. We did not know how dangerous the Power Trust was. We had little knowledge of its activities until it had successfully acquired a strangle hold on the electrical industry of the Nation.

But now we know what it planned to do and how well and completely it did it. We are no longer ignorant. We are responsible for what happens from here on, so what shall we do now?

There yet remain in the United States a few valuable hydroelectric power sites not controlled by the Power Trust, but these sites are coveted by the Power Trust. Companies have repeatedly filed on many of these sites in order to try to keep them out of the hands of private interests, who might develop them, or until such time as they themselves might choose to develop them.

As long as I am a Member of this body and long after, I shall do all that is in my power to keep these power sites from falling into the hands of the Power Trust, or, for that matter, any private hands. They belong to the people; they must be kept for the people; and they must be developed for the people.

Within the confines of my district lies a valuable hydroelectric power site yet undeveloped. There are only three such undeveloped power sites lying within a vast area extending from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains and from the Rio Grande to the Canadian border. This project is located on the Grand River in northeastern Oklahoma and is known as the Grand River power project.

From an engineering standpoint this project is sound and it bears the approval of the United States Army Engineers as to feasibility, as well as the approval of a number of nationally known engineering firms. The project contemplates the construction of a large dam to be known as the Pensacola Dam, creating a vast reservoir, valuable for flood control as well as power. The dam site is ideal. It is proposed that this first unit shall be a 60,000-kilowatt installation. The Army Engineers have estimated that it will cost $13,300,000, or an average of $166 per horsepower. This cost compares favorably with similar projects. The Grand River power project further contemplates the construction of another dam at Markham's Ferry, lower on the stream, with a 29,500-kilowatt installation, and a third dam yet lower at Fort Gibson, with a 35,300-kilowatt installation. The total power capacity of the entire project is 120,800 kilowatts and the estimated cost of the entire project, $24,500,000.

The Army Engineers have estimated that by building only Pensacola Dam to start with, the power generated would cost not to exceed 4 mills per kilowatt-hour and that, as the additional units might be built, the cost could be lowered to as low as 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour.

The area which would be served by the Grand River project is almost identical with the area which has been designated by the Federal Power Commission as district no. 33. District no. 33 embraces a portion of Arkansas lying in the northwestern corner of the State, a portion of Missouri lying in the southeastern portion of the State, and approximately two-thirds of Oklahoma lying to the east. District no. 33 is now served by 8 large public-utility companies and 103 municipal companies, a portion of these municipal companies generating their own power and some of them purchasing it from the larger companies. The eight public-utility companies serve a population of approximately 1,325,000. The 103 municipal plants serve approximately 245,000. The total population of this district is 3,465,000. In other words, only 45 percent of this district are now served with electricity.

The total installed electrical capacity of the eight large companies is 490,536 kilowatts, of which 93.2 percent is generated by steam. The 60,000-kilowatt plant proposed at Pensacola is only 12.2 percent of the now installed capacity in the district. The 120,800-kilowatt capacity of the entire project is only 25 percent of the total installed capacity in the district. The normal and natural growth in population and industry, without any decrease in rates, should in a comparatively short time absorb the 60,000-kilowatt output of the Pensacola unit. Much of the present installed capacity of the large companies is obsolete or semiobsolete, and since many of the plants now operating are steam plants, old in years and antique in design, obsolescence will increase rapidly, furnishing a rapidly increasing market for hydroelectric power.

The cost of generating the electricity consumed in district no 33, based on the reports of the companies to the Federal Power Commission, varies from 4.4 mills per kilowatt-hour to 28 mills per kilowatt hour. The weighted average of the cost of all the companies is 5.1 mills per kilowatt hour. This figure of 5.1 mills in comparison with the maximum figure of 4 mills estimated by the Army engineers as the cost of generating power at the Pensaloca site does not seem greatly out of line, considering such costs, the type, and age of the plants warrant cheap rates to the consumers, but such cheap rates have not been granted.

At this point let me refer to the matter of inflation of assets by these power companies, since this in a large degree is the cause for their exorbitant rates. I am not informed as to the degree of inflation of most of the large electrical companies, but I do have the facts from the reports of the Federal Trade Commission relative to two of them which are dominant in this area. In the case of one company, its books show a stock equity for 1930 of $30,755,596.41, whereas a proper adjustment would be $3,630,009.23, or only about 26 percent. In another its 1930 equity shown by the books is $5,450,713.79, whereas if the watered stock and inflation were squeezed out it would be only $823,378, or only about 15 percent.

Now we begin to see the reason for these exorbitant charges for electricity. They try to earn dividends on watered stock in an amount several times the value of their plants. The consuming public as a whole must not continue to be robbed by such methods.

It is customary for those who are opposed to the Government participation in hydroelectric power projects to charge that there is no market for power which may be developed by them, and this charge has been made relative to the Grand River project. A most complete and thorough economic study was made relative to this question under the direction of the Government. This report was based on a thorough study of the physical condition of the plants now furnishing electricity in district no. 33, the rates charged by them, the degree of obsolescence of the plants in operation, and a study of the amount of electricity used by all classes of industry over a period of years.

In arriving at a conclusion no attempt was made to claim markets for power from this project through commercial or industrial expansion, through an extension of rural electrification, or through expected development from air conditioning. The figures were based on the continuation of the normal growth of present industries and reasonable increase due to the lowering of rates. The conclusion of this economic study is that a unit of 20,000-kilowatt capacity will be needed by January 1939, a second unit of 20,000-kilowatt capacity will be needed by January 1941, and a third unit of 20,000-kilowatt capacity by January 1943, in order to take care of the normal increase in energy demand by present users.

If the rates are lowered, and they certainly should be, it is estimated that an additional capacity of 33,165 kilowatts would be needed to supply the increased demand.

It is estimated that a capacity of 11,957 kilowatts will be needed for displacing municipal generating systems.

Naturally the increase due to the lowering of rates and the increase due to municipal requirements will be gradual. The 60,000 kilowatts which will be needed by 1943 to take care of the normal increased demand of present users, plus the increase due to the lowering of rates, plus the increase required for municipal systems, totals 105,122-kilowatt capacity.

Since this estimate was made in the manner usually employed by industrial and banking concerns for making such estimates, it would appear that there can be no question as to the economic feasibility of the Grand River development. These figures do not include an increased demand which will be brought about through rural electrification, for the reason that the extent and rapidity of rural electrification cannot be computed with any degree of accuracy. Any increase in demand which might be brought about because of the location of new industries in the areas to be served by this project is not considered for the reason that it is impossible to determine to what extent new industries would move to this area or be developed in this area.

The question of farm electrification, however, is one which is close to my heart. At present, only 10 percent of the farms in the United States, and only 5 percent of the farms in the areas adjacent to the Grand River project, are electrified. The charges for electricity on rural electric lines now in effect in this area vary from 16 to 18 cents per kilowatt-hour where 40 kilowatt-hours per month are used, and this is about the average amount used by farms in this area. The charge is now 9 to 10 cents per kilowatt-hour where 100 kilowatt-hours per month are used, which amount should be available to all farms. These charges are exorbitant and unreasonable. Forty kilowatt-hours per month purchased from the Tennessee Valley Authority cost $1.20 per month. In Oklahoma it costs from $6.40 to $7.20. One hundred kilowatt-hours per month purchased from the Tennessee Valley Authority costs $1.70. In Oklahoma, farmers pay from $8.20 to $10.17 for this electricity. There can be no such thing as successful, prosperous farmers unless we have happy, contented farmers. One of the great problems confronting this Nation today is that of the proper usage and preservation of our farm lands. We know that millions of acres of our farm lands have been destroyed due to improper farming. We know that two-thirds of our farm lands have been seriously damaged by improper farming. As the older generation passes on it should be the desire of the Nation that our farms be taken over by young people properly trained in the usage and preservation of our soil. It is unreasonable for us to expect educated, enlightened young people to attach themselves to the land in rural communities unless the ordinary comforts of civilization are made available to them. Without electric lights, without running water, and without the customary sanitary facilities, farm life cannot be made appealing to the younger generation. With the development of rural electrification and with rates consistent with the cost of production, not only will electric lights be available and cheap but it will be possible to have electric refrigeration, electric washers, radios, food grinders, lighted barns, and electric incubators. The drudgery which our forefathers experienced could not be avoided. The necessities of life, as we now think of them, were unknown even in the most cosmopolitan cities, but drudgery today can be avoided. Communism, fascism, or nazism, the scourges of this age, never incubated or grew except in atmosphere of drudgery and oppression.

Congress has rightly recognized the importance of rural electrification in the creation of the Rural Electrification Administration, but what is the advantage of a rural electric line if the power rates are prohibitive? We can never expect sufficiently low rates from those established power companies which must try to earn dividends on vast quantities of watered assets.

An economic report on the Grand River development, because of its uncertainty, has given consideration to the development of new industries in this area, and although it may not be accurate to include definite figures with reference to new industries, it certainly would be a mistake not to give consideration to them.

The area which would be served by the Grand River project is one of the richest in natural resources in the United States. The State of Oklahoma is second in mineral wealth due to its vast oil deposits. It is second in cotton production, occasionally yielding this honor to Georgia. It is first in the production of zinc. It is seventh in the production of agricultural products and fourteenth in the amount of Federal income tax paid. Yet the State of Oklahoma was the fourth highest in the United States in the percentage of its population on the Federal relief rolls. The State has always been without the manufacturing industries which its natural resources warrant due to the absence of three of the essentials for industrial development—cheap transportation, cheap money, and cheap power. It has the resources, the labor, the climate, and the water. Producing practically the same amount of cotton that Georgia produces, Oklahoma has 25,000 cotton spindles. Georgia has 6,000,000 spindles. Much of Oklahoma's oil is shipped out of the State for refining, most of its zinc is shipped out of the State for treatment, much of its wheat is shipped out of the State for milling, and its cattle are shipped to Kansas City and Chicago for slaughter. The hides are tanned in the East and the shoes are made there.

The money earned by our great store of resources does not find its way into the hands of Oklahoma workers. It finds its way into the hands of workers in the manufacturing east. This condition can never be remedied until we industrialize our State, and this can never be done until we have cheap power. Cheap power, and cheap power alone, converted the Carolinas and Georgia from a poverty-stricken condition to a prosperous condition. The same thing can and must be done in Oklahoma and the adjoining States. Industry does not lead cheap power—it follows it.

Farm service, 1,854 kilowatt-hours per year per connection.

Residential and domestic, 603 kilowatt-hours per year.

Small light and power concerns, 4,051 kilowatt-hours per year.

Large light and power concerns, 205,785 kilowatt-hours per year.

For district no. 33, that area which would be served by the Grand River project, the consumption is as follows:

Farm service, 1,041 kilowatt-hours per year per connection.

Residential and domestic, 445 kilowatt-hours per year.

Small light and power concerns, 1,755 kilowatt-hours per year.

The rates in effect in district no. 33 are much above the average for the entire United States, which doubtless accounts in a large degree for the fact that consumption so far is under the average. In the territory of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. the average consumption of electricity for residential service in 1922 was 298 kilowatt-hours per customer. The average rate for this electricity was 9.07 cents per kilowatt-hour. In 1934 the average kilowatt consumption in this same area per residential connection was 774.1 kilowatts per hour, but the rate had been reduced to 4.13 cents per hour. This illustrated the effect of cheap rates to the domestic consumers. When cheap rates went into effect in Tupelo, Miss., due to the city's contract with the Tennessee Valley Authority, domestic consumption doubled within a year. In Seattle, Wash., where an extremely low rate is in effect, the average domestic consumption is 1,108 kilowatt-hours per year. In Tacoma, Wash., it is 1,560 kilowatt-hours per year, due to the same reason. In Ontario, Canada, 26 cities had an average consumption of 1,779 kilowatt-hours per year per domestic customer. This was due to the cheap power from Niagara Falls. In Winnipeg, Manitoba, with an average net cost of 8 mills per kilowatt-hour, the yearly domestic consumption averages 4,000 kilowatt-hours per customer. In Lubbock, Tex., a city of 20,000 population, with a municipal electric plant, the average consumption per domestic customer is 1,200 kilowatt-hours per year.

The Federal Power Commission reports that as of January 1, 1935, 100 kilowatt-hours per domestic customer in Tulsa costs $4.75; Oklahoma City, $4.60; Muskogee, $4.91; Bartlesville, $4.25; Pawhuska, $7.50; Miami, $6.02. These cities are all in the area which would be served by the Grand River project. In Tupelo, Miss., which is served by the Tennessee Valley Authority, 100 kilowatt-hours per domestic customer costs $2.50. The facts brought out by such comparisons cannot and must not be ignored.

The Federal Power Commission reports that in Oklahoma 27 percent of the homes have electric refrigeration. In Lubbock, Tex., where 100 kilowatt-hours of electricity per month costs $3.60, 68 percent have electric refrigeration, and in Spur, Tex., with the same rate, 47 percent of the homes have electrical refrigeration. There is no reason why the people of Oklahoma and the adjoining States should not receive the same benefits and advantages as the people who live in Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, and those other areas where hydroelectric developments have made cheap rates possible. If these valuable power sites fall into the hands of the Power Trust, the old system will continue. We, the people, now own these power sites and the Government must continue its control of them. It must, as rapidly as possible, develop them. It must establish rates as low as the costs of production will permit and if those companies with inflated assets suffer, the blame lies with them and them alone. Government projects will force such companies to lower their rates to a just point and eventually write from their books those false values created for exploitation purposes and which never should have been created.

The Grand River project is one of the best in America from both engineering and economic standpoints and its construction logically follows the Tennessee Valley Authority development. It is the next unit westward in the great grid system so urgently recommended by the National Resources Committee.

Under authority of H. R. 8455, the War Department is authorized to continue surveys and make studies on the feasibility of this project. As the people's representative from Oklahoma in the Halls of Congress, I will not rest until there is legislation authorizing the construction of this project.

THE PENNSYLVANIAN

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Speaker, I realize much that I may say is controversial, but I am going to confine myself to facts as I see them in my official capacity. I would, indeed, be a poor patriot if I were to place party above country, or personal ambitions above the welfare of my people. I have tried sincerely to vote for or against legislation entirely upon its merits, but I have not been a "yes" man.

I am reminded of the man whose wife was addicted to constant bridge playing and her husband had been amiable for a long time, but finally he asserted his rights and said to her: "I have scrubbed your linoleum and I have run your sweeper; I have turned the washer and pushed your vacuum cleaner; I washed your dishes and made the beds; but when you ask me to ribbon my nightshirt to fool the baby, you are going too darned far." I have no quarrel with the Democratic Party. The platform that they wrote in Chicago in 1932 was as fine a platform as could be written. I do differ, however, with the so-called New Deal and its kindred "brain trusters" and with those who promised to abide by the Democratic platform of 1932 100 percent but have not done so.

They say that Columbus was the first new dealer; when he started out he did not know where he was going; when he arrived he did not know where he was; and when he returned he did not know where he had been—and he did it all with somebody else's money.

ALL LEGISLATION NOT OPEN TO CRITICISM

All of the New Deal legislation is not open to criticism, but much of it has been at such variance with the usual procedure of our Government, under its Constitution, that, without thought of criticizing the sincerity that prompted the legislation, the legislation in itself has not stood the test of application.

During the 3 years that the present administration has been in power the Federal Government has spent approximately $10,000,000,000 for the relief of unemployment. No one could be so cruel as to wish that our people should go hungry or cold, but it is a sad commentary that notwithstanding these enormous expenditures the country is no nearer solving this unemployment problem than it was 3 years ago. With our national debt increased during these years by $11,000,000,000 we still have, according to the Government and to the American Federation of Labor figures, eleven and one-half millions of unemployed still within our boundaries. During the 3 years of the present administration more money has been spent than was the total of money spent by the Government from and including the time of Washington up until the beginning of the World War.

It may yet be fitting to remove from our coins the motto, "In God we trust" and substitute instead "I hope that my redeemer liveth."

The depression was world-wide and all countries suffered even as America suffered. The failure of our efforts to reduce unemployment is all the more discouraging when we realize that other countries have done considerably better without resorting to the futile methods of crushing the depression as used by the present administration.

According to a report just received from the international labor office of the League of Nations at Geneva, there are at the present time in the United States 3,000,000 more workers out of employment than are unemployed in all of Europe, although Europe has four times the population of the United States. England, that suffered just as severely from the depression as has the United States, has balanced its budget 4 years out of the last 5 and expects to balance its budget again this year.

While the stock market shows marked improvement and may act as an optimistic barometer, and the brokers may be doing an increased business, this in no way assists the farmer, the small businessman, or our laboring people who remain unemployed; nor does it aid those who are on relief through no choice of their own.

UNSEEN TAXES

Under the A. A. A. tremendous and unseen taxes were imposed upon our people amounting to more than a billion dollars. This more than a billion dollars came directly from the pay envelopes of the laboring classes in the same ratio that it came from the rich, for the tax was largely imposed upon the absolute necessities of life. Time will not permit a detailed statement where all these taxes came from. Suffice it to say that the tax on flour was $396.10 a carload, while the tax upon pork amounted to the staggering sum of $945 for every carload of pork consumed in the United States.

Not one cent of the tax reached the United States Treasury to be used by the Government in the payment of its obligations or to be used in the running expenses of the Government, but every cent of this more than a billion dollars was paid out mostly to the southern and western farmers in return for slaughtering millions of hogs and cattle and in payment for cattle and crops they agreed not to raise, and to the southern farmer for plowing under his cotton and in payment for crops he agreed not to plant.

I remember the Biblical story when Christ visited the earth and when the people cried with hunger, that He took two fishes and a few loaves of bread and fed the multitude. During this great depression, when our people were hungry, millions of hogs and cattle were slaughtered and their carcasses buried in the earth; when our people were naked the farmer of the South was ordered to plow under his cotton and the farmer of the West to slaughter his sheep so that curtailed production would increase the price of clothing and food to our already impoverished people.

NATURE ASSISTS NEW DEAL

During the year 1934 one of the worst droughts that ever visited our country struck with a fatal blow throughout the West. Production of crops and cattle were almost nil, and now the New Deal, with great enthusiasm, exclaims that farm production in 1935 increased 12 percent over the preceding year, when Nature's desire to help the New Deal in its destruction had brought an almost zero production for 1934.

Every cent of the billion dollars or more that was paid to the farmers for destroying production came directly from the pockets of every purchaser, whether employed or unemployed, and was also taken from the meager dole of those who were receiving relief. Much of the money that was taken from the purses of the thickly populated industrial sections, such as Pennsylvania, went to foreign countries under the insidious propaganda that our own American farmers were being helped. Vast sums of money went to corporations and banks and insurance companies, while the average payments to farmers in general were quite small.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS GARNER THE DOLLARS TAKEN FROM THE POCKETS OF OUR PEOPLE

A shifting group of slightly less than 300 producers received $38,460,000. The Hawaiian Commercial & Sugar Co. received $1,022,037 for not producing sugar. R. E. Wilson Plantation, of Crittenden County, Ark., $392,702, and the Delta & Pine Land Co. in Mississippi received $318,287. This company is British owned, and Oscar W. Johnson, manager of the company, is also manager of the A. A. A. cotton pool. At least four State penitentiaries received benefits for not growing sugarcane or cotton. The Arkansas Board of Penal Institutions received $33,500; the Louisiana State Penitentiary received $146,124 for not growing sugarcane. The Mississippi State Penitentiary received $155,056 and the Texas Prison System garnered $57,924 for not growing cotton.

Others who received payments for not growing cotton were Banks & Danner, Crittenden County, Ark., $80,000; Tillar Mercantile Co., of Drew County, Ark., $99,137; Chapman Ranch, Texas, $189,985. The Fontana Farms, of San Bernardino County, Calif., received $155,575 for not producing corn and hogs. Wheat payments included a check for a total of $51,066 to the Campbell Farming Corporation, of Montana, for not growing wheat on land they had rented from the Indians—the rental, I am told, being $1.50 an acre. The Sutter Basin Corporation and Sutter Improvement Co. of California received a total of $134,834 for not growing wheat. The Bank of America National Trust & Savings Co. in California received $47,537 and James Irvane, of Fresno County, Calif., received $47,049 for not growing wheat.

The Olaou Sugar Co. of Hawaii received $904,562 for not producing sugar. A long list of numerous payments to Hawaii included $815,400 to the Lihue Plantation Co., $751,843 to the Ewa Plantation Co., and $740,095 to the Wailua Agricultural Co. The National City Bank of New York received $705,481 for Puerto Rican sugar reduction. The Eastern Sugar Associates received $27,881 and the Bank of Nova Scotia $478,025.

The Metropolitan Life, John Hancock, Prudential, Northwestern, Mutual, Travelers, Equitable Life, and Aetna Life Insurance Cos. were very large recipients of these gifts from the Government. Nineteen large hog producers received a total of $200,000 for not growing hogs, and likewise 19 rice producers received half a million dollars for not growing rice. Seven wheat producers received more than $70,000 jointly for not raising wheat, while 43 cotton growers were given jointly another half million dollars for not producing cotton.

FOOLING THEMSELVES

These are but a few illustrations of how the Pennsylvania farmer was, or was not, aided by the A. A. A. I am wondering if anyone feels they are fooling the Pennsylvania farmer by dangling a bright new penny before his eyes in an effort to distract his attention while they are throwing baskets of thousand-dollar bills to others. I am quite sure that they are not fooling anyone—except themselves.

Of the more than a billion dollars collected on the bare necessities of life, almost five hundred millions went to the farmers of the South and more than five hundred millions went to the farmers of the Middle West, while less than fifty millions came to the farmers of the Northern and Eastern States, from Main to Ohio and West Virginia, inclusive, and to the far Western States. Surely no one should expect the Congressmen from these Eastern and Northern States to support any such legislation as would drain the money from the pockets of his already impoverished people in order to pay such sums as I have just mentioned to corporations, whether American or foreign.

NEW DEAL IN GOOD GRACES OF SOUTH AND WEST. WHY?

It is astonishing that but 24 of our States paid a greater amount in taxes to the Government than they received back in various forms of relief, while the other 24 States received an average of $23 in relief for every $6 they paid into the Government Treasury. Almost without exception the States who paid to the Government more than they received were our Northern States, while those who received more than they paid were Southern or Western States. In round numbers, Alabama paid $3,000,000 in Federal taxes and received $17,000,000 in relief payments; Arizona paid 1¼ million dollars and received $7,000,000 in relief payments; Idaho paid less than 1½ million dollars in Government taxes and received 6½ million dollars in Federal relief payments; Kansas paid $10,000,000 in Federal taxes and received $22,000,000 in Federal relief payments; Mississippi paid less than $2,000,000 in Federal taxes and received almost $13,000,000 in Federal relief payments; North Dakota paid but $859,000 in Federal taxes and received $12,000,000 in Federal relief payments; and the remainder of the 24 other States are likewise. These great Federal relief payments in excess of taxes the 24 States paid were collected from the more thickly populated States, of which Pennsylvania is one. Pennsylvania paid 88½ million dollars more in taxes than it received in relief; New York paid over one-half billion more in taxes than it received in relief; Illinois paid 139 million more in taxes than it received in relief; Michigan paid 93 million more than it received; Rhode Island, 10 million more; New Jersey, 80 million more; Delaware, 34 million more; Ohio, 81 million more than it received in relief; and so forth. It is not my belief that I was elected to Congress to support legislation which would drain the money of our industrial sections, rich and poor alike, so that the present administration might remain in the good graces of the Southern and Midwestern States, by spending the money taken from the toilers of the industrial districts.

HOW THE STATES MET FEDERAL RELIEF CONTRIBUTIONS

Comparisons of how the various States met the Federal relief contributions by State and local relief appropriations during 1933, 1934, and 1935 are interesting. Let us take first some of the States of the North: Massachusetts contributed $813 for every $895 contributed by the Federal Government; Vermont matched $506 with every $660 contributed by the Government; Connecticut gave $826 for every $647 given by the Government; New Hampshire gave $759 for every $613 contributed by the Government; Rhode Island contributed $798 for every $519 contributed by the Government; Pennsylvania gave $334 for every $814 contributed by the Governmentment; Delaware contributed $563 to every $383 by the Government; New York gave $858 for every $968 given by the Government.

And now let us take some of the Southern and Western States: Montana contributed $145 for every $1,141 from the Government; Idaho contributed $189 for every $1,003 contributed by the Government; Louisiana gave $26 for every $840 by the Government; New Mexico gave $28 for every $792 by the Government; Georgia gave $39 for every $711 contributed by the Government; Virginia gave $70 for every $646 contributed by the Government; Arkansas gave $23 for every $637 by the Government; Florida gave $31 for every $616 contributed by the Government; West Virginia contributed $74 for every $570 by the Government; North Carolina gave $17 for every $518 contributed by the Government; Tennessee contributed $37 for every $533 by the Government; South Carolina contributed $11 to every $542 by the Government. Nevada relief families received almost $100 a month during the 3-year period.

Thus it can be seen that taxes paid in excess of the relief given to some of the States which I have mentioned earlier was sent to States that contributed but little in an effort to help themselves.

It is a matter of record that when the boll weevil threatened destruction to the cotton crops of the southern farmers the Government spent millions of dollars to destroy the boll weevil; and having conquered this insect that was destroying the cotton crops gratuitously, the Government then began paying the southern farmer to do that which the boll weevil was most generously doing without pay and without gratitude.

It is worthy of note that immediately upon American cotton growers curtailing their acreage and reducing their crops Brazil and other countries began increasing their acreage, until today the world is looking to other countries for its supply of cotton, where but a few years ago it depended almost entirely upon us. The same thing is true of scores of American products.

While America used to help feed the world, today the world is helping to feed America. Australian and other meats are being sold directly to the people of Chicago, our own meat center, because of the scarcity in our own land due to curtailed production.

In the first 6 months of 1934, 23,000,000 pounds of edible meat products were imported into the United States, but for the same period in 1935 this had increased to 39,000,000 pounds. During the first 6 months of 1934 we imported 360,000 pounds of butter and for the same period in 1935 the importation jumped to the almost unbelievable sum of 21,500,000 pounds. The increase of importations of sugar for the first 6 months of 1935 was approximately 1,000,000,000 pounds more than for the same period in 1934; and so we might go on down the long list of food commodities.

The following statistics, taken from Government reports, show how the American farmer is being subordinated in favor of the foreign producer. They are:

Products		1932 imports	1935 imports
Corn	bushels	347,627	43,242,296
Oats	do	58,786	10,106,903

Inedible molasses	gallons	155,888,307	235,161,684

It has been computed that 22,000,000 acres of our idle farms would have been necessary to raise the amount of foreign importations stated above. These importations mean American dollars for foreign farmers, for spending in other countries, and for foreign farm labor, while Americans remain in the bread line.

When we buy food are we assisting our American farmers when our money is going to the foreign markets or to foreign or domestic corporations? It is evident that under the New Deal, "To him that hath shall be given."

GRAND RIVER DAM

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, the political "stinkbugs" are always busy; they thrive during elections. They abhor the truth. Distortion is their hobby. Their tactics are so obvious that they fool only themselves. The people think correctly.

The recent statement or so-called attack on me published at Vinita is only worthy of notice because the people are entitled to know the truth. It cannot affect my status with those who know or want to know the truth.

Let us first look at the motive for the article. I did not appoint Mr. Hill, the author of the so-called attack, postmaster at Vinita. I could appoint only one. My reason for appointing Frank Bailey was because he made the highest grade on the list, was recommended by the county chairman of the Democratic Party, and is a loyal, trustworthy gentleman. I am sure that if I had appointed Mr. Hill postmaster that, instead of now attacking me, he would be praising me to the skies. The article was so obviously malicious and untruthful that it somewhat speaks for itself, but it is ingeniously designed to fool people—hence this explanation.

There is an additional motive besides malice for this attack. You all know that my activity in behalf of the Grand River Dam and my vote for the administration's utility holding company bill aroused the violent opposition of the utilities. Back of this article will be found utility influence, utility money, or utility approval. They know they have not a Chinaman's chance of defeating me in the primary, but their design obviously is to do everything possible in the primary so as to attempt my defeat in the fall.

The article espouses no other candidate, so no public interest is attempted to be served in the article, merely the venting of personal spleen.

Consequently I hope our Democratic friends will not be fooled either by the malice or secret design.

Two outstanding falsities appear in the article:

First, it states that no application was filed in time, ahead of the dead line of September 12, 1935. The letter of Clark Foreman, of the Power Division of the P. W. A., quoted hereafter, showing that the application was filed with the P. W. A. on the 26th day of August 1935, shows up the first falsity.

Mr. Foreman's letter is short, and I quote it in full, as follows:

FEDERAL EMERGENCY ADMINISTRATION OF PUBLIC WORKS,
June 9, 1936.

Hon. WESLEY E. DISNEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DISNEY: In response to request contained in your letter of June 8, you are advised that the Pensacola (Grand River) power project in Oklahoma is docketed under Oklahoma-1097, and dated August 26, 1935.

Sincerely yours,

CLARK FOREMAN,
Director, Power Division
(For the Administrator).

The second falsehood is that I was a member of the conference committee, and that the conference committee agreed that the Grand River might be stricken from the report. I was not a member of the conference committee, and I spoke, as did Congressmen NICHOLS, MILLER, and others, against the adoption of the conference report. These falsities brand the article with complete suspicion.

The old adage is, "False in one thing, false in all."

It is stated that I got nothing for my district out of the big appropriation. That, too, is false, for several millions of dollars in various projects came to my district as a result of my activities in this behalf. Even now Vinita is wanting a Federal building.

Page 7980, May 26, 1936, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, shows that the House conferees on the Overton bill, and page 7939, May 26, 1936, that the House conferees on the flood-control bill were identical, namely, WILSON, WHITTINGTON, GRISWOLD, RICH, and ENGLEBRIGHT.

I opposed the conference report, and on page 8862 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, spoke against it, as did Congressmen MILLER, NICHOLS, and others.

Page 14182 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that on the 22d day of August 1935 the flood-control bill (H. R. 8455) contained the Grand River project; and it was placed there as a result of my efforts. We passed the bill. Pages 7735, 7742, and 7758, May 21, 1936, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show that when Senate bill 5531, the Overton bill, came to the House I led a fight for the addition of 13 projects on the Arkansas and 13 on the White, including the Grand River, to be included in the Senate bill, and was successful.

What more can my constituents ask when I pass the matter through the House every time it comes up. I passed it twice through the House. I cannot be Representative and Senator both at the same time.

A summarized statement of my activities in behalf of the Grand River project is as follows: I passed it twice through the House of Representatives. In 1933 I spent 4 months in Washington after the session of Congress was over and got the Arkansas Basin committee appointed. I introduced several bills for a Grand River authority similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority. I interviewed the President several times, and Secretary Ickes many times. I got the President to order an economic survey of the Grand River project. I prepared the Grand River authority bill, sent it to the legislature for introduction, and got Governor Marland to intercede with the President on behalf of the project; interviewed Senator NORRIS, Dr. Morris L. Cook, of R. E. A., the Army Engineers; spent 2 additional months in Washington in 1935 doing everything possible in its behalf. I assert that no man could devote more time and energy to this project than I. At this moment I am making every effort to get the President to order an additional survey, and only today visited the White House for that purpose.

Scoffers and malicious tongues have always been at work when big matters were involved. Nehemiah of old refused to "come down from the wall." DeWitt Clinton's Erie Canal had the same type of "bladder blasts" aimed at it and at him.

I assure you, fellow citizens, that it is not an easy matter to get $16,000,000 for a project. Passamaquoddy in Maine, the Florida ship canal, and many others failed. It takes time, patience, and energy to get these big things done.

The answer of the President to my importunities for an allotment for this project was that he had been criticized for ordering the Grand Coullee, Passamaquoddy, and the Florida ship canal without congressional authorization, and he felt that he was taking too great a responsibility without Congress' approval. Secretary Ickes took the same attitude.

It is my judgment that this project will finally be built, and that the foundation has been laid by the work I have done. It cannot be built in a day, and malice and misinformation will not help—those two errors never assisted anywhere, any place, any time.

Captain Clay's letter sounds plausible. It was very useful as a disguise for malice and design. Why should I file an application with Captain Clay of the Army Engineers? They had no money with which to build this project. Secretary Ickes had the money, and it would be a futile gesture, akin to falsity, to have filed an application with the Army Engineers. An application for what? Not for money, because the money was in the hands of the P. W. A., not the Army.

I have conferred with General Markham, Captain Clay's superior, since this so-called attack, and he says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, June 18, 1936.

Hon. WESLEY E. DISNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DISNEY: I have your letter of June 15, 1936, enclosing a copy of a newspaper clipping reproducing a letter from my office to Mr. R. L. Lunsford, president, First National Bank, Cleveland, Okla., advising him with respect to the status of proposed construction on a dam on the Grand River, Okla., for the development of hydroelectric power.

Mr. Lunsford, in a telegram to the President, referred to this Department for consideration, urged speedy and favorable action on the Grand River Dam proposal, pointing out its value for the development of hydroelectric power and for flood-control purposes.

His telegram was one of a number received in this Department shortly after the Works Progress Administration program had been placed under way, which were understood to urge a direct Federal grant for the Grand River project. During the period in which this project was receiving the active consideration of this Department, representatives of the area, accompanied on several occasions by you, were in frequent contact with my office in connection with the submission of an application for an allocation of funds from the Federal Government. They were advised that under the procedure established for the allocation of funds from the emergency relief appropriation applications for a 100 percent grant from the Federal Government, if submitted to the National Emergency Council, would be referred to this office for report, but that such report would have to be unfavorable to the inclusion of the work in the relief program in view of the man-year cost limitations which had been established for that program. They were also advised that the work would appear to more nearly come under the provisions of the loan-and-grant clause of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act, and in such event an application for the loan and grant should be submitted to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works. This office is advised by the Administration of Public Works that an application for the construction of this project under the loan-and-grant provisions of the emergency relief appropriation was received on August 26, 1935.

I am, of course, familiar with your continued interest in the Grand River project and your efforts, not only to secure an allocation of funds from the several emergency appropriations but also to secure its inclusion in the general flood-control legislation recently adopted by Congress. The Grand River project was included in the general bill as originally passed by the House of Representatives. When this bill was receiving consideration by the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, I was called on to testify with respect to the several projects maintained therein. In my testimony I pointed out that the primary purpose of this project was the development of hydroelectric power and that flood control was an incidental feature, according to the records available to my office. I understand that the Commerce Committee, in reporting the bill to the Senate, adhered to a fixed policy of including therein only projects primarily designed for flood-control purposes and to eliminate those projects having other purposes. The committee recognized the importance of the Grand River project as a proposed hydroelectric development by authorizing a further study to determine the possibility of developing a market for such power as could be produced.

I trust that this letter fully explains the status of the Grand River project before this Department and shall be pleased to furnish any additional information desired.

Very truly yours,

E. M. MARKHAM,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

To any fair-minded person this is a complete rebuttal of the misstatements in the recent so-called attack. I have been faithful in my duties as your Congressman and I am now at the National Capital attending to the business of the district.

HON. RANDOLPH CARPENTER, OF KANSAS

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every Member of the House regrets that our colleague, RANDOLPH CARPENTER, of Kansas, will not be a Member of the House in the Seventy-fifth Congress, for he has announced he will not be a candidate for reelection from the Fourth District of Kansas.

Mr. CARPENTER has been a Member of Congress in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses. He has made an enviable record and has won the good will of everybody in the House. He and his fine little family have won the affection of all who have come in contact with them, and they take with them to their Kansas home the affectionate regard of everyone who knew them.

While Members of the Kansas delegation regret to see Mr. CARPENTER sever his connection with the House, they are, I am sure, ready to congratulate Mr. CARPENTER on his wise decision.

There is in the House opportunity for exalted service to our country, for the House of Representatives writes the laws of this country. The Senate has not enough Members to constitute four of the great exclusive committees of the House. Each of these great committees is a great legislative organization in itself, and they write the most important laws of this country. The Senate criticizes and sometimes amends the House laws and often helps them, but the House writes the laws of the Nation, and so a Member of the House has almost unlimited opportunity to guide the destiny of his country toward better days and nobler ideals, but to do so he must surrender to the public service his best years and his life's blood, for in the House, years of toil and experience are essential to success in legislation.

Our colleague, Mr. CARPENTER, has chosen to follow his profession in the footsteps of his distinguished father, one of the great lawyers of Kansas. In this decision he has no doubt taken the wise course. He has received everything the House has to confer of importance, honor, and the sincere regard of his colleagues; and he retains his health and youth for his profession and his peace of mind and soul and tranquillity of life without a continuous performance of asking his constituency to reelect him to an office which robs him of health and tranquillity and at the same time imposes the vow of poverty.

We congratulate Mr. CARPENTER and bid him and his accomplished wife Godspeed, with happiness and prosperity for the years to come.

APPROPRIATIONS OF THE SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the difference between the statement that I prepared last year and that issued by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is that I used as direct appropriations all funds which would come out of the Treasury as a result of appropriations, regardless of whether they were new appropriations or reappropriations of funds that would otherwise have lapsed.

To obtain the picture of what can come out of the Treasury in expenditures one must follow the figures that I have used rather than those the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has used.

I have prepared a table showing the regular appropriations made last year during the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress as compared with those made at the present session for the fiscal year 1937, as follows:

Table I

Title	First session, 1936	Second session, 1937
Agriculture	$125, 157, 983. 14	$195, 565, 606. 00
District of Columbia	40, 547, 115. 00	43, 500, 000. 00
Independent offices	777, 501, 956. 20	2, 934, 751, 000. 00
Interior	61, 220, 928. 00	116, 425, 195. 00
Legislative	20, 746, 760. 00	23, 314, 428. 00
Navy	458, 084, 379. 00	526, 546, 532. 00
State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor	98, 561, 895. 00	115, 012, 400. 00
Treasury-Post Office	903, 635, 678. 00	992, 524, 892. 00
War	401, 998, 170. 00	572, 446, 844. 00
First deficiency	112, 633, 830. 42	368, 234, 000. 00
Second deficiency	272, 901, 233. 50	2, 675, 397, 537. 96
Emergency relief	4, 880, 000, 000. 00
Interior deficiency		35, 000. 00
	8, 153, 589, 928. 06	8, 563, 753, 434. 96
Public acts	102, 161, 741. 47
Public resolutions	2, 635, 098. 00
Private acts	1, 268, 332. 68
Rural Electrification Administration		50, 000, 000. 00
Miscellaneous		10, 000, 000. 00
	8, 259, 655, 100. 21	8, 623, 753, 434. 96
Permanent appropriations	2, 200, 101, 127. 00	1, 505, 957, 086. 82
Total	10, 459, 756, 227. 21	10, 129, 710, 521. 78

In the last year's figures there was nearly a billion dollars of reappropriations, that is, providing that money appropriated for one thing may be used for another. This year there is approximately $375,000,000 in reappropriations.

The reason that the appropriations for the second session are lower than those for the first session is that there was about $3,000,000,000 more appropriated last year for so-called relief. Of course, last year's appropriations were intended to cover a 12-month period, while this year it is openly stated that the wasteful and inefficient relief for which we have appropriated funds in the second session will all be expended by January 1, 1937.

There are some other circumstances that should be considered. The permanent appropriations for the second session are upwards of $500,000,000 less than last year because of the wiping out of the A A. A.; on the other hand, the independent offices bill carries $440,000,000 for the so-called Soil Conservation Act, which is an increase, the one offsetting the other. The independent offices bill is also $1,700,000,000 higher on account of the soldiers' bonus, which was not in last year.

If we were to continue fraudulent relief appropriations on the same basis that they have been carried on under the Roosevelt administration after January 1 next for the rest of the fiscal year 1937, a deficiency bill of $2,500,000,000 for that purpose would be in order by January 1, because the Treasury will be stripped by that time to meet the exorbitant election demands of General Farley. In other words, if appropriations had been on the same basis as last year to carry the fraudulent relief all through the year the appropriations for this session would have been at least $1,000,000,000 more than the appropriations for last session. It also means that if Federal relief of any description is carried on beyond January 1, there must be further large appropriations in January.

The following is a list of the appropriations made by different Congresses. The appropriations under the second session of the Seventy-second and the first session of the Seventy-third are combined because they cover the same period.

Table II

Seventy-first Congress, third session	$4, 983, 250, 949. 98
Seventy-second Congress, first session	4, 627, 440, 936. 33
Seventy-second Congress, second session, and Seventy-third Congress, first session	8, 791, 396, 777. 10
Seventy-third Congress, second session	$11, 534, 376, 618. 23
Seventy-fourth Congress, first session	10, 459, 756, 227. 21
Seventy-fourth Congress, second session	10, 129, 710, 521. 78

The following table shows the expenditures of the Government each year, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, together with the receipts of the Government over that period, together with the net public debt at the end of each fiscal year and the guaranties on which the Government is liable. The guaranties are mostly home-loan and farm-loan bonds, and unquestionably the Government will have to meet a considerable portion of these bonds.

Total	18, 602, 595, 869. 29	21, 155, 046, 727. 96	23, 589, 425, 737. 54	27, 639, 288, 050. 32	32, 479, 611, 739. 06	35, 363, 551, 479. 82

The increase is still going on at an increased rate. The record of this Congress for appropriations of upward of $20,000,000,000 is the largest of any peacetime Congress, and the only thing we can say of the Roosevelt administration is that it has been getting worse and worse, more and more wasteful, and with less regard for the people's interest. A year ago I predicted that the deficit would be $6,000,000,000. The present Treasury estimates indicate that I was correct, and that the total of Government liabilities as of June 30, 1936, will be approximately $40,000,000,000, as I predicted a year ago.

The following table shows the number of employees in the Federal Government beginning June 30, 1930, and ending with the last date available, April 30, 1936:

Table IV

1931	571, 368
1932	570, 000
1933	577, 170
1934	680, 181
1935	751, 269
1936	810, 418

The above figures are taken as of June 30 each year except for the years of 1935 and 1936, in which years the figures are as of July 31 and April 30, respectively.

This indicates an increase of 233,248 since the Roosevelt administration came into power.

With the tremendous appropriations which have been made and the present rate of spending, if the Roosevelt administration continues, Government expenditures will have exceeded the receipts by at least $5,000,000,000 for 1937. It is manifest that the only safety for the people is the retirement of the Roosevelt administration.

Since the 4th of March 1933 there has been spent by the Roosevelt administration the unprecedented sum of approximately $25,000,000,000—in about 3 years.

EVOLUTION OF A PRESIDENTIAL OPINION

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, when President Roosevelt contemplates the evolution of his constitutional opinions since he was Governor of New York State, I wonder if he ever recalls the century-old correspondence between Henry Clay and Nicholas Biddle, president of the Second Bank of the United States. Second thoughts are not always better thoughts. A man's second judgment is sometimes worse than his first. His second judgment may be based upon no new facts but may be marked by an inclusion of emotional elements absent when his first opinion was formed. The quality of his advisers may have been better when he reached his first opinion. Mr. Roosevelt's conclusions on fundamental questions of government may have been sounder, for example, when his counselors included Alfred E. Smith, Herbert C. Lehman, and Raymond Moley than when he relied for advice upon Professor Tugwell, Professor Frankfurter, and the bright young men Professor Frankfurter exported to Washington for the President's guidance.

You will remember that Nicholas Biddle in 1831 was anxious to assure a renewal of the charter of the Second Bank of the United States. The charter expired in 1836. Andrew Jackson was President and was coming up for reelection in 1832. Jackson had been doubtful of the bank's constitutionality and had expressed some opposition to it, but his opposition was not militant and had become progressively milder. Jackson's Cabinet was friendly to the bank and so were most of Jackson's intimate friends. All Biddle needed to do to obtain a recharter was to save Jackson's face by consenting to a few minor charter amendments.

Henry Clay appreciated all this and set it out to Biddle with perfect clarity in 1830. Clay at that time was a private citizen of Kentucky and was writing to Biddle not as a candidate for office but as a friend of the bank and as a man of political insight and experience. He told Biddle that it would be impossible to obtain a recharter of the bank against Jackson's opposition, because there would not be sufficient support in Congress to override a Presidential veto. Clay went on to say that a number of Jackson men wanted to make the bank a political issue; that if a recharter bill was presented and vetoed by Jackson before the election of 1832, the bank question would be an issue in the campaign; that Jackson's reelection was likely; and that if Jackson were reelected on the antibank platform the bank's ruin was certain. However, if there should be no application for a recharter until after the election and no reference to it as a political issue, the Jackson men who were friends of the bank could persuade Jackson to consent to the recharter in order to have the bank's support for the Government's fiscal policies.

Clay's advice coincided with Biddle's own opinion.

A year later Clay was nominated for President by the National Republicans. This party was in search of an issue. With surprising obtuseness, considering how easy it is always to arouse popular prejudices against any financial institution, these Whig politicians thought they had a winning issue in support of the bank. They not only wanted to support the bank themselves but they were determined to drive Jackson into an antibank attitude.

Clay forgot all about his previous advice to Biddle and with the help of other Whigs urged Biddle to apply at once for a recharter. The pressure on Biddle was sufficient to cause him to reconsider his previous decision to wait until after the election. Clay's opinion as a disinterested outsider was sound; his opinion as an active politician was warped by his immediate ambitions. Biddle's first decision to postpone application for a recharter until after the election was right; his reversal of this decision was disastrous to the bank. Jackson vetoed the recharter bill, easily defeated Clay in the 1832 election, and in revenge for the bank's opposition caused its ruin.

I was reading the other day a speech made by President Roosevelt on March 2, 1930. He was a mature lawyer who had been Assistant Secretary of the Navy, a candidate for Vice President, and then Governor of New York. Speaking about the Constitution and the relation of the States to the Federal Government, he said:

> The United States Constitution has proven itself the most marvelously elastic compilation of rules of government ever written. * * * It was clear to the framers of our Constitution that the greatest possible liberty of self-government must be given to each State and any national administration attempting to make all laws for the whole Nation * * * would inevitably result at some future time in the dissolution of the Union itself.

After expressing his scorn for any idea that the whole country could be controlled by master minds in Washington, and stating that such a control would be an oligarchy masquerading as a democracy, he said:

> We are safe from the danger of any such departure from the principles on which this country was founded just so long as the individual home rule of the States is scrupulously preserved and fought for whenever they seem in danger.

Three years later, Mr. Roosevelt, as President, in his inaugural address, showed that his attitude toward the Constitution remained essentially unchanged. To quote his own words:

> Our Constitution is so simple and practical that it is possible always to meet extraordinary needs by changes in emphasis and arrangement without loss of essential form. That is why our constitutional system has proved itself the most superbly enduring political mechanism the modern world has produced.

Three years more have now elapsed and President Roosevelt has new problems, new counselors, and new ambitions. A year ago, after the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional the National Industrial Recovery Act, President Roosevelt asserted that if the implications of that decision were carried out, the Government would be stripped of all authority in behalf of human welfare.

President Roosevelt, according to the New York Times, at his press conference on May 31, 1935, seemed to believe that the issue was whether the Federal Government was to be given the control contemplated in the Recovery Act or whether such problems were to be turned back to the care of the States, reverting to the "horse and buggy days." Only about a month later, on July 5, 1935, we find the President writing to Representative S. B. HILL urging the passage of the Guffey Coal Act, and saying:

> I hope your committee will not permit doubts as to its constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation.

I have no means of knowing what will be President Roosevelt's future attitude toward the Constitution. He has seemed at times to be defying the Constitution and the Supreme Court. The long list of New Deal legislation overturned by the Supreme Court decisions must have convinced him of the futility of this course. He has two other alternatives. One is to seek a modification of the Constitution and the other to reframe his legislation within constitutional limits.

Before the President abandons the latter alternative I commend to him a reading of the correspondence between Henry Clay and Nicholas Biddle from 1830 to 1832, and with this a reading of the speeches of Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York, just 100 years later.

WHITHER ARE WE DRIFTING?

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Speaker, immediately following the preamble of the Constitution the very first section of the very first article reads:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

There are no qualifications to this, nor directly or indirectly is any authority given to anyone other than Congress to legislate or pass laws. Yet under the present political regime we find that men have been fined and imprisoned under laws that have since been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court; under laws that were never passed by Congress or never submitted to Congress for its ratification, nor were they ever formulated by any man or group of men elected to any office in this first representative government to be founded by man.

LAWS WRITTEN BY MEN NEVER ELECTED TO ANY OFFICE—AND ENFORCED

I may cite the hundreds of codes under the N. R. A. which were written by groups of businessmen in the same lines of business and pronounced the law of the land without even being submitted to Congress. Under these codes a law-abiding tailor, in a basement shop in New York, was fined $100 for pressing a pair of trousers for 35 cents when the assumed law of his competitors had written he must charge 40 cents; of the aged woman who made her living making paper flowers and who was told she could no longer do so in free America; of the battery man in our own State who was fined and imprisoned; and many similar cases.

They tell the story of two Southern darkies, immediately after the N. R. A. went into effect, who when walking down the street noticed the many Blue Eagles. Rastus exclaimed, "Sambo, what do all those Blue Eagles mean?" And Sambo answered, "Every man a job." Rastus then asked, "But what do N. R. A. mean?" To which Sambo replied, "Not right away." How true this prophecy has proved.

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE REVERSED

Under the Constitution it is the prerogative of Congress to draft and pass the laws, following which it is the privilege of the President to either approve or disapprove of the legislation. However, in the present administration this procedure has been reversed. Until very recently, under the New Deal practically all of the legislation was written by the "brain trusters", none of whom were elected to any office, and sent to Congress by the President for its approval or its veto. Under this order we come dangerously near a dictatorship when backed by an acquiescing Congress.

In the President's Baltimore speech delivered recently he hinted strongly upon the revival of the N. R. A. Humorously, we might suggest that if it should be revived they leave the Blue Eagle where it was buried by the Supreme Court and substitute instead the American owl. It is a wiser bird.

UNSUCCESSFUL EFFORT TO CORRAL ALL AMERICAN MONEY

I might also cite the banking bill of 1935, that was not written by Congress but by the new dealers, who, I repeat, were never elected to any office in this representative Government, and was then sent to Congress by the President, asking that it be enacted into law. One section of this bill gave the President the right to increase our national indebtedness to $45,000,000,000. It gave him the further right to issue Government bonds and to send these bonds to the banks throughout the Nation, and compel the banks to accept these bonds and send the money in purchase of them to the National Government, thus bringing practically all of the money of the United States under the control of one man.

That this legislation was protested and did not become a law is through no fault of the new dealers, whose every desire seems to be to regiment everything within the Nation under the direction of a one-man government.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY O. K.—NEW DEAL A DISGRACE

As Senator CARTER GLASS, Democratic Senator from Virginia and chairman of the Banking Committee, with 16 years of intensive senatorial service, and whose loyalty to his party cannot be questioned, has said:

> The New Deal, taken all in all, is not only a mistake, it is a disgrace to the Nation. The time is not far distant when we shall be ashamed of having wandered so far from the dictates of common sense and common honesty. I would rather have died than live to see the disgrace of this era. Perhaps it would be better to drop the expression "brain trust" and substitute a word more apt. As for the

New Deal, thousands of struggling industries are being driven out of business. * * * I have not had anything to do with it, nor have I permitted it to have anything to do with my business.

It is interesting to recall that but a few years ago $1 out of every $13 was needed for taxes. Our taxation is now increased until $1 out of every $4 is taken forcibly for that purpose. Forty-nine percent of our expenditures are being made on borrowed money and 44 percent by taxes that are hidden and unseen and but 7 percent is received in personal-income taxes. The deficit of the present administration is now nearing the eighteen thousand million dollar mark, which means that the Government, in the 4 years of the present administration, has spent eighteen billion more dollars than it has received from all sources.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY BILLION DEBT IN AMERICAN DOLLARS GIFT TO OUR CHILDREN

Granting that our public debt does not exceed $40,000,000,000, it must not be overlooked that the present generation is passing the greater part of this onto their children and to their children's children. With this stupendous debt it can reasonably be assumed that there will be at least $3 paid in interest for every dollar of the principal sum, which mournfully brings to us the realization that we are handing to the coming generations a debt that will take one hundred and twenty billion American dollars to pay.

The present Democratic Secretary of the United States Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, before a recent congressional committee said:

What I might say, if it became public property, might have a very adverse effect on the Government's credit. Now, that whole question of Government credit is such a delicate thing. One day there is confidence, and the people who buy bonds are with you. Then overnight something happens, and they won't buy. * * * The minute I cannot raise the money to finance the Government, that minute you will have complete chaos.

Under questioning, Mr. Morgenthau conceded that the Treasury now faces the problem of raising around $12,000,000,000 within the next year and a half. Not cheerful news to either us of the present generation or to those who will follow us.

I trust that I will not be misunderstood. When a physician is called to the bedside of an ailing patient he does not concern himself with what is right and normal with his patient but principally with what is wrong.

In searching out the ills of present-day government, our people throughout the anthracite-coal district recall that the Democratic platform of 1932 averred that the Democratic Party was opposed to the Government going into business; yet today we find not the Democratic Party but the New Deal promoting great Government projects to convert our rivers into energy, thus supplanting the use of coal—our principal industry. Already considerably more than $100,000,000 has been appropriated for the Muscle Shoals project to generate electricity by water power—and the project is only begun.

Similar projects in great numbers for various parts of the United States are under advisement. Five million dollars was spent upon the Passamaquoddy Dam in Maine, with the thought of converting the tides into energy, and then abandoned, which, if carried out, surely would not have helped the coal industry. Likewise, $5,200,000 was spent on the Florida ship canal, presumably to compete with railroads. This project was also abandoned, both of these appropriations being a very small part of the Government waste.

While the present administration was paying its farmers to curtail their acreage, resettlement projects were established and promoted. Scores of families were transported, at the expense of the Government, to till new lands in Alaska, in spite of the fact that we were curtailing our acreage at home.

TAXING BUSINESS TO SECURE MONEY FOR GOVERNMENT COMPETITION

The Government is today in some 250 fields of business endeavor and is taxing private business to secure the funds with which to set up Government competition against them.

In President Roosevelt's address at Baltimore on April 13 he said:

We shall press ahead with new experiments. The period of social pioneering is just beginning.

In my protest I am not alone, for in addition to the men of national affairs who I have quoted and who are loyal to the principles of Jefferson and the Democratic Party, I have only to refer to such men as the late Governor Ritchie, of Maryland; to ex-Senator Jim Reed, who stated that many of the new dealers were better known in Russia than in America prior to their present activities; to Douglas, former Director of the Budget, who could not carry out the wishes of the administration because of his conscientious objection to the great waste of funds, and who sent his resignation to the President; also to Governor Talmadge, loyal Democrat of Georgia; to Shouse, Al Smith, Senator Byrd, Hugh Johnson, John W. Davis, Senator Tydings, Raskob, and a long list of Democrats who, although opposed to the New Deal, cannot be assailed for their loyalty to the traditions of Jefferson and to their party.

ECONOMY—WHERE ART THOU?

At the very beginning of the present administration the Nation was asserted to be in such financial chaos that it was necessary to cut all Government employees' salaries 15 percent. It was also necessary to eliminate and slash the pensions that were being paid to veterans; other economies were also put into effect. But when our national indebtedness had become several billion dollars greater than at the time economy was so necessary, the administration discovered that economy was no longer required, and a 5-percent return of the pay cut to the Government employees was restored by Executive order of the President. When the national debt increased several more billion dollars further economy was still less necessary and the President recommended to Congress that an additional 5 percent be returned to the Government employees.

Congress, then realizing that they had been made the unpopular goat in reducing all Government employees' salaries 15 percent and in legislating vacations without pay at a time when our national debt seemed great, so the President could be a generous good fellow and give it back when the national debt was much greater—decided that inasmuch as the President had recommended and given back by Executive order 10 percent of the 15-percent cut, that Congress would be somewhat of a good fellow, too, so Congress gave back the remaining 5 percent, and immediately the President vetoed it.

From the time the administration first took office when there were 535,487 permanent employees in the Government service, we find that today under the economy program there are 815,769 employees in the service, exclusive of all those on emergency relief jobs who number an additional 3,500,000, and approximately 20,000,000 others, less fortunate, who are still in need of relief and who are compelled to accept it because, under the program of the New Deal, no advance in recovery has been made in the 3½ years of New Deal government.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, my attention has just been called to a comparison of imports of farm products for the year of 1935, as compared with the year of 1932, before the Roosevelt administration adopted the national policy of scarcity of farm products.

Just stop and consider for a minute how many days of farm labor it would have taken to have produced these extra imported farm products, and how much more the income of the American farmer would have been if he had sold these additional amounts to the public, instead of importing them from the foreign farmer.

DISCRIMINATE AGAINST AMERICAN ANTHRACITE

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Speaker, I regret so much that another Congress has come to its closing days without any action being taken for relief from foreign importations of coal that are not only sapping the life of our American mining industry, but also continues to keep foreign labor employed while our own American labor remains idle and impoverished. Not only does this directly affect the miners who would be employed if these importations were stopped, but it also affects the American railroads and the men who man the American trains, as well as every business that otherwise would receive the benefit of the money earned and spent here in America.

A PROVISION OF N. R. A.

One of the provisions of the now defunct N. R. A. was that the President of the United States could declare an embargo on foreign importations of any article that was coming into the United States in increasing amounts to the detriment of American production. Immediately upon the enactment of the N. R. A., I brought to the attention of President Roosevelt the continuously increasing amounts of foreign coal being imported into the United States to the detriment of our mining industry, and more especially to the detriment of Americans who depend upon the mining industry for their occupation and their living. It might be said here that the total of hundreds of thousands of tons of foreign coal reaching our shores does not accurately represent the tonnage mined, for only the large sizes are shipped into the United States, whereas in preparing the large sizes from the mines there is almost an equal amount mined in the smaller sizes, and the total amount that is actually mined is the basis on which to figure the workdays lost to our good laboring people, said workdays now going to the laborers of other countries while our American laboring men remain idle.

The President answered me by letter from Maine, where he was fishing, as follows:

Hon. C. MURRAY TURPIN,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TURPIN: Your letter of June 21 has been forwarded to me up here on the coast of Maine.

I hope that at your convenience you will have a talk with Secretary of Labor and with General Johnson in regard to the whole problem of anthracite coal.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

I immediately followed out President Roosevelt's suggestion, but Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, Administrator of the N. R. A., informed me that no embargo could be given consideration until an anthracite-coal code was agreed upon and put into effect. Then later he informed me that the administration did not believe an anthracite code was necessary. What a circle! I got off—just where I got on.

ASKS FOR FAVORABLE LEGISLATION

I also took this matter up with the Department of Labor as the President suggested, with no result. Failing in this I again presented a bill in Congress authorizing a $4 per short ton tariff on foreign importations of coal, which was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, but no hearings on this legislation have ever been granted by the present administration committee.

On June 7, 1933, I wrote the committee as follows:

On March 9 of this Seventy-third Congress I introduced a bill providing a $4 per short ton import duty (tariff) on coal and coke imported into the United States. This bill was referred to your Ways and Means Committee of the House.

The coal-mining industry has now reached a crisis; its very existence is threatened by low-waged foreign competition. Three hundred thousand American mining wage earners throughout the various mining districts in the United States, are and have been without work. Over 30,000 families in my own anthracite district are dependent upon organized charity.

Permit me to call your attention to the fact that 387,000 net tons of coal came to our shores in 1926 from foreign countries. In 1931 this tonnage increased to 638,000 net tons. These foreign importations again increased in 1932 to 857,147 net tons, and for the first 3 months of this year 368,965 net tons reached our shores.

FOREIGN LABOR KEPT OUT, BUT THAT WHICH HE PRODUCES COMES IN

Our Nation has passed restricted immigration laws with the one thought in mind of keeping the hordes of Europe from further bleeding our American labor market. I cannot reconcile myself to the inconsistency of excluding the low-paid foreign laborer from our shores, yet allowing that which he produces in other lands to come into this country to supplant the labor of our American citizens. The failure to protect this great industry means that the wages that would be paid to our American laborer and which would be spent here to buy that which is produced by other American industries will go largely to the coolie of Indochina and the conscript labor of Soviet Russia.

I believe that the great Democratic Party has the welfare of the Nation's toilers at heart, and it is in the interest of these toilers that I urgently request the setting of an early date for a hearing on this very important and vital subject.

Yours sincerely,

C. MURRAY TURPIN.

In reply the chairman of the committee wrote me:

DEAR MR. TURPIN: The Committee on Ways and Means early in the present session voted not to consider any bills except those recommended by the President. I shall, however, be glad to bring your request to the attention of the committee during the next session of Congress.

Very sincerely yours,

R. L. DOUGHTON, Chairman.

That was 3 years ago, and we have not yet been able to get any action.

Again, as you know, oil has become an active competitor to our American coal as fuel, and this is being imported from Venezuela and other countries and is making great inroads on our coal market at a price which even American producers of oil cannot profitably meet.

DISAPPOINTMENT SHARED BY DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS ALIKE

The disappointment over no action being taken is not mine alone. Democratic leaders from the various counties throughout the anthracite-coal district a year or more ago—having faith in the New Deal policies and promises—circulated a petition throughout the anthracite district and secured some 90,000 names, praying for an embargo on these foreign importations. The circulation of this petition was accompanied by a great deal of newspaper publicity. These Democratic leaders, working so sincerely in the interests of the laboring people of the coal industry, brought this petition to Washington and presented it to President Roosevelt; and there was much more newspaper publicity. Since then, however, nothing more has been heard about the much-wished-for embargo, either from the President or from those who circulated the petition. Even though they through discouragement or for other reasons have given up the fight, I shall continue to battle for this relief as long as I am privileged to be a Member of Congress.

It is not my thought to suggest that we are any better than any other part of our great Nation, but I do insist that we are just as good. The New England shoe manufacturer and their many other mills whose products we buy are protected by a tariff from the low-waged manufactures of other countries. And the same thing is true of nearly every other commodity purchased in the anthracite district.

That we are not entitled to the same protection, that we must continue to buy from manufacturers who are protected, and helplessly watch our markets destroyed by the low-wage products of foreign countries, is for someone higher up in national affairs than I am to answer.

RECOVERY WITH ROOSEVELT

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, the district which I represent is comprised of eight counties in northeastern Indiana, the population approximating 300,000.

The activities of the district are pretty evenly divided between industry and agriculture. Some of the best farm land in the State is located in this section. The manufacturing is widely diversified. General Electric Co. has approximately 7,000 employees in one of their largest plants in America. International Harvester Co. manufactures trucks in the largest exclusive motor-truck plant in the world. Gasoline pumps of the most modern design and effectiveness are made by the Wayne Co., S. F. Bowser Co., and the Magnavox Corporation. The Horton Manufacturing Co. is one of the largest producers of electric washing machines. I could not take your time to tell you about the hundreds of smaller manufacturing plants making practically everything that is consumed on the farm and in the home.

Every county seat town in my district has a number of manufacturing plants. Among them are the McCray Refrigerator Co., Flint & Walling Wind Mill Co., and the Auburn Automobile Co., the latter being located in my home town. One of the enterprises that has brought a large revenue to the district is the Central Sugar Co. located at Decatur.

This means that there are many thousands of laboring men, many of the highest skilled type, who are engaged in these various plants. We have had our labor problems and activities, but I am happy to tell you that labor disturbances within this area are very rare. These people are the industrious working crowd who make the wheels of industry hum and bring prosperity to the district.

Our farmers are active and in the main live on farms consisting of from 40 to 320 acres of land. It would be rather difficult to pick any section of the country more ideally situated than here, as six great trunk lines of the railways cross this district from east to west, bringing the commerce not only of the United States of America but the commerce of the world to our doors.

When the Roosevelt administration took over the affairs of the Government in 1933 this fine section of the country so ideally suited for American living was pretty well prostrate. Our banks were passing through a difficult experience. The final adjustment of these banks has shown that they were sound but with frozen assets; and, through the management of the banking departments of the State and in Washington, most of them have been taken care of with only small losses to the depositors.

One of our great insurance companies, the Lincoln Life Insurance Co., is located in Fort Wayne, and they, too, were forced in the depression that had come upon them to use their highest skill in taking care of their vast holdings and have been able, under this administration and leadership, to put their house in good order.

After the bank holiday, at which a courageous and wise policy was adopted, people began to regain confidence in their banking structure, and I have a deep-seated feeling that the one outstanding act that made this possible was the enactment into law of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. This insurance of bank deposits had been discussed for a long time, and, having been closely identified with the committee which handled this legislation, I cannot now understand why this helpful legislation was so long deferred or why any banking institution or group of bankers should have opposed it so vigorously.

Today, I think, the principle is generally accepted almost unanimously that this had to do with the restoration of confidence, and people now go about and feel that we have our financial house in order.

Laboring men were out of employment, either laid off or furloughed, and there was very little but gloom for them. Today the picture is vastly changed. They leave home in the morning with a smile and quick step and return at the end of the day's work to find their families fed, clothed, and happy.

Labor has achieved more in this administration than under any one administration in all the history of our governmental affairs. I have the utmost confidence in the intelligence and fidelity of the American workingman; and so long as we have the type men whom I have the honor to represent engaged in industry I think all that is needed is a better understanding between the employer and employee and a lot of unrest that has gone over the dam in the past will be prevented.

There were many thousands of homes that were in distress because of mortgages which could not be paid and interest and taxes that likewise could not be met. Under this wise leadership the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was set up, and in this district more than $15,000,000 has been loaned on easy terms covering a long period of years. I have had men tell me with devout gratitude what this meant to them and their families. I firmly feel, with the information in hand, that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be self-liquidating and in the end will not cost the Government of the United States a single dollar but will have accomplished its worthy mission.

Many thousands of farmers have likewise been relieved by direct loans from the Federal land banks; and while all who have sought this assistance have not had their wishes granted, yet the percentage declined is small in comparison to the number granted.

The Commodity Credit Corporation has been given impetus in this administration, and we have been able to make loans to farmers for the purpose of buying seed, feed, and other necessities, and at a rate of interest that is within keeping with American principles. I think we have put an end for a long time to come to the high, unfair interest rates that have been charged in too many cases in the past. We have likewise given the small borrower who is identified with credit unions an opportunity to live. Credit unions which have been set up have been growing very rapidly, and there are now more than 1,000 of these organizations where a man, instead of having to go out and borrow money at any rate of interest to tide him over an emergency, can now borrow from his own organization small amounts of money. I am told that the average loan is $50.

We have known for a long time that there was not adequate protection for the investing public. Millions of dollars have been filched from the innocent investor by the purchase of stock in corporations which really had no right to ever sell their securities. In this administration we have set up the Securities Exchange Commission, by which all such transactions are investigated; and as this Commission functions more perfectly in the days to come there will be little reason for anyone to lose money in securities if they will take time for investigation. What seemed to some large operators in the beginning to be a serious break to securities has proved to be a valuable step in the direction of stabilizing their business, and I have not heard a reputable financier suggest that this act be repealed and that they wanted to go back to the old order.

The banking laws have been pretty well revamped, and the Banking Acts of 1933 and 1935 will stand out as milestones for better control of these institutions for long years to come.

One of the outstanding accomplishments of this Congress has been the passing of laws for the wiping out of crime. Unfortunately, there will continue to be some lawbreaking, but by the prompt action of the Department of Justice, with this additional authority, more progress has been made in the last 2 years than in the past decade. It will be impossible for gangs of gangsters to flourish as in the past. I do not want to take the position that this relief shall be entirely credited to the party in power. Everyone has recognized the need of such legislation, but through powerful opposition influences we have not had it until now. This is just one of the examples of the courage of the President is making his recommendations and following through to see that legislation is passed which will make them effective.

It has been my happy lot to go along in complete accord with the Neutrality Act of 1935. Had we not taken this step in our foreign policies, we could easily have been a nucleus around which a great war could have been started again. America's place in the world at this time is unique, in that the world looks to us for guidance and suggestions. It is our duty to be prepared against invasion of any power in the world. It is our place in humanitarian activities to do all we can to prevent any great conflict as the World War was, and I want to be for sane neutrality in the stand of the United States Government, but at the same time do not want to be a weakling in the thought that we would rear a Nation of young men and women who would not at all times be ready and willing to go to the defense of the country or to join against a great foe. In other words, we should be prepared on land and sea for eventualities, and strong defense will come nearer preserving peace than any other method.

We have raised the cloud of gloom from all the activities of the people of this country. I know you do not care much for figures, but they do speak louder than any other language, and I just want you to make this observation. Under the so-called old deal unemployment advanced 313 percent from April 1, 1930, to April 1, 1933. Under the New Deal, from April 1, 1933, to December 1, 1935, the decline in unemployment was 30 percent. Agriculture has likewise had its share of improvement. On March 1, 1933, cotton was selling at 5.90 cents per pound, wheat at 48 cents per bushel, and corn at 24.12 cents per bushel. On the same date in 1936 cotton was selling at 11.35 per pound, wheat at 101.5 per bushel, and corn at 60.87 cents per bushel. The advance in the position of labor and agriculture has greatly stimulated all industry. Industrial production between January 1, 1933, and January 1, 1936, advanced 51 percent. Steel production in the same comparative time advanced 257 percent. Automobile registration, which is now looked upon as a fair index of the conditions of the country, advanced 326 percent from January 1, 1933, to January 1, 1936.

Thus you see that a firm hand with wise legislation has taken the country from the suicide era and started on the high road to continued prosperity. To be sure, there are still critics, but I am happy to be living and helping at a time when partisan politics is less thought of all the time, and when people realize, as today, that all our interests are in common. Forward with our splendid leader, President Roosevelt.

A $20,000,000 CONGRESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the Seventy-fourth Congress—the second New Deal Congress—was the perfect flower of the Roosevelt double-barreled policy of borrowing and squandering.

The Seventy-fourth was America's first $20,000,000,000 Congress.

It appropriated and authorized enough money to build 2,000,000 homes costing $10,000 each.

This one Congress alone, in its two sessions, appropriated and authorized more expenditures than did all the Congresses of the United States from the First, under George Washington, to the Sixtieth, under Theodore Roosevelt.

In 2 years the Seventy-fourth Congress squardered more of the wealth of America than 60 previous Congresses spent in 120 years of our national history.

Here is the perfect fulfillment of New Dealism—spending other people's money riotously, extravagantly, improvidently, recklessly.

The New Deal knows no cure for any national problem but an appropriation—one million, a hundred million, or a billion dollars.

We are afflicted with a raging fever of billionitis.

Loose spending, prodigious borrowing, and crushing taxation are the basic elements of New Deal "recovery"—$20,000,000,000 in one Congress, and far less than half of it actually collected in Government revenues during these 2 years of profligate squandering—the remainder passed on as a heritage of burdensome debt to be liquidated in the toil and sacrifice of every citizen of the land for generations to come.

I have before me the official tabulation of the Senate Committee on Appropriations of the money bills actually passed by the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The total for the first session, which began in January 1935, was $9,579,756,510.31.

And the second session, which began in January 1936, after another full year of Roosevelt recovery, made appropriations aggregating $9,716,430,863.11.

Here is a total of appropriations never before dealt with in American history for a single Congress—$19,300,000,000; enough to purchase outright well more than half of all the farms and farm buildings and farm equipment in the country today.

The total value of our farming plant, including houses, barns, machinery, livestock, and acreage, is only about $32,000,000,000.

But that is not all. The New Deal Congress just adjourned approved expenditures of $19,300,000,000 and authorized additional projects which will require $700,000,000 more for completion and maintenance over the next 5 years.

The end of the session finds us with a national debt of $34,500,000,000, an increase of $12,500,000,000 since March 1933. Such is the record of the President who declared solemnly in his speech at Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 19, 1932:

> I regard the reduction of Federal spending one of the most important issues in this campaign.

Such is the record of the President who promised the American people in his campaign speech at Sioux City, Iowa, on September 29, 1932:

> I shall use this position of high responsibility to discuss up and down the country, in all seasons, at all times, the duty of reducing taxes. * * * This I pledge you, and nothing I have said in this campaign transcends in importance this covenant with the taxpayers of this country.

The enormity of the New Deal's spending spree is well epitomized by a single fact which comes to mind from my own experience. The citizens of the Thirty-first New York District elected me to Congress first in 1915. That was during the Government's fiscal year 1916. The total expenditures of the United States Government during that fiscal year were $734,056,000. Imagine, less than $1,000,000,000 for the entire Federal Establishment. Today the total expenditures for 1916 would not pay the interest on the national debt for a single year. Yet within the term of my own service I find another Democratic administration squandering $20,000,000,000 in one Congress.

To accomplish its reckless spending the New Deal has created by law or Executive order no less than 114 additional Federal bureaus, boards, commissions, authorities, corporations, and councils—agencies to supervise and check and harass and molest the citizen in the most intimate concerns of his daily life. Agencies to tell him what to plant and when to reap; agencies to tell the pants presser how much he may charge; the laborer how many hours to work; the packer how many pigs and cattle to slaughter.

More than 250,000 persons have been added to the full-time pay roll of the Federal establishment.

Constitutional government by statute law has been largely replaced with government by Executive order.

A growing bureaucracy of dictatorship rules us by mimeograph.

No other period in all American history has witnessed such a terrific peacetime expansion and entrenchment of bureaucratic control.

Nor has any other period in our history recorded such demoralizing raids upon the merit system of civil service. Less than 1 in 100 of the new bureaucrats added to the Federal pay roll have been selected by the competitive system of civil-service examinations. Instead the New Deal has manned its new agencies with the political appointees of the ancient spoils system.

And once established, these new segments of government move with but a single purpose—to entrench themselves ever more firmly, and to reach out constantly for more and more power.

In the Seventy-fourth Congress this unceasing grasping for power came to a ridiculous fruition in the potato-control law, which attempted to enforce the distribution of every authorized potato under a special tax stamp. The stamps were actually printed pursuant to the law, but the measure then was repealed before a whirlwind of determined public indignation. The spirit of the Boston Tea Party, the spirit of free men the world around through all the ages, had been dormant for a long time, but it was not dead in America. It swept this ridiculous expression of New Deal bureaucracy from the statute books at the express command of the President.

America will not soon forget—and it will never forgive—this orgy of dictatorial extravagance, of bureaucratic domination and unconstitutional procedure under the New Deal.

America is not ready for a dictator, more especially a reckless, spendthrift dictator.

Even President Roosevelt understood this clearly as recently as 1930. While yet serving as Governor of New York State, he delivered a radio address on March 2, 1930, which was an eloquent plea for effective local government under the Constitution. On that occasion Franklin D. Roosevelt said:

> It was clear to the framers of our Constitution that the greatest possible liberty of self-government must be given to each State, and that any national administration attempting to make all laws for the whole Nation, such as was wholly practical to Great Britain, would inevitably result at some future time in a dissolution of the Union itself.

Yet, in the face of this utterance, the Roosevelt administration since 1933 has enacted and tried to enforce more unconstitutional legislation than any other administration in all our history. Ten major measures of the New Deal already have been rejected by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional, as an encroachment upon the rights and powers of the States or the liberties of the people. And five other visionary programs, rejected in the lower courts, still are to be passed upon by the Supreme Court.

Will American voters be bribed again with borrowed money—which they must themselves repay with interest—to vote for a continuance of this folly?

Will America vote to resign herself to the capricious whims of a dictator whose promises and pledges of 4 years ago and 6 years ago now sound like utterances from another planet?

Will America vote for another $20,000,000,000 Congress?

GENERAL PULASKI'S MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Speaker, I am keenly disappointed with the failure of the second effort to pay proper homage to the memory of one who gave not only his fortune, his service, and his devotion, but also gave his life to our country during its formative days.

America is not ungrateful for the services of those of other lands who aided so splendidly in making our people a free people, and without whose aid we might not have been successful in our battle for independence. I am referring particularly to the effort of Congress to recognize the services of Gen. Casimir Pulaski. I desire to bring to the attention of my colleagues my remarks on General Pulaski as contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 23, 1935.

Both the House of Representatives and the Senate approved and passed legislation designating October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, this particular day being the anniversary of the death of General Pulaski in 1779 from wounds received 2 days earlier at the siege of Savannah, Ga. More than half the States in the Union, including Pennsylvania, have passed legislation designating this date as a State memorial day to this great man.

RESOLUTION HONORING GENERAL PULASKI PASSES CONGRESS

The resolution introduced in Congress authorizing General Pulaski's Memorial Day, and which passed Congress, was killed by the veto of President Roosevelt. Had it been an act proclaiming a holiday I can see some reason why, because of the great number of holidays we already have, the killing of the legislation by veto might have been justifiable, but the resolution as passed by Congress simply authorized the President to call upon all officials to display the American flag, for which General Pulaski fought and died, on all Government buildings, and not to compel but to invite our people to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies.

> Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all governmental buildings on October 11 of each year, and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day in schools, in churches, or other suitable places with appropriate ceremonies commemorating the death of Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

AMERICA IS GRATEFUL

Why these ceremonies should not be encouraged by national laws is lamented by American patriots. No loyal American is ungrateful to those of other lands who sacrificed and died that we might enjoy the privileges we have today.

Congress has designated October 11, 1929, October 11, 1931, October 11, 1932, October 11, 1935, and October 11, 1936, to be General Pulaski's Memorial Day, but each of these resolutions referred to the one particular year only. I can see no reason why legislation making this permanent should have been killed by President Roosevelt's veto.

COLUMBUS GIVEN THE HONOR DENIED GENERAL PULASKI

I join with all Americans in honoring the memory of Christopher Columbus. But it is difficult to understand why the legislation inviting our people to observe the 11th of October in schools or other suitable places and providing that our flag should be displayed on all governmental buildings in honor of General Pulaski should be killed when on April 30, 1934, President Roosevelt approved a resolution passed by Congress, with the same provisions and recognizing the services of Columbus, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating October 12 of each year as Columbus Day and calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on said date and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day in schools and churches, or other suitable places, with appropriate ceremonies expressive of the public sentiment befitting the anniversary of the discovery of America.

Without thought of lowering the estimation of the wonderful achievements of Columbus, it does seem strange that General Pulaski, who used his fortune to equip the first American Cavalry and who fought and died for our country, should not be accorded equal honor and his memory receive tribute comparable to the tribute paid to Columbus. Columbus' gift to the world was the discovery of a new continent. Pulaski's gift to America was his fortune and his life in the cause of liberty and a new nation dedicated to freemen.

VETERAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago the Seventh District branch of the American Legion held its convention in our congressional district at Red Oak, Iowa, and adopted a resolution specifically condemning me for my antiveteran activities. I am wondering if it is going to be the policy of the American Legion in the future to permit any disappointed candidate for postmaster, assisted by partisan or anti-New Deal motives, to use that noble organization for the purpose of airing a failure to realize a personal ambition. It has been my understanding that the Legion was founded for entirely different purposes, and that there was no intention originally for it to be used in such a manner.

I desire to call your attention to the fact that I was the first Representative from our congressional district to ever vote for the payment of the adjusted-service compensation certificates, and, furthermore, did so upon every occasion, including motions to override the President's veto. You are aware, of course, of the final action of this Democratic Congress in extending that favor to the World War veterans, which will send approximately $41,018,480.37 into the State of Iowa. It will undoubtedly interest the members of that organization to know that I have also voted for such outstanding veterans' legislation as the bills sponsored by JOHN RANKIN, of Mississippi, for the payment of pensions to widows and orphans of disabled veterans who died from other causes; the Philippine travel-pay bill, which is primarily, of course, of interest to the Spanish-American War veterans; as well as other important legislation in that field. I have letters in my files from the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN and the Honorable JOHN E. RANKIN, unquestionably two of the best friends the veterans ever have had in Congress, commending me most highly for my active and consistent interest and support of veterans' legislation.

The matter of distributing patronage entered into the resolution presented to the seventh district convention, which prompted me to examine into the records with reference to that matter. I might say at the beginning, of course, that the veterans' preference law, as it applies to the appointment of postmasters, simply provides that men who have seen service shall have 5 percent added to their grade, or 10 percent in the event they have been injured, which constitutes the extent of their preference. After this action on the part of the Civil Service Commission, such candidates have received their advantage and are thereafter considered upon their merits with the other eligibles for appointment under the terms provided by law and Executive order of the President. There is no provision that they must be appointed, as is often intimated. The appointments which have been made in our district have been made upon the basis of the recommendation of the district, county, and local leaders, a considerable number of whom are veterans. I note with interest that my record compares favorably with that of my predecessor in the appointing of veterans or veterans' wives or widows. Furthermore, I would suggest that the selection of deputies or assistant postmasters who are veterans or veterans' wives or widows be taken into consideration. In the face of the above facts as outlined to you, a partisan resolution urged upon the convention by a Legion post supporting the whims of a disgruntled candidate and a few anti-New Dealers which condemned me for my antiveteran activities was, to say the least, astonishing, and I cannot believe it represented a majority of the fair-minded men who compose the organization, as has been evidenced since the incident occurred. Please understand that this action goes deeper than my own personal welfare, which after all is only an incident to the Nation's history. It strikes at the very roots of the American Legion and the purpose for which it was formed. Such expressions of opinion for selfish, personal motives can, of course, as you will readily see, wreck the organization and the noble work it is in a position to do in the way of community service, boys' work, care of World War orphans, and Nationwide Americanization. The truth is common decency demands a retraction and a straightforward effort to counteract any damage that may have been done, not because of the injustice to a friend of the veterans, who has been fair and who has given veterans and nonveterans a square deal, but for the sake of the future welfare and position of the American Legion in the American scene.

WHAT THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION HAS DONE FOR THE FARMER IN NEW YORK STATE

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this is a time when we should take stock of what the accomplishments of the Roosevelt administration have done for the farmer in New York State.

They have brought about a reduction in the duty on hay from $5 per ton to $1.75, and as a result Canadian importations have very markedly increased, and as a direct result the price of hay has dropped from an average of $11.80 per ton in 1930, $10.50 in 1934, and $15.70 in 1935 to an average price of about $7.50 per ton in 1936. At the farm the average price is about $5 to $5.50. He has the operations of the Roosevelt administration to thank directly for this reduction in price. They did it deliberately.

Besides the reduction in the duty on hay, there has been anywhere from a 33⅓ to a 50-percent reduction in the duty on cattle, dairy products, poultry, horses, oats, apples, berries, cherries, peas, and turnips; and on top of that the regulations of the Treasury Department have been so manipulated that all winter wheat is admitted as wheat unfit for human consumption, an improper ruling of the Treasury Department. This ruling lets the wheat produced in Canada—that is, the winter wheat—in practically without duty. This has seriously affected the market for winter wheat and made it almost impossible for the New York State farmer to sell his crop.

Talk of farm relief for the farmer without restoring the duty upon agricultural products is absolutely ridiculous. We must have a restoration of the duty upon agricultural products to the old schedule of the 1930 Tariff Act if we are going to do anything at all to help the farmers and give them a chance to operate. The interests of the New York State farmer have been traded off for nothing by the Roosevelt administration through the Reciprocal Tariff Act, the regulations of the Treasury Department, and the operations of the Tariff Commission.

The Republican platform pledges the restoration of the duty upon agricultural products so that the American farmer may have the American market. Is it not about time for the farmer to realize what Roosevelt has done to him and that it is his first interest to get rid of that administration and to elect the Republican ticket?

DIRIGIBLES

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, a scientific advisory committee, ostensibly appointed by Secretary Swanson but in reality selected by the Science Advisory Board, to "review and analyze the past and present situation as to the design and construction of airships, and to make recommendations as to their future design and construction", has made its preliminary report urging more airships for the Navy in the face of the world's most disastrous experience in that field of any of man's many modern inventions. The situation is worthy of our own personal consideration, despite the fact that the committee states in its first report that we may, perhaps, however, define a safe airship as one the performance of which, in the mass of estimation in this mode of transport and with some competence of judgment, is such as to justify its present retention in the general scheme of transport and its development at least to the point of demonstrating whether or not it is or will be capable of attaining and retaining an assured and useful place among other competitive means.

Analyzed, that statement simply means that, in the estimation of the committee, those who are interested in this mode of transportation and who desire to promote it, which means the Goodyear-Zeppelin Corporation of Akron and the Mellon Aluminum Trust, the latter being practically the sole manufacturer of duralumin, which goes into the construction of such ships, should have the privilege of deciding favorably upon a policy of continuing the construction of dirigibles in the face of world-wide disastrous experiences and terrific loss of life, with the hope that sometime in the future they can decide definitely that such death crates are useful. A little further on in the report the committee intimates again the necessity of listening to those who are in the "mass estimate", whatever that means, competent to judge. Now, that may or may not be meant to exclude those of us who are plain Members of Congress struggling to protect human life and the taxpayers.

Let us go back to the early days of this Commission in 1935 and analyze the set-up briefly. I know that out of the eight members, three are outstanding representatives of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which institution has long been a dominant advocate of lighter-train-air construction. The Commission was recently appointed at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, not to discuss or question the use and value of airships, not to give an opinion on whehter airships are practical in war or commerce, but merely to review airship history and the situation as it now stands and, assuming they find some value in them, to make recommendations as to their future design. It seems that Admiral Standley, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, was chatting one day with Senator Hiram Bingham. Bingham remarked that it was too bad some investigation into airship construction from the early days up to the present could not be made with an idea of ascertaining just what value and use airships will have in the future. Admiral Standley passed the suggestion along to the Government authorities, who promptly adopted the idea, and the committee was formed soon afterward.

It is entirely fitting and proper that we analyze first the real history of lighter-than-air construction. Let us look for a moment at the impressive summary of England's post-war experiences with dirigibles, compiled by Lt. Comdr. J. M. Kenworth for the Saturday Review: The NS–11 struck by lightning in 1919 and destroyed, with her whole crew. The R–24 and R–29 were scrapped after a few flights. The R–26 was scrapped 10 months after launching. The R–31 was scrapped after two flights. The R–32 was scrapped on the strength of experience gained with the R–31. The R–34 was wrecked in 1931. The R–35 construction was canceled after $375,000 had been spent. The R–36 was scrapped after 97 hours in the air. The R–37 was scrapped after less than a hundred hours in the air. The R–38 was destroyed, with the loss of 44 lives, including American officers and enlisted men. Both the R–39 and the R–80 were scrapped after making a single flight.

In a debate on airships in the House of Commons in March 1928, Frank Rose, a critic of such craft, declared that if history counted for anything, the two proposed airships, the R–100 and the R–101, were doomed. Up to date he reckoned a total expenditure of almost $12,000,000 for construction alone, and Great Britain had received only 1,040 hours of flying in return—at a cost of approximately $7,500 per flying hour. The two dirigibles, the building of which Mr. Rose was opposing, were afterward constructed at an additional cost of $10,000,000. The R–101 met with the well-known disaster and the other has been dismantled. This experience led England to abandon the policy of lighter-than-air construction, along with all the nations of the world, with the exception of Germany and the United States. In the former they have Dr. Hugo von Eckner, who is, we admit, a great navigator and wise enough to advertise that "Tomorrow the Graf Zeppelin will sail, weather permitting", as well as to adjust his course to the extent of traveling hundreds of miles around a storm area. Before passing on to other phases of the subject let us pause for just a moment and survey a few of the major American disasters, which include the Shenandoah, the Italian-built, American-purchased Roma, the French Dixmude, the Akron, the Macon, and innumerable blimps, one of which went down searching for the remains of the Akron. In each instance the public was told that the crash and the spilling of human blood was advancing the cause of scientific experimentation and that the next would be better. The Macon was advertised to the four winds as a supership, but she, too, went down in a squall off the Pacific coast, as the Akron went down in a similar one off the Atlantic coast.

The commission to which I referred earlier and which has prompted these remarks has intimated, as others have in the past, that the principle of dirigible construction is sound with certain mechanical adjustments which can be made, and likewise intimates that our experience with the last two ships we have lost, at an expense of some $5,000,000 in cash expenditure, not to mention the pensions that must be paid to the widows and orphans of the men who were lost on the Akron and who were left rotting in their watery grave off Barnegat Light in order that bringing the ruins and their broken bodies to the surface would not leave such a distasteful thought in the minds of the sympathetic and tax-paying public, seems to glibly overlook the known fact that two faulty rings were placed in the framework of the Akron at the Goodyear-Zeppelin plant, rings that had broken from two to three times before they were finally placed. Workmen were eventually successful in getting them into place. Men were discharged from the concern upon various pretexts if they objected or attempted to reveal the facts. The builders of that ill-fated ship even went to Germany for foreign materials, and installed Maybach motors, built to the metric scale, not used in American machine shops, and when one of the engines blew a cylinder it was necessary to crate it up and ship it back to its point of origin for repairs. But the latter item is beside the point. It only serves to illustrate the extent to which grasping American builders will go for the sake of profits. The commission should not overlook the fact that Commander Wiley himself testified the Macon collapse followed an order to effect the installation of certain repairs on the ship, the necessity of which had been occasioned by certain errors in construction.

The only remnant we have left of an expenditure that has mounted to millions is the old Los Angeles, which prior to the Macon crash had been almost stripped of helium gas to be used in the bags of the Macon, and had been practically dismantled. As a final effort to keep up favorable publicity, those interested in the manufacture and sale of the ships to the Navy decided that this old crate would have to serve the purpose, and the thought in mind was that she should be tied to a mooring mast with the intention of surveying the effect of weather conditions upon the hull and the mechanism, but we heard no more about that experiment after a gust of wind came along and almost whipped the old girl to pieces. Some say she can fly, but if that is true let us see her do it.

It has been interesting to note the publicity campaign that has been launched in behalf of dirigible construction of late. When the people over on Tangier Island, near the coast of Maryland, were in need of food the Hearst tom-toms informed us that the local "dirigible" was going to save their lives, but we did not hear much more about any of its trips over there for that purpose; possibly because they almost cracked up the first time they went over with a load, or perhaps, because the weather became rather threatening and as a consequence the food was delivered by planes and Coast Guard ice cutters. Unfortunately, those people over there could not put off their hunger until good weather any more than the enemy would be courteous enough to refrain from attacking us on anything but nice days, when the dirigible can be what some people term "a military asset." Of course, to carry this particular discussion a little bit further, the bag that has been floating around over this city for the past year or more for purposes of publicity and in an effort to impress Congress is not a dirigible but a blimp. The former has a rigid interior construction and is entirely different from that standpoint. Of course, the advocates of such a building program, which evidently includes the Hearst newspapers, want to impress the public with the name "dirigible."

In spite of the fact that after approximately two decades of experimenting we only have three such ships in the air, two of them belonging to Germany and the other belonging to the United States Government and tied up to a post in Lakehurst unable to take to the air.

The point I am making in this particular illustration is the fact that the Goodyear blimp, which was to save the lives of the people on that little island in the Chesapeake Bay, was unable to do so because the weather suddenly became threatening—which bears out my contention that both blimps and dirigibles are no asset to us from the standpoint of military or naval protection, and therefore we should not be squandering the taxpayers' money in any building program of that character. Furthermore, we would no more than get some of these ships into the air than the tom-toms would begin to beat with the idea of having Congress subsidize their operation with mail pay or some other type of racketeering. If dirigible construction has such a tremendous future and is of such great commercial value as the worshipers of the Graf Zeppelin would have us believe, then let us permit private capital to have the advantage of profiting in that particular field. The same financial interests that want to drag us into this proposition are complaining about the Federal Government's getting into business, so let us be good boys this time and keep out of business. We can save some human lives and a good many millions of dollars for the taxpayers by doing so in this case.

The question that will arise in connection with this discussion is, What about the new German Zeppelin, christened the Hindenburg, the world's largest dirigible, that has finally, after 2 or 3 years of ballyhoo, got into the air? It was not surprising to see that even the masterful builder of such vehicles is beginning to have his own troubles. Just recently, on March 26, I noted an International News Service dispatch to the effect that the ship had scarcely started on her first journey other than trial flights before she effected a forced landing, resulting in a damaged tail vent. The article does not state—and perhaps for a reason—who was in command at the time of the incident. Previously news releases had stated, however, that the great Count Hugo von Eckener was to direct the first flight; and it will be interesting to find, if we ever do, whether or not he was aboard, because the people who would have us build more dirigibles always point to him as being the perfect example of the unfailing navigator of dirigibles.

I would not have anyone for a single moment think that I am depreciating Count von Eckener as a scientist, for he should be classed with the world's greatest. The only reason I cite this particular incident is by way of indicating the fact that even a genius in the field is not infallible. What is of even greater importance is the fact that no nation—and, in fact, not even the world itself—produces Count Hugo von Eckeners or Thomas A. Edisons on a wholesale basis; and what a master scientist can do with an unsound piece of mechanism often astonishes the eye. If placed in the hands of anyone other than himself it is apt to wreak its vengeance upon those who are experimenting with it.

I do not for a moment want to be placed in the position with reference to dirigibles of the lovely little old lady who was certain they did not make airplanes and when she saw one was positive it could not fly, and later, when it took to the air, turned her back upon it with the unfailing conviction that it would never come down; but I do say that if American capital wants to experiment with lighter-than-air flying construction, they should do so at their own expense rather than the American taxpayers. It is barely possible, although in my judgment highly improbable, that such air transportation can be developed upon a scale that will be commercially profitable. If so, then let us permit those who are seeking the advantage thereof to have the privilege of financing their own dreams.

The Scientific Advisory Committee on Aeronautics, to which I referred in the earlier part of my remarks, should take all of the above facts into consideration, as should anyone else before urging the United States Government into another dirigible-building program. Everyone, including myself, knows that I am not an authority in this particular field, but the material given to the Congress constitutes facts I have obtained from the most reliable sources available. Some few Members may recall, perhaps, that I have discussed this subject upon previous occasions, and during the Seventy-third Congress spoke upon some of the fallacies involved in the construction of lighter-than-air craft, obtaining my material from construction engineers and others in that field. The comments I made at that time and that I repeat in part today with reference to the fact that such air transportation is not safe in times of bad weather, and therefore cannot be considered for purposes of military defense, have been borne out by the vast quantity of unfortunate experience of this country and all others with dirigibles. In answer to those people who insist that we should attempt further experimentation in the field I reply that private industry should carry the load in view of all of the money that has been spent for such purposes prior to this date.

In my humble judgment, after careful observation of aeronautical history and material gathered from every conceivable source, future progress in the air lies through the channel of heavier-than-air craft, or the airplane. This is not the time nor the place to discuss that phase of the subject, but I would remind the advocates of dirigibles that flying boats of 40 tons displacement or greater are now upon us and an international authority states that 160-ton flying boats are "perfectly practical." Furthermore, it must be remembered that, according to the most reliable estimates I can obtain, it would be possible to establish daily service between the United States and Europe with 40-ton clippers, costing in the vicinity of $4,500,000 and $5,000,000 in all, which would scarcely more than pay for the building of two dirigibles, which do not begin to compare with the flying boat for ocean flying because of the latter's greater speed and efficiency and its greater independence of operation in bad weather. Therefore let us remember before starting out on another costly program of building in any particular field to move cautiously, consider our experience and that of our neighbors, and observe the development of airplane transportation during the past few years.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the partisan spirit runs too high in Congress and legislative bodies for the impartial consideration and proper observance of the mandates and injunctions of the Constitution. The Constitution is made a football in Congress in the mad scramble for partisan advantage. Measures demanded by one party are always urged as constitutional and measures opposed by a party are always condemned as unconstitutional.

There must be some other body of men, more deliberate and farther removed from the conflict for partisan advantage and the partisan emergencies of the hour, to review legislative enactments and to weigh them in the balance against what the Constitution prohibits or enjoins.

The Federal Supreme Court, the judiciary department of the Government, with all its faults and imperfections, must be left to function until some better way is found for calm and deliberate review of legal forms and legislative enactments molded and shaped under the heat of bitter partisan strife.

True, the veto power of the Supreme Court, the power to annul popular will, and to override the mandates of the people by judges entrenched by life tenure, to give courage, to declare justice, may be prostituted to cover evils and be used to shield the usurpation of powers. But an appeal from Supreme Court abuse by submission of constitutional amendments to the people as the court of last resort, as with the income-tax amendments, serves to modify the evils of such abuse and to relieve from the prejudices of jurists.

The Constitution is like other laws which admit of and require different interpretations and construction under varying state of facts. And the Constitution is subject and susceptible of conferring full and adequate powers to meet emergencies under new and changed conditions.

In the course of economic industrial evolution purely intrastate or local conditions may so vary and change to present a general or interstate condition of facts involving a Federal problem under the Constitution and under which Federal powers could be properly conferred and exercised without enlarging constitutional authority.

We are suffering more today from failure to observe and abide the Constitution than from a failure of sufficient powers. Many powers unequivocally conferred, standing out like mountain peaks, sun clear, against the skyline, and unobserved, are disregarded and ignored. Such powers clearly and unequivocally conferred upon Congress, the legislative branch of the Government, are being naively abdicated and renounced and either usurped by private selfish interests or by other departments of the Government, the exercise of which the Constitution forbids in clear, express, and unequivocal terms.

We have long suffered and are still suffering today more for the want of the exercise of constitutional powers already conferred by the provisions of the Constitution than we are suffering for the want of any amendment conferring new and additional powers.

While the Constitution expressly provides, in recognition of the wisdom and necessity, for amendments to be made from time to time to meet new and changed conditions and to keep pace with progressive government, the instrument is too sacred to the cause of the liberty of freedom to be lightly meddled or trifled with. Before any man or class of men should be heard to claim or make demand for an amendment to the Constitution they should be required to show that the powers of the Constitution already conferred by its provisions have been exercised and fully exhausted.

Until all the powers vested by the Constitution are exercised, tried out, given full force and effect by Congress, and these powers already conferred are in good faith administered, and the remedies provided are fully and clearly exhausted, certainly no amendment to the Constitution should be submitted or considered to vest Congress with the power to suspend our free competitive system of industry, to suppress the natural laws of supply and demand, nor to permit the usurpation of powers vested in one branch of the Government by another.

This has not been done. And until the powers conferred upon Congress to coin and regulate the public currency have been exercised in good faith and this remedy provided to deal with the panic or depression exhausted, any amendment to the Constitution granting greater and further or special powers assuming a necessity for such purpose is trifling without warrant with the sacred Constitution, a vandalism desecration of that sacred instrument.

NEUTRALITY AND WORLD PEACE

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this Congress and administration have taken a great forward advance step in perfecting and declaring a policy of neutrality, defining the duties and obligations of citizens in their foreign and international relations, and their dealings with other nations at war.

Since our beginning as a nation we have asserted and claimed the right of the freedom of the seas during conflicts between other nations, encouraging our citizens to enter the war zone between the countries in conflict to carry on commerce and trade. This claim for the freedom of the seas, this right to trade with nations at war, insisting on the right of our citizens to enter and navigate the war zone, has been the hazardous neutral policy which has ultimately involved us in conflicts between other nations.

It was this ancient claim of the right to carry on trade and commerce between other nations at war which involved us in the War of 1812, which led us, in fact, into the Cuban War, and which carried us directly into the great World War, and if followed now, ultimately into this war.

This Congress and administration has not only declared for neutrality in fact, to be observed during the Italian-Ethiopian war, but we have given admonition and warning to our citizens against entering the war zone to furnish supplies to either nations and making it plain to our citizens that we will not follow them into the conflict to avenge their wrongs and misfortunes.

This policy of strict neutrality becomes even of more serious import with the progress and development of the war, making it not only a war between Italy and Ethiopia but an economic war or conflict between Italy and 52 League nations and a breach of violation of neutrality of far more critical and hazardous concern.

Claiming the right to trade with nations at war and parading with a chip on our shoulders between the armies and navies of belligerents locked in the throes of the death struggle is a hazardous neutral policy coming down from an ancient war age, always sooner or later involving neutral nations in the conflict.

Framing and perfecting and declaring such a policy of strict neutrality has marked this an epochal period in history, a turning point in international relations, when the preservation of peace will take precedence over false national pride and military dignity leading to war.

Facing the world as it is today, the one proper course before the American Nation is to observe absolute good-faith neutrality, counsel our citizens to remain at home or outside the belligerent lines or war zone. And while thus observing such a neutral course it should be our duty to prepare and maintain a full, adequate, and complete defense necessary for our own security against invasion.

While maintaining such full and adequate defense and safeguarding our shores against attack and invasion there is a course for this Nation to pursue in advancing the cause of world peace and discharging our obligations to civilization without involving ourselves in the hazards of war.

The proper course and policy for this Nation under a program for world peace is not to resort to arms and war to enforce peace upon the nations but to lead them in the course of peace by the far greater power of example.

Our forefathers, throwing off the yoke of ancient British despotic rule, set up and established a new form of government and demonstrated to the world the ability of men to govern themselves. Yielding to the moral force of our example, standing out before the peoples and the nations of the earth, monarchies gave way to republics, kingdoms to free institutions, and harsh despotic rule to constitutional and more humane government.

And the irresistible force and power evolving from our standards of human rights, moving in the minds and hearts of men, led all Central and South America to renounce their kings and establish republics, leading France and Switzerland to enthrone more complete free institutions, and liberalizing every government of Europe for the greater recognition of the rights of man.

Christ was crucified upon the cross. Speaking the language of human affairs, that was a victory for political force but temporary for the present moment.

But the moral force of the example of His pure and blameless life moved on, gathering strength and multiplied power as time endured, wore on. And sweeping into an irresistible tide with these cycles of years, overcoming armies and navies, subduing nations and whole races of men, and finally reaching out to the utmost parts of the earth and conquering and overcoming the whole civilized world.

And every church spire we see pointing heavenward and every church bell we hear ringing out upon the clear Sabbath morning is declaring the supremacy of moral force over physical force and the material world.

BLESSED BE THE PEACEMAKERS

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, peace is the greatest problem in the world today. I have always been interested in it. When I graduated from college my commencement-day oration was on The Abolition of War.

Now that I am older, I see more clearly than I did then the immense difficulties in preserving the peace of the world and the greater necessity for preserving it. War has become more frightful, more lethal. It no longer involves armies. It involves nations. From its scourge no one is longer safe. There are no noncombatants today.

There ought for that reason to be no noncombatants in the struggle to end the threat of war. I can think of no cause to which a young man or woman could better devote his or her life than this.

For myself I cannot conceive of any pressure that would cause me to vote to send our youth to war except to defend the boundaries and shores of our own land.

But we cannot wait until the war drums throb in the streets. We must prepare against the time of passion, excitement, and alarm. That preparation must be mental and spiritual. It must become part of the pattern of our thought. We must fortify our desire for peace against the day of quick decision.

We must broaden our understanding of the problems that affect other people.

The battleship Maryland cost $22,137,457. It took 4 years 3 months to build. In a few years it will be obsolete.

What could we do with $22,000,000? We could select 22,000 of the best of our boys and girls graduating from our high schools and, at the cost of $1,000 each, give them a year's education in the colleges of England, France, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Japan, or other countries.

Perhaps this is a dream, but I should like to sponsor it. These young men and women—the pick of our land, the leaders in their communities in the years to come—would have had a year in foreign lands mingling with the best of their youth who will be the leaders of their communities, making friends in the time of life when friends are made, broadening the horizon of understanding, and cementing the bonds of sympathy. "Good will among men." How much that would be promoted by such an interchange, because I would hope other nations would reciprocate and send their young men and women to our schools and universities.

Twenty-two thousand of our youth. Seven for each county in the United States. All for the cost of one battleship. And the process could be repeated year after year until you would have thousands and thousands of our people growing up into positions of responsibility and leadership—school teachers, pastors, priests, editors, men in public life—who would have had this insight into how the other half lives. And all for a cost of less than half a cent on the dollar on our normal Federal Budget. Some 85 cents on the dollar go to pay for past and prepare for future war. I propose half a cent for peace.

Turning from possibilities to actualities, I have supported the so-called Ludlow amendment, House Joint Resolution 167, both before the Judiciary Committee and by signing a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the resolution so that it could be brought on the floor of the House for a vote.

This, as is well known, proposes to amend the Constitution of the United States by taking from Congress plenary power to declare war except in case of invasion and to provide that the question of going to war must first be submitted to the referendum of the people. It also provides for taking the profit out of war. Without profit there will be few wars.

Appearing before the Judiciary Committee of the House in 1935, I made the following statement on this subject:

Gentlemen of the committee, I doubt if any more important matter has ever come before your committee than House Joint Resolution 167, introduced by my distinguished colleague, Mr. LUDLOW. I beg of you to consider it carefully.

We have to look at war with cold realism. Patriotism itself requires us to do so. We have to think of it in terms of the greater good and the long perspective. Shall a million lives be sacrificed to vindicate a hundred?

War comes in the present. It is liquidated in the future. It affects us, but it concerns posterity. The decision when made is irrevocable. Its burden must be borne by generations who had no voice in its decision.

During the World War we spent more money than in the 128 previous years since Washington became President. The payment of that debt will tend to lower the standard of living of our grandchildren.

War no longer is the business of armies. It is directed against the entire civilian population and is fought by them. As it has become mechanized it has become merciless. It is said that only 8,000 died of battle wounds during the entire period of the Revolutionary War. Today that number would be the death toll of a single day—or an hour.

The decision whether we should engage in future war is too serious to be decided by boxcar headlines, flag waving, hidden economic interests, munitions makers, mass psychology, emotional insanity. It can only properly be decided by the anxious deliberations of father, mother, son, and daughter sitting at the American fireside. It concerns them.

This resolution would give time for sober second thought. It would prevent a nation from being swept off its feet by an unfortunate incident, like the sinking of the Maine or the Lusitania. It would serve notice to the purveyors of propaganda that the case for war must be so clear and clean that it can stand inspection by those who have nothing to gain from it. This resolution takes selfishness out of the decision to fight. It places war on the rock of patriotism. It deserves to stand on no other foundation.

I have also supported the neutrality legislation of the administration, which goes further than we have ever gone before in our entire history in the effort to not become involved, even innocently, in foreign war.

The Neutrality Act provides, briefly, as follows:

It places an absolute embargo on the sale or export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to belligerent countries. It forbids the making of loans or extension of credits to belligerents. It forbids issuance of passports to American citizens to travel on vessels of belligerents, and removes, in large part, the protection of our nationals in belligerent territory.

Briefly, the sense of it is that the United States shall not be a base of supplies for war purposes. It is a new principle of international behavior. It means, so far as possible, that the American flag shall not be wound around powder kegs.

The stated policy is mandatory upon all, from the President down. By it we meant to keep our own peace and contribute toward keeping the peace of the world.

As it was impossible to reach an agreement on permanent neutrality legislation, the act is extended in force only until May 1, 1937. In the meantime further efforts must be made to consolidate the gains so far made. The present act does not apply to the South and Central American republics if they become involved with a non-American power. As to them the principles of the Monroe Doctrine are kept in force, if not in fact strengthened.

The act applies only to arms, ammunition, and implements of war. It does not cover "munitions" of war, which include such articles as wheat, cotton, apples, petroleum, iron ore, rubber, tin, automobiles, medicine, and so forth, in common use both in time of peace and in time of war by combatants and noncombatants alike. As to them there is no prohibition of sale or export.

What are "implements" of war? That term is not defined and is probably not capable of strict definition. What is today not an "implement" of war may become such next month due to the advance of science. The President was authorized by the act to catalog certain articles as such implements. For the present, by proclamation dated April 10, 1936, the following in general terms make up the catalog:

Rifles, revolvers, machine guns, ammunition in excess of .22 caliber, grenades, torpedoes, mines, armored vehicles, war vessels of all kinds, aircraft designed as capable of being used for military purposes, aircraft engines, flame throwers, mustard gas, and lewisite.

As to the above there can be no export from America to nations at war, either directly or indirectly, by transshipment through neutral countries.

Another step in the long struggle for peace took place on March 25, when the Senate ratified the London Naval Treaty with England and France for a 6-year holiday on the construction of heavy cruisers.

Still another step forward is the forthcoming inter-American conference which is to meet at Buenos Aires. It is doubtful if there has been more good will between the nations of the Western Hemisphere than there is today. The untiring efforts of Secretary of State Cordell Hull are largely responsible for this happy result, and as an expression of my own sentiments I am glad to quote from his speech before the Pan American Union on April 14, 1936, when he said:

The goal that we are seeking is an America in which the spirit of mutual helpfulness shall determine international relations; in which fear of aggression shall disappear and in which the great purpose of national security shall have been achieved.

Viewed in its larger aspects, the fostering of conditions that make for peace and security on this continent is a matter of deep interest and concern, not only to international relations but also to the fullest favorable development of those principles of democracy to which America has dedicated herself.

Fundamentally, of course, the responsibility for the maintenance of peace rests upon the peoples themselves. Statesmen may perfect peace machinery, wars may be outlawed, but the effectiveness of such measures depends upon the extent to which the citizens themselves manifest a strong and virile "will to peace" against the forces of selfish greed and uncompromising nationalism. I firmly believe that the spirit of neighborliness pervades the minds and hearts of the American peoples and that they have a sincere desire to live in peace and harmony.

The tremendous costs of war and the terrific toll it exacts in misery and death are borne in large part by the common man, the average citizen. These millions of people, desirous of living at peace with their neighbors and enjoying the bounties with which nature has so generously endowed them, are the ones who will gain the most by all practical efforts devoted to the high ideal of peace, and who should therefore rally in support of the conscientious efforts of their governments in this behalf.

The forthcoming inter-American conference, which is to meet at Buenos Aires in accordance with the suggestion made by President Roosevelt to the Presidents of the other American republics, offers, I believe, a promising opportunity for the American nations to set an example to the world of friendly cooperation and enlightened internationalism. May the peoples of these Americas unite in supporting their governments in this effort to employ the forces of reason and justice in our international relations rather than the barbaric methods of the doctrine that "might makes right." It is my hope, and I believe it is the hope of all true lovers of peace, that this conference may attain its great objectives, that it may carry the standard of good will one step farther toward the realization of the ideal of perpetual peace, and that the peoples of the 21 American republics may unanimously support the efforts of their governments to banish forever the scourge of war from this hemisphere.

I call attention particularly to what Secretary Hull said about the "will to peace" and the fact that the "responsibility for the maintenance of peace rests upon the peoples themselves."

We have learned all too well that statutes, treaties, resolutions, and proclamations do not alone preserve peace.

Are we willing to pay for peace? That is the acid test. Are we willing to forego $3 wheat, $500 mules, and rising prices for stocks in "war brides", and the thousands of items that go to feed and clothe and arm navies, armies, and aircraft?

It seems to me that unless we are willing to face this question and answer it honestly we cannot rely on paper to preserve peace. Does war pay? The answer is "No!" Against a war cost of thirty-five billions, which will not be paid for 50 years after the armistice, to say nothing of the continued cost of veterans' relief, the "profits" or prosperity of wartimes sinks into utter insignificance.

The question is, Can we, will we, you and I, form public opinion against the temptation of temporary trade and greed and gain?

If not, the fault is not in our stars nor in our public officials or diplomats, but in ourselves.

Emerson once said, "Whatsoever a man would have, pay for it and take it."

Are we willing to pay for peace?

Are we fit to "inherit the earth" and receive the blessing of the Master of Men?

The answer will not be found in Washington, or London, or Paris, or Berlin, or Tokio, or Rome. It will be found in the church, the school, and the hearthside.

We rely too much on government, forgetting that—

> Except the Lord build the house,
> They labour in vain that build it:
> Except the Lord keep the city,
> The watchman waketh but in vain.

PULASKI MEMORIAL DAY—PEOPLE FROM POLAND HAVE CONTRIBUTED TO THE GREATNESS OF OUR COUNTRY

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Speaker, our country has its roots in every country and clime. The men and women who have come to our shores from foreign soil represent many nationalities, but under our flag they are living and working side by side in a spirit of friendliness and tolerance which embraces every race and every tongue. America honors such inspiring names as Columbus, Von Steuben, Pulaski, and Leif Ericson because they evoke memories of the gallant men whose lives have become a part of our Nation's history and who have enriched our traditions.

It was the consciousness of this contribution to the development of America which prompted me to introduce House Joint Resolution 107 on January 27, 1935, authorizing the President to proclaim October 11 of each year a memorial day for the observance and commemoration of the death of a truly great figure in history, a man who gave his life for our country, Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

This resolution was passed with an amendment for the year 1935, and President Roosevelt approved the resolution on June 6, 1935.

This year I assisted in bringing out a similar resolution from the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member. This resolution was passed by Congress and approved by the President on June 20, 1936, and on October 11 of this year we will again honor the name of General Pulaski.

It is not necessary for me to narrate the life history of General Pulaski. It is to be found among the biographies of the world's heroes. In every library, in every schoolbook of American history, there can be found the story of Pulaski. His life is a symbol—the symbol of the struggle and sacrifice of a human being that countries and nations may be free. He fought and bled to save his native Poland from rapacious neighbors who were conspiring against the freedom of his people. At the early age of 25 he was the acknowledged leader and hero of his countrymen, and he became renowned as one of the great cavalry leaders of his day.

In Paris he became acquainted with Benjamin Franklin, who wrote of him, "an officer famous throughout Europe for his bravery and conduct in defense of the liberties of his country."

He came to our country and enlisted in its struggle for independence. He began as a private, but within 2 months his abilities were recognized and on September 15, 1777, Congress elected him "commander of the horse, with the rank of brigadier."

In 1778 he organized a special corps, known as the Polish Legion, and even contributed his own money to fit it out. He fought continuously in the struggle of the Colonies until wounded in the Siege of Savannah, Ga., on October 9, 1779. He was taken aboard the ship Wasp, but died at sea 2 days later, where he was buried.

General Pulaski died in a strange country far from his native land, and yet he was not a stranger, for he had espoused our cause and became known throughout the land. His loyalty and devotion made him a great American, and his untimely death at the age of 31 ended a career of service to America.

General Pulaski came from Poland. Many others have come from that land to distinguish themselves in our country, both in times of peace and war.

Forty thousand American doughboys who served in France were of Polish descent. It would take volumes to narrate their exploits in the World War.

In the arts, science, commerce, industry, and on the farm the Polish people are serving America today with hand and brain.

Many are already of the second and third generation of parents who came from Poland. But we can glory in the aged mothers and fathers of these people—those who first came here, the parents of the present generation, many of whom have gone to that land from whence no traveler returns, as well as the many who are yet to be found in city and country. They are like the seed out of which a great forest has grown. Therefore, in honoring the great historic personages who came from Poland, a word of tribute should also be paid to this older generation, for though they were immigrants, their love for their children and country, their ideals and principles, their home life, their devotion to religion, to lofty morals, and to those civic ideals which make a community better have earned for them and their descendants the admiration of all Americans.

America is destined for greatness—and the people from Poland are contributing their share.

Mr. Speaker, it is for such reasons that these resolutions connote more than a tribute to a person; they are a tribute to a great people.

MY RECORD AND MY SERVICE IN CONGRESS

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the general permission granted to Members to extend their remarks, I am again taking this opportunity to report to the constituents of my district whom I have had the honor to represent in two terms of Congress an accounting of my stewardship and all matters on which I have enjoyed the high honor to speak for them and vote for them in this legislative body. When Edmund Burke in reporting to his constituency enunciated the rule for a Representative he set down a principle of guidance for legislative conduct that might well be kept before us. He said:

> It should be the glory as well as the honor of a Representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes should at all times have great weight with him, their opinions high respect, their business his unremitted attention. But his mature opinion, his unbiased judgment, his enlightened conscience he should not surrender to any men or set of men. These he does not derive from the law or the Constitution. They are the gift of Providence for the use of which he is deeply responsible.

Because, Mr. Speaker, the two terms of Congress of which I have had the honor to serve has transacted much business, passed upon many measures, and because most minor matters before us have been of passing interest and limited public concern, I will but briefly record my stand in favor of or against those major issues passed upon in both the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses.

To make this summary of my record, to which I sincerely believe my constituents are entitled, as briefly as possible, I make the following digest of my activity and vote in both sessions of the Seventy-third Congress.

Voted against press-censorship bill.
Voted against the releasing of claims of the United States Government against the Teapot Dome conspirators.
Voted against sales-tax amendment to public-works bill.
Voted against repealing home rule for Hawaii.
Voted against all gag rules brought before the House this session, the effect of which, when passed, prevented amendments to legislation and restricted debate.

THE 1934 REGULAR SESSION

In this, the regular session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, my vote was cast in favor of the following major legislation:

Voted for gold devaluation.

Voted for amended Railway Labor Act.
Voted for labor-disputes law.
Voted for act to provide compensation for widows and children of war veterans.
Voted for Federal Credit Union Act.

During this regular session of the Seventy-third Congress I opposed by my vote and in debate the following measures:

Voted against appropriation to establish a Federal furniture factory.
Voted against establishment of foreign-trade zones in American ports.
Voted against census bill providing $8,000,000 expenditure from relief funds for political purposes.
Voted against $23,000,000 appropriation to Philippine Islands for currency adjustment.
Voted against resolution providing United States entry into the international labor organization of the League of Nations at Geneva.

In addition to the above-mentioned votes both for and against legislation, I offered an amendment to the Liquor Taxing Act to reduce the beer tax from $5 to $3 per barrel. Offered an amendment to the Tariff Act to protect America from a flood of foreign-made goods made in foreign branch factories of American companies. Offered a preferential motion to adopt the Senate amendment to levy a 10-percent recovery tax to be used for relief, said tax to apply to large incomes.

The following legislation was introduced by me in the Seventy-third Congress:

House Joint Resolution 155, providing that Congress cannot conscript persons for military purposes without at the same time conscripting wealth and industry for service during war without payment of profit.

House Joint Resolution 161, providing for a 50-percent emergency tax on the profits of American manufactures made in plants operated in foreign countries.

House Joint Resolution 257, providing for a new method of handling Indian affairs. This measure is now law, having been signed by the President.

House Joint Resolution 175, imposing a tax on securities now tax exempt and preventing further expansion of the great evil of tax-exempt securities.

House Joint Resolution 137, providing for the creation of a committee to investigate frauds in real-estate bonds. This resolution, the terms of which were combined with other resolutions, was finally passed by the House providing for the creation of the Select Committee to Investigate Real Estate Bondholders' Reorganizations, on which I have had the honor of serving since its creation.

During the Seventy-third Congress, in addition to the above-summarized activity, I opposed the amendment of the discharge rule to prevent committees from "pigeonholing" legislation.

I was also during this session the first Representative to make an appeal over a national broadcasting system for the support of Federal legislation to establish a uniform national system of old-age pensions.

So that both my constituents and anyone interested in my stand on various measures may have the opportunity of reference to my remarks on measures of importance affecting citizens of my district, I call attention to the principal debates in which I participated in during the Seventy-third Congress:

Investigation of motion-picture monopoly and indecent pictures (for). (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 12, 1933, p. 3431.)

SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

Since taking my oath of office I have tried to keep in mind that the only practical way to learn a job and to develop ability to efficiently represent one's constituency was to devote as much time and study as possible to the job. The Honorable Champ Clark, the late Speaker of the House of Representatives, once stated in a fine oration delivered on the floor of the House that—

> A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

A continued period of service not only enables a Representative to gain a more thorough grasp of the complex rules of the House but gives him that seniority on committees and that prestige among his colleagues that is an invaluable asset in making him more efficient and giving him greater opportunities to serve his district by legislation, in committee, and departmental work. In the Seventy-fourth Congress I believe that I hold the distinction of serving upon a greater number of committees than any of my colleagues, thus giving me the opportunity to more fully represent my constituents both in these committees and upon the floor of the House than it was possible for me to do before.

Since it has always seemed to me to be much fairer to the voters of any community to account for what has been done in their behalf rather than to hold forth mere promises of future acts when asking for their consideration, I shall summarize as briefly as possible my record and service on the major issues before the House of Representatives during the two regular sessions of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

FIRST SESSION SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

I voted for the following measures during this session:

Voted for relief appropriation providing funds for public works and the Works Progress Administration.

I opposed the following measures in this same session:

Voted against further extension of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Voted against the attempt to extend and continue the N. R. A.

Voted against the Ship Subsidy Act of 1935 providing for large Government subsidies to private ship owners.

Voted against bills to create additional Federal judgeships.

Voted against the resolution authorizing the President to invite world power conference to the United States.

Voted against amendments to and extension of agricultural adjustment and crop-restriction acts.

Voted against Guffey-Snyder Coal Price Control Act.

SECOND SESSION SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

During the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress I voted in favor of the following measures:

Voted for immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates.

Voted to override the veto of the President and pass the bill providing immediate payment of adjusted-service certificates.

Voted for bill to provide for sick leave and limited vacation periods to regular civilian employees of the Government.

Voted to continue Electrical Home and Farm Authority as a United States agency.

Voted for revised railroad workers retirement act.

Voted for H. R. 2066 to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness, otherwise known as the Frazier-Lemke farm refinancing act.

Voted to extend the classified civil service to include postmasters of the first, second, and third classes.

Voted for the creation of a committee to investigate executive departments of the Government for the purposes of coordination.

Voted for interstate commerce long-and-short-haul act.

Voted for the 1936 Emergency Relief Act.

Voted for Walsh-Healey Government contract bill.

During the second session of Congress I voted against the following measures:

Voted against the substitute neutrality act giving the President sole authority to determine when a state of war existed between foreign countries and whether or not the United States should remain neutral.

Voted against Emergency Soil Conservation Act, which provided no protection for dairy States against unfair competition.

Voted against exemption from local taxation of stock, notes, and debentures of banks held by the R. F. C.

Voted against $50,000 appropriation for investigation of old-age-pension organizations.

Voted against Tobacco Control Act, limiting tobacco production.

Voted against transfer of airport technical school from Central West to Colorado.

Voted against amendments to increase District of Columbia appropriation from Federal Treasury.

Voted against bill to require registration of all persons or organizations favoring or opposing legislation before the Congress, including labor, fraternal, civil, and voluntary citizen groups.

Voted against compromise tax bill increasing taxes on small concerns more than 66 percent over present rates.

During my service in the Seventy-fourth Congress I introduced the following legislation:

H. R. 12678. To provide for the control of flood waters in Wisconsin Valley Authority and to provide for the sale of surplus power generated from such project.

H. R. 12216. To limit the power of the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy, preventing them from using any of the Military or Naval Establishments for the protection of private interests in foreign countries.

H. R. 10931. To repeal a portion of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, so as to repeal the most-favored-nation sections of the Reciprocal Tariff Act and prevent foreign-made goods from depriving American manufacturers and American workers of the home market to which they are entitled.

As a member of the Patents Committee in the House, I introduced H. R. 8099, to provide copyright protection by registration for designs, textiles, furniture, toys, and many other articles.

H. Res. 353. To provide for investigation of the alleged use of Federal road funds for political purposes in various States obtaining Federal allotments for road-building purposes.

I reintroduced as House Joint Resolution 13 my bill proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing against conscription of persons for military service unless and until wealth and industry were conscripted for service in time of war without payment of profit.

H. R. 173. To provide counsel for the defense and prosecution of rights of owners of patents without the funds to protect themselves from infringements on their patent rights.

H. J. Res. 56. To provide for the levying and collection of a tax on the income of securities now tax exempt, and to prevent the further issuance of tax-exempt securities.

In addition to the above measures, I signed House discharge petitions to aid in obtaining action on legislation to prevent lynchings, otherwise known as the antilynching law; to bring about House action upon the bill to provide for a referendum of American citizens on the question of war; to bring action in the House on legislation to provide for adequate old-age pensions.

I voted against all endeavors to fasten upon the membership of the House gag rules, and opposed in debate and by my vote the change in the discharge rule which was raised from 145 signatures to 218 during the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

During all debates on major legislation in both sessions of the Seventy-fourth Congress in which I participated I indicated my stand on major legislation and major policies. Successful support of an amendment to take the Labor Mediation Board created by the Wagner Labor Disputes Act out from under the jurisdiction of the Labor Department has resulted in this Board being now an independent agency of the Government not subject to the domination or control of any executive bureau.

I call attention to statements I have made on principal legislation as an indication of my attitude on the issues involved in this legislation, which are summarized in extracts appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Perhaps no session of Congress has transacted so much business and acted upon so many issues of vital importance to all our people than that of the Seventy-fourth Congress. With the exception of the times when either illness or the loss by death of a member of my family has prevented me from being present in person on major legislation, I have registered my vote on every important issue before the House. Those times when unavoidable absences prevented my personal registration of my vote, I have been paired on record either for or against the important legislation before the House.

Because it has been my policy to submit to my constituents as plainly and coherently as possible my record in their service, I have endeavored to adhere to that policy established in the first term in which I had the honor to represent my district.

SINCE MARCH 4, 1933

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, during the closing hours of Congress it is customary for Members to review the work of the session passing into history. We who are Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and especially those who participated in the activities of that momentous Seventy-third Congress, have a duty, as well as a privilege, in following this long-established custom.

We now attempt to summarize the acts of two Congresses under an administration which assumed control of the Nation's affairs at a period so critical that no comparison comes to mind except that of the dark days of the sixties. This administration is asking for a renewal of its commission in order to make permanent some of the gains which have been made in the face of catastrophes almost unprecedented in our history.

Faced with a bewildering economic collapse which had destroyed confidence throughout the country and interrupted our remarkable economic prosperity, emergency legislation was necessary. The banking and industrial disasters were first dealt with. Then emergency agricultural legislation took shape. Scarcely had this emergency legislation begun to operate when the program was again interrupted by a terrible drought, calling for more legislative changes and for large appropriations. Again the administration settled to the work of a permanent agricultural and industrial program when court decisions overturned the program by invalidating the Industrial Recovery Act and wiping out agricultural legislation passed to meet the emergency. It became necessary to substitute new acts in order to keep things going and to develop a permanent plan for meeting the inescapable problems growing out of failure to equalize the benefits of the period of capitalistic expansion which ended with such a thud of failure.

In the face of the dust bowl obscuring the sky to the borders of the Atlantic Ocean, and of the declaration by the Supreme Court that the Government has no power, under the Constitution, to legislate for social welfare, constant change and shift of plans has been necessary; and I have wondered whether those political leaders of the Republican Party assembled in convention last week could have produced "clearly defined programs" and policies and statements of "future aims" about which they talked so loudly. The "muddles" to which they referred were not the result of inefficient planning but were rather the outgrowth of a series of catastrophes and disasters and blows entirely unforeseen and impossible of solution through a planned program. It is utter folly to talk about dealing judicially with a cyclone or a tornado or a whirlwind, and this is exactly what was happening in the economic world.

Undoubtedly there have been some errors of judgment and some mistakes in the choice of men and methods, possibly there has been some waste because of necessary haste in meeting emergencies, but the gains, as I shall try to measure them in this summary, are most tangible and really amazing. As we review the efforts to remedy wrongs and to build the groundwork of a better structure, I ask you to consider just which act you would have omitted or what plan you would have substituted to meet the situation. Remember, the times demanded aids for recovery from disintegration, repairing our economic system, which had broken down. Along with the repairs was some measure of rebuilding, but the foundations were bad and new groundwork was required. Now, let us keep clearly in mind the development of a new and better system alongside a series of acts somewhat hurriedly drawn because urgently needed to save further disaster.

THE DAYS OF '33

It is said that accurate history is never written by participants in its events. Those of us who saw the President take the oath on that chilly March day in '33 have often attempted to picture the conditions as we faced them. We were then confused, only partly informed, and working without precedent to establish a new order, the necessity for which was brought about by the very apparent economic collapse.

We knew that thousands of banks had failed during the previous 10 years, and that failures were being reported daily with alarming rapidity, while the relatively few banks remaining open were hanging on in great uncertainty as to the outcome. The situation of the agricultural producer was most serious. Cotton was 5 cents a pound, wheat brought the producer 25 cents a bushel, corn 12 cents a bushel, hogs 2 cents a pound, and cattle often as low as 1 cent a pound. In fact, all agricultural products were selling for less than the cost of production, excluding the labor of the farmer, who was forced to work without recompense.

The men from great industrial firms, who organized and now liberally finance the Liberty League in order to defeat the reelection of President Roosevelt, were walking the floor in the Ides of March of '33 wondering how pay rolls were to be met. There was less need for production, for consumer purchasing power was destroyed. World trade was at a standstill, and ships floated at wharves, no longer sailing the seven seas heavy with cargo. Men who bore legislative responsibility in those dark hours, when disaster threatened our people, certainly recall most vividly the stark tragedy of the whole situation.

CAUSES OF THE COLLAPSE

I am not one of the group which places the total blame for the break on the political party in control during the 12 preceding years, but I hold it largely responsible because it piled the privileges high for those whose wealth gave them political control, yes, dictatorship over the party itself. I believe that conditions in Europe also had something to do with our own break-down. It is my judgment that the tragic harvest which we were reaping in '33 was the result of seeds long before planted, and that abuses under the capitalistic system, especially unreasonable interest and ruinously high fixed dividends, exacted from the producing world by the financial group, were factors bringing about destruction. These, together with the growth of monopoly, have gathered the wealth and income-bearing property of our country into the coffers of a very few people. It is, indeed, gratifying to me to find that my Republican friends have become converted to the Democratic attitude toward monopoly. It was our great leader William Jennings Bryan who put into the Democratic platform, in 1912, the statement on monopoly which has just penetrated the understanding of our friends across the aisle. He then said:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

Probably if the legislation then advocated had been enacted, the great holding companies would not have become such a menace, and hundreds of thousands of investors would have owned their hard-earned savings in place of the fraudulent securities which were all they held in their hands in March of '33.

We often hear the figures that 5 percent of the people have more than 80 percent of the national income and that 200 corporations with their interlocking directorates control and operate more than half our industries. This concentration and maldistribution of wealth and power undoubtedly led to the great break, and no administration and no Congress could immediately legislate the country into prosperity. Legislation at best can but fix conditions under which changes can be gradually worked out.

RUGGED INDIVIDUALISM BATTLING ORGANIZED INDUSTRY

During the struggle with adverse conditions we have heard much from the other party about the return to "rugged individualism" and to the conditions under which some of us prospered in past years. Is anyone simple-minded enough to think that any man or group of men could now organize a new industrial firm to produce agricultural machinery in competition with the International Harvester Co.? And, by the way, how interested we farmers will be in the outcome of an investigation of a comparison of the advancing prices of agricultural machinery with the receding prices of agricultural products. Can any man or group of men profit from an attempt to manufacture automobiles in competition with General Motors or Henry Ford? What success would an independent group have if organized to manufacture steel in competition with the United States Steel Corporation? Much as we may regret the passing of the day of individualism, its return is as impossible as the return of chattel slavery. Cooperation is the watchword of the new day, and it has been forced upon us by organized industry, which can be balanced only by organized agriculture and organized workers. An organized society must determine how all may share in the privileges of the tariff and of the financial world. The accumulations of wealth should not be lavished solely upon industry, but should be opened to all people under the guidance and control of a just Government.

When the President ordered the banks closed and commandeered gold we could not foresee what would be the next steps toward recovery. First, a legislative act seemed necessary to reduce routine governmental costs in order to care for extraordinary expenses for relief. Next came legislation for the revival of banking so that banks might pay their depositors and put money into circulation. The Government assumed the responsibility for feeding the hungry, and emergency relief measures were initiated. The burden of the millions of unemployed had to be assumed without the guidance of tradition, and new organizations were speedily put under way with freedom to use to the best advantage the great appropriations voted by the Congress. The critics may pick some minor flaws in this great scheme. They cry "patronage", knowing full well that the civil service could not have acted quickly enough to have been of any help in meeting the immediate demand for more workers in the emergency agencies.

An emergency agricultural program brought hope to farmers for the first time since 1930. Wheat climbed to 60 cents a bushel for the producer; cotton around 10 cents; hogs, 8 cents; and cattle, 4 and 5 cents. Gradually industry revided, factory wheels turned, and the atmosphere changed from ocean to ocean. Certainly holders of stocks which have jumped from 8 cents to 64 cents may well chant the praises of this administration. Confidence was restored, optimism took the place of pessimism, people generally believed that there was a hope for a way out of their difficulties. Business was improved, banks operated, deposits were saved, future deposits were guaranteed, some debts were paid, exploitation of investors was curbed, the Government assumed social responsibility and faced new problems with resourcefulness. Gains could be measured by statistical methods, but it is useless to insert here tables of statistics, as the figures are often before you in authoritative publications. You know and I know that business is better, farm prices and income are higher, some of the great industries report the peak of business of their careers. This must be due to increased purchasing power.

Money has come to every county in Oregon through Federal agencies, and it has flowed into every channel of activity accomplishing, primarily, the purpose of starting money circulating. Substantial accomplishments will for years to come testify to the value of the expenditures—roads, bridges, schoolhouses and other public buildings, municipal improvements for sanitation and water supply, grade crossings eliminated, reservoirs constructed to hold the waters for livestock as well as for people, floods controlled, farms and homes saved from foreclosure. Payments for relief were made when the situation was desperate. The immediate payment of the adjusted-services certificates put the so-called "bonus" money into circulation just when it was most needed to give families a new start in life. All this has helped to tide over the difficult times into which we were suddenly pitched.

If all who received any benefit, direct or indirect, through the foresight, sympathy, and courage of this administration would support and defend it against unjust attacks waged by destructive critics who offer no better plans and who did not have the responsibility in those dread days, the administration would be triumphantly vindicated and returned to power. It cannot be possible that those financial brigands who, as a great editor said recently, "rode high in power while the people were being led to the economic slaughter of 1929" will be allowed to take the reins of government for another mad drive. They are the ones who cry out against great public expenditures. If we must look either to government or to big business, which has made wars and depressions, let us magnify and extend government. What an uplifting experience it has been for the people of this Nation to unite in an effort to help the downtrodden and to set people on the path toward security and hopefulness.

In Oregon, generations yet unborn will look back to this period with gratitude for the great Bonneville Dam, with its possibilities for navigation and power. They will recall that the Federal Government helped rebuild our State capitol. Those who live on our fruitful irrigated lands will think of this constructive period with gratitude. Above all, those reclaimed and made healthy and resourceful in C. C. C. camps and helped through school and college will have a new view of the possibilities of Government.

Gradually a program, a real program, the result of careful planning began to take shape, and from the hastily formulated beginning has been evolved a consistent policy of governmental activity which touches the lives of all of our people. How quickly we have become accustomed to this! It is now so much a part of our daily lives it seems impossible that it was just yesterday, in the beginning of this administration, when we first became acquainted with it. Then farmers began to look to the Government for controlled production which should bring them fairer prices, for allotment checks, for soil conservation, for rehabilitation and proper land utilization, for controlled land resources and actual governmental acceptance of responsibility for farm welfare, as exemplified in the Triple A.

Industry profited through the Government's National Recovery Administration which, though short-lived, established ideals and analyzed situations in a manner to suggest stabilization and standards. For the first time children were protected from labor exploitation.

We have learned to cooperate, we have accepted principles of Federal unemployment insurance and of pensions for retired railway workers. We have entered into an era of responsibility for social security. Our first efforts in the Security Act, while unsatisfactory and far short of fulfilling the expectations, were, after all, an admission that government has a definite responsibility for the handicapped, the underprivileged, and the aged. It must meet that responsibility by further legislation. Undoubtedly any laws enacted by Congress providing pensions for the aged will be submitted to the Supreme Court, and unless we have a constitutional amendment they will be thrown out along with our other social legislation. Possibly one beneficial result of this great movement for old-age pensions will be the determination to put this Nation in a position which will give its legislative bodies the right to meet the needs of our people.

We have become wholly conscious of the fact that our natural resources are to be controlled by the Government, as they always should have been, and we have accepted the great projects like our own Bonneville. We have a Rural Electrification Administration seeking to extend the beneficial use of electricity throughout the land. We shall always expect to meet slack periods in employment with Federal public-works programs such as have been initiated during the past few years.

How our outlook has changed and what a wonderful thing it has been to have this great forward movement and this era of progress developed from the chaos and misery of the so-called depression, which really ushered in a new day, because of the way the situation was met by this administration. Some people feared it was the end, because we did not know how to meet the issue. The courage and resilience of our people under stimulating leadership has made it possible to change a great crisis into a new governmental opportunity.

All of these things have suddenly been injected into our lives so that none of us could conceive a Government which did not accept these responsibilities. The new organization fits into our new world. No great political party can go before the American people with the avowed purpose of eliminating all this governmental activity. Gradually, as the emergency subsides, some of it will be discontinued; much of it has come to be a well-defined program in its relation to agriculture, labor, industry, transportation, communication, electric power, housing, relief, and even in its relation to public and private financial affairs.

Yes, there were great problems facing the administration and they were met with a broad-minded effort directed solely to the public welfare. Some of those problems still face us. We have been laboring to meet the immediate necessity, but we have worked toward permanent solutions.

Not all of the things accomplished by this administration were embodied in legislative enactments. Great powers were vested in the President by act of Congress, and large sums were put at his disposal. Many important steps were taken on authority of Executive orders, because it was necessary to act within fixed limits without the long procedure of committees and the routine of two Houses of Congress. Through the use of this power and the expenditure of the funds the President has merited the confidence of those who have investigated most carefully and are best informed on the governmental activities of the past 3½ years.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE CONSTITUTION

The opportunity for definite planning and for permanent change through legislation has been checked by the Supreme Court through a number of decisions which have brought clearly before us the fact that Congress is denied by the Court the power to deal effectively with national problems of greatest importance. The succession of Supreme Court decisions nullifying acts which seemed esential in dealing with the great national tasks forced by the economic overturn culminated in its recent minimum-wage decision. Here the Court clearly declares that State governments do not have the constitutional right to pass laws fixing minimum wages for women and children. This decision creates a "no man's land", so far as social welfare is concerned, as the Court previously declared that the Federal Government has no right to enact such social laws. It makes an impossible situation which we cannot accept. It certainly forces into the political campaign the question of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

On what subject should the Nation speak with one voice if not on our standards of living and conditions of labor? The plea that these subjects should be left to the States is the plea of those who feel confident that powerful interests bent on money-getting could for generations fend off State legislation in those States which have exploited women and children and have the most unsatisfactory labor conditions. Justice Stone in his dissenting opinion in the minimum wage case said:

> There is grim irony in speaking of the freedom of contract of those who, because of their economic necessities, give their services for less than is needful to keep body and soul together.

We in Oregon do not call this freedom; we call it peonage. Oregon's minimum-wage law was upheld by the Supreme Court through a divided opinion in a famous case brought to it many years ago. We in Oregon are ready for a constitutional amendment which shall forbid enslavement of either women or children. We are determined that women, children, farmers, and laborers generally shall be free to enter into any program for their own salvation, and that the program shall be conducted under our Federal Government.

The Supreme Court decision on the Triple A which declared that agriculture was of local importance and not charged with a public interest was enough in itself to force an amendment to the Constitution. The Court outlawed the Guffey Coal Act passed to rescue a group of industrial laborers from conditions which should never have existed under our civilization. The National Recovery Act for the protection of labor in industry was set aside. All of the adverse decisions on attempts of Congress to better the conditions of the underprivileged, the farmer, the laborer, have created a condition that demands an immediate movement to amend the Constitution. These decisions also leave very unsettled the programs inaugurated through the Social Security Act and the securities-exchange legislation. If the Court as now constituted, with the same attitude of mind which has been exhibited in these and other cases, passes on these acts, it is likely that more of our advanced legislation will be declared outside the Constitution. We must, then, have either a more liberal Court or provide constitutional amendment before we can benefit from legislation.

I have no faith in the movement toward limitation of the jurisdiction of the Court through congressional action. The traditions of a century and a half are so firmly imbedded in our legal and political system that they cannot be cast aside. No law can change the attitude of the people toward the Court and the Constitution for which they have, fortunately, great respect. It is true that a liberal President may soon have an opportunity to name new members of the Court. It is, however, also true that some of the aged members are the most liberal, and also that a reactionary President may at any time throw the Court back into its present condition of fear and disapproval of all change which seems to be demanded by changing social conditions. The Constitution should be considered a living, growing, changing instrument keeping pace with civilization. We expect it to be construed in accordance with the enlightenment of our times. This is the task of a liberal Court.

A forward-looking Congress should not be bound by the inhibitions of men who are determined to consider the Constitution in the light of conditions which existed at the time of its adoption. This is the opinion of our great liberal, Senator NORRIS, who further says that such construction will make the Constitution a stumbling block in the way of advancement instead of a protection to a more highly enlightened and highly developed civilization.

I firmly believe that the Constitution should be amended in order to make it impossible for judges of any type of mind to compel us to recede from an advanced social position. Our people are ready to speak. This fight must be made and upon its result hangs the fate of American institutions. Several amendments have been offered. I fully realize the immense task; 13 States may block amendment and override the decision of 35 States, as amendment requires the consent of three-fourths.

I have pending before the Congress an amendment suggested by an eminent liberal who is an authority on such subjects. I offer this amendment, providing that it be submitted to conventions elected by the people and not left subject to legislative adoption. It reads:

> Congress shall have the power to promote the economic welfare of the United States by such laws as in its judgment are appropriate and to delegate such power in whole or in part to the States. Existing State powers are not affected by this article except as Congress may occupy a particular field.

THE FARM PROBLEM

This problem has interested me intensely because of my life experience in farming and the fact that during my two terms in Congress I have had the privilege of membership on the very important and powerful Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This committee has framed all farm legislation and, as a basis for decision, has conducted extensive hearings, calling into council all who might make contributions of value. As a result of my participation in the work of this committee, I have made several speeches analyzing and setting forth farm problems as I saw them and suggesting possible solutions. I shall not go into these matters at length at this time, because any interested person may have copies of those more extended speeches which have, at my own expense, been printed for distribution. I look forward with the greatest interest to the opportunity to sit in when permanent farm legislation is enacted during the next Congress and here I believe I can make a real contribution.

For the first time in American history our Government has concerned itself with a Nation-wide program for the farmer. This administration has in 3½ years passed more legislation favorable to farmers and laborers than has been passed previously in the century and a half of our national existence. The farming world has made definite gains in its tremendous struggle against entire subordination to industry, which has resented the privileges granted farmers through this new legislation and is now struggling to gain its old monopoly of the benefits possible through tariff, trade, and finance. The net result of the legislation and of the new attitude toward agriculture has been an increase of farm income from less than four billions to more than eight billions yearly.

Prices for farm products, though still below the cost of production, have really doubled. Interest rates have been lowered, and the mortgaged farmer has been rescued where humanly possible. If his load was too great to be carried until returning land values would save him, the Government has undertaken his resettlement and rehabilitation. A great program of soil conservation and land utilization has been adopted as part of our national policy. Controlled production has been accepted as a method to be used in emergency. The Government has definitely assumed responsibility for surplus production. Truly, there has been growing, from the beginning of the administration, an orderly system of agricultural aid. The growth of this important undertaking has been interrupted by the emergencies of great droughts and floods and by Supreme Court denial of the right to legislate for our salvation under the conditions forced upon us by our national and international situations.

Of all the acts of this administration which brought immediate results the greatest was unquestionably the Triple A. It was the main factor in bringing this country back to prosperity. Under the operation of that law, passed by the Seventy-third Congress, allotment money distributed among the farmers made it possible for them to buy much-needed supplies, the demand for which caused factory wheels to turn. Higher prices for farm commodities created markets for labor's efforts. The benefit payments amounted to more than a thousand million dollars, 90 percent of which went into the hands of small producers. There were a few large checks to big producers. It was necessary to have their cooperation to make a success of the program. The experience under this act has taught us that we should graduate benefit payments so that large commercial producers shall not have an unfair advantage over the small producer. The lessons in cooperation learned during the brief life of the A. A. A. will never be forgotten, and another lesson which the Nation has learned is that agriculture is basic and fundamental and that we cannot safely countenance its financial destruction. The Supreme Court, harking back to ancient days, found the act unconstitutional. Fortunately, it had largely accomplished its purpose and it was possible to substitute quickly the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. This also is temporary legislation, planned for 2 years, pending the formulation of permanent agricultural legislation. If our increased prosperity continues and our foreign trade is reestablished, crop-production control may become unnecessary, but it must be reserved for use until increased exports can play a more considerable part in the solution of the farm problem. The objectives of the new act include preservation and improvement of soil fertility and promotion of better use of land. On the economic side the declared policy is the reestablishment of a just ratio between the purchasing power of workers on farms and those in industry. In some way this relationship between agriculture and industry must be stabilized on a more satisfactory basis.

During this administration the scattered agencies for financing farmers have been welded into a system under the Farm Credit Administration, which now supervises all of them. Some new emergency financing has been necessary and some agencies are gradually being liquidated so that all farm lending may be accomplished through a few associations brought nearer to the farmers and more completely under their control. The new agricultural legislation was passed in sympathy for the mortgaged farmers. The land bank commissioner's loans were instituted for the relief of the man most heavily burdened by debt. Interest rates on Federal loans have been materially lowered, and payments on principal have been suspended for the time being.

In my judgment the farm problems have been handled on the financial side somewhat less successfully than in matters relating to the fertility and preservation of the soil. I was one who supported the Frazier-Lemke bill, and I have set forth my reasons for favoring it in a speech which I believe merits the study of those who feel concerned over the matter of farm-mortgage indebtedness. There is also the very grave question of regaining control of our money system, which has been usurped by private groups. We cannot entirely solve our farm problems until we have absolute government control of money.

Growing out of the concern for soil preservation and the apparent tragedy of the struggle to maintain life and property on poor lands has been a series of acts and Executive orders setting up many agencies which have already been generally accepted as permanently beneficial. I refer to the grazing administration, which is important to the livestock industry, to the soil-conservation program, and, above all, to the Resettlement Administration, which plans to take families from poor land where they are barely existing and move them to good land under conditions which will make it possible for them to work hopefully. We in Oregon have profited largely from this plan, and thousands of our people have come under the beneficent care of this new governmental agency. This Administration has an admirable program for land use, resettlement, and aid for stranded families. Incidentally, the proposed changes will relieve our county governments from expenditures for roads, schools, and other improvements in the poor-land areas. It is hard for us who have been part of the competitive system of years past fully to grasp the value of this great cooperative movement.

One of our great difficulties is the high cost of distribution of farm commodities. Out of the dollar paid for 10 food products in the United States in 1934, the farmer, according to the Department of Agriculture, received 38½ cents, while distributors received 61½ cents for processing and distributing. For the same products in Denmark in the same year, the farmer received 63.4 cents, the distributor and processor 36.6 cents. That which they have been able to do in Denmark we can and must do in America. Until the Congress is by constitutional amendment given the right to legislate to meet changing conditions we cannot benefit from the most carefully worked-out laws for production and price control and the regulation of distribution.

THE TARIFF

Since our Government has been in existence, tariff has been a bone of contention. Most of the discussion and most of the laws have dealt with benefits to industry. The laws have been enacted to benefit the manufacturers of products, prices of which could be controlled at will. Manufacturers of such products have been able to regulate foreign competition. The result was a political logrolling tariff, the privileges of which were usurped by the manufacturing corporations, with agriculture now and then getting a slight break. This administration, realizing that the whole country is vitally affected by tariff policies, sought to remove them from political manipulation and to break down tariff walls, which were preventing world trade. The result was the Reciprocal Tariff Act, which made possible trade-agreement negotiations between our country and other nations. It is impossible to conclude such trade agreements without making some concessions, and I have regretted that these concessions seemed to be in favor of industry. A careful study, however, reveals the fact that most of those in which we have yielded have been on agricultural products which are not competitive with American farm products. Some of these products have come in over the tariff wall and these competitive imports were due largely to the drought. The increases in agricultural imports in 1935 were due, in a minor degree only, to trade agreements, only three of which, enacted prior to 1936, contained any agricultural items on which duties were reduced by the United States. The frequently reported increase in agricultural imports is chiefly accounted for by noncompetitive products like tea, cocoa, and spices, bought more freely because of recovery in this country. There can be no doubt that the tariff agreements have materially increased trade which had been declining for years on account of the Hawley-Smoot tariff law, which was an actual barrier to international trade and to domestic prosperity. Experience will teach us to modify the Reciprocal Tariff Act so that agriculture shall not be sacrificed for the benefit of industry. The administration has a right to ask the farmers of this country to stand behind the program for trade agreements with the assurance that eventually the difficult problem of fair trade will be worked out. Without international trade agriculture cannot wholly prosper, and until trade is restored we must have methods of production control and policies of handling surplus which would not be required under a system of trade. We look forward to a farm program which shall embody an adequate system of financing farm loans, proper management of the land, and a control of production to meet market conditions. The farmer must also depend upon legislation fairly regulating transportation and must be assured of stable money legislation, which shall not be, as in the past, solely for the benefit of his oppressors. These things can gradually be worked out and many of them are in the immediate future if those now in charge of our Government may complete their program. It is my hope that I may continue to take an active part in ushering in this new era for American agriculture.

MEETING SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITIES

The care of the unemployed and plans for reemployment, pending industrial recovery, was one of the great problems facing the administration in March 1933, and it still distresses us. The almost unending line of unemployed had been accumulating for years as changes in machinery and methods threw men out of their usual occupations. When buying stopped, production was curtailed and men were jobless by the millions. Real progress has been made in finding or making work at living wages. If our property rights are to mean anything in the future, there must be work assured and men must be fitted for the task. The owners of stock in great corporations can have no assurance that the stock is to have dividend-paying ability unless every person is given the right to labor at wages sufficient to supply the necessities of life for dependents.

The United States Employment Service has been established to promote and develop a national system of employment offices, and the Reemployment Service has efficiently operated as a temporary agency. Employment insurance has been recognized as a measure of justice, and I particularly rejoice in this accomplishment. It is 17 years since I introduced into the Oregon Legislature a proposal for a State constitutional amendment for State guaranty of jobs financed by a tax on inheritances. Now, the Nation must face the situation and Congress must find a way to provide whatever legislation is necessary to hold labor on a more secure level. There must be no obstacles to a just plan for dealing with unemployment, eliminating poverty, and providing necessary relief for those who are not reestablished or not fitted to care for themselves.

Critics of the program which has emerged fail to offer constructive suggestions. The truth is that these things must be worked out with experimentation and fitted to the economic framework during recovery. Preventive measures should have attention now in order to guarantee that our Nation will never again be subjected to the strain of sudden universal poverty and insecurity.

This administnation has ever been most active to forward the interests of labor through legislation. The Wagner Industrial Disputes Act, the Guffey Coal Act, and the Executive orders from the White House all so testify.

Under its work-relief plans this administration has paid out thousands of millions of dollars through its three organizations known as the Civil Works Administration, Public Works Administration, and the Works Progress Administration. Direct relief was provided first by Federal agencies and then transferred to State jurisdiction through which Federal aid passes. Government has met its responsibility for relieving poverty, and will continue to do so.

The purpose of the National Recovery Administration was to increase the purchasing power of labor and to prevent unfair competition. Though it was short-lived and has passed into history because of Supreme Court action, it taught the American public a lesson of square dealing which will not easily be eradicated. Through this act the terrible blot of child labor was, for a time, erased. The problem of the unemployed will be partly solved when we take from pay rolls 2,000,000 children and 3,000,000 aged.

The Civilian Conservation Corps—C. C. C.—seems to me one of the outstanding achievements of this administration in its attack on the unemployment problem. A million and a quarter young men have enrolled in work camps and sent to their 5,000,000 home people $25 of their $30 monthly wage. By forest and mountain streams many an enrollee in the C. C. C. camps has received more real education in health, habits, and labor than any other school could have offered. This will become a permanent part of our youth program.

Through the National Youth Administration almost a half million young men and women have received direct financial aid to enable them to go to high school and college. Thousands have received the touch and inspiration they would never have felt had it not been for the great humanitarian undertaking of this administration. It has cost sixty millions annually and has been money well invested. I say "invested" rather than spent, for it will bear fruit a thousandfold in future years.

Hours of labor, wages, ability to meet the pressing problems that are forced on us by the unemployed, all hang upon a proper amendment to the Constitution. At whatever cost, the 20 percent of our population today without regular employment must be offered jobs. The Latter Day Saints, known as the Mormon Church, has set a fine example to the country in announcing its determination to assume full responsibility for all its people on relief, and to exemplify real

Christian cooperation in caring for the 10 percent of its members who are now dependent.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House said, in opening his argument for the Social Security Bill, that "it was the most humanitarian act ever proposed in a legislative body anywhere or at any time." This omnibus act makes provision for unemployment compensation, old-age security, aid to dependent children in child-welfare and maternal service, aid to the blind, extension of public-health work, and vocational rehabilitation of the crippled. Many of the sections provide Federal aid with State supervision, supplementary to State agencies, and dependent upon State enabling acts before going into effect.

The old-age-security provisions were least satisfactory, but offered an inducement to States to recognize the necessity for action. The law opened the way for an adequate program of assistance to those now in need, and prevention of future recurrence of poverty in old age, through a system of Government operated and aided annuities.

The Townsend plan, embodying old-age assistance and financial recovery, has brought to a head the demand for assurance of the security essential to a satisfactory life, money security for old age, and freedom from financial panics. I regard as a serious error the effort to suppress this agitation through congressional investigation, and voted against the appropriation and the citation for contempt. These groups, meeting frequently all over our country, are a powerful influence for good in their determination to hold the Government in the hands of its people, and to force social justice. Our sectional and racial differences in population and economic conditions are so marked, and the public attitude toward social problems is so widely at variance in the States of different regions, that it is hard to get Nation-wide agreement on such a matter. We must press as far as we can get a majority to move, then start again and move further ahead. We must welcome a great movement which unites people with the bond of a common aim for the general betterment. Again we see the necessity for constitutional amendment, as it is perhaps a fact that these revolutionary or evolutionary changes cannot take place until a liberalizing amendment removes the certainty of Supreme Court barriers to social reorganization or change.

ELECTRIC POWER

Many students of economic affairs have declared that the act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority is unequalled by any other act of the present administration for its far-reaching effects. T. V. A. was instituted to put into use the vast investment of millions in the Tennessee Valley, made when our country was at war with Germany. During that war immense dams had been erected to generate electrical power for the purpose of making munitions of war. At the close of the war they remained unused, kept so by the powerful influence of the private utility companies. This administration provided for the completion of the navigation of the Tennessee River and development of electrical power. The Congress also provided that the electrical power should be transmitted and sold to the people at cost, with a small amortization fee that would pay back the investment in 50 years. The T. V. A. goes further than merely furnishing electricity for the people who live in that section. It will open new industries and will conserve the soil and other natural resources. It will make thousands of homes comfortable and pleasant and will provide an example and a yardstick for measuring cost and fixing fair prices elsewhere, provided the greed of private companies can be controlled in their determination to wreck this great movement. In a somewhat different manner the investment of millions at Boulder Dam on the Colorado will be of tremendous value in making available the resources of nature.

Oregon has been singled out for special consideration and will ever be mindful of the vision and courage of the President who created on the Columbia River at Bonneville a great public-works project similar to that in the Tennessee Valley. This dam was authorized by President Roosevelt on September 30, 1933, and is now nearing completion. Its certain influence on our economic life makes it of greatest importance. It will make possible navigation for ocean-going vessels a distance of 188 miles from the mouth of the river, and it will create an immense amount of electrical power. The total Government investment will be around $40,000,000, which is less than the cost of one of the two battleships authorized by the Seventy-fourth Congress. This battleship may disappear beneath the seas as a result of one bomb fired by some brave boy piloting an enemy plane. The amount of money needed for the important Umatilla Rapids Dam, which must come soon in order fully to utilize our advantages, will be twenty-four millions. The entire cost of Bonneville and Umatilla Rapids Dams, electric plants, and transmission lines to all large cities in Oregon and Washington will be less than one hundred millions. The cost of the two battleships will be one hundred and two millions. If we can afford such battleships, why should we question such a useful and valuable improvement as the utilization of this immense source of power on the Columbia River? Together with the other power developments possible on the Columbia and Snake Rivers, these two dams will be capable of turning the wheels of industry, electrifying our farms, and of lighting and heating every home of the immense population that will soon live in the land drained by the Columbia River.

This great development has its legislative problems to meet. Many proposals have been offered by delegations and members from the Northwest. It is urgently important that proper State legislation be enacted in Oregon, and most unfortunate that State measures urged by the Oregon State Grange and by the Secretary of the Interior have been defeated by those who do not favor public power development. The people of Oregon must accept this greatest opportunity that has come to them and must be alert and determined or it will be forever lost. The legislative battle is on in State and national bodies. The odds are against the people because of concentrated wealth and influence long on the job, while action has been deferred in the interests of private corporations.

I introduced into the House the bill finally agreed upon as most satisfactory for the beginning of power operation when the dam is finished in December 1937. New industries attracted to Oregon must have time to make plans. Congress should act at once, and, if action is not taken at this session, there can be but one interpretation of the situation—private greed in control. Failing action by the Seventy-fourth Congress, the Bonneville bill will become Oregon's major issue in the Seventy-fifth session. Let us prepare to win this battle for the right to profit from our last unexploited natural resource.

The struggle for our rights at Bonneville must be made against those same forces which made the bitterest fight against this administration—that against regulation and control of public-utility holding companies. No investigating committee will ever learn just how many millions this lobby spent to defeat the effort to legislate in the public interest. Every influence of the administration was brought into the contest for protection of investors in utility securities and users of electricity. The partial victory showed the great power of entrenched wealth.

The Rural Electrification Administration was created by Executive order in May 1935 with the purpose of aiding projects for power distribution to rural areas. This last session of Congress has enacted legislation making permanent and etxending this most useful agency. The effect of the program for power development and utilization will last long after its instigators have passed from the scene. It marks another advance into the new era.

FINANCE

Men and women, who never before studied money and banking, have become interested in such matters and now know how closely they concern them, and that it behooves them to learn what is taking place in the financial world. The Emergency Banking Act of the first days and the Banking Act of 1935 were necessitated by the banking disasters under the old order. The part of the new law which meant most to the small depositor was the guarantee of safety for bank deposits under the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, now extended to cover deposits up to $5,000. It took 30 years of effort to bring this about. Had bankers been willing to accept it when advocated by some of us so long ago, much of the tragic disaster of the great crash would have been averted. This act is an outstanding achievement of the Roosevelt administration. I particularly rejoiced in it because I had ardently advocated such legislation for many years. Now, who would surrender this protection?

There was no more far-reaching act of the Seventy-third nor of the Seventy-fourth Congress than the devaluation of the gold dollar or, rather, the revaluation at a lower price in terms of gold. When the United States broke away from the gold standard as a measure for the products of farm and factory and declared that contracts made in gold might be paid in current funds, there dawned a new economic day. Now, by legislative act and Executive decree, 59.06 cents worth of gold is one dollar, instead of 100 cents worth of gold. At the time of the departure from the gold standard the index of wholesale prices was 60, as compared to 100 in normal times. It is now 81. Prices have risen about 33 percent. In other words, debts and obligations bear only two-thirds as heavily as they did.

Nullification of the gold clause in contracts was, indeed, a brave act. At the time that act was passed the debtor could not, under any conditions, secure the gold to pay the obligation, because gold had been taken over by the Government. This situation was met by the administration in a statesmanlike manner that will stand out more clearly as the years come and go. To go back to the gold standard now would mean the severest of deflations. Wheat would be 25 cents a bushel and other farm products in that ratio.

We have not had all the money legislation we need, and as long as values are measured by a fluctuating commodity like gold, we cannot have a stable currency. When the dollar increases in value it takes more of our commodities to match it and more current funds or products to pay debts incurred when the dollar was low. We have not yet been able to secure a "managed currency" which will be wholly fair, and we still collect and bury gold for "security." We must modernize our money system in order to avert another break. Silver has not yet been accorded its proper place.

The evil of increasing government indebtedness to banks and tax-exempt bond issues has yet to be remedied. We must reestablish in the hands of the Federal Government the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof, which the Constitution placed there.

Those who talk most loudly about balancing the Budget must know that the Budget had long been unbalanced, and that the suffering and misery of the great emergency had to be met by government so long as money could be had from any source. The taxes to meet the needs have not been as high as those exacted in other countries. In fact, tax measures have been made extremely difficult by pressure from those privileged ones who are determined not to share their wealth gained by governmental protection and opportunity. The outlay has been moderate under the circumstances and has been justified.

The citizen in his relation to business has been protected by two outstanding laws in addition to the Public Utility Holding Companies Act of 1935: These are the Securities Act of '33 and the Securities Exchange Act of '35—real achievements—the beneficial results of which have been felt in every stock-trading center. The object of this legislation was to make it impossible for the fraudulent and corrupt promoter to sell his bogus securities to innocent purchasers. The extension of Reconstruction Finance Corporation borrowing privileges to industries and to irrigation and drainage districts and holders of city real estate has increased business activity and restored values.

THE RECORD SUMMARIZED

As I recite the history of the achievements of this administration during the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses, I am amazed at the summary, which clearly indicates that we have made a start toward building a new society—a real democracy. We have not reached our goal, but we have chosen the path which will lead to the perfection of our representative Government and we must not turn back. Only through social justice can we preserve our American institutions. We have gained new freedom and have lost none of our liberties through legislation under the leadership of a President determined to care for the interests of the average man. Government has been fulfilling its primary duty in coming to the rescue of those in need and assuming the heavy burden of responsibility. We have faced a crisis which no one expected and have survived as a nation. Out of our experience has come much of enduring value. We have begun to meet the difficulties of adjustment to a machine age. It is a challenge to experience as well as to youth.

It is easy to criticize and to promise what will be done if only power be given to another group. There has been no betrayal of confidence and the only obstruction has been that raised by the courts, which are traditionally slow to change and last to admit the necessity for experimentation. We may well take pride in the courage manifested in testing different methods of handling our governmental problems. We of the Administration claim allegiance of our citizens because we have enacted remedial legislation which has brought us out of the crisis of '32 and has pointed the way for action on the great issues which will next hold our attention. These are employment, permanent agricultural and labor policies, a stabilized currency, restoration of foreign trade, and social security for youth and old age. Preliminary to such action must come constitutional amendment to restore to our people and their Congress the right to meet issues as they come before us. Our Government must assume the right to pass laws necessary to the welfare of its people and of having those acts sustained by the courts. We in Oregon look forward with most interest to satisfactory legislation on Bonneville. We have, indeed, a full program for 4 more years of the New Deal. Who wants to return to '32?

WHAT THE NEW DEAL MEANS TO WOMEN INVESTORS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, it has often been said that men earn the money and women spend it. I would add that women also invest it, and the record discloses that women outnumber men as investors. However, their ranks are divided into three classes—each with a separate philosophy of investing and each carefully watching her money for a different reason. Whatever the reason may be, it is a fact that there are a great number of women investors throughout our country who must be interested in what our Government is doing to secure their investments. To begin with, we must understand that if the national income diminishes our income will diminish. Therefore what your Government has done to safeguard your income should be of paramount interest to you, no matter into which class you fall.

First, there is the smallest class of women investors—but an ever-growing number who are businessmen in their own right; on equal footing with men in every way; who have their own money to invest. In this group will be found some of the most outstanding personalities in the country as well as some of the finest women. They are faced with exactly the same problems and difficulties which confront every businessman in the country, but as is always so they approach the problem of investing their money from a different point of view. The political liberty we enjoy here in the United States has bestowed on women the free and unfettered right to invest their own money and because of that to make a valuable contribution to equality for women in the business world. This freedom has brought forth into the public eye many women who should be models to the rest of us for their unfailing belief in their own ability and their untiring efforts to invest the capital they have made. To these women the New Deal has given an additional security in their investments, particularly through the establishment of the Securities and Exchange Commission, which has stabilized the action of Wall Street and made registration of stocks and bonds obligatory, resulting in a rise in stock values. I will not linger further on this group, as I know they represent the smallest group of women investors in the country, although in most cases the best known.

I now think of a larger group—women who, too, invest money on wide scale but whose money has been made by their husbands, but who, because of various reasons, are entrusted with the care of the family finances. The largest percentage of these women are widows who have been left money, but not always financial security, by their husbands. Too often they have young children dependent on their ability to invest their money wisely and safely. To them the security of the New Deal in investments must be a great comfort. Often their entire income is tied up in an insurance company—safely invested, the husband thought, to provide a sufficient income for his wife and family. But that woman might well have found herself and her children faced with dire poverty and actual need had not the Reconstruction Finance Corporation come to the aid of the insurance companies and helped them through the black days following 1929. Or that woman's husband might have died feeling that his family would be financially secure for their lives because of his investment in real estate or in mortgages. But what would have become of that family if the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, established by our President to save homes and in that way to guarantee mortgages, had not been a bulwark of strength? Suppose a man had left his wife secure in the knowledge that his farm was large and well cultivated; that it would continue to produce an income sufficient to maintain his family. I do not need to tell you the actual privation, the misery and want, and, too often, the black despair, which came to live in many of these homes—places which should have been happy and free from the terrors of poverty. Just try to picture—or, perhaps, unfortunately, you have actually suffered the conditions I have described. But consider what might have happened had the President not established and continued the Farm Credit Administration, which saved more than a million farm homes valued at over $3,000,000,000. I am afraid to even think of the conditions that might have existed had a new deal not been established for the farmer. The organization of these agencies has been a very personal and real help to the women I have mentioned. It has vitally affected the course of their very lives, and in all cases has helped them to continue their fight for their families with renewed courage and high hopes for their eventual financial security once again.

But when I think of women investors of the country I think most particularly of the largest group—the very backbone of the Nation—the wives and mothers of America. On them too often depends the financial security of the family, although the man is the wage earner. It is their duty to put aside a little money from week to week—maybe only 10 cents or a quarter at time, but it represents the savings of their lives. It means the difference between independence in their old age and the dreaded shelter of a poor farm or an old peoples' home. They must be safeguarded. But they had been woefully neglected until President Roosevelt came into office. As you know, this woman puts her little savings in a bank—in a savings account—and rests happy in the knowledge that she is helping her husband accumulate a nest egg. Was it not a horrible experience for that woman to try to get her savings out of that bank during the depression only to find hundreds of desperate, fear-ridden men and women storming the very doors of the bank only to be told that the bank was closed; that she had lost, because of one man's greed, her life savings. When Roosevelt came into office there had been 25,000 bankruptcies during the first 9 months of 1932, with liabilities of more than $750,000,000. For the first 9 months of this year there were less than 9,000 bankruptcies, with liabilities of $170,000,000.

There were more than 1,000 bank failures during the first 9 months of 1932, with 438 during early months of 1933, with a net loss to the depositors of about $600,000,000. During 1934 there was only one bank failure and in 1935 but four. Then our President, realizing that the small depositor was the biggest loser in these bank failures, worked for the establishment of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which guarantees the individual bank deposits up to $5,000. Do you realize that this covers 98 percent of all depositors' accounts? Just think of the misery which need not have been endured had this brave step been taken years before by Mr. Hoover. But he lacked the courage and the foresight to take any step forward to help his struggling people out of the morass into which they had fallen.

In this group of women are the home builders—the mothers who fight and struggle and save to buy a house, the eternal symbol of security and the most sought-for investment in the world. How often the savings fell just short of the money necessary to buy the house and were spent for rent instead of the investment for which they were intended. President Roosevelt knew this and established the Federal Housing Administration, which allows you to buy or build with only 20 percent of the needed cash on hand for building or buying. The long-term single mortgage has saved thousands of dollars for women home owners.

I wish it were possible for me to talk with you at greater length on this subject—that is so dear to my heart—to tell you of the many safeguards the New Deal has built around your investments. President Roosevelt has fought and struggled and worked hard and long to renew the inalienable right we as Americans have to invest our savings and our capital safely and productively. He has succeeded with the help of a sympathetic Congress. We women now are safer, and because of that security happier in a life which is at best fraught with lurking trials and dangers. We need courage and faith—courage which must dwell within each one of us and faith which must be fostered by someone we can trust. We can trust our President. He has taken care of us for 4 years in a way that has inspired confidence. With a return of these two qualities—which were for a time threatened—America will progress and we women will be safer and happier.

THE HOLDING-COMPANY BILL

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, the Public Utility Act of 1935 was in two titles. Title II dealt with operating companies engaged in the transmission of electric current across State lines. It is administered by the Federal Power Commission. I supported that title both in committee and by my vote on the floor. That title, so far as I know, has been accepted by the electric-light industry and has not been attacked in the courts.

Title I dealt with holding companies. It is administered by a different body—the Securities Exchange Commission. I supported and voted for the less drastic House bill. I voted against the more drastic Senate bill. I did so for four reasons: First, it was unnecessarily destructive to some 5,000,000 investors who had put their savings into such companies in good faith; second, the worst of the evils of holding companies are already on their way out and cannot be repeated under other legislation, particularly the Securities Act of 1933, which I helped draft; third, a better, less drastic, and certainly constitutional method was available for accomplishing the objective of paring down the pyramided superstructures—I refer to a tax on intercorporate dividends which I advocated at the time both before my committee and the Ways and Means Committee and which has since been incorporated into income-tax law; fourth, because in my judgment the Senate bill was clearly unconstitutional, would be so held, and in the end nothing constructive would have been accomplished. Title II goes far beyond holding companies, and it holds a "death sentence"—the power to compel reorganization—over every operating company in the country that is owned in part by a holding company.

In justice to myself and others who held the same view, I call attention to the fact that four United States Federal judges have since passed on the constitutionality of the Senate bill, and all four have unanimously upheld the judgment I expressed as to its illegality.

The first was the district judge at Baltimore. From his decision an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. On February 22, 1936, Judges Parker, Northcott, and Soper of that circuit sustained the district court in all important particulars.

I quote briefly from that opinion:

We are told that power to enact the statute is derived from the constitutional grants to regulate commerce among the States and to establish post roads and post offices. * * *

The regulatory control of the act is imposed upon holding companies which use the mails or the instrumentalities of interstate commerce for certain purposes. * * *

It is contended that the decisions show that there is a national police power, which is not limited in its exercise to the transportation of articles in themselves harmful, such as adulterated foods or diseased stock, but may include a beneficial article, such as an automobile, if Congress has reason to think that evil will result from its use in interstate transportation; and hence Congress may take steps to eliminate the evils that may reasonably be thought to result from the interstate distribution or acquisition of unapproved securities through interstate communications or from the unregulated use of the dangerous holding-company device. * * *

We are of the opinion that the argument is not in accord with the rule to be deduced from the decisions which hold that the mere use of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce in the transportation of commodities does not authorize Congress to regulate their local production. It should be borne in mind that neither the debtor nor any of its subsidiaries is engaged in interstate commerce. * * *

The Holding Company Act goes much further, for it seeks not merely to control the use of the means of distribution but in many material respects the business of the user. The scope of the Public Utility Act is in fact more extensive than any congressional regulation of the use of the mails or the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, which has stood the test of litigation. * * *

The objection to the Public Utility Act is similar to that which proved fatal to the first child-labor statute passed by Congress and considered by the Supreme Court in Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251). The statute was held unconstitutional on the broad ground that it was an attempt to regulate the internal affairs of the State. * * *

It was held that the grant of power to Congress to regulate interstate commerce does not authorize it to control the States in the exercise of their police power over local trade or manufacture. * * *

In both of these cases, as in the present case, the Government urged that the legislation should be upheld because the evil aimed at affected the whole Nation, and could not be effectively cured by the separate action of the several States, but only through an act of Congress bearing upon all localities alike, but the Court pointed out that it is as much its duty to strike down an unconstitutional act designed to achieve a desirable end if it is not within the power of Congress as it is to uphold an act passed in conformity with the Constitution, although the Court may not perceive the wisdom of its underlying policy. Otherwise the dividing line between the powers of the National Government and the powers of the States would be obliterated. * * *

The application of the Holding Company Act to the business of the debtor and its subsidiaries would bring about a regulation and control of local business in the field in which it relates, that would be comparable in its effect to that which the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 195), sought to impose upon conditions of local trade. * * *

Little need be added with regard to the power of Congress to establish post offices and post roads. The power has been frequently exercised to regulate practices in the use of the mails which Congress decided would be injurious to the carriage of the mails or would subject the mails to use for fraudulent or unlawful purposes. * * *

The Court, however, held that the power was not absolute, but that it was subject to rights preserved in the Constitution. * * *

It becomes clear that certain provisions of the act if given effect would regulate and control activities of the debtor or trustees necessary to carry out any plan of reorganization, which have no relation to the protection of the mails of or the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. * * *

We conclude that the Public Utility Act is invalid insofar as it relates to the reorganization of the debtor.

This case and others involving the same questions are now on their way to the Supreme Court of the United States. I have little doubt but that it will be held that the act was beyond the power of Congress to enact and that the more moderate and clearly constitutional alternative of a tax on intercorporate dividends was the wise course to have been chosen. That course would have accomplished the result, but would have done so gradually and without unnecessary destruction of property, and without needlessly sacrificing recovery and expansion and reemployment in a great and important industry.

It must be left to fair-minded men to determine who are the genuine friends of reform—those who advocate measures which cannot stand up, or those who proceed upon the sure foundations of constitutional law.

No one has criticized the evils that grew up in this industry more vigorously than I. In my separate report on the bill I said:

The pyramiding of holding companies, however—in some instances as much as 10 stories—is a legal monstrosity, an economic dinosaur, and a social wrong. Nevertheless, both State and National Governments have permitted, even encouraged them. In the meantime, and on the faith of what their own governments have created, thousands of innocent people have invested the savings of a lifetime. Government itself is partly at fault in the matter, and because this is so the remedy for the evils which have grown up should take the equities of investors into consideration.

These evils, in my judgment, are on their way out, and drastic remedies are neither necessary nor just. To begin with, many of these financial structures have fallen of their own weight—such as Insull, Foshay, and Clark. In addition, the following forces have entered the field since 1929 and are now at work. They are:

1. The recent elimination of consolidated tax returns which also encouraged the development of corporate superstructure and for which the Federal Government, like the repeal of the intercorporate dividend tax, must accept its share of the responsibility for the situation which we now seek to cure.
2. The Federal Securities Act of 1933, as amended.
3. The Federal Stock Exchange Act of 1934.
4. The Federal Power Commission Act.
5. Closer regulation of utility securities and operations by various State commissions, some 32 in number.
6. As a pertinent example we now have statutes in many States which require the filing of all management, construction, and engineering, and other contracts made with an affiliate, and providing that no such contract shall be effective unless so filed. The Commission, after a hearing, may hold the contract in whole or in part as against the public interest. Statutes of this character are now in force in New York, Kansas, Virginia, North Carolina, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Illinois, Indiana, Oregon, Maine, and Wisconsin.
7. Last but not least, even in the absence of State statutes, we have the powerful effect of recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court, such as Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co. (282 U. S. 133) and Dayton Power & Light Co. v. Public Utility Commission (292 U. S. 297), holding that State commissions may inquire into and disallow excessive charges made for services, etc., by holding companies to their subsidiaries.

The focusing of these forces, and others which might be mentioned, has changed the picture very greatly over that of 10 years ago, and, in my judgment, will operate not only to prevent future abuses but also tend to weed out the rank growths and unfair practices which grew up in the past.

This brings us to the "death sentence" as it appeared in the original bill and as now appears in the Senate bill (S. 2796, sec. 11). It may be pointed out that this was not advocated:

1. By the Federal Trade Commission in its utility company report;
2. By the Federal Power Commission;
3. By the Securities Exchange Commission;
4. By the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce;
5. By any group of consumers;
6. By any group of investors;
7. By the State public utility commissions; or
8. By the party platforms of the Democratic or Republican parties.

In the hearings none of the Government witnesses gave the "death sentence" a clear-cut endorsement.

The "death sentence" as it now appears in the Senate bill, in my judgment, will crack like an eggshell in the United States Supreme Court for reasons which I have stated at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Thursday, June 20, 1935, page 9787. If this is so, why pass it?

Well, we have passed the law. A year has also passed. We have condemned, and very properly so, the stock jobbing, stock watering, wildcat promotion, and speculation that prevailed in the industry.

But a problem still remains far more important to us now than the frenzied finance that crashed in 1929. That is the problem of unemployment, of jobless men, of the dole, and a national debt growing nearly $7,000 a minute.

Has that problem been solved?

Did the passage of this extreme bill put men to work?

No; it condemned them to continued idleness. Next to the automobile industry, none in America was in a better position to expand, hire men, and purchase enormous quantities of durable goods than the light and power industry. But now it must have its progress checked, its future clouded, and its expansion curtailed by an extreme and unconstitutional law which must drag its weary way through the courts.

Why? Because the law went too far. Because it puts every operating company affiliated with a holding company under the threat of reorganization, dismemberment, dissolution, and sale. What industry can expand under those circumstances?

I repeat, I am speaking of operating companies, not the holding companies. Because of its title the public thinks the bill hits only holding companies. They should take the trouble to read the bill and see that it is the operating companies that have a suspended sentence hanging over their heads.

Stop evil practices? Of course. Punish crooks? Certainly. Put men back to work? No. That is where the bill pinches today. It subjects men to relief and the dole who ought to be out stringing wire.

Some day passion will cool and prejudice will pass and this bill will then be seen in its true light—needed and necessary reform, but reform run wild. The greatest reform today would be to reform the pay envelopes and pocketbooks of our millions of unemployed.

The underlying question in the Senate bill was not a utility question at all. It was the question of the legislative destruction of property rights without trial—by court or commission—to separate the sheep from the goats, the good from the bad. And it certainly cannot be gainsaid that there are utility companies which have not been guilty of the serious evils complained of. The Federal Trade Commission will vouch for that fact.

I am not afraid to say that I oppose legislative confiscation of property without trial, without a hearing, without a "day in court."

That to which the worst criminal is entitled cannot be justly denied to law-abiding American citizens whose only fault, if any, is that they trusted too much in other men in investing their savings in companies which the laws of their own country had authorized.

A SUGGESTED PLAN FOR THE REHABILITATION OF HUMAN LIFE THROUGH COOPERATIVE RESETTLEMENT

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, on a previous occasion I took some time to discuss the general economic situation of the country. I tried to point out some of the causes of our present plight. Today I wish to suggest a plan for economic rehabilitation that has been worked out or designed by a group of economists, businessmen, agriculturalists, and engineers, commonly known on the west coast as the "Spark's plan." May I at the outset warn that any criticism that merely says "No" is insufficient. There may be criticism and disagreement, but unless some better method is suggested for human rehabilitation as a part of the criticism such criticism is hardly fair.

Understand, I do not propose this as a cure-all or as the only way to work out of our difficulties. As I say, this is a suggested plan offered for consideration.

The so-called "Spark's plan" proposes:

1. To develop a sizable laboratory experiment and working model of a definitely planned cooperative economy for those in need of employment and especially for those who are permanently disinherited under the existing profit economy.

2. To develop such cooperatives on the basis of voluntary membership, free from any legal forcing, such applications to be passed upon on the basis of willingness to cooperate and ability to make some contribution, relatively easy to get into and just as easy to get out of.

3. To provide opportunity within the cooperative for abilities and ages that our high-pressure economic system no longer finds profitable; in short, for every kind of creative, constructive, or valuable occupation, skill, and ability, whether as ditch digger, mechanic, farmer, preacher, teacher, doctor, nurse, housewife, artist, or musician. It is estimated that from 20 to 25 percent of the total number will be needed for agriculture, with the balance engaged in all the useful industries and activities found in any organized society, such as manufacture and distribution, a full health program, full educational program, full leisure-time program, with full development of cultural and spiritual values.

4. To develop one large cooperative of 200,000 members.

5. To secure Federal financing, roughly estimated, at $75,000,000 for:

a. Capital investment in lands, plant, and equipment.

b. Essential supplies on a diminishing scale as production gradually takes the place of procurement outside the cooperative.

6. To use, in general, the legal machinery of the nonprofit corporation.

7. To use the typical cooperative set-up of one member, one share, one vote, and no proxy voting; eliminating the dangers of small clique or Fascist control; guaranteeing democratic control.

8. To join democratic control with typical corporation line and staff management. This junction can take place at the board of directors, democratically elected, vested with full authority to direct, but denied participation in execution; given the mandate to find and secure the best available executive ability for such actual management; imparting to such management, within appropriate contractual limitations, full responsibility, and full authority. This plan has long been in successful operation in agricultural marketing associations. It is also the technical or presumed plan of most corporations, though there it is usually defeated by the proxy voting, which is here eliminated. This junction of democratic control and line and staff management eliminates the dangers of fascism on one side and of mob management on the other.

9. To make possible through centralized control of one large cooperative, comprehensive planning and coordination of many activities divergent in nature and separated in location.

10. To avoid the inherent and fatal weaknesses of the small self-help cooperative units, predestined to failure by their lack of coordination, inadequate possibilities for reciprocal operations, lack of comprehensive planning, and lack of experienced management.

11. To give to planning, to comptroller operations, and to all angles of management the same recognition, and to carry them out with the same universal application and thoroughness that is aimed at in the best-run corporations.

12. To make the maximum use of modern science and technology; never using pick-and-shovel methods where machines can be secured or devised to do the same work better, or with greater economy of human labor.

13. To give the members of such cooperative an opportunity to produce their own requirements, instead of maintaining them in unwilling idleness on an un-American and intolerable substandard of living, and at the expense of those who still have some material assets.

14. To keep off the relief rolls marginal cases in need of employment.

15. To take completely off the tax-load those members who are accepted from the relief rolls.

16. To provide for the full circle of human needs on a cooperative basis rather than undertaking only small segments of that circle, or partial and unconnected operations, such as housing only, or food only, which leaves the members who have been on relief still in the laps of the taxpayers for the balance of their needs.

17. To carry every operation back to natural resources so far as available resources will permit, and as fast as may prove practical. Thus, housing will be carried back to timber lands for lumber, to quarries for stone, and to clay pits for brick, tile, and ceramics. Clothing will be carried back to cotton lands for cotton, to sheep ranges for wool, and so forth. All operations to be under the cooperative structure or management.

18. To center the development of such cooperative working model in a general way in the West, because of the exceptional combination of resources and conditions here offered, as 12 months' agriculture compared with 3 to 6 months in many other parts of the country; the wide range of other natural resources; and the existence of the old Spanish land-grant titles, which, in the case of California, were recognized by the United States Government when this

State came into the Union and have served to keep out of intensive settlement some of the best lands of the West, making it possible now to secure land in large contiguous areas or units without having to acquire and consolidate many small pieces of land, with the difficulties and losses that would be involved in such a procedure.

19. To secure by purchase as wide a range as possible of essential natural resources, as timber lands in Oregon and Washington, wheat lands in Idaho and Montana, sheep and cattle lands in Arizona, with areas in California for general farming, for cotton, for fruit farming (both citrus and deciduous), together with suitable locations for fisheries, for oil, hydroelectric power, and mining.

20. To develop a basic standard of living for all members that will include the essential requirements for human life, eliminating, as far as the cooperative is concerned, all charity and the worst of the economic pressures that carry in their wake starvation, malnutrition, disease, begging, crime, and suicide.

21. To raise that basic standard to include as much additional enjoyment of the possibilities of human life as the success of the cooperative as a whole will permit.

22. To provide, over and above such basic standard, for differentials in remuneration that recognize differences in the value of different kinds of work, difference in ability, training, and application.

23. To develop within the cooperative structure commodity credit exchange banking of a simple, practical nature.

24. To bring to bear on the Nation's major economic problem the scientific or open-minded approach, free from political implications and "isms"; to solve, on a laboratory scale and in a practical working model, the basic problems involved, working out methods, procedures, and techniques for bringing into actual being conditions of human existence in keeping with the abundance that modern science has made potential.

That ye might have life, and have it more abundantly.

HON. WILLIAM D. THOMAS

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, with a feeling of deep regret, it is well for us to pause a moment in our deliberations to reflect upon the passing of our colleague and friend, WILLIAM D. THOMAS.

A newcomer to the Seventy-fourth Congress, it was not long before I came to admire and respect Mr. THOMAS, not only for his sound judgment as a legislator but also as a generous and kindly friend. Always he was the same; a smile for all and a kind word for each one, but with it all a high sense of duty to his constituency and a sincerity in his deliberations. Many times did I go to him for guidance, and never did he hesitate to give me the full benefit of his experience, which I learned, as time went on, was wise and helpful. A beginner in the House of Representatives has many things to learn, and sooner or later each one acquires a godfather who out of the generosity of his heart is ready to pass on to his ward bits of counsel that can only be acquired with years of experience. Mr. THOMAS was that to me.

Being deprived of his presence during the greater part of the second session of the Congress, we now have lost him forever. Though he is gone, his memory will linger with me and with all his close associates forever; we shall always remember him as the quiet, friendly, and able man that he was. May each of us in years to come seek to emulate the same spirit of fatherliness and friendliness toward those new men of the coming Congresses as was possessed by our colleague, BILL THOMAS.

THE SOCIAL-SECURITY LAW

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the social-security law is one of the most unusual and far-reaching laws ever passed by Congress. It is unusual in several ways: First, it takes the Government into many new lines of activity—old-age pensions, pensions for the blind, and unemployment insurance; second, it provides a new and unique method of taxation to meet the expenses; third, it provides State participation along new lines. It is far-reaching in that it touches all classes of people. It involves millions of our people directly and all of our people and all of our activities directly or indirectly. It is in reality 10 very important laws all included in one. It is divided into 10 titles, each title being in effect a law unto itself. It will cost not only many millions of dollars, but it will cost many, many billions of dollars. If carried through, the funds accumulated to meet the annuities that will be due in 40 years from now will exceed any sum ever contemplated by any government that ever existed. For instance, the reserve fund that will be kept in the Federal Treasury to meet the demands of title II of this act—annuity insurance—will amount to more than $50,000,000,000, all of which will be invested in Government bonds. This amount is far in excess of our national debt, which is, as everybody knows, already threatening to bankrupt the Nation.

These 10 titles divide themselves into 2 groups—insurance group and charitable group. Titles II, III, VII, and IX are the insurance group. I shall not discuss them here. Title I, old-age pensions; IV, aid to dependent children; V, maternal and child-welfare aid; VI, public health; X, blind pensions, are the charitable titles. Each of these titles suggest the groups cared for thereunder.

It shall be my purpose to discuss only titles I and X.

TITLE I—OLD-AGE PENSIONS

There is much misunderstanding among all classes of people as to the manner and method in which this law works. This is due largely to the fact that it involves a participation on the part of the Government with the States. The Federal law—the social-security law—provides that the Federal Government will pay its portion to the State to be distributed by the State if and when the State provides a plan which meets the requirements demanded by the Federal law. The Federal law lays down some general requirements with which the States must comply, but it leaves to the States quite a wide latitude in many respects. No two States have identically the same laws. Hence the confusion. And the desire of members of State legislatures and State executive departments to claim credit that is not due them also confuses the people greatly. For instance, in Ohio, which is inflicted with a Democratic State government, both executive and legislative, the people are kept in a confused attitude by reason of the propaganda put forth in which individual credit is claimed by many who deserve no credit, and in which political pressure is exerted in an effort to profit politically from the misfortune of the deserving poor. A Democratic State legislature and a Democratic Governor refuses to pass an old-age-pension law in Ohio, so the people took it unto themselves to override the Governor and legislature, and they availed themselves of the initiative and referendum provision of the State constitution and submitted an old-age-pension law to the people by a referendum vote, and the same was carried overwhelmingly. So any person receiving an old-age pension in Ohio is under no obligation to the Democratic Party or to a Democratic Governor or to a Democratic legislature for the small pension received. The only obligation he owes is a recognition of the fact that the people of Ohio by a solemn referendum vote did their duty, while a Democratic Governor and Democratic legislature refused to do their duty.

Under the force of the referendum passed by the people of the State, Ohio began paying a State old-age pension in 1934. This law provided a maximum pension of $30 per month, and provided a residence of at least 15 years in the State. The law is administered by county set-ups under the control of a State administrator.

The Federal old-age-pension law is administered by a board of three members known as the Social Security Board. The Federal law provides that in order for any State to receive Federal assistance that State must pass laws providing for a State system for the payment of old-age pensions only to persons in need and to persons 65 years of age or over, and to persons who have lived in Ohio for 5 out of the last 9 years preceding application and who have been living in Ohio for the year immediately preceding the application. When a State has met these requirements the Federal Government is ready to advance one-half of the amount necessary to pay pensions to those persons found to be entitled to receive them. But the Government will not pay to exceed $15 per month to any individual. The Federal Government leaves to the States the matter of the administration of the law. It is the duty of the State authorities to set up the machinery by which the law is carried out.

The Federal Government expects the State to make all the necessary plans and provisions for investigating all those who apply for old-age pensions. The Federal Government pays a part of the expense of this work, but it requires that it be done by the State upon the theory that the State is nearer to the people and should be able to do the work more efficiently. When the State has made the proper investigation and fixes the amount to be paid to any individual, the Federal Government will pay one-half of the amount, but the amount to be paid by the Federal Government will not be more than $15 per month to each individual. To explain by illustration: When John Jones applies for an old-age pension to the county old-age-pension director, his case is investigated. If he is allowed a pension of $25 per month, the Federal Government will pay one-half that amount. If he is living in a State which pays as much as $40 per month, and the county director allows him $40 per month, then the Federal Government will pay $15 per month and no more, and the State Government will supply the balance. The Federal law does not limit the States in the amount the States may pay. Ohio provides a maximum of $30 for each person and a maximum of $60 for husband and wife. The average payment in Ohio per individual for the year 1935 is about $15.

The Federal Government commenced its participation with the beginning of February 1936. Before that time, Ohio was paying an old-age pension from its own funds. The average amount paid before the Federal Government entered the field was about $15 per person. Many were receiving $18 and $20 per month. It was the expectation of Congress that when it entered the field the States would continue their payments and would add the Government's share to the State's share and thereby double the pension to those receiving them. But the Democratic administration in Ohio, through its Governor and its legislature, proceeded to lay plans whereby they would cut the State's part of the pension almost in half and supply that from the Federal Government's share. For instance, if John Jones was drawing a pension of $15 before the Federal Government came forward with any money, it was to be expected that he would draw $30 per month when the Federal Government would come forward with its $15 per month. But the Democratic administration in Columbus saw a chance to cut the old-age pensioners in Ohio out of about $8,000,000 per year, so they decided to keep John Jones' pension at $15 per month; the State would only pay $7.50 of this amount and the Federal Government would pay the other $7.50, so the State would save $7.50 per month off of John Jones, and that is why John Jones cannot understand why he is not getting $30 as he had expected. When Congress passed the social-security law, John Jones and thousands of others in Ohio thought that the Government was going to match the State. The Government did match the State, but the State refused to match the Government. This explains how the matter was handled by the State, but it does not bring the increase that Congress intended or that the poor pensioner expected.

When the Government advances its share of the money to the State it does not wait until each case is passed upon. It advances an estimated amount and then an exact accounting is had between the proper fiscal agents of the Government and the State. An exact 50–50 account is kept. The Federal Government sent to Ohio for the months of February and March 1936 the sum of $1,611,875. For the months of April, May, and June, 1936, the Federal Government sent Ohio the sum of $2,140,425.

Thirty States have qualified to receive Federal contributions for old-age pensions and several others are about to qualify. In April of this year 428,634 persons in the various States of the Union received old-age-pension aid from this Federal law in the total amount of $6,430,705.

TITLE X.—BLIND PERSONS

This is a title with which I can claim close intimacy. Without boasting, I think I can claim credit for having been responsible for the inclusion of this title in this law. I am making mention of this because I am proud to have had a part in bringing relief to the most pitiable group among all of our unfortunates. The poet speaks of "chill penury." Poverty is cold. Probably nothing freezes up the soul and body quite as completely as does poverty. If one class of poverty is colder than another, the poverty of the man who is both poor and blind is the coldest. There is no person in the whole American economic life so pitiable as the poor blind man or woman who holds out a rusty tin cup in an emaciated hand on a street corner on a cold, snowy day. To have helped to relieve that person justifies me in this seeming immodesty—especially in view of the claims put up by men whom I know to claim undue credit for their participation in the passage of this worth-while section of the Federal social-security law and in the passage of State laws to match the Federal law.

Only a few of the States had laws for the aid of the blind before the Federal social-security law was passed. Ohio had a State school for the blind, and special efforts were being put forth in some of the cities of Ohio for teaching the blind some useful trade or art. And there was a law which provided aid to the blind. The law left it to the counties to provide their own aid. In most of the counties the aid provided was only about $10 or $15 every 3 months. And in many of the counties, payments were deferred for months because of financial difficulties.

When the social-security bill was first up for consideration before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, of which committee I am a member, it contained no provision for aid to the blind. The committee considered this important bill for many weeks. During this time I maintained that the blind should be included. Gradually other members joined me. But the Democratic administration, through its representatives who had drawn the bill, refused to include the blind. I offered this amendment when the bill was in the committee, but my amendment was rejected by the committee, in line with the wishes of the Democratic administration. When the bill was up for consideration in the House I offered the same amendment. Although the amendment received the votes of many individual Democratic Members who recognized the merits of it, yet under the power of a large Democratic majority responsive to orders from the White House the amendment was rejected. When the bill came up for consideration in the Senate, and after public sentiment had a chance to express itself and when it became evident that the public was demanding this inclusion of the blind if any bill was to be passed, the administration receded and the blind amendment was added by the Senate in almost identical language with the amendment offered by me in the House. It became and now is title X of the social-security law.

Under this title it will be seen that the Federal Government will participate with the States for the relief of any needy blind person over 18 years of age up to $15 per month. This is upon condition that the States provide a State plan which meets certain requirements as set out in this law. Ohio has passed such a law, but it has not as yet succeeded in having its plan fully approved so that Federal funds can be used. The Federal Government has its share ready to send on when the State will be able to do its part. Many of the States are already receiving their part and the blind in those States are receiving their pensions. But in Ohio, because of failure of the Governor and the legislature to act, the blind of Ohio must continue to hold out their tin cups on the street corners. In Pennsylvania, 7,706 blind people received aid during the month of March. The number is larger each succeeding month. This shows about the number in Ohio that would be receiving aid if the Ohio authorities were abreast with their duties to this unfortunate class.

In 18 States where blind pensions were being paid in April 1936 the statistics show that 14,543 persons received $353,556, or an average of $25 per month.

The Governor of Ohio and the legislature should proceed immediately to make plans for the payment of pensions to the blind of the State. The State already has an organization in each county administering the old-age-pension plan. It could, with little additional trouble and expense, make provision for this same organization to administer the blind pension. The blind pension can be brought to those entitled to it with much less investigation than the requests for the old-age pension. The only facts to be proved are the fact of the blindness of the applicant and the fact of his need. Any delay for political reasons or for the purpose of propaganda is inexcusable. Any attempt on the part of the Democratic administration to play politics with these unfortunate blind will call forth the indignation of the people who have already been outraged by pernicious petty politics. The Federal Government stands ready. Let the State do its duty so that this large unfortunate group may receive the consideration that they deserve.

HON. WILLIAM D. THOMAS

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, the friends of WILLIAM D. THOMAS in this House have heard with deep regret of his passing. While he was here a comparatively short time, WILL THOMAS' unfailing friendliness drew to him many who like myself held him in warm admiration and affection. We shall miss him in this House and we all regret that he was called so soon to the unseen temple.

Having served in the State legislature, Representative THOMAS brought to the Congress a knowledge of legislative affairs which served him well. He took his legislative responsibility seriously and gave careful thought and study to the result upon the people of his district of all pending proposals and his votes were cast after true deliberation. When his health enabled him to do so, he gave assiduous application to the duties imposed upon him by his membership in the House and on the Committees on the Post Office and Post Roads, Public Buildings and Grounds, and War Claims. He was sincere, active, and faithful to the interests of his constituents. No request ever went unheeded. His was a heritage of faithful service.

WILL THOMAS exhibited that finest of all capacities, the capacity for friendship. He was kind and loved to do good to others for the pleasure it gave him. It was by reason of this quality he was universally liked and why he maintained the love of the people whom he represented.

Ability and industry were his. These qualities brought him to Congress and made possible his reelection. He was a strong Republican, but when the welfare of his constituency was at stake he knew no partisanship. His purpose was to serve his country and his people. He was motivated by fine impulses. In Republican councils, as in the hearts of his friends across the aisle, he leaves a pleasant memory which will long be cherished by those with whom he served. His constituents loved him as a kindly neighbor and a thoughtful friend whom they cannot easily replace.

A man of the people, WILL THOMAS indulged no consciousness of superiority; separated from them neither by pride nor eccentricity, he was incapable of arrogance. He was conversant with the strivings of his constituency and eagerly worked for their prosperity. He exemplified in his office the spirit of brotherly understanding, clothed it with a garment of gentleness, common sense, and sympathy—the stamp of American character.

UNFAIR AND UNJUST TAXES PLACED ON AMERICAN WOMEN—NECESSITY OF REDUCING AND REMOVING TAXES ON COSMETICS

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in addressing my colleagues of the House of Representatives on the subject of cosmetics and taxes imposed upon the manufacturer of them, I am conscious of the fact that some among you may still harbor an antiquated idea that cosmetics are only used by the leisure classes of the female population of our country.

Possibly you are convinced that the lure of the sirens was in part accounted for by the use of ancient cosmetics. Homer, however, made no reference to the subject when describing his escape.

Sensibly, I should at the beginning of these remarks emphatically state that cosmetics as made today are a necessity for women of all ages, and, as astonishing as it may sound, men, too, find many of them indispensable to their well-being.

It is improbable that many of you have reviewed Ormsby's treatise, Diseases of the Skin. Personally I was shocked to learn of the painful and disfiguring consequences of neglecting sensible care of the skin. Perhaps the industry in America has in its advertising overemphasized "beauty" rather than developing their sale approach through the common-sense recommendation of use of cosmetics to promote skin health and preservation.

Dermatologists of ethical standing have been cooperating with cosmetic manufacturers in the scientific study of ingredients in products. This work will and must continue. Be assured the objective is more vital to humanity than any appeal to the vanity of the foolish minority of males or females.

Scientific reference to causes of skin diseases would be too difficult to attempt. It is sufficient to say that they fall into three classes:

First. Skin conditions resulting from constitutional diseases.

Second. Cutaneous diseases wholly external, sometimes resulting from parasitic infections.

Third. Diseases of the skin traceable to toxic poisons.

It would be idle not to admit that the lives of hundreds of thousands have been made uncomfortable by skin disorders of the second category. Victims of malignant skin diseases are acute sufferers not only from the direct effect but from humiliation that leads frequently to morose despondency.

An industry, or may I more properly say with respect to some of its activities, a profession, contributing to the solution of such serious human problems should not have fastened to it the sole appellation "luxury."

Obviously, I admit that some products of the industry do serve vanity. Even so, if in spreading the gospel of good grooming, girls, women, boys, and men do take more care of their skin, they will escape many contagious infections, thus materially reducing the total number of victims of skin diseases, some temporary, some painfully permanent, thus truly adding to the comfort and pleasures of living.

As a woman I plead with this House of Representatives not to tax, or to discontinue taxing, millions of American women on commodities that they need for better health. Remember, too, many, many thousands require ordinary everyday cosmetics in order to hold or secure a position in commerce and industry. For the appearance of a person is a factor of importance, often determining employment or no employment.

You must not ignore the effect of this present tax upon the employees of the industry directly engaged in production. They number some 30,000 people, mostly women. In distribution this tax affects more than 100,000 retail merchants who employ other thousands of female sales clerks that are depending upon consumption of cosmetics to keep their jobs. In addition to this vast number, the suppliers of materials to cosmetic manufacturers give work to not less than 50,000 more citizens in the production of containers such as bottles, boxes, cans, metal boxes, paper, cartons, and packing units.

Actual materials used in the industry are widely diversified, their growth and manufacture affecting the farmer, the livestock, essential oil, petroleum, chemical, paper, and printing industries and at least a percentage of their workers. The high tax placed on cosmetics is a matter of grave concern to every American woman. Many organizations of women have appealed to me to lead the effort to reduce or remove taxes on cosmetics.

Let me tell you how I became interested in leading this effort to help my fellow women by reducing both the Federal and State taxes which now impose an unfair and unjust financial burden upon my sex.

Several weeks ago Mr. T. Howard Kelly, executive editor of the Drug World and American Druggist, the two outstanding publications in the drug and cosmetic industry in America, asked me if I would join his magazines in a campaign against cosmetic taxes. Mr. Kelly's request immediately appealed to me because for some time past I had resented the Federal and State taxes which have been saddled upon everyday toilet goods to such an extent that they are now making the prices of such products almost prohibitive to women on slender budgets, and I have come to the definite conclusion that these taxes are both discriminatory and unfair to my sex on the grounds that cosmetics today are not luxuries but absolute necessities. Consequently, I gladly joined the Drug World and American Druggist crusade, and recently I agreed to lead this fight for these magazines, for the benefit of American women.

Our preliminary activities have already brought highly encouraging results. Many Members of the House of Representatives have pledged their support in our drive to reduce or repeal the Federal tax. Women's organizations all over the country have responded to our appeal to them to support this campaign against both Federal and State taxes.

From the first, I have been convinced, and both Drug World and American Druggist have shared my conviction, that the way to abolish these discriminatory taxes was to appeal directly to the Congress and American womanhood, and to organize my fellow women in a united effort to reduce or repeal levies, because these cosmetic taxes actually victimize women and it is our job as women to repeal them. Consequently, I first let the women know the truth—that they are being victimized. I am now also advising the Members of this House of Representatives that these taxes are unfair to women.

Now, I am a Democrat, but I am appealing to the Members of Congress and I am approaching the women of America from the viewpoint of every woman and not from a viewpoint of a Democratic woman.

My interest in cosmetics goes back to my childhood, because I am a daughter of a druggist. Many years ago my father, James E. Somes, was an assayer of drugs in the United States customhouse in New Orleans. A graduate pharmacist of Vincennes University, he established his drug store in my birthplace, Terre Haute, Ind., in 1875. As a little girl I was fascinated by the cosmetic counter. I remember the little sample bottles of lotions, creams, soaps, and powders which were often given to us, and oh, they were such joys to little girls who played with dolls. Little did I think then, or for years afterward, that in time to come these items, then looked upon as luxuries, were to become actual necessities in the daily lives of American housewives and workingwomen.

But that is exactly what has happened. Today such cosmetics as face powder and face creams, lipstick and rouge, dentifrices, soaps, shampoos, and hair preparations have become as essential to housewives and working girls as hats, shoes, and other articles of wearing apparel. They should not be included under the heading of luxuries and subjected to exorbitant taxation. They are absolute necessities, because our high standards of living make cleanliness and a well-groomed appearance imperative to women's self-preservation in this highly competitive modern world.

In the business sphere such emphasis has been placed upon personal appearance that cosmetics have become an indispensable part of the working girl's equipment. The same thing applies, of course, to the girl who is seeking employment. This makes it more necessary that the prices of cosmetics not be skyrocketed by excessively taxing them as luxuries, which they no longer are. It is my studied opinion that further taxation of these articles amounts to discriminatory taxation of American womanhood.

As everyone knows, the first duty of a woman is to appear presentable at all times. If our Federal and State Governments insist on making it difficult for women to be presentable, then we women must use one of the greatest blessings which America has bestowed on women—the ballot.

You Members of this House know that 50 percent of the ballots cast in every election are cast by women. Today women are taking a very definite interest in every bill presented to Congress, and when it comes to voting against an excessive tax on cosmetics and toilet goods, I am sure that every woman will waive partisanship and vote for her own personal interest. I am sure that if every woman, when she looks at herself in the mirror and has occasion to use cosmetics, understands that unfair taxation is making it more costly for her to acquire a presentable appearance, then she will immediately demand that her Congressman vote for reduction or repeal of these taxes on cosmetics.

Surely there is no disputing the fact that cosmetics, used every day by the American woman, do not approach a luxury status, yet such is the legislative attitude toward long-suffering womanhood that the steep excise tax on such essential articles as face powder, cleansing creams, and lipstick has been ignored.

A working girl, or housewife married to a man of moderate means, must pay a 10-percent tax when she walks into her drug store or department store to buy a 25- or 50-cent box of face powder or a jar of cleansing cream. Women have accepted this unfair burden long enough without giving it a second thought. It is high time something was done about it, and I appeal to my colleagues in Congress to remove these discriminatory taxes.

As I promised Drug World and American Druggist, I will lead this crusade, because I feel that it offers another opportunity to render direct service to women throughout America.

In conclusion I appeal to my colleagues to help me in this crusade, and demand the repeal or reduction of this discriminatory cosmetic tax.

I thank you.

POLISH-AMERICAN CONTRIBUTION TO OUR REPUBLIC—PULASKI MEMORIAL DAY—TRIBUTE TO POLISH-AMERICAN HEROES AND PIONEERS

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, on February 6, 1936, I introduced a resolution (H. J. Res. 483) authorizing the President of the United States to proclaim October 11 of each year General Pulaski's Memorial Day, for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized and directed to issue a proclamation calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all governmental buildings on October 11 of each year, and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day in schools and churches, or other suitable places, with appropriate ceremonies in commemoration of the death of Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

Gen. Casimir Pulaski organized the Polish Legion and spent some $50,000 of his own funds in the service of the American Revolution. He was fatally wounded in line of battle.

LIFE OF PULASKI

I wish to say a few words concerning the life and services of General Pulaski and Thaddeus Kosciusko, outstanding Polish-Americans.

Pulaski was born in the Province of Podolia, Poland, about 1747. In his early twenties he became a leader in the struggle to keep his country intact and free. He pledged his fortune and his life to the salvation of Poland. In 1768 Pulaski and other Polish patriots formed an organization called the Confederation of Bar. The members of this confederation took an oath dedicating their lives to the cause of Polish freedom. His father was also a member and died in a dungeon prison. One of Casimir Pulaski's brothers was killed before his eyes; his youngest brother was taken captive. His was a family of Polish patriots.

PULASKI MEETS BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

Pulaski's estates were confiscated and he was forced to leave Poland.

After traveling to Turkey, Pulaski went to France, where he met Benjamin Franklin at Paris. Franklin was impressed with Pulaski's bravery and in the summer of 1777 gave him a letter of introduction to General Washington in America. After landing in America the spirited and brave Pulaski did not wait for Congress to act upon his commission, but enlisted in the Army as a private.

A few weeks later Congress designated Pulaski brigadier general in command of all cavalry of the American forces. He had already distinguished himself in the Battle of Brandywine. Shortly after he received his commission he helped to save Washington's Army from destruction at Warren Tavern near Philadelphia. He also distinguished himself at the Battle of Germantown.

THE POLISH LEGION

It was in March 1778 that he asked permission from Washington to organize the Polish Legion. It is said that he spent $50,000 of his own funds in this work. The members of his legion were expert horsemen. They performed invaluable service in the American Revolution, and particularly distinguished themselves in the Battle of Charleston, S. C.

At the siege of Savannah, Ga., Pulaski was commander of the entire cavalry of French and American soldiers. While leading his men in a desperate charge, he was fatally wounded and carried from the field of battle on October 9, 1779. He died 2 days later, October 11, 1779, aboard the Wasp, while leaving Savannah Harbor on the way to Charleston. He was buried at sea.

Pulaski, although a nobleman, was an enemy of kings. William K. Palmer dedicated these words to the memory of Pulaski:

Columbia! He died for thee
Cheerfully, and for liberty!
Honored forever more
On this Atlantic shore;
Palms for Pulaski! Palms!

THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO

On February 12, 1746, Thaddeus Kosciusko was born at the Chateau Mercez-Wczyzua, near Brezesc-Litenski. He was a brilliant military student, graduating at the age of 18 from the cadet college at Warsaw. He was an engineer and studied at Versailles and Paris. He spent 7 years studying abroad before returning to Poland, where he received a commission as captain.

Kosciusko, too, received a letter of introduction from Benjamin Franklin at Paris to George Washington. Washington placed him on his staff as an aide, and later commissioned him chief engineer with the rank of colonel. His judgments on the choice of battlegrounds contributed to skillful retreats and firm stands before Burgoyne's advances.

KOSCIUSKO AND WEST POINT

Kosciusko directed the construction of forts at West Point during the Revolution. A monument stands on the site of these fortifications, on an elevated parade ground called "Kosciusko's Garden." Kosciusko first suggested the location of the present West Point Military Academy where it now stands.

When peace came, Kosciusko had fought for 6 years in the American Army. After the war Congress conferred upon Kosciusko the rank of brigadier general and made note of the Nation's "high sense of his long, faithful, and meritorious services."

KOSCIUSKO RETURNS TO POLAND

After the war Kosciusko returned to Europe and was commissioned a major general in the Polish Army. He became the leader of secret patriotic societies in Poland, and was, through their efforts, made dictator of Poland. He used the power intrusted to him for the defense of Poland against partition. He wore the peasant soldier dress. He abolished serfdom. He led an army of the people.

"AND FREEDOM SHRIEKED AS KOSCIUSKO FELL"

During the Battle of Macieiowice, October 10, 1794, Kosciusko made a charge into the midst of the enemy. His horse was killed and he fell at last bleeding and exhausted, wounded by the lance of a Cossack.

In vain, alas! in vain, ye gallant few!
From rank to rank your volley'd thunder flew.
Oh! bloodiest picture in the book of time,
Sarmatia fell, unwept, without a crime;
Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe,
Strength in her arms, nor mercy in her woe!
Dropp'd from her nerveless grasp the shattered spear;
Closed her bright eye, and curb'd her high career.
Hope, for a season, bade the world farewell,
And freedom shrieked—as Kosciusko fell!"
(Evans' Memoir, p. 18.)

CONDEMNED TO DUNGEON

Kosciusko was captured and ordered brought to St. Petersburg, where Queen Catherine of Russia condemned him for 2 years to a dungeon in the Castle Gregory-Orloff. When Catherine died on November 6, 1796, he was set free. The third partition of Poland had been carried out while he was in prison.

Kosciusko came back to America in 1797. He received from Congress a grant of land and a sum of money in recognition of his military services. The land was the present site of Columbus, Ohio. Later he returned again to Europe, where he carried on negotiations with Czar Alexander on the independence of Poland. He died in Switzerland in October 1817.

KOSCIUSKO MONUMENT IN WASHINGTON

Kosciusko's Monument stands in Lafayette Square, which faces the White House, in the Nation's Capital. This fine monument lists the battles in which Thaddeus Kosciusko fought, and quotes the famous line:

And freedom shrieked as Kosciusko fell!

KOSCIUSKO OPPOSED TO SLAVERY

During the American Revolution Kosciusko spent some time in the South and came in close contact with the Negroes and slavery. More than a half a century before the Civil War he advocated emancipation. On May 5, 1798, he gave this parting advice to America:

I, Thaddeus Kosciusko, being just in my departure from America, do hereby declare and direct that should I make no other testamentary disposition of my property in the United States, I hereby authorize my friend, Thomas Jefferson, to employ the whole thereof in purchasing Negroes from among his own or any others and giving them liberty in my name, in giving them an education in trade or otherwise, and in having them instructed for their new condition, in the duties of morality, which may make them good neighbors, good fathers or good mothers, husbands or wives, and in their duty as citizens, teaching them to be defenders of their liberty and country, of the good order of society, and in whatsoever may make them happy and useful, and I make the said Thomas Jefferson executor of this. (Memoir of Thaddeus Kosciusko, A. W. W. Evans (p. 50). George A. Thitchener, printer, 78 Beekman Street, New York, 1883.)

Kosciusko was much more than a military hero. He was born a nobleman and lived a leader of and a believer in the common people. He typified American ideals of government of, by, and for the people. He was generous and sympathetic—a great military hero with a heart full of human sympathy.

His urned heart a shrine!
Poland! He is thy son!
Columbia! Also thine!
—William K. Palmer.

POLISH HEROES OF LATER WARS

During the Mexican War there were many Poles who gave distinguished service to our country. Among them were Capt. Charles Radziminski, Capt. Napoleon Kocialkowski, and Sgt. Ignace Szumowski.

It has been estimated that 4,000 Polish soldiers fought with the Union forces in the Civil War. Of these 165 were officers. There were also several officers in the Confederate forces. About 500 Poles died for the Union cause and 100 for the Confederate cause. Gen. Joseph Karge was one of the leading Cavalry officers in the Union forces. He was a lieutenant in the first Cavalry regiment of the State of New Jersey. By profession he was professor of languages and foreign literature at Princeton University. The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography called him one of the best known educators of his time.

Other Polish Civil War heroes were Gen. Vladimir Krzyzanowski, Capt. Alexander Bielawski, Capt. Joseph Glowakowski, Lt. Julius Krywoszynski, Lt. Wladyslaw Wrothowski, Capt. K. Kossak, Capt. Louis Zychlinski, Col. Emil Shoenig, Lt. Col. Jerzy Sokalski, Capts. Teofil Michalowski, Edmund Zalinski, Peter Kiolbassa, Maurice Kraszynski, Edmund Hulanick, Edward Antoniewski, Thaddeus Hulanicki, Gustav Radniecki, Lt. Karol Borowski, and Adjt. Wladyslaw Leski. (Wallace E. Maciejewski, Polish People and Their Contribution to America.)

POLISH WOMEN IN THE CIVIL WAR

Polish women rendered noble service in the Civil War. Many of them worked in the hospitals during the war, doing their share in the War between the States.

After the Civil War there was a great immigration of Polish people to America. A large percentage of them were farmers. Wisconsin has many cities named after Polish heroes. Pulaski, Sobieski, and Lublin are Polish names given to cities of Wisconsin.

These Polish immigrants were hard workers and thrifty citizens. They saved their money until they could own their own homes, and today a large percentage of the Polish people own their own homes. They are home-loving citizens, and value family life.

In the Spanish-American War about 85,000 Poles saw service.

POLISH PATRIOTISM DURING THE WORLD WAR

Three hundred thousand Poles served the United States in the World War. According to Reverend Kruszka, eminent authority on Polish life in America, 40,000 of the first 1,000,000 World War soldiers were Poles. Dr. Kruszka states that the first American soldier to sacrifice his life in the World War was a Pole, Sgt. John J. Czajka, of Milwaukee, Wis., who was killed in action November 13, 1917, while leading a patrol of men of Company A, Twenty-sixth United States Infantry.

Polish people took a leading part in Red Cross work during the World War. They were heavy subscribers to Liberty loans.

KANIEWSKI-LOSS POST, V. F. W.

I have had the privilege of meeting with my comrades of Kaniewski-Loss Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and there I find as fine, upstanding Americans as I have met any place in this country. I had the pleasure of recommending one of my Polish-American comrades, John E. Katzmarek, for the office of special assistant attorney general of the State of Minnesota, in which office he is ably serving the people of our State.

POLISH-AMERICAN PIONEERS

Every walk of life was represented in our early colonial history by Polish leaders. John A. Joyce, the American poet, said of these Polish Revolutionary heroes:

> Polish heroes in their might > Fought in freedom's holy fight,
> Brilliant as the stars at night,
> To maintain the pure and right.

We have many Polish-American pioneers worthy of commemoration by the American people. It was a Pole, Dr. Alexander Carol Kuriusz, who founded the first high school in America and the first academy in New Amsterdam. Jacob and James Sadowski founded the city of Harrodsburg, the oldest city in Kentucky. They aided Daniel Boone in settling Kentucky. Karol Blaskiewicz was the first to map the sea coast of New England. Peter Stadnicki, Amsterdam banker, gave financial aid to the United States when its Treasury was empty. Julian Fontana, noted musician; Henry Dmochowski Sanders, noted sculptor; Pawel Sobolewski, poet and journalist; Adam Gurowski, noted author; Adam Kurek, founder of the first brass band in America; and a score of other Polish leaders took part in our early colonial life.

POLISH-AMERICAN COLONIAL LEADERS

The early settlers of the Thirteen Original Colonies, who traced their ancestry to Poland, identified themselves with every movement in the march of progress. Their contribution to pioneer life was priceless. No matter where we delve for historical data we find evidence of the Poles who zealously assisted in laying the cornerstone of American civilization. True, our school texts do not acquaint us with all these salient facts of American history. Nevertheless those facts are there. (Polish People and Their Contribution to America, by Wallace E. Maciejewski.)

POLISH LITERATURE

Reverend Kruszka states that the first Polish periodical published by Poles in America was Poland—Historical, Literary, Monumental, and Picturesque. This periodical was founded in 1842 and served as a medium of informing America about Poland and the Polish people. Casper Tochman, during the years 1840 and 1844 delivered over 100 lectures on Poland, telling of the persecution of Poland by other European powers. It was about this time that the Polish people began to gather together in organizations. Polish societies were formed.

MINNESOTA POLISH STATE CENTRALE

Dr. Frank R. Gratzek, of Minneapolis, is today president of the great Minnesota Polish State Centrale. He has been kind enough to furnish me with the articles of Rev. W. Kruszka, translated into English by Wallace E. Maciejewski, entitled "Polish People and Their Contribution to America", as published in Kuryer Polski, Polish newspaper published at Milwaukee, Wis.

POLISH-AMERICAN ORGANIZATIONS

Today there are Polish-American organizations of all kinds. The Polish National Alliance has its headquarters in Chicago. It was founded in 1880. There are the Polish Roman Catholic Union, the Polish Women's Alliance, the Polish Falcons of America, the Federation of Life Insurance of America, the Polish Singers' Alliance of America, the Polish Alma Mater, and the Alliance of Polish Literary and Dramatic Circles.

The Kuryer Polski of Milwaukee, founded by Michael Kruszka, has done much for Polish progress in this country. Its editorials have directed and aided Polish immigrants in America.

Polish people today are active in every branch of human endeavor. There are about 500,000 Poles in the city of Chicago. Milwaukee, New York, Detroit, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Toledo, and Baltimore have large Polish populations. In Minnesota, according to the 1930 census, we have approximately 48,911 Poles.

There are over 5,000,000 intelligent, industrious Polish people contributing by their efficient and conscientious labor to the development and progress of America. America can never repay Poland the blood and treasure expended by her sons in our various wars. This country would do well to pay tribute on October 11 of each year to Pulaski, great American Revolutionary leader. We would do well on that day to honor our Polish heroes in the great struggle for American independence.

POLISH PIONEERS

An emigrant from a world of music and rustic symphonies of blue skies and cultivated farms, he enshrined the exuberance of life; trod forth in a hostile world against his customs and traditions. He refused to sit quiet or be pigeonholed for the sake of anyone. So he burst open, triumphant over time and space, exultantly crying, "I also live."

That was and still is the Polish spirit! (Rev. W. Kruszka.)

CORRECTING THE RECORD AS TO TRADE AGREEMENTS AND DAIRYING

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] recently inserted an address entitled "This Administration Has Wrecked the Dairymen." The gentleman is able to devise startling headlines for statements for home consumption that are contrary to fact.

From January to April, inclusive, the farmers of New York received from the sale of livestock and livestock products the sum of $67,000,000, compared to $59,000,000 in the same 4 months of 1935, $49,000,000 in the same 4 months of 1934, and $37,000,000 in the same 4 months of 1933, according to a release of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics dated June 17, 1936. It is lucky the gentleman did not delay his speech until this study was completed. Had he looked for the facts, he could not have made any speech. The farmers of the gentleman's State, which happens also to be my State, received in the first 4 months of 1936, $30,000,000 more for their animal products, principally dairy products, than they received during the corresponding months of 1933, before this administration took charge, an increase of 81 percent. They received $8,000,000 more for these products during the first 4 months after the Canadian trade agreement became effective than they received during the corresponding months of last year. Yet he claims that the Canadian trade agreement wrecked the dairy industry.

Just to show that the benefits of trade and price recovery have not been confined to the gentleman's State, I might mention that the amount received by Wisconsin farmers for their livestock and livestock products increased from $40,000,000 in the first 4 months of 1933 to $68,000,000 during the same months of 1935, and to $79,000,000 during the same months of this year. Similarly Minnesota producers of livestock and livestock products increased their sales from $42,000,000 in 1933 to $67,000,000 in 1935 and to $82,000,000 this year, January to April, inclusive. I do not know of a single industry which would not enjoy being "wrecked" in this manner.

Not only has this administration not wrecked dairymen, but it has not done many of the other things which the gentleman cavalierly charged in his speech.

In referring to the Trade Agreements Act, he states that "Certainly not under any existing form of popular government was any such power delegated to the Executive." He later suggests that all trade agreements be ratified by the Senate and States as an alleged fact that "every other nation with whom these treaties have been made, whether European, South American, or otherwise, require the ratification of the treaties by their legislative assemblies." These alleged "facts" happen not to be true. Most of the trading nations have delegated legislative authority whereby tariff-bargaining agreements with other countries can be made by the Executive, and many of the 14 trade agreements already negotiated under the Trade Agreements Act have been put into effect by the foreign country without prior ratification by their legislative assemblies. Moreover, the gentleman appears not to realize that congressional ratification of international agreements under the parliamentary system in effect in many foreign countries is quite a different matter than it is under our form of government. For 60 years we experimented with reciprocal agreements subject to congressional ratification. A number of treaties were negotiated but all, with the exception of those with Canada, Cuba, and Hawaii, failed of ratification because of the lobbying of powerful minority interests and congressional log rolling. Out of 21 agreements signed under the authority of the Tariff Acts of 1890 and 1897, 16 failed because of opposition in the Senate, a two-thirds majority being required for ratification. There is no sense in suggesting a policy that has been proved unworkable, particularly in the present state of the world. In these days quick Executive action is necessary to protect our export trade, and we must adopt and continue to use those methods which have enabled our competitors to expand their trade at our expense.

The gentleman also believes that the trade-agreements program will spell certain disaster to the future of America. Some leading members of his own party now admit that mounting tariff barriers, rather than trade agreements, will bring disaster to this country. Republicans and Democrats alike realize that the high tariffs of the past Republican administrations not only have failed to maintain prosperity, but, rather, have been largely responsible for the destruction of our prosperity.

He later says that "Secretary Hull does not now nor ever did believe in a protective tariff." This is another one of those careless misstatements made so frequently by the gentleman from New York. Secretary Hull has stated and reaffirmed the necessity for continuing necessary tariff protection; he stands for reasonable reductions of excessive tariff and other barriers which throttle our foreign trade. The trade agreements negotiated demonstrate how carefully protection has been retained where it can be justified.

The gentleman again reads an erroneous interpretation into the President's Baltimore speech of October 1932. The President, referring to farm products, then stated:

> I know of no effective excessive high duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered.

The gentleman reads his own meaning into this plain statement by omitting the words "effective" and "excessive."

Finally, the gentleman begins to approach the problems of the industry which he believes will be aided by prohibitive tariffs. In doing this, he takes occasion to say that Secretaries Hull and Wallace have abandoned any attempt to export American agricultural products. I am afraid the gentleman has not studied the trade agreements nor read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Had he been truly interested in the problem of agriculture he would not have failed to read in the RECORD the address of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] on March 30, 1936, entitled "American Agricultural Advantages Under the Trade Agreements." Covering almost nine pages of fine print is a list of the principal agricultural products for which concessions have been obtained from foreign countries in trade agreements already concluded. This list includes practically every farm product exported from this country. Since that list was prepared, agreements containing additional advantages to American agriculture have been signed with Guatemala, Finland, and France.

I need not go into details of the advantages which have already resulted. It is sufficient to mention the agreement with Cuba, which has been in effect for about a year and a half. For the first year of the agreement with Cuba our exports of agricultural commodities included in the agreement increased 174 percent over a previous corresponding period. The cumulative effect of the concessions obtained for agriculture under trade agreements will add greatly to the incomes of our farmers.

Though the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] represents a district which produces a wide variety of agricultural and manufactured products, he has decided to take under his wing one industry—dairying. He states that our duties on "dairy products" have been lowered 20 to 35 percent in trade agreements with France, Finland, and Switzerland. The fact is that cheese is the only dairy product mentioned in those trade agreements, and, with but one minor exception, these agreements provide for rates of duty on Roquefort, Emmenthaler, and Gruyere cheese equal to those specified in the Tariff Act of 1922. With regard to these cheese items, it may be pointed out that Roquefort cheese is made from sheep and goat milk and is not produced in this country, while the Emmenthaler and Gruyere cheeses, which are imported, are of a higher quality and bring decidedly higher prices, thus being only indirectly competitive with the small amounts of these types produced in the United States.

He then mentions the restoration of the 1922 duty on Cheddar cheese in the Canadian agreement, which was made only after a careful study had been made by Government departments as to the desirability of such a reduction. Let us examine the facts with regard to the gentleman's implication that such a reduction was the sole cause of the decline in the price of Cheddar cheese from January 1, 1936, when the Canadian agreement entered into effect, up to June, when he made his assertions. There is nothing unusual in the decline of the price of cheese during the early months of 1936. In 9 of the 11 years from 1925 to 1935, inclusive, the price of cheese also dropped steadily, with but few minor and temporary upward movements, from January to either May or June of each year. This is a normal seasonal trend and no justification exists for ignoring these dominating seasonal factors and for attempting instead to associate the downward movement in the price of cheese in the early months of 1936 with the increased but relatively small imports of Canadian Cheddar cheese.

It is true that the downward trend of cheese prices during the early months of 1936 was somewhat more marked than has been the case normally. But again, examination of the factors responsible for this exaggeration of the normal downward trend indicates that imports of cheese had very little, if anything, to do with the situation. In each of the first 3 months of 1936, domestic production of cheese attained a new peak for production during that month. In total, for the first quarter, production amounted to 128.9 million pounds, or 27.6 million pounds more than the average production in the same months during the 5 years 1930–34. Thus imports of cheese from Canada during the first quarter of 1936 were only 2 percent of the total domestic production. Moreover, storage stocks of cheese have accumulated to an unprecedented extent. Storage stocks totaled 78.2 million pounds on February 1 (71 million pounds Feb. 1, 1935), 68.4 million pounds on March 1 (60.9 million pounds Mar. 1, 1935), and 62.3 million pounds on April 1, the latter being 7.5 million pounds greater than the same time a year ago and 17.3 million pounds greater than the average stocks on April 1 during the 5-year period from 1930 to 1934, inclusive. Stocks on May 1 totaled 55.8 million pounds, compared to 46.6 million pounds on May 1, 1935, and compared to an average of 44 million pounds for the preceding 5 years. These data show how weak is the foundation for the gentleman's conclusion that imports of cheese from Canada have caused a drop in cheese prices. The chief explanation for the decline in the current price of cheese is obviously to be found in the high domestic production of recent months and in the consequent accumulation of stocks, rather than in the relatively small imports of Cheddar cheese. The entire stoppage of Cheddar cheese imports would have made no appreciable difference in the situation.

It is fortunate for him that the gentleman from New York ended his "investigation" at a point which seemed favorable for his argument. If he had made use of data for a more recent period, which were readily available, he would have been forced to change his conclusions. However, I will correct his errors of omissions by pointing out that the price of cheese reached its 1936 low in the middle of May, at which time the price was 12.5 cents, one-half a cent higher than the lowest price to which cheese fell in 1935. Since May 22, 1936, the price has been above last year's price, and the quotation set on June 19 of 14.5 cents per pound is 2 cents higher than at the same time last year. It seems that the gentleman's calamity clamor was a little premature. The present tariff of 5 cents made it necessary for the Canadian producer to accept 8 to 9 cents per pound in order to meet recent prices in the United States. Since Canadian cheese is admitted free of duty into the United Kingdom, the bulk of Canadian cheese will continue to be marketed there as it has in the past.

The gentleman informs us that the costs of production in France, Finland, Sweden, and Canada are "not more than one-half of what they are in America." I do not know to what part of America he has reference. I do not believe that the cows of any foreign country produce twice as much milk as cows in the United States nor that foreign machinery and ingenuity are twice as effective as American dairy machinery and ingenuity.

As the rates now in effect are generally those of 1922 and far above the cheese duties of 1921, the cheese industry need not worry about foreign competition. Our manufacturers of processed cheese need some of the aged B. and B. cheese, which is a specialty of eastern Ontario, in order to combine it with domestic cheese. Imports of Cheddar before 1930, when the present duties were in effect, were never large and only rose when prices in the United States were unusually high. The average imports from 1925 to 1929 under the same duty as now exists were 1 percent of the domestic production of Cheddar, and domestic production steadily increased under this competition, while production in Canada declined.

The gentleman has deliberately failed to notice that some 15 concessions have been obtained by trade agreements with foreign countries in favor of our producers and exporters of dairy products; also that hundreds of concessions for other farm products will reopen foreign markets and thus relieve our dairying industry of the threat of increasing competition from farmers whose foreign markets have been closed and who look with envy on the comparative prosperity of the dairy farmers. Finally, the prosperity of the dairy industry is strikingly dependent on domestic prosperity. The Department of Agriculture has published a study which shows that when pay rolls are large the price of butter is high. Thus domestic prosperity is overwhelmingly more important to the dairyman than small imports.

Statistics can be made to tell strange stories by those who seek to mislead the public. The gentleman has said that the present rate of increase of imports of foreign cheese will drive American cheese from our markets. It would be equally true to say that the importation of one foreign automobile this year compared with none in 1935 means a rate of increase which will drive the American automobile industry out of business. I am confident that the small quantities of cheese imported will not oblige the producers in this amply protected industry to give up their automobiles and radios, much less their farms and herds.

The gentleman has accused the administration of having political bias against dairymen. The same feeling has been expressed by certain manufacturers, fruit growers, cattle raisers, and others. When certain branches of agriculture claim that trade agreements favor industry at the expense of agriculture, and when certain industries complain that these same agreements favor agriculture at the expense of industry, there is evidence that they have favored none but have been advantageous to all. Whenever any industry imagines that it has gotten into trouble, whether it is from overproduction, drought, or loss of foreign markets, it runs to the Government for some form of subsidy, usually higher tariff. The dairy complaints are the same old story.

The gentleman has been buttonholed by two or three industries and he fails to consider the interests of his constituency as a whole. He was persuaded to insert in the RECORD a petition drawn up by a seafood industry, although it is a million years since Oswego was on the sea. He also protested because New York obtained some fresh vegetables in midwinter from Cuba. This was a welcome addition to the diet of the people of New York, but he never thinks of his constituents as consumers, although I believe they enjoy winter vegetables, seafood specialties, and luxury cheeses as much as do other consumers in the United States. Their high standard of living demands a varied diet. I believe they would resent it if they knew he was protesting against their buying 1 pound of imported cheese for every hundred pounds they eat of American cheese. He is far out of line with the needs of his district when he wishes to prohibit even occasional imports of products that are needed by his constituents as consumers. He will end up by forcing them to consume nothing that is not made in northern New York. Then the fruit growers can cut down their orchards and the factories in his district, which produce paper boxes and other paper manufactures, paper-making machinery, rayon underwear, pumps, and agricultural implements, can close their doors because his constituency has at last become self-contained.

MONEY AND THE DEPRESSION

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, at this late date in the session I do not wish to take up further time in considering the subject of money and the depression, but under general leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I will include and here include the following further observations relative to the principle and laws of money, the cause of the panic:

THE PANIC NOT A MYSTERY

I do not believe this panic is a mystery, a deep, dark, unexplainable mystery. I do not believe this panic involves a problem defying the comprehension and powers of man. I do not believe the blight of this panic has come like some weird phantom ghost from the somber depths of darkness to hover over the land for a time, only to disappear as mysteriously as it came some day, sometime in the far-distant hazy future. I do not believe that this blight upon Nature's bounty has been sent as a curse by a revengeful God as a scourge to rebuke and chastise man for enterprise, industry, and thrift. Only natural conditions and the supernatural are confusing, bewildering, mysterious before man. We cannot comprehend eternity, the causes in far-away space, the infinite works of the Almighty. We cannot solve the problem of birth, life, and death and our being, because the causes in nature and space and the problems of our life and being and the reasons for creation are beyond the power and comprehension of the weak, finite human mind which only God can solve.

WAS CAUSED BY MEN

But this panic does not involve creation or the supernatural. This panic is not a natural condition. Want, suffering, deprivation, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance is not a natural condition. It is an unnatural condition, an abnormal industrial condition, a perverted, economic condition, a condition brought about by men, resulting from the relations of men in the course and conduct of men. This panic was caused by men. It is within the power and comprehension of men, can be analyzed and solved by men, and can be remedied by men. To say that this man-made panic is an insolvable problem, an incomprehensive mystery, is a maneuver to evade responsibility or a cowardly mental retreat.

THERE IS A REASON AND A REMEDY

I believe there is a reason, a cause, a remedy for this industrial panic or depression, a restoration, a relief in rational means and methods which can be devised and administered by men. And in the course of these remarks I propose to show the cause, to show how, when, and where, by whom, and for what purpose this panic was brought upon the unsuspecting people. I propose to give dates and places, give names of men interested and participating. I propose to go into particulars and give details and show the operations by which this panic was brought upon the country. I propose to show this panic is not an incomprehensible mystery; that the cause can be discovered, realized, and understood; that it came following and in obedience to the violation of economic and monetary laws as fixed, certain, and unchanging as the laws of life and death. And that the cause of the sudden fall of values, prices, and the wage scale stand out as clear, open, and apparent as the distinct form of objects in the glare of the noonday sun.

PROBLEMS RESOLVED INTO SIMPLE PROPOSITIONS

It has been said that all great problems by a proper analysis can be resolved into a few simple propositions capable of understanding and solution by the people. I believe that this is true; that this is true of our industrial problem; that this is true of the problem of hard times, of the problem of want and suffering in the midst of plenty and great abundance. For such analysis of industry it is necessary to realize and understand something of the history, growth, and development of our specialized industrial system, its different and dependent parts, and the order in which they operate and function together as a whole.

OUR SPECIALIZED SYSTEM OF INDUSTRY

There was a time in early human history when every man worked with his own hands, each independently for himself, when he labored and produced separately to meet all his wants and needs. When he lived the simple life he was dependent upon no man for any of the necessaries to live. And he could use and enjoy the necessaries accordingly as he was industrious, according as he was willing to work, willing to toil and labor to live. But with all his energies exerted he was a mere jack-of-all-trades and, as the saying goes, a master of none. Production was crude, tedious, and laborious. He could make only slow progress and advance but little further than guided by mere instinct and animal nature.

But in the course of time men learned to work together to divide their labors into separate trades and callings and to specialize as experts. And instead of every man working separately, each producing alone for himself and supplying all the necessaries prepared or produced by his own hands to meet all his wants and needs, they learned to work together under a system of specialized industry dividing their labors into different lines and trades, some providing one part of the necessaries and others supplying other parts of the necessaries, some rendering one line of services and others performing different services. And then each man exchanging all or part of what he produced for some part of what others produced or his services for other services and in this way all providing themselves with all the necessaries and comforts required to live.

And the people found this plan or system was good and of great use, benefit, and advantage in the course of their labors to live. They found that this specialized system of industry enabled them to produce as specialists and provide the necessaries as experts. They found that this plan and system enabled them to produce more and better of all the necessaries and comforts and conveniences and in greater portion and abundance. And this is our system of industry under which we are laboring today as specialists and experts in production and from which we have evolved our complex industrial system. And the system of industry under which we were laboring and producing when the blight of this economic panic fell.

THE WHOLE SYSTEM BASED UPON MONEY

It must be further realized and understood that this whole system of specialized industry is based and dependent upon the exchange of commodities and services, and without the means or facilities of such exchange our specialized system of industry could not function or exist for a single day. The people working together under our specialized system of industry do not take their part of the goods produced or divide the goods produced or directly exchange for other goods produced. The people receive and take money—money instead of goods produced, money instead of services performed. They take money to represent services rendered, and which money they thus take they exchange for other goods produced or for other services.

It was only by the invention and use of money by and with which commodities and services were and are transferred and exchanged, by and between producers and consumers, which made it practical and possible for our specialized system of industry to be developed and function as a system.

The invention of money as a medium of exchange and the specialized system of industry thereby developed and made possible was the stepping stone from which mankind began the upward course of progress and advancement leading to the higher planes of life and which opened and paved the way for industrial progress and civilization. Without money as a medium of exchange, exchange without physical delivery of the goods, exchange without performance of the services rendered between those whom the exchange is made, man would have remained in the stone age or have gained no further vantage ground than the Dark Ages of medieval times.

Our specialized system of industry rests upon and is based upon the medium or means of money for exchange as the frame of a house or building rests upon the foundation upon which built. And as the impairment of the foundation would jeopardize and disorder the house, the withdrawal or interference with money would disorder our system of industry. And as the complete destruction of the foundation or the breaking down or removal of the foundation would leave the house to crumble and fall, so the complete withdrawal of money from circulation, industry would leave our specialized industrial system to relapse into the crude and primitive state in which it existed before the invention of money and the crude age before civilization.

MONEY COMPARED WITH THE BLOOD

Money under our specialized system of industry circulating in the channels of industry and trade may be compared to the blood flowing through the veins and arteries of the body. The blood is a hidden, concealed force, a mysterious power and agency of life which only physicians and medical students and chemists know and understand as an agency in the economy of the body. And only financiers and expert bankers and students of monetary science know, realize, and understand the hidden, concealed force of money in the operations and functions of our free, competitive system of industry.

But all men know that the blood carries the vital, indispensable life fluid to and from the different tissues of bone, sinew and flesh and without which the body would perish and return to the elements from which it came. And all men must know with equal positive knowledge that money is the vital indispensable agency which affects the exchange of commodities and services from producers to consumers and the different trades and callings of men upon which the whole plan and system of our specialized system of industry is based, and without which means of money for exchange our specialized system of industry could not exist, no part could operate or function, and men would be forced to return to the crude and primitive life and from where they first awoke to a realization or consciousness of their being.

MONEY MADE CIVILIZATION POSSIBLE

Probably no other one advent in the course of human affairs has exerted a more controlling influence upon the growth and development of civilization than the one invention of money. But like many other great powers, created for the common good and public welfare, money is susceptible of great abuse, and, when prostituted for selfish gain, money becomes a monster, menacing, evil, a blight, a curse upon man, reducing him to a state of slavery and abject servitude, an obedient, servient tool in the hands of cruel and relentless taskmasters, mentioned and referred to in ancient history as misers, shylocks, and money changers, and known today, in modern terms, as international financiers and manipulating bankers.

While the use of money as a means of exchange is one of its most vital and important functions in our specialized system of industry, and without which our industrial system would crumble and fall away, there is another important use which money serves in industry incidentally developed with the use of money as a means of exchange. The control of this use of money is susceptible of greater abuse, and of which great advantage can be taken to burden and oppress the people. The power to control this use of money includes the power to take from the people, the power to reduce men to poverty and dependency, without them knowing the cause of their burdens and distress.

WHAT IS USED AS MONEY

I have tried to briefly explain our specialized system of industry and show how it was based and dependent upon the exchange of commodities and services, and that money was the means by which the exchange is effected or carried on. It must further be realized and understood that bank checks or credit currency, a form of money grown up and developed, operates to serve the same use and purpose of real money or actual currency in the exchange of commodities and services and in the payment and discharge of debts and obligations. And a contraction or expansion of bank checks—money and credit—would produce the same effect or result as a contraction or expansion of real money. Regardless of whether we pay in money or by bank checks issued and accepted, the same use and purpose is served. And in the regulation and control of the volume and supply of money, bank checks and credit money must be included as a part of the currency available for use in the exchange of commodities and services.

In the meantime, in either case it must eternally be kept in mind that any withdrawal of the money supply or restriction of credit and bank-check money impedes and slows down the operations of industry and that a complete withdrawal of currency and suppression of bank checks and credit money would prostrate, paralyze, and stop all industry. But money serves another important purpose in the conduct of our industrial system, which was developed incidently with its use as a means of exchange among the people. Money measures the value of commodities and services as they are bought and sold in exchange. Money may be said to be the yardstick of value, or the bushel measure of value, or the pound measure of value. For no matter whether commodities or services are being bought or sold in exchange, their value is being measured in money as exchanged. Money measures out the amount of corn or wheat or farm products or services which the people must give up to pay interest and debts or to meet and pay contract obligations or to exchange for other commodities or services.

VALUES FIXED BY AMOUNT OF MONEY

The money measure of value is not fixed or determined by the number of cents in the dollar, nor by the denominations of money in cents, nickels, dimes, quarters, or dollars, but by the volume and supply of money maintained for use in free circulation. If the volume and supply of money is increased, the money measure is reduced and made smaller, which calls for less wheat, corn, or services to pay taxes, interest, and debts. But if the volume and supply of money is contracted, withdrawn, reduced, this enlarges the money measure and calls for more corn, wheat, and farm products, more property, goods, and services to pay taxes and more to pay interest, debts, and mortgages.

INCREASING AND DECREASING MONEY

The highest authority recognized today on money is John Stuart Mill. I quote from his Principles of Political Economy:

> That an increase in the quantity of money raises prices, and a diminution lowers them, is the most elementary proposition in the theory of currency, and without it we should have no key to the others.
> If the whole money in circulation was doubled, prices would be doubled. If it was only increased one-fourth, prices would rise one-fourth.

Money as a measure of value controls the price level and the wage scale, and the power to control the volume and supply of money includes the power to control prices and wages, the power to make high prices and wages, the power to make low prices and wages.

Double the amount of money in circulation and you double the money value of labor and products; you double the power of the people to pay taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages, and all fixed payments and contract obligations, all other conditions remaining the same. And only one-half the labor and labor products will be necessary and required to pay the same taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages, and remaining one-half would be left to the people with which to buy, take, and consume for their use, comfort, and enjoyment the vital necessaries of life, the products of farm, factory, mill, and workshop. On the other hand, take from circulation one-half of the volume and supply of money and you destroy one-half the money value of labor and the products of labor. You take away from the people one-half of their power to pay interest, taxes, debts, and mortgages and all fixed payments and contract obligations and destroy the consuming surplus over. Or, in other words, you double the burden of taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages and compel the people to produce and give up double the amount of labor and products to pay the same taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages, and take from them their means and power to provide themselves with the necessaries of life.

AMOUNT OF MONEY SUSTAINS PRICES

Under the operations of monetary and economic laws the volume and supply of money in use—the amount of money in circulation—controls values and the price level like the amount of water in a pond or reservoir controls and determines the water level. Money holds up and sustains the price level like the water in a pond holds up the logs and sticks floating upon the water. If you drain the pond or let the water down halfway, the logs and sticks will fall down halfway with the water level; and so it is with the volume and supply of money. Reduce the volume and supply of money one-half and money values and the price level falls one-half, all other conditions remaining the same; and, on the other hand, if the water or supply of money is low, to restore the volume of water or money you raise values and the price level as you raise the logs and sticks floating on the water.

THE CLAIM THERE IS PLENTY OF MONEY

We often hear it said today that there is plenty of money or more money than we need or can use, but this statement is erroneous—not true; and if true would mean nothing. It is not the money issued and outstanding but the money available for use, money in free circulation available for loans or for investment, and for the conduct of business operations, for use in exchange of commodities and services which determines the relative values of money and commodities. Money hoarded or locked up in banks has no more effect for exchange or to measure values than if the money had never been issued, and money withheld from free use and circulation is the same as no money in existence. Money hoarded or held locked up in banks is like the water held back in the millrace from the intake of the reservoir or pond. It has no more power to raise values and the price level than the water held back from the reservoir has to raise the water level in the basin and the logs and sticks or other objects floating in the reservoir or pond.

MONEY FORCES OPERATING UPON PRICES

Money, as a measure of value, controls the price level and the wage scale, and the power to control the volume and supply of money includes the power to control prices and wages, the power to make high prices and wages, the power to make low prices and wages. It is true, there are other and different forces always exerting an influence over values and prices, the supply and demand for commodities, and indirectly, custom, usage, fashion, and laws, which may all increase or diminish the demand together with other intervening factors exerting an influence to control and fix prices but money remains the greater and controlling force. The course of a boat moving in the river is subject to different forces operating it—the wind with or against which the boat is moving, the friction of the water, the current of the stream, all exerting more or less an influence upon the movements and course of the boat.

But the great propellers moved by the turbine engines beneath the deck, in the hold below, exert the greater and controlling force, prevailing over all other factors operating and controls the course or direction of the boat in its movements on the river. So it is with the power of money, the secret, covered, concealed monetary force, as compared with other factors influencing the price level. Money represents the great positive force, the great propellers moving the boat of prices and controls over all other economic forces, fixing values and determining prices or relative values as measured in money.

THE LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND

But it must be eternally kept in mind in the study of money and the depression, the operations and manipulations of money movements, the rise and fall of values, prices, and wages, the fluctuating values of property and commodities and the motives inducing money changes, that the same law and operations reducing the supply and volume of money one-half, taking one-half of the money out of circulation, doubles the value not only of the remaining money in the hands of money holders and hoarders, but doubles the value of all bonds and mortgages and all papers and contracts payable in money. This is the law of money, the law of supply and demand as applied to the volume of money, issued and maintained in circulation to serve as a medium of exchange and as a measure of values.

A farmer who had borrowed $5,000 and given his note and mortgage to bind the obligation and secure the payment, when he could have paid the amount with less than 5,000 bushels of corn, has since been called upon to pay back and satisfy the mortgage over 10,000 bushels of corn. And the lender, who loaned a so-called cheap dollar under higher prices, has since been able to collect back a dollar increased, doubled and tripled in value, and where by collection or by foreclosure has received back in money or property many times the value of the money loaned. The power to regulate and control the volume and supply of money and credits includes the power to change and impair the obligation of contracts payable in money, and what cannot be done directly by other means under the law is done indirectly in the control of money and the violation of the Constitution concealed.

HOW MONEY CAN TAKE TRIBUTE

Under, by, and through the means of money and the control of values and the price level, more tribute can be taken from the people and greater tribute has been taken from the people, secretly hidden, covered, and concealed in money, than ever despotic rulers have taken from their helpless and dependent subjects; greater than ever invading, marauding kings, by force of the military, armies and navies, have ever exacted in conquest and subjugation, or claimed as leaders of a victorious army in the pillage and plunder of the vanquished and carried off as the spoils of war.

It is a remarkable coincidence that the same money operations and movements which retard or accelerate the exchange of commodities and services among the people, at the same time change the money measure of property, commodities, and services and thereby, values, prices, and wages. The contraction or withdrawal of money from use and circulation not only slows down the exchange of commodities and services in industry, and retards and stops industrial operations, but makes the money yardsticks longer, makes the money pound heavier. This makes taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages and all contracts and obligations payable in money call for more, double and triple the amount of corn, wheat, and farm products and for more labor and the products of labor, and thereby less is left to the people for use with which to take, buy, and consume the products of farm, factory, mill, and workshop and produces a double harmful effect.

And on the other hand the expansion of the money supply or in the case of the present emergency, the restoration of the money supply, would hasten, accelerate, and speed up the exchange of commodities and services and would operate to revive and restore prostrate, paralyzed, and stagnated industry. At the same time the same operation would reduce the money measure of value, make the money yardstick shorter, make the money bushel smaller, make the money pound lighter, by raising values and prices higher, and by making taxes, debts, and mortgages, under higher prices, values, and wages call for less wheat, corn, and farm products, call for less labor and the products of labor to pay and satisfy the obligations, would leave a greater surplus over in the hands of the people for their use, and with which to buy, take, and consume the products of farm, factory, mill, and workshop, thereby restoring the buying and consuming power.

THE TWO POWERS OF MONEY

I request my fellow Members of Congress to remember and hold in mind the two uses served by money, which I have briefly described and pointed out—first, that money is a medium or means by which commodities and services are exchanged, that any withdrawal or restriction of the volume and supply of money impedes and slows down industrial operations, and that a complete withdrawal of money would prostrate and stop all industry; and the second and further use of money, which I have briefly described, that money is a measure of value, and the power of money includes the power to control values, prices, and the wage scale; to make high prices, values, and wages; or to make low prices, values, and wages.

OPERATIONS DESTROYING BUYING AND CONSUMING POWER

It is known that panics have always come with a fall of values, prices, and wages, and that prosperity has always returned with a rise of values, prices, and wages; that low prices and wages always spell panic, and that high prices and wages always mean prosperity. But it is not enough to say what has always come with other panics. We must know the facts of this panic, how this panic or depression came, and with the fall of values, prices, and wages, we must know, realize, and understand the cause just how such fall of values, prices, and wages operated to destroy the buying and consuming power of the people, just how it multiplied taxes upon the people, just how it doubled interest and debts upon the people until they were left without consuming surplus over. We must not only know the cause but be able to trace the operations from cause to effect not only to a general or logical conclusion but to a demonstration and mathematical certainty. And the people are not only entitled to know the cause, they are entitled to a recital of time and place, and all facts entering into the analysis and proof of demonstration of the cause from the basis of the facts found and shown.

CONFIDENCE AND THE FAITH CURE

If a remedy is true and correct in theory, if it is founded upon true principles, then it can be analyzed, it can be demonstrated and proven and made clear before men.

It is idle to urge a remedy for a mysterious or unknown cause. It is vain to direct relief from an evil without an understanding of the cause of the evil.

It is folly to talk of "confidence", "faith", or a "better feeling existing" or "prosperity just around the corner." Coué, the man who was always getting better every day in every way, died while repeating his meaningless psychological formula whereby to persuade and lead others to effect a cure of their afflictions by forgetting their ills, pains, and troubles.

We are told again, at this late date, that only confidence will restore the buying and consuming power; that to smite the rock of faith and prosperity will come like gushing water. But faith without works is dead. God helps those who help themselves. If you want to restore confidence in a hungry, starving, famished man, fill his stomach with good, nutritious food, and faith, assurance, and confidence will return. If you want to restore confidence in a cold, shivering, and suffering man, give him plenty of good, warm clothing, provide him with food and shelter, and faith and confidence will come again.

PANIC OF 1929 A RELAPSE OF 1920

Many people have been misled to believe that the panic came following 1929. But the panic following 1929 was only a relapse of the panic begun in 1920, 9 years before, and which has now continued, alternating with relapses and relief, for 14 years. Up to 1924, 5 years before 1929, the farmers had suffered their greater loss; 2,000,000 farmers had lost their farms by foreclosure before 1929. Two million more were subject to foreclosure accrued and accruing before 1929. Seven million acres of farm land had been abandoned before the year 1929. Two million farmers had left the farm in quest of employment and a living wage all before the year 1929. Six thousand farm banks had failed. Farm values had fallen more than $40,000,000,000. Farm values had shrunken and fallen until farm debts had all but equaled farm values all before 1929 and not after 1929. Thousands of farmers, realizing the loss of their frugal savings of a lifetime, have gone insane or committed suicide. Others had left for parts unknown to escape the burdens of impossible debts and the humiliation of insolvency before their friends.

In fixing the beginning date of this panic and the manner as well as the time of its coming, I will quote from the Prairie Farmer, one of the oldest and most reliable farm journals, of date September 24, 1927, to show that the panic came first in 1920; that it came with the fall of values, prices, and wages, and that it came suddenly, unawares:

> In 1920, in almost the twinkling of an eye, the condition was reversed. Prices fell to a ruinously low level; the exchange of commodities almost stopped.
> The wheat fell in price from $3 to $1.60 per bushel, corn fell from $1.50 to 35 cents per bushel; hogs, cattle, and all farm livestock and all other farm products fell in proportion.

When the blight of this great panic fell upon this fair land of ours the farmers of the country were happy, prosperous, and contented. And during the same time the industrial laboring people of the country were alike prosperous, happy, and contented; prosperous with continued employment at a fair and living wage, happy for the opportunity to labor, contented to labor to live, and grateful for the right to labor and enjoy the fruits of their toil.

Keeping in mind the laws and principles of money-controlling values, prices, and the wage scale, the economic factors which entered into, and the monetary forces which controlled, the precise operations under which the people were deprived of their earnings and income, and which destroyed their buying and consuming power, can be pointed out and their relations shown.

HOW BUYING AND CONSUMING POWER WAS DESTROYED

When this crisis fell upon the farming industry, with the higher normal values and prices, the farmers were selling not more than one-third of their crops with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and were left with the other two-thirds or more with which to buy, take, and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop. But when the sudden fall of values and prices came, as described by the Prairie Farmer in 1920, the farmers, instead of being required to sell only one-third or less of their crops and produce to pay taxes, interest, and debt installments, were forced and compelled to sell three-thirds or all of their crops and produce with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and were left with no part of their crops and produce to sell with which to buy, take, and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop. And the buying and consuming power of 40,000,000 farm population and dependents was destroyed and taken from them.

While the fall of values and prices came suddenly, the failure of the buying and consuming power did not come in full immediately coincident with the fall, but came prolonged and delayed for a time but following inevitably no less certain. Many farmers, under higher values and prices, had laid aside a savings from year to year for old age and the coming winter of life. But when their earnings and income failed they were compelled to take from their savings to provide themselves with the necessaries and to maintain farm upkeep and operating expenses. Other farmers, less fortunate or supporting larger families, were compelled to go to the banks for credit and borrow money from time to time with which to provide the necessaries of life and maintain upkeep and equipment. But in time the farmers' frugal savings were used up in meeting expenses. And in time their credit was exhausted and they could borrow no more money; then their buying and consuming power was reduced to a mere bare minimum.

FARMERS ARE DOUBLE CONSUMERS

The farm population not only includes the most numerous class of consumers, but a class which buys and consumes double what any other class of men consumes. The farm population and dependents not only buy and consume what other classes buy and consume for personal and family use, not only what other classes buy for their homes, but as much or more outside of their homes. The 40,000,000 farm population and dependents after buying household goods and supplies for personal and family use, buy many other and different articles for use in farm operations and equipment. The farmer buys and uses on his farm over, above, and in addition to household goods and supplies for personal and family use, ropes, chains, nails, and paint, plows, cultivators, harrows, binders, mowers, pitchforks, and hay tools, spades, spuds, and post diggers, and a thousand other miscellaneous articles of daily use. The farmer's buying and consuming power under the fall of values and the price level was reduced and all but destroyed. He could not both pay taxes and live. If he used his meager income to live, he could not pay taxes and interest. If he paid taxes and interest, he could not live, and he began the strenuous struggle to live and save himself from bankruptcy.

And finally this failure and destruction of the farmer's buying and consuming power left the retail merchant without demand, left the wholesale house without sales, left the factory, mill, and workshop without orders. And the wheels of industry slackened and slowed down and brought unemployment to industrial labor, and destroyed the buying and consuming power of another thirty million and their dependents, and the fatal circle of hard times, want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance was realized and complete.

It was the fall of values, prices, and wages which took away the people's earnings and income and destroyed their buying and consuming power, and tax- and interest-paying power, their debt- and mortgage-paying power, and left them in want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance. And here it must be kept in mind that money is a measure of value, fixing the price level and the wage scale; that contracting or withdrawing money from free use and circulation, reducing currency and credit one-half, reduces values, prices, and wages one-half. And it must be further kept in mind that the same operations in money, reducing the currency and forcing down values and wages, increases, doubles, and multiplies the value of money, bonds, and contracts payable in money in the hands of money holders and hoarders.

THE CRIMES OF MONEY

In the trial of money for the crimes of panics and depressions, there are always many alibis claimed, charging the responsibility to other causes to vindicate, exonerate, and to justify the control of money and credit by private banking corporations. The failure of the prices of manufactured goods and products, with manufacturers fixing their prices arbitrarily and under trusts and combinations in restraint of trade; the failure of manufacturer's prices to fall, with the farm prices and agricultural values, will not account for the sudden fall of farm values and prices in 1920. The theory of excess supply or overproduction with per-capita production declining at the very time values and prices were falling will not account for the sudden fall of farm values and prices in 1920. The closing of the World War in 1918 with prices maintained and rising for 2 years thereafter and, too, while surplus war materials were being thrown back upon the market will not explain the cause of the fall of farm values in 1920 and the fall of the wage scale following thereafter.

The very illuminating theory of mystery, wandering and groping in the darkness, at sea without a compass or a guiding star, without knowledge of the facts, seeking a remedy for an unknown cause, will not account for the fall of values, prices and wages and the complex want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance. The want of faith and confidence of the people, the failure of the people to believe that they were fed when they were starving, that they were clothed when they were naked, that they were housed when they were homeless, or that they were getting better every day in every way will not account for the fall of values, prices, and the wage scale when all the people are willing to work and ready to use all their earnings and income to take production from farm, factory, mill, and workshop. None of these alibis claimed would account for the sudden fall of values, prices, and the wage scale coming suddenly unawares upon the people nor lift the veil of the mystery complex of want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance.

THERE IS A REASON FOR THE FALL OF PRICES

There is a rational reason and explanation for this sudden fall of prices and wages under economic and monetary laws in the contraction of currency and withdrawal of currency and wtihdrawal of credit and the facts of which can be and will be shown with equal certainty and conclusive evidence, as required in the conviction of capital crimes. The fall of values, prices, and wages, coincident with and immediately following certain currency movements and changes, came under the unerring laws of cause and effect, as certain and inevitable as the laws of life and death, and which it is my purpose to point out and explain.

But before I enter upon this explanation of the money movements and operations as a cause for falling values, prices, and wages measured in terms of money, I wish to show the system under which the currency of the country is controlled and the secret means of operation. I also wish to describe and point out as a class the men directing and controlling this system, their motives, interest, and opportunities to control money for profit and gain and to take from the people their earnings and income unnoticed, hidden, covered, and concealed, not to censure or condemn men as individuals but to charge a vicious monetary system.

PRIVATE CONTROL OF PUBLIC CURRENCY

In considering the control of money it must be realized and understood that under our specialized system of industry, with the people dependent upon money whereby to exchange their services and what they produce for other services and what others produce, as the only means to provide themselves with the vital necessaries to live, that money becomes a vital public agency and indispensable factor in the life of every individual and as imperative to the public welfare as light, air, and water to the body. The hidden, covered, and concealed power of money to control values, prices, and the wage scale, the earnings and income of the people, their buying and consuming power therefore becomes subject to greater abuse and greater temptation for advantage and gain than any other power or function of the Government. A menacing evil, operating in secret, preying upon the vitals of industry, taking from, draining, and exhausting men of the fruits of their toil and labor without them knowing or suspecting the cause of their burdens and distress.

There is no greater power exerted over human welfare, over the destinies of men, than this hidden, covered, and concealed power of money, controlling values, prices, and the wage scale. It has been truthfully said of the evils of money, of the abuses of the power of money:

> Sum up all the horrors of the age of slavery, men, women, and children sold at the auction block, and all the heartaches, suffering, bloodshed which resulted in both ancient and modern wars alongside the crimes of money, and they are as a pigmy standing in comparison with a giant.

And on this same subject, of the evils and power of money, the Mid-Land Bank, Ltd., the largest bank in Great Britain, has made this statement:

> The history of the past has shown that, apart from wars and religious intolerance, no single factor has been more productive of misery and of (human) misfortune than the high degree of changeability.

Referring to the manipulation and abuse of money.

THE MEN WHO UNDERSTAND MONEY OPERATIONS

Shrewd and crafty men have long understood and used the power of money to control values, prices, and wages for profit and selfish gain to take from the people. They have used this power to lower prices when they wanted to buy. They have used this power to raise prices when they wanted to sell. And by increasing and decreasing, by raising, holding, and lowering the volume and supply of money, and thereby raising and lowering from time to time the price level at will, men can take income and earnings from the people until they are impoverished, until they are exhausted, until they are reduced to poverty and want, without them knowing the cause of their burdens and distress or how their earnings and income were being taken from them and left in bewildering want, suffering in darkness and mystery. By controlling the volume and supply of money, money can be used to make hard times, money can be used to bring prosperity, or money can be controlled to make a panic.

The control of the supply and the amount of money moving in circulation is a vital public function, a power to be exercised only by the Government itself through the sworn and chosen representatives of the people. Money is a vital intervening agency between production and consumption, the control of which includes the power to speed up, facilitate the transfer and exchange of services and commodities, or the power to throttle, paralyze, or stop all at will. This vital intervening force of money is not a power for private control. Selfish interests are no more entitled to control the volume and supply of money than one man to claim the right to control the blood and life currents coursing through the veins of another man, or to control the civil rights of another man, or the liberty and freedom of another man, or the independence of another man, or be allowed to exercise, dictate, or control the taxing power of the Government, to levy and collect taxes from the people alike vested by the Constitution in Congress, for his private, personal benefit.

BANKERS HAVE NO MORE RIGHT TO CONTROL MONEY THAN OTHER MEN

Bankers are men dealing in money and they have no more right to control the supply of money than men dealing in grain should have the right to control the grain supply, to reduce or increase the supply of grain to meet emergencies in the operations of buying and selling grain upon the market. In fact, bankers dealing with money and credit should have less power to control the volume and supply of money than other men dependent upon money for the exchange of services and products of other men, to provide themselves with the necessaries of life. As men dealing in grain for profit should have less right and power to control the grain supply than the men depending upon grain as food with which to sustain themselves and the lives of those dependent upon them.

No one class of men as private individuals or corporations should ever be allowed to control the volume and supply of money. And above all, private bankers and financiers should never be allowed to control the volume and supply of money, because bankers and private financiers by reason of their knowledge of money, of the power and use of money, can take greater advantage through the control and manipulation of money than other classes of men. The banker's training disqualifies him to control the volume and supply of money. He is trained to measure all values by the dollar. The dollar is created to serve the people, but the bankers are trained to make the people serve the dollar. But this does not apply to the bankers we know. This applies to the bankers we do not know. To the bankers we only know of and of whom the people and the country should be guarded against and know less of. The bankers we know are part of the people. They suffer with the people. They are victims with the people. With the bankruptcy of 5,000,000 farmers has come the failure of 10,000 banks and many more thousand bankers.

CONSTITUTION PLACES CONTROL OF MONEY IN CONGRESS

Realizing the use of money as a vital element of industry, as a necessary medium of exchange, and as a measure of value, and the control of money as a power for good or evil, in the economic life of the people, our forefathers wisely and unequivocally provided in the Federal Constitution for the issue and control of public currency directly by the Congress of the United States, the sworn and chosen representatives of the people, the same as with the exercise of the taxing power.

Article I, section 8, clause 5 of the Federal Constitution vests Congress with the exclusive power to coin and issue money and to regulate the value thereof, which includes the power to control money and credit and thereby values and the price level.

The history of the control of money cannot be told briefly nor more than faintly touched upon. And all that can be said and briefly said is that the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to regulate and control the money supply has been surrendered and yielded up to private banking corporations, to be dealt with as a commercial asset and as a means by which to exact profit and gain and to take from the people their property, earnings, and income, all while assuming to act as governmental agencies for the discharge of public functions and duties.

THE PANIC OF 1907

In 1907 the abuse and manipulation of money under secret "gentlemen's agreements" became so brazen and flagrant, such a menacing evil to public welfare, that the people, arising in righteous indignation, demanded that the power to control money be taken away from private banking corporations. And in 1913 Congress and the President declared for a change of the money system for the purpose of recovering back that power for exercise and control by Congress; and the Federal Reserve System was created, to be controlled by the Federal Reserve Board, which was to be a public governing body commissioned and empowered to act for the people. But by loopholes discovered in the law, and taken advantage of by the bankers, and by repeated artful amendments made to the law from time to time, always to meet some great pressing emergency, and by the perverted administration of the law, the Federal Reserve System has become a private banking corporation, conducted for selfish profit and gain, without obligation to the people or responsibility for the public welfare.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM A PRIVATE CORPORATION

There are two means or instrumentalities provided under the Federal Reserve System for the control of the volume and supply of money. One is called "the open-market operations", and the other is known as the "discount rate." Under the open-market operations, bonds and securities are bought or sold. Buying bonds and securities expands the currency; selling bonds and securities contracts the currency. Or as bonds and securities are bought and come in over the counter, money goes out into circulation. Selling bonds and securities produces directly the opposite effect. As the bonds and securities go out over the counter, the money comes back into the banks and money is contracted, withdrawn, and retired from circulation.

What is known as the discount rate is the interest or charge made for advancing money to the member banks to be loaned out to the people. If the discount, interest, or charge rate is reduced and made lower, more money will be borrowed from the member banks, and the volume of money will be increased in circulation. If the discount, interest, or charge rate is raised, increased, and made higher, less money will be borrowed by the people and money borrowed will be repaid to avoid the increased and higher charge and the volume of money will be reduced. It will be impossible to further explain the working operations of the Federal Reserve bank in these few remarks, but an understanding of money operations as they explain the cause of the panic, requires these two instrumentalities to be kept in mind.

THE GOVERNMENT PRINTS THE MONEY AND TURNS IT OVER TO BANKERS

Under this private banking system, exercising the constitutional powers of Congress, to coin, issue, and regulate the volume of money, the Government prints the currency, guarantees its value, and stands behind to make it good, then turns the money over to these private corporations for a charge of a fraction of 1 percent and to be loaned back to the Government at 4 percent. And the people are paying to these private banks billions of dollars as interest for the use of their own money. And in loaning the peoples' money to the people, these private banking corporations, have been making the huge profits of from 100- to 200-percent dividends or earnings, and some of the 12 Federal Reserve banks have made as high as $10,000 a day.

This is where the power and authority to coin, issue, and control money rested during the fateful year of 1920, when values and the price level fell in the twinkling of an eye, unawares, and the blight of this panic came. And this is where the power to control money has since remained and remains today, while the people are supplicating for relief and Congress is struggling and floundering, straining to pierce the veil of mystery and to analyze an unknown cause to solve the problem of the panic. And while these banking corporations remain vested with the power to issue and control money, more money can be withdrawn from circulation than Congress can restore to circulation, money can be withdrawn from circulation faster than Congress can restore back in circulation.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE

In order to more fully analyze business and industrial conditions today and the cause of this panic and depression, we must consider a great natural law, always moving and operating among men, the law of selfish human nature, implanted in all men and animal life for self-preservation and to maintain existence. It must be further realized and understood that this selfish impulse in man is the moving and controlling factor, leading, urging and driving men on, to strive for gain, to acquire, possess, to have and hold surplus food, clothing, shelter, goods and property, surplus money, wealth and riches; that this natural impulse in man has long been stimulated, actuated, encouraged, long been cultivated, developed, and enlarged in man in the course of competitive business and trade and the rival pursuits of commerce and industry, until the natural impulse of self interest has become abnormal in men, a perverted nature in men, has become a mania in men, leading, urging, and driving men on to strive for, possess, have and hold surplus goods, property, and wealth which they can never see, which they can never use, which they can never enjoy, all for the abnormal pleasure and gratification of holding from the use and enjoyment of others.

But there is a further trait of character developed over nature in men, more directly and especially influencing, and contributing to the immediate cause of bringing on and maintaining this panic upon the country. The stock exchange is an old trading order, beginning with the curb brokers in the street even before the Revolutionary War, and developing and taking form early with the organization of the Government, when Federal bonds and warrants became subjects of trade and manipulation. In time the membership of the curb brokers developed into an exclusive trading class with a code of business morals separate and a conception of right and wrong, of just and fair dealings, different from the rule observed by other men. This organization in time ripened into a caste, a body of men separate, apart, exclusive in their dealings, proceedings, and associations, with a different moral code or conscience, a creature of their exclusive surroundings. And in this exclusive trading class there grew up, developed, and crystallized the spirit of merciless strategy and intrigue characteristic of the kings and exclusive royalty of old. And where with kings all was fair in love and war for pillage and plunder, so all was legitimate, honorable, and right in financial manipulations for gain by the members of the stock exchange.

In this way this certain class of men, developing from an organization of street traders and curb brokers in the great metropolis of New York, first making their stand under a tree, has come to be recognized and known as Wall Street and the stock exchange, maintaining the curb traders' strategy and intrigue; and their original primitive conceptions of right and wrong between man and man, brought down from a different and cruel age, remains unchanged and held to the present day.

I am making these preliminary observations to impress Members why they must consider and account for the actions by certain classes and stratas of men on a different basis and theory for analysis from the acts of others who take from their fellowmen to appease their hunger or clothe their bodies or to enjoy some comfort, convenience, or some bodily pleasure in life. In the meantime I want to make plain and certain that I am condemning systems and not individual men, not the membership, officers, or agents of private banking corporations, taking over the control of public money for selfish profit, gain, and advantage, but the currency system permitted and suffered to exist by the people themselves. Under this system permitted by the people and taken advantage of by the financiers there is a serious doubt and question of whether the greater censure should go to the men who take the advantage left before them or the people who in passive indifference submit to the pillage which they invite by the open and unguarded gate.

It is a remarkable coincidence to be observed, that the curb brokers and street traders, who organized with and following the Government, to deal with bonds and warrants issued, have since kept in close touch and relation with public fiscal affairs, with Federal finance and the Treasury. And this course of public dealing and relations has been so continuous and uninterrupted that the history of public finance cannot be written and explained without some reference or narration of the inside operations and movements of Wall Street and the stock exchange. Such is the course and character of Wall Street and the stock exchange and such has been its relations with public office and fiscal operations that confidence has often been shaken in the course of public affairs, and in the good faith of public officials. When we speak of Morgan, Kuhn, Loeb, or Lamont, or other manipulating financiers, we are not speaking of them as individuals but as representing a class of men organized and operating under a system for the private control of public currency.

And now, in connection with these observations, I wish to call attention to a certain event in our history involving the relations of the stock exchange with the public finance and subtreasury. This is to show and illustrate how and by what means resorted to, financiers have misled high public officials, and directed the courses of legislation and the administration of government.

JAY GOULD AND JAMES FISKE

We all know of Jay Gould and some of us know James Fiske. These were two great American manipulating financiers of Wall Street and the stock exchange operating during the great Civil War times. Jay Gould and James Fiske, with other Wall Street financiers, had made great fortunes during the Civil War just as financiers in our day amassed great fortunes and wealth during the great World War. When the great Civil War was over following in the mad lure and craze for money the same as the financiers of today, following and after the great World War, they were eager to make more money.

PRESIDENT GRANT AND WIFE WERE ENTERTAINED

Following this lobby legislation, they entertained President Grant and especially Grant's wife and daughter, in elaborately planned ocean cruises and in sumptuous banquets and entertainments, all in great luxury and splendor.

They prepared newspaper articles and had these articles published as editorials in the New York Times and other papers headed, "Grant's Financial Policy." They dictated the appointment of John Biglow to control the subtreasury of New York, and, producing a fantastic array of facts and figures, they convinced Grant and the Secretary of the Treasury that high gold prices would stimulate business, and induced Grant to make an order directing the Secretary to sell no gold. And they took into their confidence or control Grant's brother-in-law, a Mr. Corbin, and through whom they arranged to take Grant to the woods of Pennsylvania for a 10 days' camping and outing, leaving no word of their destination.

THE PRESIDENT WAS TAKEN AND CONCEALED IN THE WOODS

And while the President was sojourning in the woods for rest, recreation, and recuperation, and before his whereabouts could be learned, Gould, Fiske, and their Wall Street associates had completed their gold market corner and by their conspiracy took from the people, through American importers, over $20,000,000.

I quote from the March of Democracy (Adams, p. 140):

Grant having allowed himself to become converted to the idea that a higher price for gold would benefit the farmer, ordered the Secretary of the Treasury not to sell any Government metal.

I also quote from Elson's United States History, page 830:

They convinced the President, therefore, it would be better for the country, the movement, and the crops and the like, if the gold sales were suspended.

I quote from Muzzy's United States History, pages 41 and 42:

Grant's failure of appreciation of the proprieties of the Presidential office, and his undisguised admiration for men of (great) wealth, brought his name into this unfortunate connection.

I further quote from the same history, page 42:

The argument which they (Gould and his associates) used was that the high price of gold would stimulate the movement of grain eastward to the Atlantic seaboard for export.

PRESIDENT GRANT A BRAVE, GOOD MAN

Grant was a great general, a brave and courageous soldier, the hero of Appomattox, the military genius of the modern world, an honest President, and an innocent man, yet he surrendered to the wiles of Wall Street, was taken and held a prisoner in the Pennsylvania woods until Gould and his associates had robbed the people of $20,000,000.

NO CHANGE IN THE CHARACTER OF MEN

History shows that while time, manners, customs, and forms change, there is very little change in the natures of men themselves. The men of today are not different from the men of Lincoln's time. They are only different, facing different conditions, confronting different opportunities and advantages to be gained. The great financiers of the country, the men of Wall Street and the stock exchange of the present day, are not different from the same men, the great financiers of Wall Street in Abraham Lincoln's time. Jay Gould was a great moneyed man, a great Wall Street manipulating financier, during the great Civil War, just as J. P. Morgan was during the great World War. Both of these men stood high on Wall Street and before certain men of the country in their day and generation.

The great financiers of the Civil War times had made millions during the Civil War, just as our financiers had made billions during this great World War. But they were not satisfied with their millions made; they wanted to make more millions, just as our great financiers today, after the great World War were and are not satisfied with their billions, but want to make more billions. Money is like strong drink, which creates a thirst for more drink, and money drives men mad, to strive and strain for more money and until it involves their whole nature and transforms them into misers, Shylocks, daring, desperate, money vandals, and thieves.

THIS PANIC IS A WORLD BLACK FRIDAY

The Jay Gould-Fiske Black Friday in 1869 was a money conspiracy following our great Civil War. This great World War has had its Black Friday no less than our Civil War. And this World War Black Friday has come following a war involving all the nations and casting its withering shadows here, in Europe, China, and India and reaching the entire civilized world. By the great Civil War Black Friday of 1869, Jay Gould and his Wall Street associates took $20,000,000 from the people of the country through the pillage of importers. But in this World War Black Friday in 1920 the World War bond syndicate, acting under a secret gentleman's agreement, has taken more, many times 20 billions, from the nations of the world and the people of the earth.

THE SECRET BANKERS' MEETING

When the blight of this great panic first fell in 1920 the country was reveling in the joy of returning peace and civil life and the farmers were happy in prosperity, dreaming of their gifts of land and homes to their children and children's children.

The song of the reaper in the field, the call of the farmer to his team in the harvest, the glad voice of the farmer boy, happy and content on the farm, met, joined, and mingled with the din of saw and hammer, the whir of machinery in motion, and the rumble of the busy marts of trade, all to swell the chorus and anthem of a prosperous and contented people, rejoicing, bringing in the sheaves. Such was the condition of the people on the farm, in the factory, mill, and workshop under higher values, higher prices and wage scales, when the blight of this panic and its withering shadows fell to prostrate agriculture and industry.

But suddenly, while the people of the country were happy and prosperous, reveling in Nature's copious bounty, rejoicing in plenty and great abundance, there came a change to interrupt and reverse this contentment and happy order of things, this prosperous condition of the people, coming not as some slow, loathsome diseases but coming like a bolt from a clear sky, coming like an avalanche from the mountains, coming like a devastating tide from the sea, or, in the language of the Prairie Farmer, which I have before quoted:

In 1920, in almost the twinkling of an eye, the condition was reversed, prices fell to a ruinously low level, the exchange of commodities almost stopped.

Under this sudden fall of values and commodity prices the confiding and unsuspecting farmer awoke as at the break of day to find his crops, stock, and produce sinking in a vortex of fallen values.

The farmers' failure, the failure of his buying and consuming power, finally reached back from retail merchant through wholesale and commission house, and for want of orders for goods closed factories, mills, and workshops, affecting 30,000,000 industrial workers and leaving 14,000,000 unemployed.

PROCEEDING CONCEALED

And for 2 years, 8 months, and 4 days the cause of this panic remained a bewildering, confusing mystery, and men struggling with the problem were charging and assigning many causes, some claiming a scourge sent by the Almighty, others that the people were buying too much, others that the people were not buying enough, and proposing a buying campaign; and still others were claiming the panic was an unsolvable mystery complex, a phenomenon, coming in cycles without comprehensible reasons and which would in some way vanish like a phantom ghost coming and passing away. And so the panic remained a mystery unsolved for 2 years, 8 months, and 4 days, and until the 22d day of April 1923, when the editor of the Manufacturers Record, a trade journal of Baltimore, Md., published the minutes of the proceedings of a secret bankers' meeting, held May 18, 1920, in Washington, D. C., in the very shadows of the Capitol, behind closed doors and curtains, the beginning date and from which the panic followed.

FRANK R. GOODING

On the 28th day of February 1923, 6 days after the publication of the proceedings of the secret bankers' meeting held May 18, 1920, the Honorable Frank R. Gooding, late Senator from Idaho, presented the published stenographic report of the Manufacturers Record to the United States Senate for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. At the same time Senator Gooding introduced a concurrent resolution denouncing the secret bankers' meeting and calling for a congressional investigation before the Banking and Currency Committee. But no investigation was ever made and the resolution remained pending for 5 years until the time of the Senator's death, June 24, 1928. These proceedings will be found on record at pages 4854 to 4866, inclusive, of volume 64, part 5, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and to which Members of Congress are respectfully referred and urged to read for a more detailed account of the publication of the proceedings of the secret bankers' meeting of May 18, 1920, and of the investigation never made.

THE MANUFACTURERS' RECORD

The publication of the proceedings of the secret bankers' meeting by the editor of the Manufacturers' Record, on April 22, 1923, lifted the veil and curtain of mystery and for the first time the world looked in upon the secret conclave of bankers and of whom there were the following financiers and honorable gentlemen attending: George L. Harrison, Philip Stockton, A. B. Hepburn, James B. Forgan, A. L. Mills, Edmund Platt, Frederick S. Chamberlain, James A. Alexander, John F. Bruton, George M. Reynolds, Wesley C. McDowell, E. K. Smith, B. A. McKinney, and many other private bankers controlling public currency, to whom I will particularly refer and make special mention when I come to give the proceedings and the secret resolution passed in the secret bankers' meeting.

Following, concurrently with as well as preceding the secret bankers' meeting of May 18, 1920, the Federal Reserve Board and banks were cooperating in servile obedience with the open-market operations, selling bonds and securities and withdrawing vast sums of money from the channels of industry and trade. And while at the same time, and as a part of a concerted program, the discount rate was being raised from 3 to 4 to 5 to 6 to 7 and 10 percent and which raise was continued from time to time until upon some hesitating country banks the discount or interest rate was raised to 85 percent as a penalty to compel collection at any cost or sacrifice to the borrower.

The contraction of money and credits for the time in which made effective, the rapidity and frenzied haste in which the operations were carried out, the amount of currency and credit withdrawn, is unprecedented in the history of the world, is equaled only in extent and magnitude by the unparalleled fall of values and prices.

This panic is not a mystery but came following an inobedience to the contraction of money and the fall of values under economic principles and monetary laws as fixed and certain in cause and effect as the laws of life and death, and was as inevitable to come as night follows the day with the rotation of the earth upon its axis, as the changing seasons alternate with the revolution of the earth in its orbit, revolving in an inclined plane. And if this panic had not come at the time it did come upon the country, and as it did come upon the people, following this contraction of currency and the consequent fall of values and the price level, it would have been a contravention of all known economic principles and laws, a phenomena which could be accounted for under no theory of economic or monetary science.

And if this panic had not lingered, continued, and remained up to this time, as it has lingered, continued, and remained under the economic course pursued and the monetary policy observed from the time of its beginning in 1920 of withholding credit and currency; if under the course pursued and the policy observed, prosperity had come back to the people, it would have come back or returned in defiance of every known economic principle, in defiance of every known law of money in their operations upon industry and trade, and such return of prosperity would have been as mysterious as the break of returning day at the hour of midnight, or as a copious shower or downpour from a clear and cloudless sky.

The only mystery of this panic is why it has not been more destructive, why the exchange of services and commodities has not been more completely stopped; why this flagrant and violent change of the money measure of values has not disrupted more completely the contracts and obligations to pay money; why it has not stopped the payment of more taxes, debts, and contracts for money and brought on greater default and more general insolvency and bankruptcy.

It was under these 2 years 8 months and 4 days while the secret bankers' meeting was being held and kept a guarded secret, while the secret resolution was unknown and currency and credit was contracted unawares, that this propaganda and claim of mystery was held out before the people and the bankers' tools, puppets, and cat's-paws were taught to speak as parrots speak and led to repeat after them in blind, submissive, vacant stare, "This panic is a mystery." It was during these 2 years 8 months and 4 days that the international bankers flooded the columns of the press with illuminating philosophy of mystery, and the want of faith and confidence, to account for a panic and depression which by its ravages and economic demoralization had first destroyed the faith and confidence of the people. It was during these 2 years 8 months and 4 days that puppet platform speakers were prompted to prate long and loud on the want of faith to create and crystallize public opinion, to accept the explanation of mystery, and thereby to forestall inquiry as to the cause which brought the panic upon the country.

Pirates never boarded a merchant's ship to scuttle and sink the vessel, highway robbers never rode masked, bandit burglars never blew a safe with more deliberate criminal intent than the international financiers and bankers who pulled the manipulating wires from behind set screens and closed curtains or gave orders from afar directing their tools and puppets in the secret bankers' meeting and upon the Federal Reserve Board fawning to do their will and bidding.

THE SECRET BANKERS' MEETING OF MAY 18, 1920

Was the meeting a public, open meeting or a closed secret affair? This is the question which must be answered. I will not answer it myself; I will let the bankers answer for themselves. But there were many bankers in the meeting, and the chairman represents and speaks for the people in a meeting. We will, therefore, quote the chairman and let him answer the question. W. P. G. Harding was the chairman and at the close of the meeting he cautioned and admonished the bankers, using the following words:

> I suggest, gentlemen, that you be very careful not to give out anything about the discussion of discount rates. That is one thing that there ought not to be any previous discussion about, because it disturbs everybody.

And the chairman was right in saying, "Because it disturbs everybody." It would disturb the farmer who owed a mortgage on his farm; his mortgage might be foreclosed. It would disturb the home owner paying for a home and make him realize he could not pay, would have to move. It would disturb the merchant and make him realize the people losing their buying power could not buy his goods and wares, and he would lose his business. The chairman was right, "It would disturb everybody"—and it did disturb everybody when the panic came and destroyed the peoples' buying and consuming power.

THE REMEDY

Money will not cure all the ills that flesh is heir to, nor cure all our economic ills. But money will cure the ills which money caused, and money will cure this panic and cure it in the same record time that money brought the panic upon the country. While this panic has remained and continued with alternating periods of relapse and relief, for over 14 years and since 1920, and while the economic loss and waste resulting cannot be compensated for or recovered back in the span of an average lifetime; and while the cost in lowered morale and depraved spirit and character in men, born of want, suffering, and distress, facing plenty and great abundance, and resulting from enforced idleness, and while the evils of this panic will remain a burden and a scourge to plague the third and fourth generations.

Yet the economic loss of this panic can be stopped and its further ravages stayed and arrested and turned back in 30 days, and substantial relief can be realized in less than 1 year's time or in the same brief time values, prices, and wages were forced down to a ruinously low level, taking away the earnings and income of the people and destroying their buying and consuming power. And there has never been a time since the panic began, first in 1920, when the contraction of money and the panic could not have been halted and stopped and turned back toward normal prosperity in the course of 30 days, and substantial relief realized in less than 1 year's time.

And while the economic loss and waste brought on and resulting from this panic, in the failure of earnings and income and the depreciation of property values, amounting to more than $200,000,000,000, or to an amount equal to one-half the value of all the property and assets of the country, yet this panic can be stopped without the cost of a single dollar to be taken from taxes levied upon the people, and without the exercise of any special powers or any extraordinary powers to be conferred upon any officer, board, or body of men, or without any extraordinary proceeding taken, either legislative, judicial, or executive, in the exercise of governmental functions.

CONGRESS CONVENED IN SPECIAL SESSION

Congress, convened in special and extraordinary session to consider the cause of the panic and provide measures for relief, found on full investigation and consideration that this panic was caused and brought on the country by a failure of the buying and consuming power, and further found this failure had resulted from a fall of values and the price level. But not only has Congress found that the fall of values, prices, and wages was the cause of the panic, but this cause has come to be accepted generally by economics students of the times and by all who have conducted special investigations, and will bear the scrutiny of critical analysis and can be demonstrated and conclusively shown.

This leaves the one preliminary problem remaining—the cause of the fall of values and prices. It is a general scientific principle, accepted and declared by all monetary authorities, that the volume and supply of money, under the law of supply and demand, operating upon money and credit as well as upon other commodities and services, controls values and the price level, all other conditions remaining equal.

A DROUGHT OF MONEY

This panic was therefore caused, and industry remains suffering from a drought and failure of the money supply. The problem has been analyzed and solved, the remedy has been agreed and entered upon, three billions of money has been printed, and billions more has been made available under the gold revaluation plan, more than enough currency to restore the money secretly withdrawn from circulation. All preparations have been completed. The money, made ready and available, has been held in waiting for issue and use for over 1 year and since May 18, 1933, while the country and the people have languished in the throes of panic and depression, and the Government stands powerless to put the money back in circulation, restore the depleted money supply to remedy and relieve from the crisis. There is one reason, and only one reason, why this program has not been completed and the money supply restored to the people, and this reason can be shown and explained briefly in the form of questions and answers.

What must be further done in pursuance of this program and what would be the further step to be taken?

The further step to be taken would be to take from private banking corporations the power to control public currency and return that power to Congress, to be exercised as a public function, where the Constitution placed it and where it rightfully belongs. Without this power taken from private banking corporations, the volume and supply of money cannot be restored because money can be taken from circulation faster than money can be restored to circulation, and more credit can be restricted and withheld from use than can be restored and made available for use, and the Government can be, has been, and is being defied and defeated.

HOW CAN CONGRESS RECOVER POWER BACK

But how can this power over money be taken from private banking corporations and restored back to Congress and the Government?

Many plans have been proposed or offered to take the control of public currency from private banking corporations and restore that power to the Government, including a plan I have myself considered, but all these different plans cannot be analyzed here or even enumerated or briefly referred to except only one. The only plan which can be analyzed and explained here, and probably the most simple and practical plan offered, is the plan proposed by Hon. Robert L. Owen, for 12 years chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate, and recognized as very high authority on public currency and credit today. The currency is regulated and controlled by, under, and through what is commonly known as the Federal Reserve System, a private banking corporation, operating under a public name, owned by the member banks of that system as the holders of the stock of the Reserve Corporation.

THE OWEN PLAN

Under the plan proposed by Senator Owen it would not be necessary to tear down the system or create or build up a new system. All that would be necessary under the Owen plan would be to change the ownership of the Federal Reserve banks now existing from a privately owned banking system to a publicly owned banking system.

But how could this change of ownership be made?

All that would be necessary and required under the plan proposed by Senator Owen would be for Congress to pass a law requiring the member banks holding the stock of the Federal Reserve Banking System to assign, transfer, and deliver their shares over to and to be held by the Government. This would make the Government the owner of the System, with the power to control and direct the System, and to regulate the circulation of public currency.

How long would be required to make the change from private to public control?

This would require only a very brief time and could be brought about in 30 legislative days. With the System taken over and a monetary authority created, as proposed by the Owen plan, there would be no interruption of the course of currency operations, and public control could be made effective promptly, at once, and without delay. And once the System has been separated from private banking corporations under the control of international financiers, the Federal Reserve System thus acquired could be changed, modified, or amended to meet all the requirements of a scientific system for the control of public currency and credit to serve the interests and welfare of the public.

But how could the money secretly withdrawn from circulation be publicly restored back to circulation?

There are many ways in which this could be accomplished. First, by paying off bonds and public obligations and stopping billions in interest which the people are paying for the use of their money. But to pay off all these bonds at one time may return too great an amount of money in circulation and raise values and prices beyond a normal level. There are some debts and obligations the payment of which would operate more promptly to restore the buying and consuming power than the payment of others to be resorted to, but will be impossible to enumerate, much less to describe these different forms or classes of obligations. But the payment of public obligations could be ordered made by the monetary authority accordingly as they would best serve to raise values and prices most promptly in restoring the buying and consuming power.

Now, if Members have held in mind my first explanation of the Reserve System, of the open-market operations, and the discount rates provided, they will better understand my explanation here and how the volume and supply of money can be started back in circulation and how values and the commodity price level can be stabilized and kept at an even stage. If the volume and supply of money becomes too great and values and the price level rise too high, the open-market operations would be brought into play, bonds and securities would be sold and delivered, and as the securities would go out over the counter money would come in and be withdrawn from circulation. And, in cooperation with the open-market operations, the discount or interest rate would be raised, which would make borrowed money less profitable, and borrowed money would come back to the banks and be returned from circulation, and values and the price level would be lowered. Then, if values and the price level fell too low, these operations would be reversed, money would be returned back in circulation, values and the price level would be raised and thereby stabilized and kept at an even stage, all other conditions remaining equal.

The true remedy for this panic is so plain, so simple, and so promptly effective that, when compared and considered alongside with the maze and bewildering mystery, to confuse and overawe the public mind, thrown out around other remedies proposed to be tried out at the cost of billions, calling for a vast army of employees numbered in the tens of thousands and increasing and all to be prolonged through tedious years of time; that this remedy may appear at first glance as fantastic, unreal, and unbelievable, but which rests upon infallible theory and principle, upon facts, science, and experience, conclusively demonstrated and shown, and will relieve from this depression as promptly and to an effect certain as a cup of free water from the spring will relieve from the awful pains and tortures of a man writhing in the agony of intense suffering from want of water to quench his burning, feverish thirst.

INFLATION

It is recognized in physical science that no particle of matter can be destroyed, that only its form can be changed, and this is likewise and equally true with values in this panic or depression. The values lost by the people are not destroyed; they have only been shifted and transferred to the property of other owners. This is the first fact to be realized in the solution of the problem of this panic—that of all the values the people have lost by depreciation of property, commodities, and labor, amounting to $50,000,000,000 to farmers alone, or an average of $5,000 for each and every farmer, and, in all, over $200,000,000,000, or amount equal to one-half of all property values, none of which values have been destroyed, none has been burned up, none has been cast into the sea, but all exist and remain tonight the same as before taken from the people. By the magic wand of money waved in magic gesture over property, these values have been made to shift and leave commodities, labor, and labor products and pass into money bonds and money contracts, and every dollar in value the people have lost is now in the pockets of these manipulating financiers, which, in control of currency and credit, they are grasping to retain and hold.

Under economic laws and the principles of money, the contraction of money and credit, ordered under the secret gentleman's agreement and pursuant to which the secret bankers' meeting was held, brought a fall of values, prices, and wages, the effect of which was to more than double the value of money bonds and money contracts, and thereby to double and multiply taxes, interest, and debts upon the people, measured in labor and the products of labor, the only means with which the people have to pay; and with double the labor and labor products required to meet these money obligations, the people were left without surplus means with which to buy, take, and consume the products of farm and industry. It is obvious, apparent, and conclusive that the remedy and only remedy for this loss of buying and consuming power is a reversal of these money operations, a return of money and credit withdrawn, restoring the value of labor and the products of labor which alone will leave a surplus over, after the payment of taxes, interest, and money obligations, for use as buying and consuming power.

But this obvious remedy for relief, a reversal of the money operations and restoration of the money supply, is declared against as "inflation", as some course of total depravity, as monstrous, unfair, unthinkable. And without a proper knowledge of the cause and the remedy required many good people are and will be misled to hinder, delay, and prevent the relief they are demanding and praying for, higher values, higher prices, and higher wages, to restore their buying and consuming power. Prejudice is a more controlling factor than facts, reason, and logic with men, and this has been long recognized and understood by the financiers and international bankers—mental attitude, the bent of mind, the power of prejudice to hold, lead, and control men. They know how to saturate and mold the public mind with fear and apprehension, and with a shrewd sense of practical psychology they apply the prejudice thus created and of which they adroitly take advantage to lead, control, and hold men accordingly as their interests may require.

"Inflation" is a general word or term which, used and applied to objects, means to swell, puff up, to distend beyond their normal or natural dimensions. The word has no more special application to values or prices and money than to any other nature or property or commodities or services. But as it carries a certain sense or meaning of instability, wavering, and uncertainty and because of this meaning it is capitalized upon and applied to values, prices, and wages rising to their normal stage back from a lower to a higher level. And by a shrewd and crafty appeal to prejudice, deliberately created for the purpose, the restoration of higher values, prices, and wages is declared to be "inflation" and is made obnoxious, offensive, and distasteful, to stink in the nostrils of the people, and as an abomination in the sight of the Lord. By this strategy the people are misled to oppose, resist, and prevent a rise or restoration of values and the price level and what they are appealing and praying for, and the only means or hope of relief from the impossible taxes and debt burdens under low and ruinous price levels.

For the proper consideration of the word or term "inflation" it must be realized and understood that commodities or labor values and money values are always relative and opposite; that the value of one must be low; that the value of the other may be high; that if one is worth more the other is worth less; that there can be no such economic condition as high money values and high commodity or labor values, at one and the same time; that when commodity values are higher, money values are correspondingly lower, or if money values are higher, commodity and labor values will be lower; if commodity or labor values are too low, it is because money values are too high. It must be forever kept in mind that whatever makes low values, prices, and wages regardless of the cause or operation, the effect is to make higher values in money and contracts for money and that rising values, prices, and wages make so-called cheap money.

And it must be further realized and kept in mind that there can be, and are the same changes in money values, the same so-called inflation of money, of bonds, and contracts for the payment of money as so-called inflation of other property values, as wheat, corn, and farm crops and products, as labor values and the products of labor. But the operations carried out in secret, enlarging, swelling, and distending the money measure of value, the dollar, and which multiples taxes and interest and doubles mortgages and debts upon the people, measured in labor and what they have to pay, and under the crushing burdens of which the people have been left, robbed, and gagged, and left gasping for economic breath—these financial operations are never called or referred to as "inflation", meaning swelling, enlarging, and distending, but instead the very different words and high-sounding terms are applied, as "currency reform" to bring about so-called sound money and an honest dollar.

But the currency operations required for the restoration of values, prices, and wages, is not inflation in any sense within the meaning of that term. It is not expanding beyond the natural, normal level of the volume and supply of money. It would only be a restoration back of money and credit secretly withdrawn, a restoration of values, prices, and wages, a restoration of earnings and income, a restoration of the buying and consuming power, a restoration of the tax, interest, and debt-paying power.

Before this panic came upon the people, the country was under so-called inflation with a greater volume of supply of money and credit, with higher values, prices, and wages. The people were happy and prosperous, ambitious, anxious to labor, to live, and grateful for the rewards of their toil, and while under so-called "inflation", the 40,000,000 farm population and dependents were buying, taking, and consuming the products of factory, mill, and workshop and industrial labor was kept busy and working to supply the farmer's wants and needs and, in turn, consuming the products of the farm, while under so-called inflation the people were paying their taxes without burden or complaint, the people were paying their debts and mortgages, all without strain, sacrifice, or denial. The farmers were paying their notes at the bank, the laboring men were paying for their homes and meeting their payments promptly in building-and-loan associations. Tenants were paying their rent to landlords, customers were paying their bills to merchants, patients were paying their physicians for services, clients were paying their lawyer's fees, the people were meeting their obligations promptly, and all laboring men were working and employed at good wages and living in plenty and comfort, with all the necessaries required to live.

But secretly there came a change, coming suddenly, unawares, first in 1920, a change from so-called inflation to so-called sound money and currency reform, coming with the contraction, withdrawal of money and credit, a change from so-called commodity inflation to money and dollar inflation. And we now have money inflation; we now have high money values; we now have so-called currency reform; we now have so-called sound money; we now have a so-called honest dollar; and with which we have had and now have unemployment and resulting starvation wages, with 23,000,000 on the relief rolls, the people without earnings and income with which to buy the necessaries of life, without money to pay taxes, debts, and mortgages, with their property being sold for taxes and the nonpayment of mortgages. We do not now have so-called inflation—we are only warned of its horrors, only warned against its monstrous evils, against the dangers and menace of restoring values, prices, and wages.

A NEW SLOGAN COINED

There is a new word or term which is being used or capitalized upon to further confuse and mislead the public mind, to cover and conceal money movements, to prevent the restoration of commodity values, and whereby to enable financiers to hold and make secure their ill-gotten gains. This new term is called tinkering. Tinkering is a word akin to meddling, unskillful changing, tampering with, an operation men would naturally oppose in their own most important affairs. And now when it is proposed to reverse the currency and credit operations, to restore values, prices, and wages, secretly taken from the people, the operation is charged and referred to as tinkering, to discredit the remedy before the people, and lead them to oppose and reject the means which will recover to them their lost values, earnings, and income, and restore their buying and consuming power.

It was currency reform, looking to sound money and an honest dollar to withdraw currency and credit, force down values, prices, and wages to a ruinously and disastrously low level, doubling taxes, interest and debts upon the people, and destroying their buying and consuming power. But now when it is proposed to reverse these currency operations, to restore values, prices, and wages, it is inflation, meddling, tinkering, disastrous, unthinkable, revolting, and in their humane felicitations, engrossed in benevolence, they forget self and plead not for themselves but for the widows and orphans and for the laboring man's wage. They warn of the danger of inflation, of tinkering, meddling with money.

Every ingenious argument and conceivable pretext is being and will be resorted to to hold these manipulated values in money, bonds, and contracts for money. They are now saying and will say that a return of the same money and credit back into circulation will be fiat money, as something abhorrent, when all money is fiat money and without the fiat of the Government, nothing will pass or be received as money. And they are charging and will charge that a restoration of money back into circulation will be printing-press money, when all paper money is printing-press money and when the money proposed to be returned would be the same money as the money contracted and withdrawn and the same as other money used and based upon the same gold for redemption.

THE GERMAN INFLATION

And then they will point to Germany and warn of German post-war money, withholding the true facts about Germany, that Germany was an insolvent and bankrupt nation, owing both domestic and foreign debts, and how money was used to destroy the domestic debts to put all resources behind the foreign debt, and too, was deliberately carried out by raising and multiplying values and prices many times one hundred fold above the normal level, and for the purpose of going back upon the international gold standard for the payment of the foreign private-debt holders and owners. And it was under this fall of values following the international gold standard, Germany with all her payments on her debts, owes more today and carries a greater burden measured in labor and labor products than before Germany had paid a single mark. Every abnormal expansion of money immediately preceding or followed by a contraction of money and credit, and a fall of values and prices, can be traced and shown to be a part of the preliminary money maneuvers and manipulations, and when values and prices are raised to a high level then property and commodities are converted into money and money contracts, in or calling for a greater number of dollars and following which conversion of commodities into money, currency, and credit are contracted to increase and multiply the value of the increased number of dollars.

The effect of this system of currency manipulation is a double multiplication of values as the one and the other comes into the hands of the manipulating financiers, and in the face of which some people are still curious to realize and understand why the rich grow richer and how less than 10 percent of the people have come to own over 90 percent of all the wealth and property of the country. It was under these double reverse currency movements that values and prices were made to rise for 2 years after the close of the World War, while surplus war materials held by war profiteers were being thrown back upon the market, and then suddenly made to fall, with the actual per-capita production declining, using the power of money to overcome the laws of supply and demand.

But this whole ingenious, camouflage argument, this propaganda to becloud the public mind, falls and fails in the face of the fixed program for the restoration of money and credits which is to restore values to the 1926 price level. This fixed and agreed price stage is below the normal level from which values and prices were forced down, measured in taxes levied and obligations contracted and to which the word "inflation" has no more application than a part meal in an empty and collapsed stomach. And the ominous warning of temptation that restoration would be carried further and above the fixed normal value and price level would be like refusing food to a starving man, claiming he would never stop eating, or refusing clothes to a shivering man, claiming he would only demand more clothing, or refusing shelter to a freezing man, claiming he would never again go outside and would become a hothouse plant.

By the secret contraction of money and credit, more tribute can be levied and collected from the people and more tribute has been collected from the people than ever royal rulers have exacted of their subjects, than ever marauding kings have taken in conquest and subjugation from the vanquished as the spoils of war. The international financiers and bankers, by taking advantage of the prejudice which they have deliberately created in the minds of the people, and by urging other measures for so-called experimental relief—they have delayed and are delaying, they are withholding and postponing from year to year the restoration of values, prices, and wages, without which no recovery can come, and are holding and are making secure their ill-gotten gains against a recovery back of the property of the people from which taken.

TRIFLING WITH THE PEOPLE

They are temporizing with the people, they are parleying with the people, they are trifling with the people by their appeal to prejudice, by diverting attention from the true cause, and by urging conflicting, experimental remedies, and the pity of it all, the humiliation of it all, and the tragedy of it all is that they are misleading the people to coerce their representatives in office, to suspend the administration of relief measures provided for the restoration of their buying and consuming power. And it would be divine and Christlike to say, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

What the country and the people need today is not high, scarce, dear money, with resulting low commodity values and prices, is not so-called currency reform, is not so-called sound money, is not a mere partial rise of values, prices, and wages, is not a higher price for a part crop but a higher price for a whole crop, a full restoration of the buying and consuming power, a full restoration of the taxpaying power, of the interest, debt, and mortgage-paying power.

LOOKING BEHIND THE SCREEN

And now, in conclusion of these remarks, I want to remove the screens and lift the curtains and look in upon some of the scenes of the secret bankers' meeting. I want to turn the radio dial to listen to a phonographic record of some of the proceedings of the bankers' conclave behind closed doors and safeguarded by soundproof walls. John Skelton Williams was at this time in office as the Comptroller of the Currency, and, ex officio by reason of his office, was a member of the Federal Reserve Board. Williams objected and protested against the secret order for the contraction of money and withdrawal of available credit, and in reporting his protest said:

> I heard much talk while I was a member of the Federal Reserve Board about forcing the farmer to sell his wheat, or the cotton farmer to sell his cotton, or the cattle raiser to sell his livestock, or the wholesaler or retailer to sell their stock (their merchandise) of goods.
> But I must frankly tell you that I do not recall of a single occasion during the last 2 years of deflation when the Board ever discussed seriously the importance or desirability of requiring the big banks of New York City to liquidate (pay) a portion of their loans, some of which were lending millions of dollars to their own executive officials on highly speculative securities and to big syndicates, in which those officials were actively interested and which these banks had been carrying for months, and some for years (without requiring) to liquidate a portion of their loans.

This same John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency during the secret contraction of money, explaining his efforts to stop the contraction and withdrawal of money and credit to John A. Simpson, then president of the Farmers Union organization, said:

> I told the other members of the Board, "Do you know that this will break a lot of little country bankers?" And they cold-bloodedly answered me, "They ought to break; there are too many of them." I told them, "Don't you know it is going to ruin lots of farmers?" And they cold-bloodedly replied to me, "They ought to be ruined; they are getting so prosperous they will not work."

This panic is no mystery; it is a conspiracy carried out under a secret gentleman's agreement. Bandit raiders of the range never hied to deeper caverns, gang murderers of a city never crept back to blacker darkness to cover highway robbery and theft or to conceal cold-blooded murder, than the international financiers who pulled the manipulating wires from behind closed doors and curtains or gave orders from afar, directing their tools and puppets in the secret bankers' meeting and in the Federal Reserve banks, for the contraction of money and credits, and thereby to take from the people their property and substance unawares.

But, forgetting the past and the cause for the present, and the remedy—water is the vitalizing, indispensable element going to sustain all animal and plant life, without which existence could not be prolonged and all would languish and finally perish and decay. Many of us have observed the anguish and pains, the griping contortions of the body suffering from the want of water, and the almost instant relief coming with the quenched thirst. Many of us have looked upon the dry, dead, parched earth, the withering vegetation during a drought, the want and scarcity of water, leaving the sod without semblance of existing life. And as often we have heard the rainfall coming gently in the nighttime and, awakening in the morning at the break of day, we have found all nature aglow and the sod springing to renewed life in sparkling, verdant green.

Money, currency, and credit as a means and medium for the exchange of property, commodities, and services is to our civilization and specialized system of industry what water is to animal and plant life. The people are suffering from a drought, from the want and scarcity of money, as a means and medium for the exchange of their services and what they produce, for others' services and what others produce, whereby to provide themselves with the necessaries and the comforts required to live. This vital element or agency of industry has been withheld until it has dried up the arteries, veins, and channels of trade, until industry has been left with the appearance of the dead, parched, lifeless sod. Yet the return of this vital, life element of industry, money and currency as a medium of exchange, would bring relief as prompt and as instant as the quenched thirst to the famished body, as the magic showers bring back life to the grass and plants lying dormant waiting for the raindrops on the sod.

Under this drought and scarcity of money, the failure of a medium of exchange and a measure of unchanging values, this vital element of social industry, like the potent energies of life, lying dormant to spring anew to active life and growth, is waiting to join in cooperation with the fertility of the soil, with the resources of the country, with the energies and enterprise of the people, to awaken to a new industrial activity, which medium and means of money have alone caused industry to develop and our advanced civilization possible. And prosperity, with a restoration of money, will come back to the people of the country as prompt in response as relief comes to the famished body with water to quench the thirst, and as magic life springs and returns to dry, dead, lifeless sod, drinking from the raindrops and the showers.

THE INVISIBLE BURDEN OF TAXATION

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, there exists in the United States today an invisible burden of taxation which materially affects the purchase price of all articles of personal use and consumption.

An ever-increasing burden and multiplicity of taxes on the economic units of production, transportation, and distribution add to the daily cost of living.

One article of every-day consumption is bread. This necessity of life, common to all, bears its proportionate burden of more than half a hundred local, State, and Federal taxes before it reaches the table of the consumer.

The variety and number of taxes hidden in a loaf of bread are not limited to bread alone, but apply to practically all purchases. Other examples are meat, products manufactured from wheat, cotton, wool, steel, and leather, which bear from 40 to 63 local, State, and Federal taxes in the journey from farm and mine to the home of the consumer. No item of personal or family use is exempt. Shoes, clothing, household furnishings, and so forth, all bear their share of the total national tax burden.

Taxes, like wages and other expenses, must be included as part of the cost of production and distribution by all engaged in providing the nation with the things it buys. The cost of taxation must be recovered by the farmer, miner, manufacturer, railroad, distributor, and all units in the chain of supply if they are to make a profit and continue in the business of satisfying a nation's needs. No business can be run indefinitely at a loss. Consequently, although we never receive a tax bill, we do pay, in the retail prices of the things we buy, practically the entire tax bill of the combined units engaged in providing us with our daily purchases. Increased cost of government, with its resulting demand for increased taxes, increases the cost of living. Regardless of who pays taxes in the original instance, it is the consumer who ultimately pays. In that respect, cost of government is but another name today for cost of living.

Everything we eat and wear bears and accumulates its proportionate share of innumerable local, State, and Federal taxes at each step of the journey to the consumer. Twenty-four percent of the rent we pay is for taxes. These three items—food, clothing, and housing—are the three chief necessities of life, and on the average take two-thirds of the family income.

For the year 1934, local, State, and Federal tax collections amounted to $9,500,000,000. The national income for this year was $48,561,000,000. Tax collections were, therefore, 19.6 percent of the national income. Practically 20 cents out of every dollar we earned went to the tax collector. But this is only part of the picture and does not tell the whole story. For the year 1934, cost of government was equal to approximately one-third of the national income. Government expenditures for this year—local, State, and Federal—totaled $15,500,000,000, or 31.9 percent of the national income. The difference between collections and expenditures was borrowed, and since it must be repaid, constitutes an unpaid tax bill. Federal Government expenditures alone, in the period March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1936, amounted to $25,067,769,509, or approximately $2.12 for every dollar received.

The cost of government today exceeds the margin of security in the average American family's earnings estimated at 25 cents of every dollar of income. This margin formerly provided for home building, education of children, sickness and old age, church and charity, and other requirements above the bare necessities of life.

Obviously, this burden of the cost of government is not an abstract thing. It is borne and paid for by every wage earner in everything he buys, although he never receives a tax bill. It is not confined to luxuries, but extends to all the necessities of life, and, unfortunately, the more common the use, the greater the contribution to the cost of government.

The hidden taxes collected by the Federal Government alone for 1935 totaled $2,232,402,340, which is a cost per family of practically $70. This does not include the Federal income, capital stock, and excess-profits taxes levied on corporations, or the Federal income, gift, and estate taxes levied on individuals. Hidden taxes, as the term is used, include only those taxes which are imposed indirectly upon and are paid by the consumer.

Since 1932 the amount of hidden taxes collected by the Federal Government has increased more than 286 percent, as shown by the following table:

Hidden taxes collected

	Amount	Per family
1932	$780,703,659	$25.35
1933	1,088,901,635	35.01
1935	2,232,402,340	69.96

Freedom from taxes is a delusion, but the protest must come from the consumer who ultimately pays and bears this burden of the cost of government because it is part of the cost of his daily purchases, because it adds to his cost of living, because it lowers his standard of living, and because it threatens to destroy his economic security and places him on the line between individual independence and Government relief.

A RECORD OF SOME OF MY ACTIVITIES IN CONGRESS, TOGETHER WITH SOME OF THE ACTIVITIES OF THIS ADMINISTRATION IN CONNECTICUT

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to review my activities as a Member of this great body. As a Representative of all the people of my State, I believe that I have consistently served their best interests. At all times it has been my care to preserve the closest relations with my constituents, to all of whom I have constantly held myself available.

I. Fundamental Principles of Human Rights

(A) LIBERTY OF RELIGION AND EDUCATION

I have actively interested myself in civil and religious liberties and have on numerous occasions denounced the violation of those fundamental human rights which are set out in the Bill of Rights of our Constitution.

On many occasions I have protested, by introducing resolutions and by speeches, against religious and racial persecution, no matter where it exists, in Mexico, Germany, or elsewhere. I believe that the voice of the people of this country should be expressed in such matters through the proper officials. That we must also zealously guard all of the priceless liberties of our own citizens is an axiom of my political philosophy.

And at all times must we be conscious of the danger of the spread of intolerance which finds expression in mob violence and lynchings. I have, therefore, actively supported the anti-lynching legislation in Congress.

(B) LIBERTY OF THE PRESS

I have advocated that in time of war for the defense of our liberties there should be a conscription of wealth, as well as of men. When we were considering the McSwain bill to prevent war profiteering, a national policy with which I am in complete sympathy, I introduced an amendment to exempt the press from the licensing provisions, lest our zeal to prosecute a war might cause us to forget the importance of a free press. My amendment was adopted.

II. Social Legislation

(A) OLD-AGE SECURITY AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

I have consistently advocated and voted for such legislation. It is true that we have not provided complete protection for the aged and unemployed. But we have made a start, and as we learn by experience we will be able to extend and modernize pension and unemployment-compensation laws in this country.

(B) LEGISLATION BENEFICIAL TO EMPLOYERS AND LABOR

Our statutes now recognize the fundamental rights of labor to bargain collectively through representatives of its own choosing. I favored the Wagner-Connery labor disputes adjustment bill because it recognizes the equal rights of the laborer and the employer to adjust their differences by negotiation and is therefore beneficial to both.

(C) INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF STRIKEBREAKERS AND ARMED THUGS; CHILD LABOR; AND SWEATSHOP CONDITIONS IN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Some of the most progressive legislation of this session of Congress came out of the House Judiciary Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. This committee approved, and Congress passed, the law prohibiting the interstate shipment of armed guards to interfere with peaceful picketing. We have thus abolished a notorious system whereby a few racketeers were making money by shipping armed thugs around the country to cause disorder and riots.

I introduced a bill to prohibit the Government from contracting for supplies from manufacturers who employ child or convict labor. The Judiciary Committee finally selected the best provisions of this and similar bills and incorporated them in the Healey Government contract bill, which requires contractors with the Government to covenant that they do not employ child or convict labor, use sweatshop methods, or employ workers over 40 hours per week or 8 hours per day without paying them for such overtime, utilize the indecent "kickback" system, or exploit labor by paying less than the prevailing rate of wages in the community. It is a bill which protects the manufacturers of Connecticut, including those in the textile industry, against unfair competition and low wage and labor standards in other sections.

(D) PREVAILING WAGES

I have advocated decent wages for labor and the inherent right of citizens to obtain work and to receive adequate remuneration to maintain themselves and their families. That is why I proposed, when the Merchant Marine Act was being considered on June 25, 1935, a prevailing wage rate amendment for workers engaged in shipbuilding. The amendment was adopted.

(E) PUBLIC WORKS AND WORK RELIEF

With millions out of work, this administration acted properly in providing public-works employment and work relief. I voted for the public-works program, and in this connection I can only ask, "Is there any person so inhuman as to assert that he would vote against a measure to save millions of unemployed from the bread lines and starvation, a measure that helps men and women to retain their self-respect and morale?"

(F) CIVIL SERVICE EXTENSION

I advocated the extension of the civil service and cited its success in the efficiency of the postal employees.

(G) VETERANS

I voted for payment of the bonus to the veterans because it was a debt owed to them. I introduced measures to give the veterans of the Spanish-American War, their widows and dependents, some of the priviliges given to veterans of other wars. It is not class legislation that I favor, but legislation to equalize their privileges and rights with others.

Many appeals have come to me from veterans and the widows of veterans for my assistance in obtaining more fair and equitable treatment, and I have been successful in many instances in securing justice for them.

III. FLOOD CONTROL AND PUBLIC WORKS

(A) THE CONNECTICUT RIVER VALLEY AUTHORITY BILL

Immediately after I came to Congress, on January 29, 1935, I introduced H. R. 4979, a bill authorizing $50,000,000 for a comprehensive plan of flood control of the Connecticut River and the incidental use of dams to generate cheaper electricity in order to help pay the cost of flood control. The bill did not constitute Federal interference but provided for Federal cooperation with the States involved. This was in the early part of 1935, when no one expected a disastrous flood such as occurred in the spring of 1936. Selfish interests attacked the bill, even arguing that "it proposed a garden for the Connecticut River Valley." Unfortunately, our Connecticut River Valley, which was a garden, suffered the havoc of this year's great flood.

(B) COMPACT BILL—RESULTS

On August 13, 1935, I introduced another bill, permitting the New England States to make compacts for flood control, elimination of pollution, and other improvements, such as reforestation and the prevention of soil erosion. Under the Constitution, congressional sanction is necessary for State compacts or treaties.

This bill was passed by Congress and enacted into law on June 8, 1936. Already it has stimulated the New England States to assemble their representatives and to make preparatory arrangements for such agreements. It permits them to proceed with a program for flood control and elimination of pollution, and it provides for protecting local traditions and State rights, because each State legislature must ratify these agreements.

(C) OMNIBUS FLOOD-CONTROL BILL—CITRON AMENDMENT FOR CONNECTICUT RIVER

About the same time that my compact bill was passed, the Senate finally passed the omnibus flood-control bill, containing an authorization of about $13,000,000 for the Connecticut River, of which the several States will have to contribute about $3,000,000.

This omnibus bill was introduced in the House last year, but there was no provision in it for the Connecticut River. I thereupon offered an amendment on the floor of the House for $1,000,000 for this river, and the amendment was adopted. This was on August 22, 1935, and when the Senate considered this bill this year there was available a new report from the War Department Engineers recommending $13,000,000 for the Connecticut River. This was substituted for my $1,000,000 amendment. It is my belief that my requests for surveys and reports, together with the widespread floods of this spring, brought home to the War Department a realization of the need of extensive flood-control work upon the river, so that its Engineers completed the report in time for the Senate's consideration.

(D) RIVERS AND HARBORS

I favor reasonable and sensible improvements in rivers and harbors, not only because of the permanent economic value but because of the opportunity to employ men on worthwhile projects.

Before the various committees and in the House I advocated improvements in the Thames River and New London Harbor, the Connecticut River, New Haven Harbor, and Stamford Harbor.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 9, 1935, shows the following authorizations:

New London and Thames River	$820,000
Connecticut River, below Hartford	530,000
Connecticut River above Hartford, subject to local contributions—about	3,384,000
New Haven Harbor	352,000
Stamford Harbor	186,000

(E) OTHER PUBLIC-WORKS IMPROVEMENTS IN HARBORS

Through the medium of the Public Works Administration improvements have been made to Southport Harbor, and a survey of Bridgeport Harbor is now being completed. The War Department Appropriation Act of May 15, 1936, allotted $53,000 to Bridgeport Harbor for dredging and restoring channels.

I was instrumental in having surveys made of Clinton, Saybrook, and Madison Harbors, and of the Housatonic River.

(F) NEW LONDON, CONN.

At all times since my arrival in Congress I have worked for the improvement of this harbor. It is my opinion that New London, with its excellent location and wonderful natural harbor, may be developed into a great shipping point.

I appeared before the Naval Affairs Committee and protested the threatened removal of the submarine base from New London, and I have advocated the establishment of a merchant-marine school for New London in close cooperation with the Coast Guard Academy.

Recently I conferred with naval authorities concerning further development of this harbor. Although it is adequate for present needs, future considerations may alter the present status.

P. W. A. allotments to the naval base at New London total $2,697,891; to the Coast Guard Academy at New London $71,065; and to nearby Groton for construction of naval vessels $5,540,000. For construction of a dock terminal at New London P. W. A. has allotted $22,604.

IV. PROPOSALS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

(A) TAX-EXEMPT BONDS

I have proposed an amendment (H. J. Res. 576) to the Federal Constitution to eliminate the issuance of tax-exempt bonds.

I also believe that there is an opportunity for Congress to improve our Federal Reserve System, which should not be an instrument for private profit and gain but a true public institution for the benefit of all of our people.

(B) VETO POWER BY PRESIDENT OF SEPARATE ITEMS

On March 30, 1936, I proposed an amendment (H. J. Res. 552) to the Constitution to permit the President to veto any item in a budget or in an appropriation bill. Too often "pork barrel" riders are attached to such measures, which the President is now powerless to eliminate since to veto one item the whole bill must be vetoed.

V. MANUFACTURE, INDUSTRY, AND AGRICULTURE

(A) TEXTILES

To protect the New England textile industry from extinction, I introduced, on March 14, 1935, a bill (H. R. 6721) to create a commission to study the textile situation. Later the President appointed a special Cabinet committee to study this vitally important matter.

In some States there is legislation providing for higher labor standards; in other States there is none. The textile industry is interstate in scope. It is therefore a national problem, which should be met with national legislation. One or two States cannot meet this problem alone.

When my attention was called to the dumping of Japanese and other foreign goods into our country, in unfair competition with our own goods, I protested. On May 29, 1936, the Secretary of State advised me that the President, upon recommendation of the United States Tariff Commission, had raised certain duties approximately 42 percent. On May 8, 1936, I took up with the State Department and the United States Tariff Commission the "dumping" of slide fasteners into our country and was instrumental in having our administration stop this unfair practice also by increasing the rate of duty.

(B) F. O. B. SHIPPING POINT PRICE—ELIMINATED TO PROTECT CONNECTICUT AND OTHER MANUFACTURERS

When the Patman bill amending the antimonopoly laws was being considered, I labored to eliminate the f. o. b. shipping-point price feature because it would be detrimental to Connecticut manufacturers. Our committee recommended its elimination and the House agreed.

(C) RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS HAVE INCREASED EXPORTS OF CONNECTICUT MANUFACTURERS

According to statistics, the reciprocal-trade agreements are helping Connecticut industry. Already the program of our able Secretary of State has resulted in increasing our export business.

Connecticut enjoyed an important export business until the days of the depression. Since then there has been an encouraging revival, which I noted in my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today.

(D) POULTRY; TOBACCO

I have endeavored to assist the poultry industry on many occasions, and the Connecticut Poultry Association passed a resolution commending me for my efforts in their behalf.

In my humble way I have also tried earnestly to help the tobacco industry by obtaining appropriations for the eradication of tobacco pests and by requesting the State Department to notify foreign countries, like France, which grant us tobacco concessions, of the quality of Connecticut shade-grown and sun-grown tobacco.

VI. OTHER LEGISLATION

MIDDLETOWN-PORTLAND HIGHWAY BRIDGE

Congress passed my bill granting consent to the State of Connecticut and Middlesex County to construct and maintain a bridge across the Connecticut River. Such legislation was necessary because the Connecticut River is a navigable stream and, as such, is under Federal jurisdiction.

VII. FURTHER ASSISTANCE TO CONNECTICUT BY THIS ADMINISTRATION

(A) THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made loans totaling $25,958,880 in Connecticut.

(B) THE RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Resettlement Administration has loaned to Connecticut farmers a total of $99,049 and has made grants totaling $2,064.50. In addition, there is also under way the New London County land-use project, involving the acquisition of approximately 10,000 acres of misused and unsuitable land. The total estimated cost of the development plan is $262,508, of which $242,305 has been authorized from funds made available by the Works Progress Administration.

(C) HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

The H. O. L. C. has closed in Connecticut, as of April 23, 1936, 10,278 loans amounting to $44,223,736. In other words, the H. O. L. C. saved 10,278 distressed home owners temporarily, and over 9,800 of these still have their homes today, thanks to the intervention of the H. O. L. C.

(D) FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The Federal Housing Administration insured in Connecticut 11,833 modernization and repair notes for $4,634,956, and accepted for insurance 437 mortgages, amounting to $2,278,620, from the beginning of operations through February 1936.

(E) CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

As of May 31, 1936, there were 3,859 Connecticut men enrolled in the corps, and the organization has supplied direct employment for varying periods of time to an aggregate of 18,375 enrolled Connecticut men. The War Department estimates that as of April 30, 1936, Connecticut enrollees had sent home to dependents approximately $2,593,735.55 of their earnings.

(F) FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

During the period May 1, 1933, to February 29, 1936, the Farm Credit Administration made 1,974 farm-mortgage loans in the State of Connecticut, totaling $4,277,800, and in the same period made emergency crop loans, drought relief loans, and agricultural credit association loans totaling $2,355,629.

(G) THE CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The C. W. A. advances in the State of Connecticut amounted to $9,606,111.02 as of January 31, 1936.

(H) THE PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has made total allotments of $25,302,708 on 254 projects in Connecticut.

(I) THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The W. P. A. total expenditures in Connecticut as of June 1, 1936, amounted to $12,730,817. By April 15, 1936, 1,398 W. P. A. projects had been approved.

(J) TOTAL FEDERAL LOANS AND ALLOTMENTS TO CONNECTICUT

It is estimated by the National Emergency Council that in excess of $155,000,000 has been allotted, loaned, expended, or disbursed in Connecticut since March 1933 by departments and agencies of the Federal Government. This is a conservative approximation and includes loans and grants of Federal funds to individuals, organizations, and to the State.

VIII. CONCLUSION

In order to present a full picture of the work of a Congressman, I have included in my report some of the activities of the various Federal agencies which are helping to take us out of the depression, as well as my own legislative activities directed at the same goal.

More than the occupant of any other public office, a Member of Congress is the intermediary between his constituents and the Federal Government. Tradition and practice have brought this about. Besides being a legislator, he has to keep in touch with his constituents. That I have always attempted to do, believing that a Congressman, who is ready to serve, must make the problems of his constituents his own.

THE STRUGGLE FOR PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY LEGISLATION—DESPITE THE DIRE PREDICTIONS OF OPPONENTS, UTILITIES ARE BETTER OFF UNDER ROOSEVELT—UTILITY CROWD WILL TRY TO CONTROL CONGRESS

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Speaker, last year Congress enacted legislation to regulate public-utility holding companies.

It was done to protect the people of this country, including investors and consumers, from the evils and abuses of the large public-utility holding companies, which permitted millions of people to invest in all kinds of fake, fraudulent, and watered securities without a chance of getting their money back.

DISCREDITED PRACTICES NOW ELIMINATED BY THE PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY ACT

In the New York Times of June 29, 1935, there appeared the following:

Bond "fraud" laid to Associated Gas. Utility accused of giving an unjustified guaranty and forcing employees to buy. Hopson unit under fire. Paid officers in system and billed companies at rate 250 percent higher, Mack hears.

Mr. Hopson and another person controlled this billion-dollar concern; and, according to the Federal Trade Commission's studies, were able to do this upon an investment of about $23,000, of which Mr. Hopson's share was $10,000. The total write-ups or watered stock of this outfit amounted to $212,012,065.

The New London (Conn.) Day of July 29, 1935, remarked that Hopson alone received from this firm during the depression days $2,805,000 and queried, "Who pays this?"

This system controls the Litchfield Electric Light & Power Co. in my State, and the customers of this Connecticut company are paying for the misdeeds of the holding company.

Another Connecticut concern, the Danbury & Bethel Gas & Electric Light Co., was also owned by a large outside holding company, the Cities Service Co. In 1924 and 1925 Cities Service Power & Light Co. took over securities owned by the Cities Service Co.

The assets were recorded on the books of the new company at $106,104,403, or 165 percent more than the $40,067,952 at which they were carried on the books of Cities Service Co. This was a write-up of $66,046,551, and people in Danbury, Conn., will be contributing to make good this watering of stock.

The Derby Gas & Electric Co. (of Connecticut) is owned by Utilities Power & Light Corporation. This firm had write-ups amounting to $4,902,262, according to volume 54 of the Federal Trade Commission reports, and the people of Derby will be contributing toward this watered stock.

UNITED GAS IMPROVEMENT CO. AND SOME OF MR. RORABACK'S CONCERNS

The United Gas Improvement Co. controls several Connecticut concerns in which Mr. J. Henry Roraback is the dominant figure. There is the Connecticut Electric Service Co., which, according to volume 54, page 769, of the Federal Trade Commission report, had a write-up of $11,118,649; and the Connecticut Light & Power Co., according to page 790, had a write-up of $8,657,449; and the Northern Connecticut Power Co., according to volume 58, page 65, had write-ups of $1,633,052.

Write-ups or watering of stocks are only one of the many evils that are harmful to investors and consumers. And does not the consumer have to pay the dividends on watered stock—if there are to be any dividends—in higher gas and electric rates?

PRESIDENT SAMUEL FERGUSON OF HARTFORD ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. FEARED AND DENOUNCED OUTSIDE HOLDING COMPANIES

Knowing all this, it is no wonder that Mr. Samuel Ferguson, head of the Hartford Electric Light Co. and of the Connecticut Power Co. took steps in those days to protect himself and his companies from being swallowed by these holding companies. He was instrumental in forming a trust agreement at one time among his stockholders to prevent his companies from merging with outside concerns.

One of the main arguments of President Roosevelt for the utility legislation was to avoid absentee ownership. A notice sent out by the Hartford Electric Light Co. in this connection stated:

> In various parts of this country one or other financial interests have been able to influence the majority of stockholders of local operating companies to surrender their control and sell out. A specific case recently in New England—the stockholders, through the ignorance of their stock rights and the purposes of their company, were induced to part with their stock far below its value.

Writing in the Electric World for January 21, 1933, Mr. Ferguson mentioned the "sins of speculation, wild finance, and get-rich-quick schemes to which abuses the holding company set up has lent itself all too readily", and in the New London (Conn.) Day of April 7, 1934, he stated:

> I join wholeheartedly in denouncing many of the acts of financial pirates who abused their control of utility securities to further what was straight robbery.

EVEN THE UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE ADMITTED THE ABUSES AND SUPPORTED SUCH LEGISLATION

This organization, through its president, Mr. Harper Sibley, admitted the necessity for Federal regulation in a circular letter addressed to Members of Congress under date of June 24, 1935, and came out in favor of the bill to regulate utilities.

UTILITY LOBBYISTS TRY TO DEFEAT LEGISLATION—WHAT HAS BECOME OF THEIR DIRE PREDICTIONS?

But, Mr. Speaker, when it came to enacting legislation last year, why did these utilities raise their wailing voices in an attempt to block passage? Why did they send swarms of lobbyists like locusts to Washington? They filled the air with dire predictions, none of which has come true.

According to the New London (Conn.) Day of July 19, 1935, one company alone, the Associated Gas & Electric Co., which owns the Litchfield Gas & Electric Co., in Connecticut, spent over $700,000 to defeat the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. What did the other companies spend?

And if they spent that much to defeat a bill, what will they spend to control Congress this fall?

I doubt if the investors and consumers will stand for this very long, for the money spent by these companies belongs to these two groups; it should go into dividends for stockholders or lower rates for the users of gas and electricity.

THE REPUBLICAN DILEMMA

The Republican platform confesses it is for regulation, but the platform writers did not have the courage to declare for repeal of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill.

When this legislation was being considered by Congress, the Republican organization opposed regulation but did not offer any constructive substitute. And the platform they adopted in Cleveland neither dared to criticize the administration's measure nor does it offer a suggested substitute.

GOVERNOR LANDON AND MR. RORABACK

Who wrote the Republican platform? Former Senator Bingham, of Connecticut, closely affiliated politically with Mr. J. Henry Roraback, head of many Connecticut utilities and interested in the United Gas Improvement Co.—of Philadelphia—was chairman of the platform subcommittee. Mr. Roraback joined the Landon band wagon and was instrumental in obtaining the nomination for him.

Mr. Roraback, who for years has been chairman of the Republican committee of Connecticut and Republican national committeeman, has been rewarded within the past few days with the high office of vice chairman of the Republican National Committee. He is assisting Mr. John Hamilton, the chairman, in trying to elect Mr. Landon.

WHO IS MR. RORABACK?

Mr. Roraback is a personally estimable gentleman whose abilities I respect. But I object to his theory and system of government. He has been for many years the head of the Connecticut Light & Power Co., the Connecticut Electric Service Co., and the Connecticut Electric Syndicate. In addition, he controls many other public utilities in that State, and of late years he has been connected with the United Gas Improvement Co. of Pennsylvania. Mr. Roraback guided the course of the Republican legislature not only in utility legislation but in many other matters. He is the head and dictator of the Republican organization in Connecticut. He is high in the councils of the national Republican Party and was closely affiliated with Mr. Hoover during the latter's administration.

MR. RORABACK'S CONNECTION WITH OTHER CONNECTICUT UTILITIES

The same Mr. Roraback received sometime about the year 1913 the sum of $15,000 from the Northern Connecticut Securities Co. "for legislative services." He also received $5,000 per year from the United Gas Improvement Co., an item which he could not explain at the time of the hearings by the Federal Trade Commission. (See vol. 55, doc. 92, Letters of the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.)

And this same report (p. 219) shows that the secretary of the Republican State committee received various yearly sums for the dissemination of public-utility propaganda in the State of Connecticut.

THE POLITICAL AND UTILITY ALLIANCE OF MR. RORABACK AND MR. FERGUSON

One of the leaders of the Fairfield County (Conn.) Republican organization, which is the backbone of the Roraback machine in Connecticut, is our esteemed colleague, the Honorable SCHUYLER MERRITT. Mr. MERRITT is an officer and director of the Stamford Electric Co., now in the process of merger with the Connecticut Power Co., of which Mr. Samuel Ferguson, of Hartford, Conn., is one of the heads. Mr. Ferguson is also head of the Hartford Electric Light Co., which has had certain business relations with the Connecticut Light & Power Co., Mr. J. Henry Roraback's outfit, through the Connecticut Valley Power Exchange.

Recently the annual reports of the Hartford Electric Light Co. and the Connecticut Power Co. carried almost identical statements attacking certain Connecticut Democratic Congressmen and a Senator for voting for the Public Utility Act of 1935. By innuendo these firms suggest voting therefore for Republicans.

The general counsel for both of these corporations, Mr. Austin Barney, has been a Republican State senator for several years and is politically affiliated with Mr. J. Henry Roraback.

And, of course, Mr. Ferguson, head of these two utilities, in these same annual reports, further explains that better legislation will come about when those in power "sit down with those in the industry."

For years Mr. Roraback, as chairman of the Republican Party, controlling the Connecticut Legislature, has sat down with Mr. Roraback, as head of Connecticut utilities, and for years no regulatory legislation was passed in that State.

Possibly it is Mr. Ferguson's idea that if Mr. Landon were elected President, he could sit down with his vice chairman, Mr. Roraback, and map out some utility legislation.

DESPITE MR. FERGUSON'S PREDICTIONS, PUBLIC-UTILITY INDUSTRY IS IN GOOD FINANCIAL CONDITION—PRICES OF STOCKS AND BONDS ARE HIGHER

Mr. Ferguson, like the utility lobbyists in Washington, predicted in these annual reports that the regulatory legislation of 1935 will "do great damage to the industry by adversely affecting the interests of both customers and investors." Therefore, let us look at the record.

We will examine the condition of the Hartford Electric Light Co. The report to the stockholders states:

It is of great interest to note that the sales of electric current for 1935 exceeded the corresponding sales for 1930—the previous highest record—by $5,000. The lowest volume of sales experienced during the depression was for 1932, and the sales for 1935 exceeded this figure by $670,000.

The electric output and revenues of the Hartford Co. have been increasing steadily since the present administration came into office, and its output and revenue have continued to increase in 1936.

The following information submitted to its stockholders in annual reports shows conclusively that the Hartford Electric Light Co. has not been adversely affected by the Public Utility Act of 1935 but, on the contrary, has shown increasing financial health since the inception of the present administration.

	1932	1934	1935
Kilowatt-hours sold to consumers	194, 602, 000	213, 506, 000	235, 791, 000
Kilowatt-hours sold to other companies	87, 244, 000	95, 862, 000	105, 545, 000
Total revenue from sale of electric energy	$6, 671, 141	$7, 010, 550	$7, 340, 613
Net income	$2, 405, 588	$2, 506, 884	$2, 547, 208
Dividends paid	$2, 303, 267	$2, 303, 304	$2, 303, 303
Rate of dividends (on par value) (percent)	11	11	11
Fixed capital (plant and property)	$26, 401, 265	$27, 372, 370	$27, 854, 701
Reserve for retirement of fixed capital	$5, 685, 451	$6, 644, 494	$7, 188, 441
Surplus	$3, 134, 239	$3, 334, 439	$3, 382, 497

These figures show that the company's total revenue, net income, fixed capital, reserve for retirement and surplus have increased each year of the Roosevelt administration. The stockholders have received each year, without a break, a return of 11 percent on the par value of their capital stock, which incidentally is 1 percent more than they received in 1929.

In 1932 the stock of the Hartford Electric Light Co. reached a low price of $33 per share. As the company's revenues and income increased concurrently with improved business conditions resulting from the efforts of this administration, the price of the stock rose, until in August 1935, prior to the passage of the Public Utility Act, the price bid for the stock was $65 per share. Since that time it has sold for as high as $72 per share, more than 10 percent above the price quoted just before this so-called destructive act was passed and more than 110 percent above its low price in 1932. This shows conclusively that the general investing public does not agree with the management of the Hartford Electric Light Co. when it states that the Public Utility Act of 1935 is "destructive" because investors were recently willing to pay more for the stock of the company than they paid prior to the Wheeler-Rayburn law.

Now let us see how this act has affected the electric utility industry in general, as indicated by the facts and facts only.

According to reports issued by the Edison Electric Institute, the output of the electric industry in 1935 was the greatest in its history and its revenues of $1,920,000,000 were only $20,000,000 less than the peak of 1929. Current weekly reports indicate that the output of the industry is continuing to soar this year, being more than 10 to 15 percent in excess of 1935 output for the same period.

I do not claim that the Public Utility Act was the sole cause for the continued rise in the market value of utility stocks and bonds, but I do claim that this act has been beneficial to the industry. For example, in August 1935, the month in which the Public Utility Act became effective, the average of the market quotations of utility bonds was 100.9, while in March 1936 the index was 105.1. During the same period the index of utility-stock prices has risen from 81.6 to 102.8. Thus, during the first 6 months of the administration of the Public Utility Act the index of utility-bond prices rose 4 percent and stock prices 26 percent. It is also well to note that during this period utility bonds continued to hold their position as prime favorites of the investor since the index of utility-bond prices was consistently higher than the prices of railroad and industrial bonds. This reflects the confidence of investors in the soundness and desirability of the Public Utility Act.

TALKING ONE WAY BUT ACTING ANOTHER

Now the officials of the Hartford Electric Light Co. and the Connecticut Power Co. have long maintained that they welcome reasonable regulation and reaffirm this position in their 1935 report to stockholders when they state that no right-minded man can quarrel with the objective of the Public Utility Act to supplement the regulatory power of State commissions in the "twilight zone" of interstate commerce.

Notwithstanding all this, the Hartford Electric Light Co. and the Connecticut Power Co. cut their interstate transmission lines, which for years had been utilized for the interchange of power with companies in Massachusetts and New York, for the sole purpose of escaping the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission with respect to such interstate transactions.

The Hartford Electric Light Co. and its affiliate, the Connecticut Power Co., were, I understand, the only utility companies in the entire United States which destroyed interstate connections because of the passage of the Public Utility Act.

Were the lines which these two companies cut important? Assuredly so, for they carried each year between the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New York approximately the same amount of electric energy as the Hartford Electric Light Co. sold to all its consumers.

The severance of these interstate connections, it is admitted by the representatives of the companies concerned, has affected the reliability of service and increased the cost of power in the States affected.

On September 11, 1935, Mr. Frank R. McNinch, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, asked Mr. Ferguson, among other things, "Were you correctly quoted as saying that the interconnections discontinued had meant 'savings to consumers of power amounting to between two million and three million dollars'?" And on September 16 Mr. Ferguson replied, "Yes. This is an understatement of what has been saved to consumers from exchange of power."

SOMETHING FOR CONNECTICUT CONSUMERS OF ELECTRICITY TO THINK ABOUT

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I just want to include the following from the speech of our esteemed colleague, Hon. JOHN RANKIN, made on the floor of the House June 2, 1936. When we hear so much about utility virtues from the mouths of utility magnates, this is something that every electric and power user in Connecticut should think about when he reaches down to pay his electric bill:

CONNECTICUT

In 1934 the people in the State of Connecticut used 811,158,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy, for which they paid the sum of $30,123,083.

Under the T. V. A. rates the cost would have been $15,672,083, a saving of $14,451,000.

Under the Tacoma rates the cost would have been $15,726,086, a saving of $14,397,000.

Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $12,352,492, a saving of $17,770,594.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that the utility crowd lacks patriotic vision to see that the American people will not permit the recurrence of those abuses that wrecked millions of bondholders and stockholders. By attempting to revenge themselves upon Congressmen, and even upon our great President, for performing their duty, the utility crowd is menacing orderly, decent government. The day when they can control Congress and elections has ended—the day of the existence of political public utilities is over.

EXPOSING A VOTE-GETTING RACKET

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, the newspaper that exposes some questionable, fake scheme used by characters of the underworld as a racket by which to ride to wealth and power and become a menace to society is the kind of a newspaper that deserves the gratitude of every citizen.

Similarly, when a newspaper exposes some unsound, impossible old-age-pension scheme used as a racket by promoters and politicians who would ride to wealth and power on false hopes created in the failing hearts of old people, that newspaper deserves the gratitude of all old people who are deceived by the scheme as well as the gratitude of all other citizens of the Nation.

MOST NEWSPAPERS HAVE COURAGE

While serving in Congress I have written articles each week for newspapers of my home State, Ohio, under the heading, "Straight From Washington." I am proud to say that most newspapers published in the State which I have the honor to represent as Congressman at large are fearless in exposing frauds and rackets that menace the public.

Many of the Ohio newspapers have the courage to expose these various old-age-pension schemes, impossible of realization, and which are ready-made for promoters looking for easy money or politicians looking for a vote-getting racket on which to slide into office.

THE BUCYRUS TELEGRAPH-FORUM

From among Ohio newspapers I have chosen the Telegraph-Forum as an independent Republican paper published in Bucyrus, Ohio, to which to address this open letter on one of the most amazing of all the old-age-pension, money-getting, and vote-getting rackets.

My two chief reasons for paying special tribute to the Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum are:

First. The Telegraph-Forum has printed some of the best editorials I have yet seen showing up the ridiculous absurdity of the unworkable Townsend old-age-pension plan which, fortunately for the old people and the country at large, is now rapidly dying out in the minds of sensible men and women who have given it any study.

Second. The other reason for designating the Bucyrus paper is because it has had the editorial courage to call by name the local candidate who is trying to ride into Congress on the coattails of the old folks foolish enough to believe that by voting for him they will have a chance to get a pension of $200 per month for life free.

YOU ARE INVITED TO READ THIS OPEN LETTER

The open letter which I have addressed to the Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum reads as follows:

Your editorials discussing Grant E. Mouser, Ohio's loudest and most notorious Townsendite candidate for Congress, holding out to people past 60 years of age the possibility of receiving a pension of $200 per month for life, should open the eyes of all the older people and all taxpayers to the fact that they are being taken for a ride.

Every thoughtful person in your Eighth Congressional District reading your editorials exposing the use of the old-age-pension idea as a three-shell game with which to hoodwink the old people, will applaud the editorial spanking you have given to Mouser, who is hitchhiking a ride on the Townsend band wagon.

POLITICIANS DISLOYAL TO THEIR PARTY SELDOM WIN

Your editorials should make it plain to every voter how you stand on the proposition of a candidate for Congress turning his back on the leaders of his own party, as Mouser has done, to join up with the Townsendite leader, who, under oath, swore that he is out to "wreck the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, too."

To make a vote-getting racket out of the pension needs of deserving old men and women is a wicked thing for any man to do, and the newspaper that has the editorial courage shown by the Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum in exposing this thing for the cruel hoax it is, deserves the gratitude of every citizen in the community.

TRIBUTE TO EDITORIAL COURAGE

When more newspaper editors show the fearlessness shown by the editors and publishers of the Bucyrus paper, it will be harder for political demagogues to "hitchhike" into office on such preposterous fakes as the Townsend-Mouser plan, which would bleed the taxpayers to death, delude the old folks, and destroy the business stability of the country.

The people of Bucyrus, Crawford County, and the other counties in the Eighth Congressional District, have been loyal in the support they have always given to me as the candidate for Congressman at large, and in this open letter to your newspaper I am glad to join with you in helping to protect my friends there from being imposed upon and misled by this gigantic fraud.

I FAVOR ADEQUATE OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Everybody recognizes the need for legislation providing adequate old-age pensions. It was in recognition of this need that, at a recent session of Congress, we passed old-age-pension legislation which eventually will cost the taxpayers billions of dollars and which will provide pensions for millions of older citizens.

Of course, this legislation which we have passed to provide pensions for the aged is not perfect, but plans are already under way to liberalize its provisions and make it more adequate.

LET US EXAMINE TOWNSEND PLAN TO SEE WHAT IT MEANS

Grant E. Mouser voluntarily turned his back on the leadership of his own party to go along with the Townsend people. He even made the amazing confession that he knows no other way to equalize the distribution of the Nation's wealth. Therefore, that Mouser may be given full credit for the Townsend advantage he is seeking, the Townsend plan will be referred to in this open letter as the Townsend-Mouser plan.

Now let us take this Townsend-Mouser plan apart, so everyone can see what Mouser, as Ohio's most blatant Townsendite candidate, proposes to do and how he proposes to do it.

Let us see who is to pay for this pension scheme, on which Mouser is trying to "thumb" a ride into Congress, and which would load a $24,000,000,000 extra burden on the backs of the taxpayer.

Let us see who would be injured by this unsound proposition. It will add thousands upon thousands of new political job holders for the taxpayers to support; but what will it do for the older people who are being deceived by it?

How will this impossible pension plan wreck hundreds of business concerns, create additional unemployment, and raise prices beyond the reach of wage earners?

HERE ARE ANSWERS TO SOME OF YOUR QUESTIONS

Just what is it that the Townsend-Mouser plan proposes to do?

According to Dr. Townsend in his testimony before our congressional committee, the plan proposes to give approximately 10,000,000 people past 60 years of age a pension of $200 per month for life at a total cost of $24,000,000,000 each year.

This staggering sum is to be raised by means of what Townsend and Mouser call a 2-percent transaction sales tax.

Before the old people will be permitted to receive their pension of $200 per month, they will be compelled to agree to stop earning anything, save nothing, and spend everything, says Dr. Townsend.

YOU PAY A TRANSACTION SALES TAX ON EVERYTHING

What is this 2-percent transaction sales tax; how does it operate; what does it do to the taxpayer; and how will they compel the taxpayer to pay it?

The 2-percent Townsend-Mouser transaction sales tax is a pyramided, compound sales tax on every transaction, through which any commodity passes from raw material until it gets into the hands of the consumer.

This tax also applies to services, wages, and all other transactions of every form and description.

Where the present Ohio sales tax now takes only a few of your pennies, the Townsend-Mouser 2-percent transaction sales tax will take your dollars.

To collect the $24,000,000,000 in new taxes to finance the Townsend-Mouser plan, you will be compelled to take out a license.

Under this license system you have no chance to escape, for if any tax item is evaded they can use the license to put the law on you.

The license which you would be compelled to take out under this plan is the legal gun the Townsend and Mouser plan will hold to your head while the tax collector picks your pocket.

REPUBLICAN DENOUNCES TOWNSEND TAX PLAN

February 24, 1936, Hon. ALBERT J. ENGEL, of Michigan, delivered a great speech in Congress in which he made the clearest presentation of the Townsend 2-percent transaction-sales tax that has been made so far within my knowledge, and I therefore wish to give full credit to Mr. Engel for the method of analysis presented here.

Mr. ENGEL is the kind of intelligent, courageous, loyal Republican who would not think of doublecrossing the political party that sent him to Congress by turning his back on the Republican leaders and joining up with the Townsendite enemies of his party.

STUDY THE FOLLOWING ANALYSIS CAREFULLY

The following analysis will enable you to understand just how Townsend and Mouser propose to use their 2-percent transaction-sales tax under the license system to raise the $24,000,000,000 necessary to pay 10,000,000 people past 60, $200 per month pension for life.

Only a few of the countless transactions are given here, just to let you see how it works, and these that are given apply only to the farmer. Altogether, there will be thousands of millions of transactions involving every man, woman, and child in the United States, says Dr. Townsend.

But let us take only this one group—the farmer—and see what the Townsend old-age pension tax plan does to the farmer in just a few transactions.

HOW THE TOWNSEND-MOUSER PLAN TAKES YOUR MONEY

As Republican Congressman ENGEL suggests, let us assume that you want to start in the farming business.

Suppose you buy an 80-acre farm for $8,000; terms $3,000 cash, the balance secured by a $4,000 mortgage, to be paid in 10 annual installments of $500 each plus interest.

The first thing the Townsend-Mouser 2-percent transaction-sales tax will do to you is to tax the purchase price of your farm, which will mean 2 percent of the $8,000 you paid for it, or a total tax of $160 at the very start.

Then a 2-percent transaction-sales tax on your 10 annual payments of interest at 6 percent, totaling $650, will be $33 more.

THEY TAX YOU EVERY TIME YOU TURN AROUND

You also will have to pay a 2-percent tax on the real-estate tax you pay on your farm.

Thus you see the Townsend-Mouser 2-percent transaction-sales tax compels you to pay a tax on your other taxes. It pyramids, compounds, doubles back on you and gets you every time you turn around.

Assuming that the real-estate tax on your farm is $150 a year, or $1,500 for the 10 years, then you will be compelled to pay a 2-percent tax on your total real-estate tax for 10 years, or a tax on a tax amounting to $30.

Can you imagine yourself voting for a tax racket which takes your last penny, as this vicious thing proposes to do?

WHAT FARMER WOULD STAND FOR THIS?

To start farming it will be necessary for you to purchase a team of horses, other livestock, and equipment. If your two horses cost you $300; six cows, purchased from other farmers, $300; total, $600, you will pay a 2-percent tax amounting to $12.

It will be necessary for you to spend, say, $1,000 to purchase tools, binder, mower, wagon, harrow, and other farming implements needed to start farming, and on this thousand dollars you will pay a pyramided tax of 12 percent, or $120.

All these new extra taxes that the Townsend-Mouser plan would compel you to pay, in addition to your other taxes, amount to the grand total of $355. This gives you some idea what you are letting yourself in for when you vote for a Townsendite for Congress.

BUT READ ON—THE WORST IS YET TO COME

The grand total of $355 already added to your taxes is the Townsend-Mouser tax on the farm and equipment only. Now let us see how the Townsend-Mouser plan picks your pockets when it comes to the operation of your farm:

First. You pay from 2 to 12 percent tax on all the feed you buy, depending upon whether you buy it direct or through a dealer.

Second. You deduct and pay 2 percent on all the wages you pay your hired help.

Third. You pay from 2 to 12 percent on all groceries, clothes, and so forth.

Fourth. You pay 12 percent on all additional farm machinery, replacement, and repairs.

Fifth. You pay from 2 to 12 percent on all fertilizer.

Sixth. You pay 2 percent on your telephone, telegraph, freight, and electric-light service.

Seventh. You pay at least 6 percent on your coal bill, plus a 2-percent tax on the freight charges.

Eighth. If you buy an automobile or a truck, you will have to pay a pyramided tax of 12 percent on the purchase price, on all repairs, equipment, gas, oil, and so forth. This is in addition to taxes you now pay and upon which you will have to pay another 2-percent tax under the Townsend-Mouser plan.

Ninth. If you rent your farm for cash or on shares, you pay a 2-percent tax on the cash rent paid on the value of the crop rent.

Tenth. When you pay your life, fire, automobile, or windstorm insurance premiums, you must add a 2-percent tax.

Eleventh. If you take out a new insurance policy, you pay 2-percent tax on the face of that policy also.

YOU WILL BE A TAXPAYING SLAVE FOR YOUR NEIGHBORS PAST 60

If you are foolish enough to vote for a Townsendite candidate for Congress, you will be voting to tax yourself to help keep your neighbors past 60 years of age in idleness on a pension of $200 per month for the remainder of their lifetime.

The Townsend-Mouser plan compels you to toil, slave, skimp, and save, while your neighbors past 60 blow in your tax money, loaf, and have a good time at your expense.

There are perhaps more than 30 men and women in your nearby neighborhood past 60 years of age whom you will have to help support in idleness at $200 per month, if you vote for this Townsend-Mouser plan.

The Townsend-Mouser plan proposes to let you go on working your head off to get out of debt, pay your taxes, and make a living, while these 30 neighbors past 60 receive a total of $6,000 a month, or $72,000 a year, with nothing to do but loaf and spend every cent of it.

TOWNSEND-MOUSER PLAN HANDCUFFS YOU WITH LICENSE

Furthermore, when you vote for Mouser or any other Townsendite you vote to compel yourself to report each month on every single item you sell, because the operation of this Townsend-Mouser 2-percent transaction-sales tax forces you to report down to your last cent, whether you sell by retail or wholesale.

Before the congressional committee, Dr. Townsend said he would compel all farmers to take out a license. This puts legal handcuffs on the farmer so he can be checked up, prosecuted, and fined if he should attempt to sell anything off his farm without paying the 2-percent transaction sales tax demanded by the plan.

Under this license system, you will be compelled to keep books and accounts in detail on every penny involved in each transaction.

If you should overlook or fail to report anything under the sales-tax license, the Townsend tax inspector will get after you, and whether you like it or not, you will have to help pay the salary of the Townsend tax inspector who inspects you.

MOUSER PLAN MAKES FAT JOBS FOR POLITICIANS

Think of all the vast army of new inspectors, snoopers, bureaucrats, tax collections, bookkeepers, accountants, investigators, and new political job holders of every type and description that will be added to the Government pay rolls for the purpose of keeping all these millions upon millions of transactions checked up every 30 days.

In addition to your other tax expense you will have to help pay the salaries of all those in the vast army of new political job holders who will ride around over the country at your expense, swarm into your communities to check up on your sales, and poke their noses into your private business.

But this is only a glimpse of what you will let yourself in for if you vote for the Townsendite candidate for Congress and he is successful in getting this crazy thing enacted into law.

HOW TOWNSEND-MOUSER PLAN TAXES YOU AFTER YOU DIE

You should remember that the Townsend-Mouser transaction-sales tax, by which they propose to finance this old-age-pension plan, is one kind of tax you cannot escape when you die. The Townsend-Mouser tax collectors follow you to the grave, and here is how they do it:

If you should get sick, as Republican Congressman ENGEL explains, you will have to pay a 2-percent transaction tax on your doctor's services, a 2-percent tax on the medicine the doctor gives you, and on top of that you will have to pay another 2-percent tax on your nurse's bill.

The Townsend-Mouser tax plan slaps a transaction-sales tax on your coffin, a 2-percent tax on the undertaker's fee for embalming you, and the undertaker, in turn, has to pay a Townsend-Mouser tax on the embalming fluid with which he preserves you. This is the plan which Mouser says "will make everybody prosperous", to quote his own words.

YOU WILL GET TAXED IN YOUR GRAVE

You will have to pay a 2-percent tax on the services of the hearse that takes you for your last ride. There will be a Townsend-Mouser tax on the wages of the man who drives the hearse, and even for the lot in which you are buried you will have to pay a 2-percent transaction-sales tax.

This monstrosity sales tax which Mouser advocates as a method by which to finance the old-age-pension plan provides for a 2-percent tax to be taken out of the wages of the gravediggers who dig your grave and the poor gravediggers, in turn, will have to pay a 2-percent transaction-sales tax on their picks and shovels used in digging your grave.

After you are buried there will be a 2-percent transaction-sales tax on the fee the judge receives for probating your will and still another 2-percent tax taken out of the fee received by the administrator of your estate.

HOW TO STOP THIS INSANE TAX-RACKET PROPOSAL

If you have anything left after the Townsend-Mouser 2-percent sales tax gets through robbing you, then they will start in on your heirs, and a 2-percent tax will be taken out of every dollar you may leave to your wife and children after you are gone.

The only consolation you have is that, after you are dead, you cannot kick on these Townsend-Mouser taxes which you will have to pay if you vote for Mouser and he is successful in getting the Townsend plan enacted into law as he promises the Townsend people he will try to do.

No; you cannot kick about this tax racket to finance the Townsend-Mouser plan after you are dead. But there is one time and place when and where you can kick against this crazy, impossible taxation monstrosity Mouser is trying to put over on the people of the Eighth Congressional District, and you can kick good and hard, too, and the time and place to do your kicking so it will count is in the voting booth on election day.

WOULD BANKRUPT THE NATION

The total national income in 1933, when this administration went into power, was $41,000,000,000. To have financed the Townsend-Mouser old-age-pension plan at that time would have cost the American people $7,000,000,000 more than half the entire national income.

The cost of financing the Townsend-Mouser old-age-pension plan for only 1 year, $24,000,000,000, is more money than all the farmers of the United States could earn in almost 5 years at the rate they were earning when this administration took over the affars of the Government.

COST $800 PER FAMILY

The population of the United States reported by the last census was 122,775,046 people. To pay the Townsend-Mouser old-age pension would cost every man, woman, and child in the United States $195 each every 12 months.

The average earnings of the 30,000,000 or more families in the United States is between seventeen and eighteen hundred dollars annually per family. The average cost of the Townsend-Mouser plan per family on the basis of 30,000,000 families would be $800 per family, almost half the earnings for the average family.

WHY PLAN WON'T INCREASE PROSPERITY

The Townsend-Mouser old-age-pension plan would wreck every insurance company in America. What would become of the lifetime insurance savings of millions of people?

Far more than the majority of the people now living will be dead before 60 years of age and so never will receive anything out of this old-age-pension plan. They will toil, slave, skimp, and save to support a plan out of which they will not live long enough to get a single penny.

Mouser's argument that, by forcing 10,000,000 people past 60 to spend $24,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money will increase prosperity, is exploded by the fact that this money will be taken from farmers, wage earners, and millions of the smaller income classes, and therefore it is already put into circulation as fast as it is earned, because the people who earn it are compelled to spend it immediately for the necessities of life.

TOWNSEND-MOUSER TAX PLAN SOAKS THE POOR

The Mouser argument that the plan would equalize the distribution of wealth is knocked into a cocked hat by the fact that the 2-percent transactions-sales tax plan is one plan that soaks the poor with the rich.

The Mouser tax plan does not take money from the rich like the income tax does. It is a sales tax on transactions, and is therefore the most vicious, cruel, robber tax that has ever been proposed to soak the poor with small earnings. It soaks the poor who work for low wages and have but meager incomes which they must spend as fast as they earn in order to live.

HOW TOWNSEND-MOUSER PLAN REDUCES WAGES

When you vote for the Townsend-Mouser plan you vote to add 30 to 50 percent to the cost of things the middle class of people are forced to buy, which is just the same as reducing their wages or their incomes from 30 to 50 percent.

How would lowering the smaller incomes from 30 to 50 percent by increasing the cost of food, clothing, rent, and all necessities of life, thus reducing the buying power of wage earners to that extent, help the farmer, workingman, and masses of people with ordinary incomes? It will not help them. You can see for yourself it will ruin them.

WHY MANY CONCERNS WOULD GO BROKE

The argument that the Townsend-Mouser plan will boom business, put more people to work, vanishes in thin air in face of the fact that the 2-percent transaction-sales tax will, in many cases, represent total profits of thousands of business concerns. In a vast number of cases this compound, pyramided transaction tax would mount so high as to make it impossible for business concerns to continue in business.

A large percentage of the tax could not be collected, because, to avoid paying the Townsend-Mouser tax, thousands of business concerns and manufacturers would reduce the number of transactions by combining to control the sources of material and the processes of distribution.

HOW PLAN WOULD THROW PEOPLE OUT OF WORK

To avoid the Townsend-Mouser tax, thousands of business concerns would go to Canada and foreign countries to manufacture their goods, as some are already doing, thus adding additional thousands of people to the army of unemployed.

The great shrinkage in capital value, the huge number of failures and bankruptcies, that would follow the business, financial, and economic dislocations caused by the Townsend-Mouser plan are so colossal as to be beyond calculation at present. The disaster, panic, confusion, and wreckage which this revolutionary thing would cause are terrifying to contemplate and should be obvious to anyone who takes the trouble to analyze the facts.

Instead of putting men to work the Townsend-Mouser plan would throw hundreds and thousands of men and women out of work, as every recognized economist in America will tell you.

TRYING TO FOOL THE YOUNG FOLKS, TOO

The argument that old people, 60, 65, 70, and 80 years of age, would turn their jobs over to the young people explodes the moment you verify for yourself the fact in your own neighborhood that hardly any of these very old people in such advanced years are holding jobs that young people would have, are prepared for, or at which they could earn a living.

Look about you! How many old men and women between 60, 70, or 80 years of age in your immediate neighborhood are holding jobs that young men and women could fill and which would offer the young folks any chance to make a living or offer any hope of a future career? From your own observation and your own common sense you can see how absurd is this idea. Furthermore, Dr. Townsend, in a statement issued at Baltimore the other day, proposed to take the jobs of those holding political and Government positions and give these positions to people past 60, thereby throwing out of work thousands who are now employed.

GOVERNOR LANDON OPPOSED TO TOWNSEND-MOUSER PLAN

As everybody knows, Governor Landon, the Republican candidate for President, is most emphatically opposed to the Townsend-Mouser old-age-pension plan. Governor Landon's strongest newspaper supporter in Washington, the Herald, in a recent editorial said:

> The Townsend plan perpetuates a grievous imposition upon the community. It misleads the aged with false hopes. It deludes the old with alluring promises which are utterly impossible of accomplishment. No promoter of worthless stock ever committed more inexcusable deception of the innocent and unsuspecting than are produced by this Townsend old-age-pension fraud.

Since Governor Landon, the Republican candidate for President, emphatically opposes the Townsend-Mouser old-age-pension plan and one of the leading newspapers supporting Landon for President denounces the plan as a fraud, what about the candidate for Congress who tries to run as a Republican and a Townsendite both and uses this alleged "fraud" to get himself elected? Thus we see the Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum has strong supporters who agree with its editorials denouncing the Townsend-Mouser plan.

HOW TO STOP THIS DEMAGOGUE'S VOTE-GETTING RACKET

Another one of Governor Landon's supporters who was himself talked of as a Republican candidate for President, recently said:

> You can corrupt the voters with false hopes as easily as you can corrupt them with money and the one is quite as reprehensible as the other. We must scourge the demagogues from the temple of leadership. We must build a public opinion that will stamp out of American public life the growing tendency to promise the moon to millions for a handful of votes.

Give the facts to the people and they will join with fearless newspapers like the Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum, to which this open letter is addressed, in helping to scourge from the temple of leadership those undesirable demagogues who promise old people the moon as a bribe to get their votes.

Expose these money-grabbing and vote-getting rackets as soon as they appear and there will be fewer candidates leaving their own parties to tramp along the political highways, thumbing for a ride in the hope they can hitchhike into Congress on gaudily painted vehicles, so wobbly, dangerous, and grotesque as is this fraudulent Townsend plan.

WILDLIFE RESTORATION

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, no one doubts that over the years there has been a gradual diminishing supply of wildlife in America. Some species have vanished entirely, while others are on the ragged edge. When our forefathers established this Nation, practically the entire country west of the Allegheny Mountains was virgin territory, covered with forests and grasses, marshes and lakes, unpolluted water supplies, and watersheds undefiled by man. Game was plentiful; in fact, much of the food of our forefathers was taken from the forests and fields and streams. They lived on the land and from the water to a large extent.

What are the underlying factors producing this change from plenty to poverty in our wildlife resources? It is a sad commentary, but it is nevertheless true, that the advance of civilization, sweeping across the mountains of the Eastern States into the valleys of the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri, and other midwestern streams, and thence over the Rockies into the fertile regions lying on the Pacific coast, is largely responsible for the impoverished condition of our land and water today, insofar as it relates to fish and game. The rapid increase in our population from a few millions when our Nation was formed to the more than 125,000,000 of today, is a cause to which we too frequently do not give sufficient weight or importance in our discussions of vanishing wildlife. The rapid taking up of our public lands, the turning of them under with the plow, and its later intensive cultivation, have robbed much of our upland game of its birthright for unmolested cover and food, and is today one of the vital factors in our drought problem in the Midwest.

Our western civilization progressed as though it had taken on the wings of Mercury, the strength of a Hercules, and then, not satisfied with the progress, pulled on the seven-league boots in order to overcome every obstacle in its path. It tore down the sustaining influences of our forefathers to make way for more intensive farming, grazing, and industrial pursuits to house and feed the rapidly increasing local population, augmented by the flight from European countries of emigrants attracted to this new "land of the free and home of the brave."

The extraordinary efforts put forth from 1914 to 1918 to produce more foods, more industrial products, to take care of the needs of the war have left their blight upon the economic situation of today and are somewhat responsible for the depression through which we are now going and from which we hope to emerge in the not too distant future.

What have we done about all of this? What has been the answer to the problem, as conservationists have seen it, in the years that have gone by and which have taken such a heavy toll of our wildlife? True, each one of the 48 States now has some form of authority dealing with wildlife. It may be a commission or a board; it may be a one-man commissioner elected or appointed; but no matter what form it takes, there is some authority everywhere coping with the problems involved in the diminishing supply of our fish and game.

How have we taken up this challenge? For the most part we have reduced bag limits and curtailed seasons. We have carried on in some cases a highly developed system of enforcement and in other cases a very haphazard one. The numbers of those who have taken out hunting and fishing licenses have quadrupled in the last 15 years. We have formed groups of well-meaning sportsmen throughout the country to aid and assist the local authorities in conserving the wildlife resources; yet, despite very honest and earnest efforts put forth by the conservationists of this country, year after year our heritage in wildlife grows smaller and smaller, until today we are threatened with complete closure of one of the greatest of all outdoor sports, that of waterfowl shooting. Throughout the States over the years many counties and districts have been closed to this and that variety of game, until today the limits within which the 6,000,000 hunters and 7,000,000 fishermen may pursue their sport have become appreciably narrowed over that of a generation ago.

We have been thinking altogether too much about conservation and not enough about restoration. It is well enough to conserve if the forces which are at work to destroy our game are sufficiently held in check. But there are so many other factors that enter into the problem that mere conservation is not sufficient. It should be the aim of those engaged in wildlife problems to maintain our game resources at a level consistent with the normal capacity of their environment and the needs of mankind.

Our battle is against depletion—against the onslaught of civilization. Up until recently our chief efforts have been to curb or restrain our people in their use, and, I might add, their abuses of our wildlife.

In its broadest sense the conservation of wildlife embraces the conservation of the related associations of field, forest, and water. Its problems deal with the biological aspects of the destruction and perpetuation of our natural resources and the wise use of the species therein and their adaptation to human welfare.

Our problem is no longer one of conservation. The problem now becomes one of restoration. This is due, naturally, to the rapid development of our civilization in which everything in the way of its progress apparently had to be cast aside or trampled underfoot.

This is not a pleasing picture for us to view. Yet there are some hopeful aspects—some rays of sunshine—which make us look into the future with optimism. I need not recount all of the things that have been done and are being done which make this optimism possible. Most of them are of such recent origin that they are fresh in the memory of all of us. The transition from regulatory measures to restoration methods is so recent that we are all familiar with them. The able thought of the Nation has labored consistently over a long period of years to bring about this later concept of wildlife problems.

After nearly 20 years of ceaseless effort, a broad policy has been adopted by the Federal Government through congressional action for the restoration of our migratory waterfowl resources within our own borders. The duck stamp bill will eventually bring about a restoration of many of the former breeding and nesting areas in our own country. Reforestation control of erosion and pollution, regulation of grazing on public domain and within the national forests, new and enlarged national parks, monuments and reservations, will, in the coming years, have a wholesome influence on the wildlife indigenous to the areas affected by these Federal activities.

During the past few years many strides have been taken toward restoration of wildlife throughout the Nation and in the several States. Nearly two million acres of land, which formerly were waterfowl breeding or nesting areas but which have either been drained or dried up, have been restored as marshy areas and reclaimed for ducks, geese, and other waterfowl. Most of this land had proved unsuccessful as farming ventures. About $16,000,000 has been expended in purchasing and developing these refuges—a small amount compared with other expenditures, some of doubtful value.

In Oregon the greatest waterfowl refuge in the world is about completed. The old bed of Malagur Lake is again filling up with water and marshy grasses. The land and waters of the Donner and Blitzen watersheds have been acquired by the Government, which will insure forever an adequate supply of frfesh water for this greatest of waterfowl nesting areas within continental United States. More than a hundred thousand acres are to be found in this refuge which will insure a plentiful supply of waterfowl life for generations to come.

Oregon is one of the nine States which is participating in a cooperative research in wildlife management—one-third of the money being put up by the Federal Government, one-third by the agricultural college, and one-third by the game commission.

The paramount objectives of the program are three:

First. To carry on such research and investigation as will furnish foundation knowledge upon which to base practical wildlife management.

Second. To establish actual experimental and demonstration areas where methods of handling wildlife and environment and methods of game management and utilization can be tested; and where landowners, hunters, and all others interested in wildlife production can see examples of such management and utilization. These areas will be conducted under practical land-utilization conditions as they exist in various parts of the country.

Third. To carry on educational work: (1) To make available to the public the results of investigations and demonstration; and (2) to promote a greater interest in wildlife production and in practical methods of making a surplus available for utilization.

Upper and Lower Klamath Lakes, Three-Arch Rocks, Tule Lake, and several other minor regions have either been established as wildlife reservations or in process of becoming such. The antelope in the Hart Mountain region will sooner or later have a reservation set aside for themselves in this, their native home. The Biological Survey, the Grazing Administration, and the stockmen have agreed on a program for the maintenance of a sufficient area to graze at least 4,000 head of these magnificent game animals.

The Bureau of Fisheries, with its hatcheries and its excellent cooperation, is assisting in maintaining streams with their native trout.

It is on account of these considerations—the broad program of the Federal and the State Governments—and in spite of the tragic position in which our wildlife finds itself throughout America generally, that I look into the future with optimism—not with hope, because hope involves a doubt while optimism carries with it assurance. Let us never lose sight of the major problem involved, which is the restoration of our wildlife. Let us march forward with that single purpose in view.

THE EVERGLADES OF FLORIDA, THE POTENTIAL SUGAR BOWL AND GARDEN OF THE WORLD

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that the people of the State of Florida feel that there should be no attempt on the part of the National Government to restrict or prohibit the production by them of a nonsurplus commodity.

On May 26, 1936, before a subcommittee of the Senate Finance Committee, the sugar producers of Florida protested against the imposition of any excise tax on sugar, the payment of any benefits on sugar production, and the imposition of any restriction on continental sugar production, and that they believed "the industry should stand on its own feet."

Throughout the world's history probably more wars have been fought for the control of supplies of sugar, or other sweetening agents, than for any other cause, with salt taking second place for the credit, or blame, of causing strife among the nations of the world. Both are fundamental necessities of life. Of salt we in continental United States have an abundance; of sugar in continental United States we are woefully short, both cane- and beet-sugar supplies being about one-quarter of our requirements, with 95 percent of our cane-sugar requirements being imported. Sound political economy, both national and international, as well as good statesmanship, national defense, encouragement of national industry, the alleviation of distress and unemployment, together with protection of the consumer, all point to home production of vital necessities. The last time the "offshore" sugar-producing areas had control of our sugar supply the price was five times what it is today.

The Tariff Commission Report No. 73, on sugar, shows that in the period 1907–11 the Philippines supplied 2.3 percent of our sugar requirements, while today they supply 16 percent; in the same period of 1907–11 Puerto Rico supplied 7.4 percent and today 12½ percent; and in the face of these facts not only is the continent prohibited from increasing its proportionate share of the requirements but is not permitted to supply more than 30 percent of any increase in requirements. Why? Simply to protect and encourage those who, the last time they controlled our sugar supply, charged the consumer 25 cents a pound.

Both public and private publications are replete with conditions of labor in, and the attitude toward the United States of, the "offshore" sugar-producing areas, and it is on these slender, weak, and perhaps broken reeds that we depend for 95 percent of our cane-sugar requirements. The story is a sordid one, but because it is sordid is no reason why we should close our eyes, ears, and intellects to it. We have beggared our own people through granting to these free access to our markets, on a preferential basis. We have restricted the production of necessities in this, our own, country for the benefit of other countries, on whom we have wasted time, money, and effort, and they have taken all that we gave and then gone on in their own way. Is it not time that we awaken to our own interests?

What have we received from the "offshore" sugar-producing areas for free access, or preferential access, to our markets? Referring again to the Tariff Commission's report, we find that for the 8 years 1925 to 1932 we purchased merchandise and commodities from such areas in excess of all their purchases from us as follows:

Cuba	$533,000,000
Philippines	328,000,000
Hawaii	186,000,000
Puerto Rico	116,000,000

Or a grand total of the enormous sum of $1,163,000,000. Just imagine the amount of employment the expenditure of that sum would have created if it had been spent here instead of elsewhere.

When continental United States purchases sugar from "offshore" areas we have the sugar and they have the money to spend where and with whom they please; but when continental United States produces its own sugar it has both the sugar and the money, and, in addition, has furnished employment for many thousands of its own people. Who will claim that an insular possession or foreign country has any vested right to the continental market under these circumstances? The American farmer employing American labor should not be penalized by even partial exclusion from the market that essentially, rightfully, and according to all historical precedent belongs to him.

We hear much ado about regaining the market in Cuba for our agricultural products. Such market is, to a great extent, gone forever and cannot be regained. Our Department of Agiculture during the last decade sent its experts to Cuba to teach the Cubans how to raise the things we sold them. They were well taught and learned quickly, because they now export some of the commodities that we formerly sold them.

The standard of living and the demands for the comforts of life are far greater in Florida than in any "offshore" area. Permit Florida to produce all the cane sugar it desires, and many thousands of our citizens will find employment therein, and their demands will require the employment of many more thousands in other lines.

The American market for American producers is the only fair, just, and reasonable basis for consideration of any sugar legislation. Florida does not believe in continental restriction; neither does she believe in processing or excise taxes, or benefit payments, on sugar.

All of the "offshore" areas will naturally oppose increasing continental production for the same reason that England would like a monopoly of our woolen market; Germany our iron and steel market; and Japan our silk, rayon, and cotton textile markets. Will Congress favor "offshore" areas or continental producers?

In Florida 1 person out of every 5 has an automobile; in Puerto Rico, only 1 out of 130; in Cuba, 1 out of 230; and in the Philippine Islands, only 1 out of 490. It is thus apparent that any increase in Florida's agriculture will have very beneficial effects on employment in the automotive industries. In Florida there is 1 telephone for every 10 persons; in Cuba, 1 for every 110; in Puerto Rico, 1 for every 130; and in the Philippines, 1 for every 490. These same relative statistics are true for home radios, mechanical refrigerators, and many other comforts and conveniences. Such figures conclusively prove that increased continental production of our sugar requirements will result in increased employment in many varied lines of industry.

Each and every nation seeks and expends great effort in trying to reach self-sufficiency. Other countries will buy from us only those things which they cannot themselves produce, and this should likewise be the policy of this country. Cuba, through the gratuitous assistance of our governmental departments, has learned to become more and more self-sufficient; in fact, today they are exporting some things which we formerly supplied them. The Philippines are increasing their purchases from Japan at the expense of our factories. The Puerto Ricans demand free and unlimited access to our markets to dispose of products produced by the lowest compensated labor.

Florida has suffered much from the hands of our tropical charges; her pineapple culture was destroyed; her tomato culture, as well as winter vegetables and citrus crops, are affected by this competition; and her cane-sugar production has been restricted. Why? To benefit peoples not accustomed to our ways, and who, moreover, want none of them.

That the State of Florida has shown that it contains all of the worth-while, and none of the sordid, elements necessary to become one of the outstanding sugar-producing areas in the world, and, therefore, is entitled to supply a substantial portion of the consumptive requirements of continental United States, can no longer be denied, and this unequivocal statement is fully supported by the facts disclosed in a report to the President on sugar by the Tariff Commission.

During the hearings before the Tariff Commission preceding the preparation of the report to the President representatives of the offshore areas stated that the costs for the periods used in the study were entirely too low, because during such period labor received just food and shelter, and yet, despite such extremely low costs, the cost of 96° raw sugar delivered to continental refineries was—

	Cents per pound
Philippines	2.36

as against Florida costs, paying an American scale of wages, of only 2.58 cents per pound delivered to refinery.

The creation of wealth from agriculture within our domestice areas, through the production of commodities by those having an American standard of living in the United States, instead of the purchase of such commodities from foreign and insular areas having an extremely low standard of living, can only result in increasing the demand for those articles of commerce rightfully considered as necessities of life by the average American, but viewed by inhabitants of other countries as the very height of unattainable luxuries, and thus, in turn, creating an ever-increasing demand for American industrial, agricultural, and commercial labor.

The vast area of the Everglades came to the State of Florida as a gift from the Federal Government in the expectation that through the development of the area the wealth of the State would be increased. The Everglades are the greatest undeveloped natural resource in the State of Florida and probably one of the greatest undeveloped natural resources in the entire United States; they contain over 4,000,000 acres of land, on which from time to time various developments have been projected, and as a result many thousand acres have been cultivated for winter vegetables; the central muck land, except for a very narrow fringe devoted to winter vegetables, until the advent of sugar-cane culture in the district, had been practically undeveloped.

Spasmodic attempts to develop cane-sugar culture in the Everglades were made as far back as the middle eighties of the last century, the early efforts being rendered worthless largely on account of inadequate water control. The production of cane sugar in the Everglades may be said to have started with the harvest season of 1928–29, when 769 tons of raw sugar were produced. By 1932–33, despite hurricanes, cloudbursts, the lowest price at which sugar ever sold on the New York Exchange, and the worst depression in the history of the country—the production had increased to 35,908 tons, and today this area, together with another sugar-producing area in the State, centering at Fellsmere, are restricted, together with the entire State of Louisiana, the oldest continental sugar area, to a base quota for both States of the insignificant figure of 260,000 tons, or a paltry 4 percent of the Nation's sugar requirements. Only 15 years ago Louisiana alone produced 7 percent of our sugar requirements, and today the oldest area and the newest area together are limited to slightly more than one-half of that proportion, or 4 percent.

Based on, first, the costs of production in Florida, as compared with other areas; second, the protection to the consumer, as well as the reduction in the problem of national defense, that would result from larger continental production; third, the development of our own resources; and, fourth, increased employment—all demand that there should be no limitation on Florida production.

During the past 5 years, despite restrictions, the sugar producers of the Everglades have satisfied over $2,000,000 in accrued and current taxes, have provided funds for the operation of pumping facilities that served not only their lands but the lands of hundreds of small farmers, have given employment to some 3,600 persons each year, and indirectly furnished employment to many thousands more in transportation, industry, and commerce, satisfying the needs and desires of those directly employed.

To increase production where no domestic surpluses exist, to employ American labor on an American basis, to increase the demand on capital-goods industries and make available the existing wealth of the Nation through the development of its natural resources, the utilization of a vast fertile area in the production of food crops without competition with other areas in the continental United States are substantial means of relieving distress.

Not only does the Everglades offer opportunities for the development of the sugar industry and the raising of fresh fruits and vegetables at a period of time when a great portion of the country is under ice and snow but I am reliably informed that sisal, manila, and casava, and many other crops not heretofore grown, may be grown in this area, richer than the delta of the Nile. With such a development will come manufactures, stock feed, canning plants, and so forth, all employing American labor for the production of American products to feed America.

The development of this area is comparatively recent and in any farm program should be considered most carefully with a view of allowing the increase in the production of those products which are not competing with continental United States, giving employment to many thousands at the peak season of unemployment elsewhere.

I feel that it is most fitting and proper that tribute should be paid to the Army Engineers for their fine work upon the Okeechobee-Caloosahatchee flood-control project, a work which has required engineering skill and thoroughness, enabling the permanent laying out of a program in this area without the constant fear of floods, bringing hope to the faces of the inhabitants where before there was a constant apprehension. I view the Caloosahatchee-Okeechobee project as a major engineering undertaking, as money well spent by the Federal Government, and I am most hopeful that it may be completed. The Federal Government has, with the cooperation of the sugar and vegetable producers and the State of Florida and local units, made possible an orderly development of a great natural resource, and we should not now curtail the right to develop same or overlook that great right of the American market for American producers.

ROOSEVELT CONDEMNED UNJUSTLY

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, having been a Member of this House for the past 6 years, coming to Congress during a period of unrest and distress, when confidence not only in government of the people had been forsaken but lack of confidence in business was broken down.

We recall in the spring of 1933 when business was prostrate and our banks were closed, newspapers, magazines, and periodicals were loud in their praises of President Roosevelt.

But now, when the papers themselves are heralding the story of returning prosperity, most of them are denouncing the President and declaring that the business revival which is occurring under his administration cannot occur under his administration.

One might suppose that this is because another Presidential election will soon be due and that the editors of these papers are generally Republicans. But that does not explain it, as the newspapermen themselves understand. It does not make much difference, in fact, whether the editor of a newspaper is a Republican or a Democrat. What actually makes a difference is who owns the paper, not who writes the editorials. Let the owner give the word, and a Republican editor will write Democratic editorials or a Democratic editor will write Republican editorials. But why did these newspapers laud the President or at least refrain from criticizing him in the dark spring of 1933? That is easy. Strange as it may seem, American financial interests were not particularly anxious to have their way at that particular time. They were too sick. They had lost confidence in themselves. Furthermore, they had had their way. That is what made them so sick.

So naturally they begged the President and his administration to do something and do it quickly. They could not say what, but they wanted him to do something which would revive business. Even the newspaper business at that particular time was in a bad way.

And President Roosevelt did something, and eventually business did show signs of recovery. Then the big financial interests did want their own way once more.

While President Roosevelt met with little opposition from the big financial interests in the spring of 1933, it must be admitted that he and they faced our business problem with distinctly different points of view. Both were anxious that business should recover. But President Roosevelt wanted business to recover so that it might support the masses of people who are dependent on it, while these financial interests wanted business to recover so that it might have another grand spree. What they actually said was, "Recovery before reform."

I am not objecting, particularly, to these attacks upon the President. Every President who has done anything worth while has been subjected to just such attacks. Washington met with so much unfair criticism that he declared he would rather be in the grave than in the Presidency, but America remembers Washington and has utterly forgotten who those critics were.

Even President Roosevelt is not being attacked more bitterly and more unfairly than was Abraham Lincoln; and if men like Washington and Lincoln could take it, I am not going to worry about Franklin Roosevelt.

It has been charged that Roosevelt (and Lincoln) did not live up to party platforms. Although Lincoln, conscious of his inexperience, looked cautiously, testing his footing at every step, often pausing or changing his direction but never retreating, his objective was the preservation of the Union. To achieve that, he stood ready to lay aside all preconceived opinions as to the surest route for reaching the goal. Lincoln was by no means immune from errors, and he had frequent occasion to change his mind. When he made a mistake, however, he assumed entire responsibility for it, correcting it fearlessly without apologies. Horace Greeley, the famous editor of the New York Tribune, published an open letter to the President which to no slight extent voiced the popular discontent with Lincoln's policy. Greeley was then at the very height of his power and the influence of his paper had become enormous. In fact, the editor had grown to believe that he was the real power behind the Government and could enforce his opinions upon it almost at will. However that may be, he adopted a most offensively overbearing tone in addressing the President. He did not hesitate to proclaim himself the spokesman of over 20,000,000 people, judged Lincoln with remissness in the performance of his official duties, accused him of being the tool of politicians and influenced by timid counsels, and required him in the name of the people to execute laws.

Lincoln suffered from the most exasperating forms of criticism which petty meanness and spite can inflict on public men. Nothing that he said or did escaped ridicule or censure. For instance, at about this time he happened to write a private note to the actor, James Hackett, thanking him for the gift of a book and expressing some modest and perfectly legitimate preferences among the passages and works of Shakespeare. The actor indiscreetly published this letter, which the newspaper editors seized upon to scoff at the President's literary pretensions and jeered at his taste. Of course, Lincoln had long been accustomed to personal abuse and had no time to waste on it. In fact, at that particular moment he was engaged in preparing the Gettysburg Address, now enshrined among the classics of English literature.

Lincoln, like Roosevelt, was denounced in Congress in open attacks not only from the party opposing him but from his own party as well. From the pulpit he was anathematized by such eminent political divines as the Reverend Dr. Cheever, while the rostrum poured forth bold denunciations through the speeches of Wendell Phillips.

Unprejudiced consideration will find that the action taken by President Roosevelt has been fully consistent with the statement made in his inaugural address, in which he said:

> It is hoped that the normal balance of executive and legislative authority may be wholly adequate to meet the unprecedented task before us. But it may be that unprecedented demand and need for undelayed action may call for temporary departure from that normal balance of public procedure. I am prepared under my constitutional duty to recommend the measures that a stricken nation in the midst of a stricken world may require.

At the time of the President s inauguration not even small voices of opposition were heard in answer to the President's frank avowal that he would take even unprecedented action to save the stricken Nation! Such action was taken. The masses of the people see the evidences of recovery on every side of them, and now opposition and criticism seeks popular support through false charges of unconstitutionality rather than through a positive, intelligent program.

THE CLEVELAND CONVENTION OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY WAS MERELY AN ADJOURNMENT OF THE "GRASS ROOTS" CONFERENCE AT SPRINGFIELD

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, under general permission granted on June 3, 1936, to extend remarks in the RECORD, I desire to submit a few observations with reference to the Republican convention held at Cleveland.

Mr. Speaker, it was Abraham Lincoln who said, "You can fool some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time." That statement was made in the days when the chief mode of conveyance was the horse and buggy. That was uttered when the radio and other modern means of communication were waiting to be discovered. That pronouncement of human interest was delivered by the immortal Abraham Lincoln at a time in our national life when it was impossible for the people to learn all of the existing facts before a decision could be made.

But today America is awake. America understands. Modern methods of communication and travel have thrown the people and their problems into a closer proximity, the result being that the average man on the street is fairly well versed upon the important current questions of the day. The old Lincoln axiom does not apply, for in this intriguing day of American life I emphatically state that you cannot fool any group of people any part of the time. And any political party which enters into a national campaign believing that the American voter today is credulous and gullible is riding for a political fall.

And yet, my colleagues, the old guard Republican leadership of the Nation which today controls the destiny of the Republican Party is seeking through subterfuge and undercover methods to bamboozle the American people in the 1936 campaign. They have been put to route under the leadership of President Roosevelt. The present Chief Executive has made the old guard retreat to the back room. They recognize that political strategy dictates they do their driving in this campaign from the back seat. Realizing that the great mass of the American people is backing a humanatarian like Roosevelt, the old guard are now using fantastic methods to convince the American people that reactionaries have been submerged by a new young Republican movement which has been consummated by the nomination of Alfred M. Landon, of Kansas, as the Republican candidate for President of the United States. They are attempting to impress upon the people of this country that the Republican young guard will sweep clean all of the reactionary forces that so long dominated the Grand Old Party. Evidence of this line of political strategy was seen at every turn during the recent Republican convention held in Cleveland, Ohio. The old guard, sitting in behind the scenes, are anxious to have the American people believe that the Republican Party was reborn at Cleveland, and they brought about this delusion by permitting the younger group to move the political pawns while they sat in the background and by remote control maneuvered the stalemate.

Yes, Governor Landon is to be the standard bearer of the reborn Republican Party; and John D. M. Hamilton, vigorous, fighting captain of the young guard, is to lead his phalanxes to victory. It matters not in this campagn that up until a few years ago Hamilton was the most bitter political enemy of Governor Landon in the State of Kansas, and was instrumental in defeating Mr. Landon for the humble office of precinct committeeman in Independence only 6 years ago. It matters not that Mr. Hamilton was tutored at the knee of Dave Mulvane, stanchest of the old guard bitter-enders. Mr. Hamilton now leads the new battalions of young Republicans under a new ensign of liberalism, with the members of the old guard wigwagging proper signals from the lofty towers above.

It is proper at this point in my address to return to an eventful week in Republican history. It was only a year ago when several thousand Republicans of the Middle West gathered at Springfield, the capital of my home State, to put forth a declaration of principles. That was the beginning of the 1936 Republican campaign. It is important that the voters of America know who were in charge of the "grass roots" conference. Let us peer below the surface and see who controlled the destiny of that convention in the hotel rooms at Springfield. Mr. Hamilton was there and Mr. Harrison Spangler, old guard member of the Republican National Committee. Present were former Senator Jim Watson, of Indiana, old guard Republican leader of the Hoover administration, defender and vigorous champion of the iniquitous Smoot-Hawley tariff bill; Pat Hurley, Mr. Hoover's Secretary of War, Arthur Hyde, his Secretary of Agriculture; Arch Coleman, Hoover's political Assistant Postmaster General; George F. Getz, Republican national treasurer; Sam McKelvie, member of the old guard Farm Board; R. B. Creager, old guard committeeman from Texas; Charles Dewey Hilles, New York national committeeman; Henry Allen, former Kansas Governor and press agent of the Hoover campaign committee; Bob Lucas, former executive secretary of the Republican National Committee. There were others also—Dan Casement, implacable enemy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act; Mrs. George Simmons, professional dirt farmer and stump speaker for the old guard. There were representatives of the Farmers' Independence Council of America, an organization created under the auspices of the American Liberty League, whose moving spirit was an employee of the league. There were real, honest-to-God dirt farmers and farm leaders also, but did they have any voice in framing the "grass roots" conference declaration of principles? That is best told by Jay Hayden, correspondent for the Detroit News, who said in a dispatch to his paper following the conference:

> To measure the success of the Republican "grass roots" conference it is necessary to know the purposes which were in the minds of the men who promoted it. First of all, they were out to prove that a large gathering of Republicans from the corn and wheat region would produce a platform as satisfactory to the business interests of the United States as any similar meeting in the East. The idea was to present a declaration of principles, ostensibly made by the farmers, which would stimulate rather than retard the collection of a campaign fund for the 1936 Presidential battle.

The rules were so devised as to offer no opportunity for general discussion. There was not even a public hearing before the resolutions committee, such as is provided in all national party conventions as a means of showing receptiveness to new ideas. Every speaker was hand-picked and his speech carefully combed in advance of its delivery to make sure that no alien note would creep in. Individual delegates were forbidden to speak unless their appearance was requested by the chairman of their State delegation. Needless to say, the State chairmen also were hand-picked. The convention for these reasons may have suffered from a lack of spontaneity, but it preserved the appearance of solid conservatism and unity of action which its promoters were anxious to present to the country.

There at the Springfield "grass roots" conference this young Republican movement was cradled; it was there that the candidacy of Gov. Alfred Mossman Landon of Kansas was born, there fathered, sponsored, financed, and secretly directed by the old guard Republicans, by the corporate interests of the East, by the big packers and other processors, by the discredited Farmers' Independence Council, and by the Du Pont-financed American Liberty League, and cheered on by the Tory press. How gleefully these papers, representatives of great corporate wealth, hailed the "grass roots" conference and are now hailing the candidates and platform of the Republican convention! Can there be any better proof of the influence of the old guard? Can there be any better evidence that Wall Street and the big processors and rich meat packers are now completely satisfied with the Republican Party candidates and its platform?

Yes; they called it a "grass roots" conference. I wonder why. Certainly the financial and corporate powers in control of that conference knew little or nothing about grass roots. But here is more evidence of how the old guard attempted to fool the American farmer by coining a phrase which apparently came from the farmer himself.

The "grass roots" conference put forth a platform avowedly to influence the Republican national convention, for its chairman, John Hamilton, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, declared:

In this conference we cannot be unmindful of the fact that no group can bind our party to any program prior to the national convention of 1936. However, there are certain fundamentals which can properly be stressed with the thought that the Republican Party, seeking to reestablish a normal relationship between a people and their Government, will include them in its platform.

How well the Republican platform committee at Cleveland performed! A casual glance at the declaration of grievances laid down by the so-called "grass rooters" will indicate to any fair-minded and reasonable man that the leaders of that conference proved themselves to be the real champions of destruction, invective, and derision against the President of the United States. It was a shameless example of what the old-guard political leaders will do when blinded by rage because they are unable to control the politics of the country.

Did the grass-roots platform at Springfield have anything to say in praise of the Agricultural Adjustment Act? Did it say anything about the benefits that have come to the farmers under the Roosevelt Administration? Did it tell of the rise in the farmers' income from $5,337,000,000 in 1932 to $8,110,000,000 in 1935? Of course not.

What a paradox they presented with their unbridled denunciation of the Roosevelt Administration policies in one breath, while in the next they endorsed in principle, in their ten-point program, many of these same policies. If they had been consistent and had honestly believed in their grievances against the President, there was only one thing left for them to do, and that was to advocate the repeal of every measure of reform and recovery initiated under the Roosevelt administration. But an examination of the record will show that no group of Republican leaders in convention or otherwise in any part of the United States has ever adopted a single resolution proposing the repeal of the New Deal program. And the Cleveland convention, following the lead of the "grass roots" conference at Springfield, was equally silent upon the repeal of any New Deal laws.

Diverging for a moment, it is advisable to state that the "grass rooters" found it uncomfortable in trying to substitute something for the Agricultural Adjustment Act, later invalidated by the Supreme Court. They racked their weary brains in attempting to find a substitute which would alienate the farmer from this important legislative measure. And, ladies and gentlemen of the House, that was the primary reason for the calling of the "grass roots" conference. It was in the hope that, through the collective thought of the leaders of that convention, something might be discovered which would give to the farmer of the agricultural West a better and a more constructive program than that which had been given to him under a Democratic administration. They realized that the farmer's vote was lost to the Republican cause unless some new measure could be found to take the place of the first and only workable law ever given to the American farmer in the history of the Nation.

Finally they became stymied. They were in more or less of a mental panic. They sent for Frank O. Lowden to appear before the resolutions committee. Lowden declared flatly in favor of government benefits to farmers corresponding to industry's protective tariff. And, my colleagues, after that statement, the resolutions committee adopted a curious agricultural plank, noticeably weak and evasive in regard to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which might mean anything, or nothing.

I submit that a careful examination of the agricultural plank adopted at the Cleveland convention will disclose that that plank is no better or no worse than the one suggested at the "grass roots" conference. It follows the same avenue of uncertainty and vacillation. Mr. Hamilton declared at Springfield that "above all else we must look to a return of an economic program based upon a theory of plenty and not scarcity", almost the same words used by the platform makers at Cleveland. The "grass roots" platform insisted also that there should be a "sound currency based on gold", which, as Senator BORAH said, would be the greatest threat that could come to agriculture. And, while Senator BORAH was able to eliminate that declaration of principle as the basis for our currency during the convention days, yet we find the Republican presidential nominee, Mr. Landon, practically agreeing in his telegram to the convention that there should be a sound currency based on gold.

Did the Springfield convention have anything to say about reciprocity in our dealing with foreign nations, a policy advocated and championed by such Republicans as William McKinley, William Howard Taft, and Charles Evans Hughes, a policy that the big industrial barons of the East condemn? No; but the platform committee at Cleveland supplied the omission. That committee declared that "we strenuously oppose the so-called reciprocal treaties", and "we will repeal the present reciprocal-trade agreement by law."

In view of the platform adopted at Cleveland, can any reasonable man doubt that the Republican convention at Cleveland was but an adjourned meeting of the Springfield "grass roots" conference? What prompted Governor Landon in his celebrated telegram of interpretation to clarify the planks on labor and the currency and fail to clarify the plank on agriculture, the most incomprehensible and inconsistent plank in the platform? Was it accident or design? Or was it surrender? It was surrender, complete and abject surrender, to the industrial East and the old guard, the same forces that controlled the "grass roots" conference at Springfield and the Republican national convention at Cleveland.

There is but one conclusion to be drawn: At Springfield, as at Cleveland, "the voice was Jacob's, but the hands were the hands of Esau."

True it is that the old guard were fearful of having Herbert Hoover appear at Springfield, but they saw to it that he made the principal address at the Cleveland convention. And the American farmer, listening in over the radio, will not forget how the delegates cheered Mr. Hoover for a period of 15 minutes before he started the main part of his address. The newspapers and the old guard commentators unhesitatingly concluded that Hoover made the greatest speech of the convention. He ran true to form. He has always been long on talk and short on action. His feeble attempts and futile efforts to meet the economic crisis during his regime are still fresh in the memory of us all. The American people are familiar with the many outstanding examples of his vacillations, which were always exhibited most pitiably in extreme national emergencies. One must conclude from the reactionary speech made by Mr. Hoover at Cleveland that he and the present Republican leadership of this Nation are anxious to take us back to the primrose path of 1932.

My colleagues, I would not for one moment impugn the honesty or challenge the sincerity of Governor Landon. I know him personally, and I have every reason to believe that he would be glad to be helpful to the farmers of his own State and of the Nation if he could. That conclusion is based upon what occurred at the beginning of the Roosevelt administration when Governor Landon endorsed many of the recovery measures proposed by President Roosevelt. He favored the Agricultural Adjustment Administration; at any rate he did not oppose it. In fact, every member of this House from the State of Kansas, Democratic or Republican, supported that important measure. But when that act was passed Mr. Landon was merely Governor of Kansas and was going along with what the people of that particular State wanted. He did not have the slightest knowledge that within the short space of 2 or 3 years he would be the candidate for President on the Republican ticket.

And so today his viewpoint becomes Nation-wide. His visions turns to the East, the North, the South, and the West to determine what is necessary in the way of a national policy which will place him in the Executive chair. Much to his amazement he finds himself the leader. It is a miracle that as yet he cannot understand. But, as he ponders the subject he realizes that behind the Republican Party and the Nation are the great electric utilities, the Du Ponts, the big meat packers, the rich and monopolistic tariff barons of Pennsylvania, and the other interests financing the Liberty League and the fake farmers' independence council. He knows that his campaign must be financed by these greedy interests. He cannot help himself. He will be swayed by them. He stands on the Republican platform which has been written by that group of predatory interests. That document, in its concluding paragraph, declares:

> The acceptance of the nomination tendered by this convention carries with it, as a matter of private honor and public faith, an undertaking by each candidate to be true to the principles and program herein set forth.

And that platform has nothing in it for the farmer but contradictions and the same musty promises that were broken over and over in the 12 years prior to 1932.

Let us see how consistent the Republican nominee has been, not only in his public utterances but in his attitude before and after the adoption of the Cleveland platform.

In February of 1933, before President Roosevelt went into the White House, Governor Landon said:

> Dictatorships have been established all over the world. I do not view the granting of additional powers to President-elect Roosevelt as belonging in this class. I do not believe it would endanger our democracy.

But the Republican platform declares in its opening sentence, "America is in peril."

And in answer to that I say that America is in peril, provided the voters of this Nation should return to power the group in control of the Republican campaign, the same crowd who controlled Herbert Hoover, under whose administration America suffered the greatest depression in all of our history.

In March of 1933 the Kansas Governor declared: "I plan to enlist with President Roosevelt for the duration of the war against depression." And the Cleveland platform says the Roosevelt administration has prolonged the depression. What an asinine piece of drivel! What an insult to the intelligence of the American people. All one has to do is to look at the financial sheets of any big corporation or take a little trip through the research departments of the Capital, and he will discover that practically every business organization of the Nation has increased its profits during the Roosevelt administration. We farmers in the Middle West saw 10-cent corn under Mr. Hoover; today it is 60 cents. We saw 30-cent wheat; today it is 85 cents. And everywhere under this Democratic administration the farmer has prospered. If the old guard and the Republican leadership can get any satisfaction out of such a hollow statement, under the light of the true facts, they are welcome to it. But, once again, I declare that the American people are not so credulous and gullible.

Governor Landon in March of 1933 also said:

> I desire to acknowledge in a tangible way the appreciation of the people of my State for the courage with which Roosevelt has tackled the depression.

And the Cleveland platform declares the administration "has bred fear and hesitation in commerce and industry."

Again in May of 1934 Governor Landon said:

> It would be good business, in my opinion, for Kansas to borrow every dollar it can get under the P. W. A. that could possibly be spent on highway work by July 1935.

And the Republican platform says, "The New Deal administration constantly seeks to usurp the rights reserved to the States and the people" and "it has destroyed the morale of our people and made them dependent upon government."

And in September of 1934 Governor Landon, not then the Presidential nominee of his party, said:

> We have not yet found how to control and manage the industrial civilization which we have created. The only way we can find the solution is the age-old way of trial and error and experience.

Even as late as November 1935 Governor Landon said:

> I am confident that the President and the W. P. A. are doing all in their power to get the people to work.

And the Republican platform declares the Roosevelt administration "has bred fear and hesitation in commerce, thus discouraging new enterprises, preventing employment, and prolonging the depression."

What a change has come over the Governor of Kansas who has become the Republican nominee for the Presidency. Now Republican Presidential nominee, Alfred Mossman Landon, says, "The centralization of control in Washington has brought about a lamentable break-down of local responsibility", and that the Roosevelt administration "has made the worst record ever made in the history of the United States in bringing this country out of a depression."

And finally Governor Landon declares:

> If we, as Republicans, would keep faith with the people, our platform must say exactly what we mean—and we must mean exactly what our platform says.

What did Governor Landon mean as Governor of Kansas, and what does he mean as the Republican candidate for President?

It is of interest to note that most of the pro-Roosevelt utterances by Governor Landon were made in 1934. Landon was a candidate for Governor. Can there be any doubt that his campaign, particularly his stressing a major part of the Roosevelt policies of recovery, played a large part in his election as the Republican Governor?

Let me call your attention to the latest evidence as to how the old guard is working with Governor Landon in his quest for public office. Governor Landon has announced that among his advisers who will shape his speeches during the campaign is Charles P. Taft, brother of Robert Taft and son of a former Republican old guard President. Frederick T. Robey, economist of the Columbia University, who writes a column on economics for the New York Herald Tribune, a reactionary Republican daily, and is consultant for major corporations in New York City, will be the candidate's economic adviser and writer of the Governor's speeches on economics; and Earl H. Taylor, associate editor of the Country Gentleman, will write the candidate's speeches on the farm problem.

Who are these men who are to advise and direct the Republican nominee in his campaign—to inject their views into and write the candidate's speeches? They are men who have long been associated with the reactionary old guard, with the big interests of the East; they are the spokesmen for these interests; they represent the old guard.

In view of this record, the American people anxiously await the decision of the Republican Presidential nominee upon the part the old guard will continue to play in this political drama. Will they continue to operate behind stage, as they did at Springfield and at Cleveland, or will Governor Landon have the courage and the fortitude to insist that Herbert Hoover, Ogden Mills, Walter Brown, Jouett Shouse, of the Liberty League, Charles Dewey Hilles, contact man for Wall Street, Jim Watson, the Du Ponts, and a score of others take to the open spaces of America and from the agricultural platform speak in his behalf for the greatest office within the gift of the American people?

GREATER NEED FOR AIRPLANES AND DIRIGIBLES FOR RELIEF WORK

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to call attention to the need for airplanes and dirigibles for relief work.

Everyone will recall the trying suspense of the last winter when Tangier Island, located in the Chesapeake Bay, was out of communication with the mainland. The conditions were unusual and practically unprecedented. With characteristic courage, the inhabitants of the island met their problems. With commendable zeal and indefatigability the nearby communities, States, cities, and towns did their part in relieving suffering and distress.

So much was undertaken by so many different persons, activities, and agencies that a detailed recital of the many worthy efforts might work unjustly to those whose names might be omitted inadvertently.

There are lessons to be learned from the trying suspense of those anxious days. One of these lessons is the need for the development and utilization of airplanes and dirigibles in this kind of work.

When it appeared last winter that the efforts of the United States Coast Guard to reach the island would prove ineffectual for several days because of the gravity of ice conditions, it became apparent that relief should be undertaken through the air.

I asked Commander Karl Lange, of the Goodyear Corporation and commander of the blimp Enterprise, and Mr. Frank Geppy, of Arthur Kudner, Inc., if the Enterprise could be used to make contact with the island, and report conditions. Without a moment's hesitation they assured me gladly that they would go just as soon as the weather could permit.

In fact, the next day Commander Lange, with Verner Smith as first officer, landed the Enterprise on the island and reported the conditions there. The next day they returned to the island and carried 1,000 pounds of food provided by the American Red Cross.

Too much credit cannot be given to the perseverence, intrepidity, and zeal of these gentlemen who established communication with the island and commenced the work of relief.

Later, when the situation became more critical, the dirigible again carried food to the island.

In the meantime airplanes secured by the Washington Herald, Albanus Phillips, food packer of Cambridge, Md., and doubtless by other merchants, agencies, and activities, carried food, supplies, medicine, physicians, and nurses to the island.

One of the noblest efforts was that made by Maj. Enoch B. Garey, chief of Maryland State police, and the men under him. It was on this expedition that Sgt. Wilbert V. Hunter, of the Maryland State police, lost his life in his heroic effort to relieve suffering. His memory will live in the affections of those he sought to save, and his heroic struggle will serve as an inspiration far beyond the present generation.

Relief in larger volume was provided by the American Red Cross with the aid of the bombing planes of the United States Army and vessels of the United States Coast Guard.

From the day of the first trip of the Enterprise to the island and the report of its condition, Mr. Colin Herrle, of the Red Cross, was active day and night to supply relief, and Gen. Malin Craig, Chief of Staff of the Army, was active in providing facilities to send the provisions by bombing planes if necessary and as a last resort, as the deliveries were necessarily attended with some degree of danger to the inhabitants. Fortunately, through the skill of the aviators and the cooperation of the inhabitants, no damages or injuries were sustained.

The greatest possible credit is due to all who shared in the work of mercy and relief, whether or not connected with the Government and whether or not mentioned in these remarks.

It would be a pleasure to detail in full the splendid work done by all who so nobly engaged in this mission of mercy.

The value of dirigibles and airplanes for relief work was demonstrated beyond the possibility of question and under the most trying conditions. It is peculiarly important that the Government shall be provided with sufficient airplanes and dirigibles to carry on this kind of work when necessary. These airplanes and dirigibles might be jointly used and operated by the executive departments under regulations permitting their use for practical purposes at all times.

As a result, greater knowledge would be obtained as to dirigibles and a trained personnel could be secured.

The experience of the Goodyear Co. has demonstrated that we can build and operate dirigibles in the United States successfully. Notwithstanding the tragedies of the Akron and the Macon, the Goodyear Co. has been operating a fleet of small airships known as blimps. The blimp Enterprise, which first established contact with Tangier Island and delivered 2,000 pounds or more of supplies, was one of this fleet. These ships are operated for passenger-carrying, advertising, and training purposes. Mr. Stillman, vice president of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., Akron, Ohio, testified in April 1935 before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House that these blimps had flown 1,924,963 miles, which was practically three times as far as the Graf Zeppelin had flown, and that they had carried 173,908 passengers without injury to a single passenger.

The use of the blimp Enterprise, its landing under the most trying conditions on the ice, its navigation under adverse weather conditions, the use of airplanes in making similar landings, and the service of the bombing planes of the Army in delivering supplies in large quantities all demonstrate the need of greater development and utilization of these agencies for relief work.

MONEY AND THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, our forefathers in early colonial days, realizing the evils and abuses of the secret, private control of money, and to safeguard the people against the money changers of that day and the pillage of the unsuspecting, they wisely provided in the Constitution that the power to issue and regulate money should forever be in the Congress of the United States to be exercised as a public function, open in the glare of the noonday sun, as other public affairs of the people. (See art. I, sec. 8, clause 5, United States Constitution.)

THE SAME FINANCIERS NOW AS THEN

But the financiers of that day were just as loath and reluctant to release their strangle hold on money, as the international financiers of this day, and, shrewdly taking advantage of the strain of the Revolutionary War debt, then pressing for payment or adjustment, they craftily preyed upon the fears and apprehensions of the first new Congress and President to surrender the constitutional power of Congress to issue, coin, and regulate the value of money and surrender this over to a private banking corporation organized for the purpose of controlling the money supply.

THE SO-CALLED UNITED STATES BANK

They shrewdly took this power over money under the style of the "United States Bank", but which was a private corporation concealed under a public name, the greater part of the stock of which was subscribed and held by British financiers who secretly dictated our supply of money.

At this time Thomas Jefferson was in office as Secretary of State under the administration of Washington. Jefferson protested against the surrender and declared the private control of money was a greater menace to the liberty and welfare of the people than standing armies in time of peace. These are the words Jefferson used in condemning the surrender by Congress of its power over money to private banking interests:

WHAT JEFFERSON SAID

If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issue of their currency, first by inflation and then by deflation, the banks and corporations that will grow up around them will deprive the people of all property until their children will wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered.

Again Jefferson said:

I believe that banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than are standing armies. Already they have raised up a money aristocracy that has set the Government at defiance.

The issuing power should be taken from the banks and restored to the Government and the people, to whom it properly belongs.

WHY JEFFERSON ORGANIZED A PARTY

And, failing to prevent the surrender, Jefferson resigned from Washington's Cabinet and organized the Democratic Party for the purpose of recovering back to Congress its constitutional power over money for exercise, regulation, and control as an open public function vital to the people's welfare.

The surrender of this power was by charter to this private banking corporation for a period expiring in 20 years; and, this charter expiring in 1809, under the administration of President Madison, who was acting with Jefferson, the renewal was refused for another term.

AGAIN USED A PUBLIC NAME

But the financiers, abiding their time and shrewdly taking advantage of the war debt created by the War of 1812, again so preyed upon the fears and apprehensions of Congress that Congress in 1816 was induced to make another surrender of the constitutional power over money to a so-called Second United States Bank, a private, secret, selfish corporation organized for profit and gain.

ANDREW JACKSON A DIFFERENT MAN

This surrender of the power of Congress was also by charter for 20 years, and which expired under President Jackson in 1836, and the financiers made their demand upon him for renewal, followed with their usual threats and intimidations of bringing on a panic and ruining the country if denied. But this time they met a different man.

Andrew Jackson, as President, called these financiers before him and, addressing them, he said:

Gentlemen, do you have as financiers the power to bring a panic upon the country?

They answered:

We have that power, and we will use it.

And whereupon President Jackson replied:

If you have that much power, you have too d——n much power; and I propose to take that power away from you.

And when they protested and continued their demand President Jackson further answered them:

It would be my sin to permit you to continue in your unjustifiable business.

The following is an excerpt (extract) from Andrew Jackson's message to Congress December 2, 1834, preliminary to the veto of the bill to recharter the Second United States Bank, usurping the power of Congress to issue and control the currency:

WHAT JACKSON SAID

The bold effort the present bank has made to control the Government, the distresses it has wantonly produced, the violence of which it has been the occasion in one of our cities famed for its observance of law and order, are but premonitions of the fate which awaits the American people should they be deluded into a perpetuation of this institution or the establishment of another like it.

It is fervently hoped that, thus admonished, those who have hitherto favored the establishment of a substitute for the present bank will be induced to abandon it, as it is evidently better to incur any inconvenience that may be reasonably expected than to concentrate the whole money power of the Republic in any form whatsoever or under any restrictions.

Let it be said to the everlasting glory of Andrew Jackson as President that he defied the money-power monoply, refused to renew their charter, and restored the power over money to Congress, where the Constitution placed it, and where it rightfully belongs.

But these money-gambling financiers were not dismayed, but again abided their time when another war should come, bringing another war-debt crisis under which they could again demand the surrender by Congress of its constitutional power over money.

TAKING ADVANTAGE OF WAR DEBTS

And in 1862 another great war did come, with the great Civil War conflict, the conflict between the North and the South, came with another war-debt crisis, and the money-gambling financiers, taking advantage of this war debt and the crisis for money to carry on the war, as they had taken advantage of other war debts, renewed their demands for another surrender by Congress of its constitutional power to control money.

They demanded as their price for supporting the bond issue to provide money to carry on the war, that Congress surrender its constitutional power to issue and control the money supply and this power be given over to them.

And yielding to their demands, Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, recommended and induced Lincoln to sign the National Bank Act, under which the power over money was again taken away from Congress and again given over to private banking interests.

LINCOLN'S SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Later, after the law was enacted surrendering the control of the people's money over to the manipulating private bankers, Salmon P. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, realizing the effects of what he had done, said that he would regret to the day of his death that he advised Lincoln to sign the bill. The following are the exact words used by him:

My agency in procuring the passage of the National Bank Act was the greatest financial mistake in my life.

It has built up a monopoly that affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed.

But before this can be accomplished, the people will be arrayed on one side and the banks on the other, in a contest such as we have never seen before in this country.

WHAT LINCOLN SAID

And Lincoln, who was led to sign the bill creating the national-bank law surrendering the power over money to private banking interests, after the war was over and peace came, realizing the enormity of the power surrendered and the advantage taken by the private bankers, said:

As a result of the war, corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow.

The money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudice of the people until all wealth is aggregated in the hands of the few and the Republic is destroyed.

I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. God grant that my suspections may prove groundless and untrue.

Again Lincoln said:

When $100,000,000 or more of the circulation we have now shall be withdrawn, who can contemplate without terror the distress, ruin, bankruptcy, and beggary that must follow?

The man who has purchased any article, let us say a horse, on credit, at $100 when there are $200,000,000 circulating in the country, if the quantity be reduced to $100,000,000 by the arrival of pay day, will find the horse but sufficient to pay half the debt; and the other half must either be paid out of other means and thereby become a clear loss to him, or go unpaid, and thereby become a clear loss to the creditor.

What I have said of a single case of the purchase of a horse will hold good in every case of a debt existing at the time a reduction in the quantity of money occurs, by whomsoever, and for whatsoever, it may have been contracted. The general distress thus created will, to be sure, be temporary, because whatever change may occur in the quantity of money in the community, time will adjust the derangement produced; but while that adjustment is progressing, all suffer more or less, and very many lose everything that renders life desirable.

WHAT LINCOLN RESENTED

Lincoln was killed by Booth on account of his part in the great Civil War in freeing the slaves.

But at the close of the war, Lincoln became so bitter against the money power and so resented the deception practiced upon himself and Secretary Chase, in securing the passage and his approval of the National Bank Act, that many of his close friends always believed and contended that Lincoln was killed by order of the bankers and the money power to prevent him from repealing the national-bank law.

Of course this was an erroneous theory to account for the assassination of Lincoln but it shows the state of mind and the bitter resentment of Lincoln against the bankers at the time.

Only a few years ago, a close friend of Lincoln's, then residing in Canada, testified before the Banking Committee of the Canadian Parliament that he believed and had good cause to believe that the money power ordered Lincoln killed.

GOVERNMENT MONEY

In the meantime, before this surrender by Congress of its constitutional power to issue and control the people's money, Lincoln and his Congress had begun the exercise of that power by Congress and had issued almost one-half billion of money to carry on the operations of the war.

But here is what stopped them. And here is what brought about the surrender by Congress at that time of its constitutional power over money under the National Bank Act which Chase was induced to recommend to Lincoln.

When Lincoln and his Congress began the issue of money in 1861 to provide for and carry on the war, the international bankers of that day were fearful they would lose the opportunity to take advantage of the war to force another surrender by Congress of its constitutional power to issue money. The international bankers, adroitly organized, and the bankers of London, England, sent, post haste, a circular letter to their associates, the bankers in America, warning them of the great danger of allowing Lincoln and his Congress to continue the issue of money direct by the Government under the Constitution.

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS THEN

England had already abolished slavery, and they made the argument that slavery was not necessary to their interests, but a far greater interest and advantage was in great danger and jeopardy, that of allowing the Government to issue its own money and deprive them of billions of dollars of interest and the control of the circulation.

This letter is known in history as the Hazard Circular, and the following quotation would show the danger they apprehended and that they were then working upon the fears of Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, and to induce him to recommend the national-bank bill to Lincoln and his Congress:

Slavery is very likely to be abolished by the war power and chattel slavery to be destroyed.

This I and my European friends are in favor of.

For slavery is but the owning of labor, and carries with it the care of the laborer, while our plan is for capital to control labor by controlling wages.

The great debt that capital will see to it is made out of this war must be used as the means to control the volume of money.

To accomplish this the debt must be bonded and the bonds used as the banking basis.

We are now waiting to get the Secretary of the Treasury to make the recommendation to Congress.

It will not do to allow the greenbacks to circulate as money for any length of time, for we cannot control them, but we can control the bonds, and through them the bank of issues.

The international bankers were successful. Salmon P. Chase, as Secretary of the Treasury, recommended the National Bank Act to President Lincoln and his Congress. The bill was passed by Congress, signed by President Lincoln, and went into effect, and the international bankers took over the constitutional powers of Congress to issue money.

And under the bankers' dictations and demands all of the money issued by Congress, excepting $346,000,000, were retired, canceled, and destroyed and put in bonds for the bankers and upon which they have drawn billions of dollars of interest.

They likewise demanded the cancelation and retirement of the remaining $346,000,000, but by a miracle this amount was saved from destruction. A calculation has been made of the compound interest on the bonds which would have been collected from the people if they had been successful in their demands for the cancelation of this remaining $346,000,000.

WHAT PEOPLE SAVED

By the failure to destroy this remaining $346,000,000 the Government and the people up to this time have saved and the international bankers have thereby lost the incredible and staggering sum of eleven billions of taxes to pay interest. But the financiers have taken many more billions from the Government and the people on the bonds replacing the billions destroyed, in round numbers, four times that staggering amount.

THE HARD TIMES OF 1887

During the hard times of 1887 a movement was started to recover back to Congress its constitutional power to issue money, surrendered to the international bankers through the enactment of the national banking law which Chase and Lincoln had regretted. The people were in dire distress and demanding relief from bankers' interest under the galling yoke of Wall Street and the bankers' merciless and exacting tribute.

To meet and stop this movement by the people Wall Street first subsidized the newspapers by shrewd and ingenious argument and money, to oppose and help defeat this rising demand of the people to recover back to Congress the constitutional power over money.

At the same time the following circular was sent to the bankers of the country, urging them to support the papers and stop all loans to the people who refused to join them in opposing the demand and movement of the people to recover back the constitutional power of Congress to issue and control money:

It is advisable to do all in your power to sustain such newspapers * * * as will oppose the issue of greenback money and that you also withhold your patronage or favors from all applicants who are not willing to oppose a Government issue of money.

Let the Government issue the coin and the banks issue the paper money of the country. * * *

To repeal the law enacting the national-bank notes or to restore to circulation the Government issue of money will be to provide the people with money and therefore seriously affect your individual profits as bankers and lenders.

Having stopped the rising movement among the people in 1887 for the Government to issue and control its own money, the bankers were encouraged to go further and make the Government retire its money and issue bonds calling for interest coupons.

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS IN 1893

On March 12, 1893, the National Bankers Association sent out to all banks in the form of a letter what is known in history as the "panic circular." This letter is as follows:

MARCH 12, 1893.

DEAR SIR: The interests of national bankers require immediate financial legislation by Congress. Silver, silver certificates, and Treasury notes must be retired and the national-bank notes, upon a gold basis, made the only money.

This requires the authorization of $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 of new bonds as a basis of circulation.

You will at once retire one-third of your circulation and call in one-half of your loans.

Be careful to make a money stringency felt among your patrons, especially among influential businessmen.

Advocate an extra session of Congress for the repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman law; and act with other banks of your city in securing a large petition to Congress for its unconditional repeal, as per accompanying form.

Use personal influence with Congressmen; and, particularly, let your wishes be known to your Senators.

The future life of national banks as fixed and safe investments depends upon immediate action, as there is an increasing sentiment in favor or governmental legal-tender notes and silver coinage.

The order, "you will retire one-third of your circulation and call in one-half of your loans", was obeyed and the panic planned, promptly followed.

Cotton sold at 4 cents, hogs at 2 cents, wheat at 35 cents, and corn at 10 cents. But what is even more significant, the big bankers got everything they wanted and demanded at the time.

FEDERAL RESERVE MONEY LAW

The national-bank law, surrendering the constitutional power of Congress over money, remained in force until modified in 1913, when, under the claim and pretext of recovering back to Congress its constitutional power over money, this power was again surrendered and the international bankers given even greater control over public currency.

This time the surrender was to a private banking corporation—hidden, covered, and concealed under the name and style of "The Federal Reserve System"—where it remains to this day, with private bankers secretly controlling the money supply of the country and resisting, evading, and defying the Government in its efforts to relieve us from the want and scarcity of money.

PANICS UNDER PRIVATE CONTROL

It was under the control of national-bank financiers that the panic of 1873 came, the panics of 1893 and 1907 came, and it was under the Federal Reserve System that the panics of 1920 and 1929 came, from which we are suffering today.

WORLD WAR DEBT

During the great World War the international financiers loaned to their governments what they now call "a cheap dollar", which is a dollar under higher values, under higher prices, and higher wages.

But when the war was over and peace declared, they did not want to be paid back in the same kind of money loaned. Instead they wanted to be paid back in a high, scarce, dear dollar, in a dollar worth two or three times the dollar loaned, or a dollar calling for two or three times the property, commodity, and labor values.

And these financiers, being in control of the money of their different governments, or in position to dictate such control, they changed the money of their countries. In this country they changed the dollar, our monetary unit of value, to make the dollar and their bonds and interest coupons call for two or three times the value loaned.

To do this the international financiers of all the World War countries of the world, led by our Federal Reserve bankers, met in Brussels, Belgium, in Genoa, Italy, and in other places abroad and here, and in secret conclave and under a secret gentlemen's agreement carried out a plan to change the value of money in all their countries.

And, assuming to reestablish the gold standard, they changed the money of all the World War countries, doubling and tripling its value and thereby doubling and tripling the value of all the war-debt bonds held by the international financiers of all the World War countries.

BROUGHT WORLD-WIDE PANIC

This brought on a world-wide panic, a panic in every World War country. In this country it brought on the panic of 1920 and began the panic of 1929, and which were followed by the same panics over the world, making it impossible for foreign countries to pay their debts to this country, and in this country as well as other countries making it impossible for the people to pay their private debts and mortgages.

This is a world-wide panic, brought upon the world at the same time, resulting from the same cause and from the course and policy of the same men under a secret gentlemen's agreement entered into by the international financers to double and multiply the value of their World War bonds.

The same men who were in control of money when the panic of 1873 came, when the panic of 1893 came, when the panic of 1907 came, when the panic of 1920 came, and when the panic of 1929 came are still in the secret control of money today, which the Constitution in plain, clear, and unequivocal words vests in Congress for public, open administration.

TWENTY-FOUR MAJOR PANICS

There have been some 24 major panics, and every one has come under the private and secret control of money, and the country after suffering untold loss has finally recovered from all of them; but recovery has come without a remedy, and one panic has followed another.

Recovery from all these panics has come with the rich richer and the poor poorer and with the millions unable to recover back their farms and homes and their property lost.

RECOVERY WITHOUT A REMEDY

We are now recovering from this panic without a remedy enforced. The same private bankers are being left in control of money, and in the light of experience and following the examples of history we can expect another panic to come sooner or later to follow recovery from this panic.

But more than this, under recovery without a remedy, prosperity has come back but always came back only to the certain special few, the financial manipulators, and the many, the masses have remained in the throes of economic distress.

Now we must leave ancient history and the regrets, errors, and surrenders of the past to meet the living issue of the present. We are now faced with the same crisis in defending the constitutional powers of Congress to issue and control the money of the country.

The same international banking interests which intimidated Washington and his Congress, which intimidated Madison and his Congress, which attempted to intimidate Jackson and his Congress, which intimidated Lincoln and his Congress, and enforced a surrender from Congress of its constitutional power over money, is intimidating this administration and Congress.

CURRENCY LAW OF MAY 12, 1933

This administration and Congress passed the currency law of May 12, 1933, authorizing Congress to exercise its constitutional power to issue and replenish the money supply, to restore values, and the price level regardless and independent of the international bankers claim for interest.

This law was passed in good faith by the administration and Congress May 12, 1933, and to be enforced and administered as a part of the recovery program, provided for in different parts at the same time, and was placed upon the statute books before the crafty international bankers were aware of its object and purpose and who were taken by surprise.

But before the printer's ink was dry from the printing presses publishing the law, the international bankers were organized as they had organized many times before to protect their monopoly of money. They raised the old hue and cry of "bad money" and "inflation" to prevent and defeat the enforcement of the law.

And for this purpose they have craftily insisted, first, to try out other parts of the recovery program leading to the killing of millions of pigs, disemboweling millions of mother swine, slaughtering vast dairy herds, and destroying farm crops and food products.

And above all, they have encouraged the vast expenditure of money for relief and to provide employment, all to furnish them bonds drawing interest, as well as to suspend and postpone the operations of the currency laws of May 12, 1933, restoring to Congress its power over money.

CONGRESS IS BEING INTIMIDATED BY FINANCIERS

This administration and Congress is being intimidated, coerced, and misled, as Washington and his Congress were intimidated, as Madison and his Congress were coerced—but not as Jackson and his Congress—as Lincoln and his Congress were misled, to defeat the operations and administration of the currency laws of May 12, 1933.

This will be the issue of the next campaign—to elect in the next, the Seventy-fifth Congress, enough Members with sufficient courage to stand out against the demands of the international financiers and bankers and to enforce the currency laws of May 12, 1933, restoring to Congress its constitutional powers over money to replenish the depleted money supply and give relief from the panic.

WE MUST PLEDGE ENFORCEMENT

With the Republican Party in terms concealed, but no less positive in meaning, pledging the repeal of the currency laws of May 12, 1933, unless the Democratic Party in national convention will pledge the enforcement and administration of the currency law of May 12, 1933, passed by Congress and signed by the President in good-faith obligation to the people, history will again repeat itself.

Another surrender by Congress of its constitutional power over money will again be written and recorded, and the contest begun by Christ against the money changers 2,000 years ago and taken up by Jefferson and Jackson will have again been lost to the cause of civilization and human welfare.

THE NEW CONGRESS FOUND

When the new Congress convened in 1933, on full inquiry, Congress found, and all economic students have agreed, that it was the fall of values, prices, and wages which took away the earnings and income of the people and destroyed their buying and consuming power and brought the panic upon the country.

And Congress also found, and all economic students have likewise agreed, that a recovery from the panic requires a rise of values, prices, and wages to bring a return of earnings and income and restore the buying and consuming power.

TWO RECOVERY MEASURES

And to restore prices, values, and wages Congress enacted a recovery program in two parts: One to raise prices by reducing and limiting the supply under which crops and all production was to be reduced, abiding the principle or policy of want and scarcity, and known as the crop-reduction industrial recovery plan.

The other way provided by law was by restoring the money supply while maintaining plenty and abundance of all the necessaries, comforts, conveniences, and luxuries, and known as the currency provision of the Recovery Act of May 12, 1933.

Under the recovery program provided, both parts were to be carried out, administered, and put into force and effect concurrently one with another, and made permanent accordingly as one or the other proved most effective for the purpose of restoring the tax and the debt-paying power and the buying and the consuming power.

ONLY ONE PART BEING CARRIED OUT

The crop-reduction laws and the laws providing for industrial reduction have been fully administered and carried out by killing millions of pigs and mother swine, the slaughtering of vast dairy herds, by destruction of food and clothing crops and materials, and by assessing and collecting taxes to pay farmers for leaving their ground lay idle, and by limitation of hours to reduce industrial production.

But the currency provisions of May 12, 1933, enacted to restore and replenish the money supply, have never been put into force and effect but remain upon the statute books without resort or administration.

RECOVERY DOWN TO DATE

This brings the recovery program down to date with the Republican Party declaring substantially for the same crop-reduction plan and pledging to repeal the currency provision of May 12, 1933, enacted to restore and replenish the money supply before the law can ever be administered. This is the law passed by the new Congress to recover back to Congress its constitutional power to issue and control money.

The Democratic Party is holding the law enacted to restore and replenish the money supply on the statute books until the program of want and scarcity can be further tried out and tested, when the same will be put into force and effect.

ONLY TWO WAYS TO RAISE PRICES

There are only two means or ways whereby to raise or restore values, prices, and wages known or recognized by the scientific world. One way is to reduce the supply of the property, commodities, or labor, the value and prices of which are to be raised; that is, by creating a want or scarcity of such property, commodity, or labor. This is the crop- or industrial-reduction plan.

This policy of creating want or scarcity by reduction or destruction of the supply raises the price of one article or commodity at a time and leaves the price of others low, and compels a part of the people to pay more for less without more to pay with.

By the other way—to increase prices—production and supply are left normal, unchanged, and the relative amount of money is increased and restored. This raises prices, the money value, while maintaining plenty and abundance, and is provided for under the currency law of May 12, 1933.

But more than maintaining plenty while restoring prices, this way of raising prices raises all values, all prices, and all wages up on an even level or stage, at the same time, so, if one person is compelled to pay more for what he must buy, he will always have more to pay with, and prosperity will be brought to all the people.

And there is still another difference in raising prices, values, and wages by reduction or destruction of the supply from raising prices, values, and wages by restoring or replenishing the money in circulation.

In raising prices, values, and wages by reduction and destruction of the supply the people suffer from economic loss and waste, and taxes are assessed to pay the cost of enforcing the operations of reductions. But raising prices, values, and wages by restoring the normal supply of money brings no such economic loss and waste and calls for no taxes to pay the cost to be levied and collected from the people.

THE DIVISION OF POWERS

The Constitution divides the powers of government into three separate and different parts—Congress, the legislative, which makes the laws; the President, the Executive, who enforces the laws; and the courts, the judiciary, to construe the laws; and the Constitution further provides that the powers of one department shall never be exercised by another department.

Under this division and separation of powers the Constitution vests in Congress the power to issue and regulate the value of money. Under the express provisions and declarations of the Constitution this power conferred upon Congress excludes or prohibits this power from being exercised by either the executive or judicial departments.

Notwithstanding these express provisions of the Constitution, the power to control money has been surrendered by Congress over to private banking interests for control and manipulation for profit and gain. And the executive branch of the Government, prohibited from exercising control over money, has long been contending with the private bankers to acquire more control over money.

This fight between the executive branch of the Government and the private banking interests for the control of public currency is like two men fighting over another man's wife, neither of them having any claim to her, while the dazed husband stands by and looks on.

And so it is with the executive branch of the Government contending with the private banking interests for the control over public currency. Neither one has any constitutional right to issue, regulate, and control the currency of the country. But both of them are claiming and contending for the right while Congress stands by and abdicates its constitutional power.

IF WE WERE STRANGERS ON A SEA

If we were sailing on a sea and had come to a new country, and on going ashore found everybody begging for water, and wherever we went in that country the people were crying out for more water, would we not be justified in concluding there was a scarcity of water, or a failure of the proper distribution of the water in that country, and that the people should be relieved by providing them more water or a better distribution of water among them.

Then let us suppose that we were foreigners and coming to this country, coming to Washington, D. C., and we found everybody writing or sending in asking for a loan of money, farmers begging for money, home owners begging for money, manufacturers begging for money, banks and insurance companies begging for money, everybody everywhere begging for money, saying they could not carry on without more money.

Would we not be likewise justified in concluding there was a scarcity of money in the United States of America or a failure of a proper distribution of money. And would we not be justified in contending that we should have more money or a better distribution of money?

MEN BORROWING WATER IN A DROUGHT

Without a restoration of the money supply, a course of a recovery program will be like men in a drought borrowing water to prime a pump in a dry well—they will get no water out of the well and will lose a part of the water used in priming and be in debt for the borrowed water.

A LEAKY BOAT

An economic recovery program to restore values, prices, and wages, reducing, destroying, and limiting production of the necessaries, conveniences, and luxuries, without replenishing the money supply, restoring money values and the general price level, would be like men in a leaky boat throwing over their supplies to stop the boat from sinking and to lift the boat in the water instead of stopping the leak and bailing out the water to stop the sinking and to lift the boat.

Prosperity does not mean less of the necessaries, conveniences, and luxuries; does not mean creating want and scarcity. Prosperity means to provide more and have more; more for men to use to maintain and enjoy life, to live a more abundant life.

And recovery does not mean a gain in price on a part production to be offset by a loss on the total amount of production. Recovery means a gain in prices on the full, normal amount of production.

The object of the recovery program must be to restore the normal value of properties, commodities, and labor on the full and normal output of the people, in order to restore the money power of labor and labor products to pay taxes, interest, and mortgages—requiring greater total money proceeds from property, commodities, and labor and not a higher price or money value for less.

When the currency laws enacted May 12, 1933, in good faith are enforced and administered as a part of the recovery program and the general price level is raised up to the level of taxes, debts, mortgages, and fixed charges on a full, normal crop of labor and labor production, then the farmers and home owners can pay their mortgages, then there will be a surplus left over for use as buying and consuming power, then the 11,000,000 unemployed and the 20,000,000 on relief will fade away as the morning mists before the glare of the noonday sun.

NEW MONEY LAW UPHELD BY THE COURTS

The Constitution clearly authorizes and enjoins this part of the recovery program; and the law is on the statute books, confirmed and upheld by the Supreme Court, awaiting enforcement and administration, waiting to be carried into effect for the purpose of which the law was passed.

The Constitution is full, ample, and sufficient. It is not necessary to burn the barn to get the rat; it is not necessary to undermine the building to adjust the frame.

It is not necessary to change the Constitution; it is not necessary to extend or enlarge the Constitution; it is not necessary to strain the Constitution; the Constitution not only gives this power to Congress but it commands and enjoins the exercise of such power.

The currency laws of the recovery program must be administered and enforced before the international bankers are allowed to mislead a great political party and bring about its overthrow and repeal.

CONGRESS WAS RIGHT

Congress and all economic students were right in their diagnosis of the panic, that the depression was caused by a fall of values, prices, and wages, the money value of property, prices, and labor, and that a recovery from the panic requires a rise of values, prices, and wages.

And Congress and the administration were right in the enactment of the currency law of May 12, 1933, to raise the general price level, the general money value of commodities, properties, and labor; to restore the power of labor and labor products to pay taxes, interest debts, and fixed charges, and thereby restore and leave a surplus over for use by the people as buying and consuming power.

And there can be no full, normal recovery until there is a general rise in prices to restore such tax and debt-paying power necessary to leave such surplus over for use as buying and consuming power.

This panic was caused by a fall of money values, prices, and wages, while taxes, interest, debts, mortgages, and fixed charges were left held upon a higher level of prices under which they were contracted, fixed, and obligated, which made these taxes, debts, and charges call for more property, commodities, and labor to pay and leaving less to sell for surplus as buying and consuming power.

TAXES, DEBTS, AND PRICES

Full, normal recovery requires one of two alternatives. Taxes, interest, debts, and fixed charges must either be reduced or scaled down to the lower level of values, prices, and wages, or the money values, prices, and wages must be raised up to the level of taxes, interest, debts, and fixed charges in order to make it possible for them to be paid.

The first of these two alternatives, reducing or scaling down taxes, debts, and charges, is impossible under State and National Constitutions, and if possible, would be unjust to debt holders.

The second of these two alternatives, raising money values, prices, and wages, is especially authorized by the Constitution, and the law is on the statute books to do it.

But restoring money values, prices, and wages on a part crop, part production, or part labor time will not restore normal prosperity without reducing and scaling down debts and taxes, mortgages, and fixed charges to the level of lower earnings and income. There must be a higher money value on full production, crops, and labor, and the law is on the statute books to do it awaiting administration and enforcement.

This law to restore the money supply remains upon the statute books ready for administration and enforcement, and has so remained since May 12, 1933, and all that remains to be done to complete the recovery program is to enforce and administer the law.

The enforcement of this law will reverse the money operations resorted to by the international financiers to bring a want and scarcity of money and restore the normal supply of money and can be enforced any day promptly, speedily, and without waiting further.

When this law is enforced we can stop the crop-reduction plan; we can stop the program of want and scarcity; we can stop levying and collecting taxes to pay farmers for leaving land lay idle and to pay the cost of enforcing the reduction; we can stop borrowing to provide employment; we can rejoice in prosperity, permanent, lasting, and without cost or price.

ENGLAND AND 21 NATIONS

England and 21 European nations have abandoned the gold standard; have abandoned the course and policy of crop reduction, of want and scarcity; have abandoned expenditures for employment and are resorting to the money remedy by restoring the normal supply in circulation.

And England and these 21 nations are rejoicing in a return to prosperity and are far more advanced in recovery, with unemployment fast decreasing or altogether overcome under a managed currency or commodity dollar under which they are restoring the money supply.

I HAVE FILED TWO RESOLUTIONS

I have filed two concurrent resolutions, one during the Seventy-third Congress and one during the Seventy-fourth Congress, asking Congress to mandate the enforcement of the currency law of May 12, 1933, enacted to replenish the money supply, but the law still remains upon the statute books a dead letter without administration.

If I am favored with another term in the Seventy-fifth Congress, I will again file the same resolution to mandate the enforcement of this law, and I will have 149 Members to back me if the same Members who voted for the farm-mortgage law, reducing the interest, are returned by the people.

We have financed many home owners, that is, extended their mortgages and given them longer time to pay, and saved them from threatening foreclosure, saved them from sale to pay taxes and from their personal debt obligations, and given them new hope to hold their homes for their children.

And we have brought recovery sufficient to enable them to meet their interest and taxes and sufficient to save their mortgages from default in interest and tax delinquencies for the present, for the time being.

But until we raise prices, values, and wages back to a normal higher level, necessary to restore earnings and income and the tax- and debt-paying power under which taxes were assessed and mortgages made, we have not saved the home owners.

Without the enforcement of the currency law of May 12, 1933, these home owners may hold their homes and save their mortgages from default and taxes assessed upon them from delinquency and from foreclosure and sale, but they will not be able to pay the principal and leave their homes to their children debt and mortgage free.

REFINANCING MORTGAGES NOT ALONE SUFFICIENT

Extending and giving longer time for the payment of mortgage debts, loaning home owners more money to clean up personal debt obligations or to make further improvements will not alone save the home owners.

Loaning the home owners more money to pay personal debts and for improvements will only increase their mortgages; this will only make more interest to pay; this will only increase their debt obligations, which in the end must be met; and without full restoration of the power to pay, home owners will not be saved from their debts.

MORTGAGES EXCEED PRESENT VALUES

But there is another class of town and city home owners and of farm home owners as well who have not been refinanced and whose loans have not been extended, who have been given no longer time to pay and who have not been saved from impending foreclosure sale.

These are the town and city home owners and the farm and rural home owners with the value of their farms and homes fallen to so low a value level that, at the present, assessed valuation is lower than the existing mortgages, and under which no appraisement can be made to save them.

The only hope for these farmers and home owners is the restoration of the former values of their farms and homes to the value level upon which the mortgages were made and to permit an appraisement showing a value of at least one-third or more above the amount of their mortgage debts.

When the currency laws of May 12, 1933, are administered and put into force and effect and the new money thereby provided for shall have come into the channels of circulation, then general values, prices, and wages will have been raised and restored back to their former levels.

Then with the rise of such price and value level the value of farms, town and city homes will be lifted, raised, and restored. Then these farm and home owners can be refinanced, then their mortgages can be renewed; then they can not only meet the interest but they can meet payments on their loan. Then they can pay off their mortgages and save their homes for their children.

MUST BE A GENERAL PRICE RISE

Without a restoration of the general price level, without lifting and restoring property valuations necessary to bring back normal earnings and income, and the ability to pay, refinancing and extending mortgages, a part of the farm and home mortgages, and leaving the valuation of others too low to reach for renewal and extensions, recovery will prove an empty gesture, a mere temporary step taken, and a meaningless and fruitless maneuver to save the farm and home owners of the country, the misery and painful suspense will still be held over them, and in the end their farms and homes will be lost.

TWO ECONOMIC PRINCIPLES CONTROL PRICES

There are two economic principles operating to control prices, values, and wages. One is the supply and demand of money relative to the amount of property, commodities, and labor. This controls the general level of values, prices, and wages and on a permanent and continuing and lasting level.

The other economic principle is the supply and demand of the different articles or commodities which rise or fall in value of that one article or commodity alone as the supply and demand for the same change, leaving all other articles and commodities remaining on the general price level. This principle fixes the temporary values for the time being.

It is only by increasing the supply of money that the general value, price, or wage level can be lifted, raised, and maintained permanent and for a continuous time, upon which men alone can depend for earnings and income to meet the obligations of both the present and the future.

THERE IS NO ROYAL ROAD

There is no royal road assuring relief to the home owners. The general value and price level must be raised. All prices and wages must be lifted. The debt- and mortgage-paying power must be restored to the level upon which the mortgages were contracted.

The currency laws of May 12, 1933, now awaiting on the statute books for administration to restore the depleted money supply, thereby to lift the general price level, must be enforced and carried into effect before the farmers and the home owners can be assured of relief and the ability to pay their mortgage debts coming due and payable in the future.

FEDERAL AND STATE RELIEF MONEY IN SOMERSET AND FAYETTE COUNTIES

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, quite frequently we hear individuals or groups make statements like this: "The Federal Government is interfering with State rights." "The State government is interfering with the county's rights." "The county government is trying to run our city affairs."

Well, these sayings may sound good, and in some respects they are true. But in checking over the relief situation in the Nation as a whole since March 1933, I have made some striking observations.

For instance, I have found in Fayette County, Pa., that the Federal Government and State government combined have given to Fayette County $11,883,604.93, and in the same time they gave to Somerset County, Pa., $3,568,904.23.

In other words, if the taxable property in Fayette County would have been assessed so as to raise this amount of money in order to take care of its straight relief program, Fayette County would have been obliged to put on about 45 additional mills each year since 1933. That is for dole relief only, and dole relief is only one small item of the help the taxpayers received from the Federal Government and the State government since 1932. The W. P. A., the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the P. W. A., the Federal land bank, the H. O. L. C., and other avenues of support put into the county many more millions than relief put in.

The same comparison is true of Somerset County, and for that matter all of the counties. In other words, if the Federal Government and the State government had not come to the rescue of all of the counties in the State when they did, these counties would not only be absolutely bankrupt, but the people living in them in 1933 would now be not only bankrupt, but in many places starvation would have taken them.

I am not in favor of the Federal Government or the State government or the county government interfering with the affairs of the units under them. But when emergencies come we have to apply emergency measures, and I am sure everyone who reads this will feel proud of the fact that they live in the only country in the world where such a harmonious feeling exists relative to helping the needy and the unemployed.

Sometimes we hear an individual say: "Yes; but the tax burden that is being piled on my shoulders." A good honest man in my district said that to me recently concerning his home. I said in turn to him that I did not believe that on an average the taxes on the little home owners and the farmers in my district had been raised much since 1933. Of course, he was honest and sincere in thinking that they had been raised on his home considerably, so he got his books and we checked up his taxes on his home since 1929. Remember, he lived in this same home for 20 years and each year he had made some improvements on it, and he made some improvements since 1929, but in the face of all that here are the taxes he paid on his home each year from 1929 to 1935, inclusive.

Total taxes:

1930	96.52
1931	102.08
1932	106.86
1933	98.25

The same is true of the taxation on the average farm. When the farmer begins to count up his taxes that he actually paid and compares them with what he paid in former years he will find about the same thing true.

Yes; I know it takes additional taxes to raise the money to make the large appropriations that the Nation has been making during the last few years to take care of the poor and the hungry. But, my friends, the thing that interests the masses, and especially the farmers and the small-home owners, is that the several measures that Congress has put into effect during Roosevelt's administration relative to taxation, take the burden of taxation off the shoulders of the farmer, the laborer, and the small-home owner and put it where it belongs, on the upper brackets of finance.

It is just dawning on the farmer and the small-home owner that they are not only being helped but they will continue to be helped by this administration. They are now seeing that the tax structure which has been built by the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses is destined to relieve them from paying an unjust amount of taxes. Of course, the structure is not completed. It will take a number of other adjustments yet before it is completed. But I, for one, shall not cease my efforts until the farmer, the laborer, and the small-home owner, are taken care of with reference to taxation. In other words, I shall continue to fight for a basis that the farmer pays no more taxes in proportion to his holdings than the Morgans and the Mellons, and Wall Street, and the rest of them.

In closing, I should like to leave with you the following relief figures for my congressional district:

Of the $11,883,604.93 that the State and Federal Governments gave to Fayette County since 1933, up to and including June 27, 1936, 68 percent of this amount, or about eight millions of this amount, came to Fayette County directly from the Federal Government and the other three millions plus from the State government.

Of the $3,568,904.23 that came to Somerset County from the State and Nation combined, up to June 27, 1936—over two millions of it came direct from the Federal Government and the rest from the State.

Once in a while we hear someone say that the relief load in our county was more than it ever was, and expressions like that. In order that you may have a vivid picture of the reduction in the relief load, in my county, and I know it will apply to all the counties in the Nation—I submit the following:

Average number persons receiving relief

	Fayette	Somerset
July 1933	56,375	21,474
January 1934	40,957	6,306
July 1934	47,787	17,617
January 1935	67,293	18,685
July 1935	52,595	19,989
January 1936	13,811	4,817
Week ending June 29, 1936	14,266	8,017

HOME OWNERS GRATEFUL FOR THE HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in the black days of 1932 and the early part of 1933 the owners of homes and farm owners throughout the Nation were bewildered and almost frantic in their efforts to save their homes. In tens of thousands of cases they had lost their jobs and had mortgages on their homes and farms. The banks held the mortgages.

In 1929, 71 national banks closed their doors. In 1930, 88 national banks closed their doors. In 1931, 357 national banks closed their doors. In 1932, 322 national banks closed their doors. Up to April 1933, 438 national banks closed their doors. In these years a total of 1,276 national banks closed their doors. The closing of these banks swept away the savings and earnings of hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of our people. Many of these same people were about to lose their homes when the Roosevelt administration, under the Seventy-third Congress, put into effect the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. As a result, tens of thousands of homes have been saved, because the home owner could get a loan at a low rate of interest spread out over a long term of years.

In Fayette County, Pa., 1,102 loans were closed on homes, amounting to $2,352,631.89.

In Somerset County, Pa., 332 loans were closed on homes, amounting to $662,691.92.

About the same time in 1933 Congress passed the new Banking Act and later in 1935 strengthened the same by raising the insurance feature to $5,000. The new Banking Act insures all deposits up to $5,000. This act gave hope to the people. Once more the rank and file had confidence in our banking institutions—confidence beyond all expectations. Just this morning, July 8, 1936, I see the authentic statement in a New York paper that the bank deposits of the Nation are in reality greater than they were in 1929.

Mr. Speaker, if the Roosevelt administration had done nothing else than to restore our banks and give the people the assurance that their savings up to $5,000 were secure when they put them in a national bank that was operating under the new Banking Act, it would have been sufficient to recommend the administration for an extension of 4 more years.

Just think of it. Only five banks have failed since the new Banking Act went into effect in 1933; and when they did fail it was only a matter of 48 or 72 hours until Uncle Sam paid the depositors having $5,000 or less on deposit every cent.

The Republican leaders want to get back in power to put into effect the old banking system which was in operation under their administration in 1929 to 1933, when a total of 1,276 banks closed their doors and wiped away the savings of widows, orphans, and thousands of old people who had retired, driving thousands into the poorhouses and the bread lines, causing scores of bank presidents and bank cashiers to commit suicide. Yes, my friends, the flood like we had in the Johnstown district this spring was bad. The dust storms in the Dakotas which are sweeping over the West are bad; but the misery and the heartaches caused by the unsound banking procedure in those black years of 1929 to 1933 left a much greater chaotic destruction than these two forces in action this year.

Mr. Speaker, right here we might insert a bugaboo that the Republican leadership is and has been flaunting in front of the people for the last half century. The bugaboo is the term "gold standard." Many of us—I for one—as we grew up as young men thought this gold standard was some sacred thing that should be saluted like the flag. Of course, it was only natural that we did get that impression of the gold standard, because the powers that controlled the gold saw to it that we got sufficient propaganda in our papers and elsewhere to educate us to think of the gold standard in that light. Well, there is nothing the matter with the gold standard as a standard. The thing that goes wrong from time to time and went wrong right before the crash of 1929, was that those big financial interests who manipulated the money market moved the gold standard around over the checkerboard in such a way that they came out on top, and the little fellow was left holding the empty bag. In other words, today we have the soundest money in the world. It is sound because we have several mediums with which we deal in our money adjustments. The farmers and laborers do not need to get scared today about the money grabbers closing in on them.

SOME ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, there is a clause in the Constitution of Massachusetts which declares that—

Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people, and not for the profit or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men. Therefore the people alone have an incontestible, inalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government; and to reform, alter, or totally change the same when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it.

The same philosophy of government is contained in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. It is a part of the fundamental law of the land. It is the foundation upon which the structure of our Government has been erected.

My father, the late William E. Russell, in his first inaugural address as Governor of Massachusetts, said with reference to this doctrine:

This declared purpose of government and power over it guaranteed to the people make it the imperative duty of their chosen representatives, as their trusted servants, to keep it ever true to their interests, to watch for the expression of their will, and when ascertained implicitly to obey it.

I believe this declared purpose of government imposes upon the representatives of the people two additional obligations—first, accurately to render an accounting of their stewardships; and, secondly, to participate with their constituents in discussion and debate of issues and in political campaigns to the end that the voters may exercise freely and with complete knowledge of the facts the right of franchise and the powers so guaranteed them.

Accordingly with the passing of the Seventy-fourth Congress, I deem it appropriate for one who has been privileged to participate in its deliberations and share in the responsibility for its decisions to pause at this time to consider its accomplishments and failures.

THE INFLUENCE OF MASSACHUSETTS IN NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Speaker, biologists tells us that the character, opinion, and actions of men and women are influenced largely by heredity. Students of sociology emphasize the effect of environment.

As I look at the map I am ever impressed with the comparatively insignificant proportion of the vast territorial limits of the United States occupied by the little State of Massachusetts. Yet I believe she has always accepted her full share of responsibility for the general welfare of the Nation. In every crisis she has been ready and has contributed freely of her men and treasure. Her sons and daughters have always been found in the front ranks of every progressive movement, high in councils of the people and in positions of trust and power in every aspect of human endeavor.

Today in the Congress of the United States I sense the influence of Massachusetts and her institutions far beyond the Members elected to represent her. I doubt if there is a State in the Union whose delegation does not number many who have either had their roots in New England or have had contacts with the educational facilities of Massachusetts. New surroundings and local problems may have had their effect upon earlier beliefs, but the restraining influence of heredity and traditon and sentiment are still evident to even a casual observer. At hearings before committees, in debate on the floor of Congress, at informal discussions in the lobby and at social functions, in every department of the Government, when matters of interest to Massachusetts were involved, I have always received courteous attention and sympathetic response. I take this opportunity to express to the membership of the House my very sincere gratitude for the cooperation and assistance they have extended to me.

FORCES ACTING UPON THE COURSE OF FEDERAL LEGISLATION

Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned the power of these influences which I believe have had a beneficial effect on legislation, because I believe no adequate appraisal can be made or enlightened public opinion formed of the acts and omissions of the Seventy-fourth Congress without due consideration of the forces and events, which, operating upon the influence of heredity and environment affecting every Member of Congress, prompted the course of its legislation.

The World War with its draft of men for the Army and Navy and its demands for fighting equipment and munitions forced American industry to speed up, to produce more with fewer workers. Women and more efficient machinery took the places of the men at the front.

At its conclusion demand for replacement of peacetime materials, neglected during the war, and purchases with credit maintained the high rate of productivity for a while and even accelerated it. But the prosecution of the war also necessitated loans to our allies. The United States ceased to be a debtor nation and became the chief creditor of the world. European countries could no longer pay for American goods with moneys which this country owed abroad. As the shortage in the domestic peacetime requirements of industry occasioned by the war were filled, American bankers sought to maintain a demand for American products by financing foreign purchases with more loans abroad. An impossible international debt situation was thus aggravated. For a time, however, it appeared to work. Our factories continued to produce to capacity; wages and prices rose; speculation ensued; and, like everything else built upon an unsound foundation, the structure collapsed; the bubble burst; men were thrown out of employment; the value of securities and property fell, and depression stalked the land.

The administration then in power was stunned. It and most of the American people believed we were living in a new era of prosperity that would endure. Even after the collapse this thought persisted. We were assured that shortly everything would be all right again.

For a long time the American people suffered patiently and with fortitude, but they could not endure without food, clothing, and shelter. Savings were withdrawn from banks and exhausted. Unemployment continued to increase, values continued to decline, the bankers began calling loans, people began to distrust their institutions, hoarding commenced, more deposits were withdrawn from banks, fear accelerated the process, banks with frozen assets could not meet demands of depositors. Bank failures and panic followed. Industry became paralyzed.

In the meantime, affairs in Europe had developed rapidly. The peoples of the vanquished countries, angered at the harsh terms of peace imposed by the victors and at the governments that had led them to disastrous war, revolted. The victors became distrustful of the vanquished, and, in spite of finances shattered by the war, proceeded further to burden their peoples with large armaments. Thus, the war to end wars and preserve democracy has resulted in preparation for more wars and dictatorships.

In brief, this is the situation which confronted the administration which took office in March 1933.

While these facts and more are well known to every man and woman who lived through those days, the memory of the American people is short. It is sound to refresh it if, as I have said, a fair appraisal is to be made of the measures enacted to meet the awful situation which culminated in the closing of every bank in the United States in March 1933.

THE PROBLEM OF THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

As the new administration analyzed the problem its first task was to set in motion the machinery of industry, commerce, and finance which had become completely stalled; its second task was to strengthen weak points in the structure and stop abuses, which were factors obviously contributing to the debacle.

RECOVERY MEASURES

Its handling of the first phase of the problem met with almost universal approbation. Confidence had to be restored. The banks were examined carefully and expeditiously. Those in a strong financial condition were reopened immediately. Those temporarily embarrassed were given aid by the Government and its agencies and were also reopened. Others were reorganized under Government supervision and with the assistance of the Government were put in shape to serve their respective communities again. Still others were liquidated by agents of the Government in such a way that the losses of creditors were greatly minimized.

In a similar way Government aid was extended to the railroads, to industry, to farmers, to home owners, to the unemployed, and to States, cities, and towns by laws enlarging the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, by the creation of other Government credit agencies, by grants and other measures.

The program accomplished its purpose. Confidence was restored. The wheels of industry were set in motion and a recovery movement was launched and then accelerated.

OTHER IMPORTANT LEGISLATION

The first immediate and critical objective obtained, the administration turned to the task of consolidating gains.

The banking structure has been strengthened by the inauguration of Federal deposit insurance and by changes in the banking laws to extend control over bank reserves, rediscount rates, and open-market operations in Government securities, and in many other ways.

The abuse of corporation powers, unsound and in some cases fraudulent financing, manipulation in security dealings, and other unfair practices in trade have been sought to be eliminated by a great variety of legislation, much of which was extremely controversial in its nature.

The laws to regulate the issuance and trade in securities and practices on securities exchanges, while bitterly opposed when first introduced in Congress, are now, since they have been in operation, generally supported as constructive and useful measures.

Abuses which had developed in the use of the holding-company structure, particularly in the utility field, such as the concentration of power in the hands of few often in opposition to the interests of real owners, the diversion of earnings from operating companies to holding companies by unjustifiable charges for financing and for legal, technical, and other services, overcapitalization on the basis of over-optimistic estimates of economies, development, and future earnings and in other ways, prompted the introduction of drastic legislation to compel their dissolution. Ostensibly designed to protect investors, it was felt by many that the legislation went too far. It was based on the assumption—never satisfactorily established—that no good would come from the class of structure it attacked. It was aimed at practices already so thoroughly discredited that they were not likely to be repeated, and it might in some instances prove to be an obstacle to future worth-while development. Finally, to many, it seemed that its principal accomplishment would be to cause further losses to small investors who had already suffered much at the hands of high finance, for it would cost huge amounts of money to dissolve the complicated structures and the security holders would have to pay the bills, the big insiders would have better knowledge of ultimate value than the small stockholders, and the former would inevitably profit through market fluctuations at the latter's expense. In a word there was every indication that one principal result of the enactment of the law in the drastic form originally proposed would be to give the big, unscrupulous utility magnate one more opportunity to fleece the innocent public. However, if this legislation is administered as well as the stock-exchange and securities laws by the Securities and Exchange Commission, it will unquestionably accomplish a useful purpose. It has not been in operation long enough to judge its ultimate value.

While there are many sincere citizens and careful students of the times who question the necessity for the huge appropriations that have been made for the Military Establishment, these cannot be criticized fairly without taking notice of events in other parts of the world. Important Governments in Europe have fallen. Internal dissatisfaction is everywhere in evidence. Disorder is not uncommon. Dictatorships have replaced constitutional governments. Treaties have been abrogated. International distrust is the order of the day. Armament building abroad has taken the place of disarmament compacts ruthlessly violated. Confidence in international agreements has been shattered. Agencies to promote peace have been ruthlessly disregarded. Wars have been made and more are in the making. Under such circumstances few Americans object to provisions by the Government for an adequate national defense. While opinions differ as to the amount necessary for this purpose, I believe it was the intention of Congress to confine the appropriations to a national-security basis.

In a single speech it is not possible to discuss all of the far-reaching legislation enacted in the last 4 years, even in the summary way that a few of the more important laws have been treated here. The merits and demerits of the program will be developed in detail in the approaching campaign. The purpose of this speech is merely to recall the problems confronting the American people 4 years ago, to indicate in a general way how their representatives have approached those problems, what has been done with reference to them, and what remains to be done.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Speaker, this brings me to my conclusion, which is a brief statement of the task remaining before the American people as I see it. I use the term "American people" advisedly because in my judgment it is not or should not be exclusively a governmental problem.

The President stated some 6 months ago that the Government must get out of this business of relief. Past experience indicated that business recovery from depression would absorb unemployment. Today, however, we have before us the picture of recovery with profits restored to industry and trade, and purchasing power restored to the workers, with farmers in many respects better off than ever before, but with unemployment only partly ameliorated. One reason for this situation is obvious. Modern machinery has made it possible to produce more with less manpower. But this should not be harmful. It should be beneficent. I do not sympathize with those who would curb invention and eliminate the use of labor-saving devices. I hold that if 1 man can produce with modern machinery what it took 10 men to produce a few years ago there exists the possibility of satisfying just so much more of human wants. The problem is then not so much one of production as it is one of an equitable distribution of opportunity. For the time being man's inventive ingenuity has outrun his capacity to adjust himself to his own inventions.

To date the Government has had to meet this situation with relief. By use of the taxing power this could be continued. But the President has said the Government must get out of this business of relief. With this I agree. It is un-American. Every American citizen ready and willing to work for a livelihood should be given the opportunity to do so.

Panaceas have been suggested, but experience has disclosed that theories involving printing-press money or other drastic tinkering with currency or other ill-considered innovations have only resulted in uncontrolled inflation and disaster and a situation worse than that sought to be cured.

While there is room for considerable difference of opinion as to the method which should be adopted, the solution, I believe, is clearly indicated to be along the line of a more equitable distribution, not so much of the products of industry as of the right to the use of the tools of production. The former will follow from the latter. Shorter hours of labor may provide the method. On this the Government is now working, but whatever the ultimate answer may be to this problem I doubt if there is an intelligent man or woman who has given thought to it who will not agree that herein is the great task which lies before us.

The great resourcefulness of the American people must be concentrated on bringing about whatever adjustments may be needed in industry, business, and the economic and social life of the country and in the Government, if need be, in order to secure the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness to which the American people are entitled.

With bitterness toward none, with a "patriotism that is born of moral courage, the courage that attacks abuses and struggles for civic reform single-handed without counting opposing numbers or measuring opposing forces", let us go forward with the work we are in to a full realization of our national possibilities.

REPUBLICANS PROVIDE VETERANS WITH BENEFITS, DEMOCRATS TAKE THEM AWAY

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, it is a strange commentary that many of the facts concerning war veterans' benefits are not clearly understood even by the veterans themselves. Some have thought of the New Deal Economy Act of March 1933, which cut payments to war-disabled veterans and their dependents more than 50 percent, when the Nation was embarking upon the greatest spending spree in the history of the world, as an isolated incident, forced through Congress as an emergency measure.

It may not have occurred to many veterans that the history of the Democratic Party shows it has uniformly adopted an ungrateful policy toward war veterans, and that this traditional attitude only reached its climax in the passage of the Economy Act. On the other hand, it has been the traditional policy of the Republican Party in helping with the policy established by Washington to acknowledge the responsibility of the Federal Government to all disabled veterans and to provide adequate justice for them and their families throughout this land for which they offered, but a short time ago, to sacrifice everything—even life itself.

This policy was enunciated by George Washington on June 8, 1783, when he said:

In what part of the continent shall we find any man or body of men who would not blush to stand up and propose measures purposely calculated to rob the soldier of his stipend and the public creditor of his due? And were it possible that such a flagrant instance of injustice could ever happen, would it not excite the general indignation and tend to bring down upon the authors of such measures the aggravated vengeance of Heaven?

This is strong language, but it expressed his sentiment. Nearly a hundred years after Washington laid down the country's policy toward veterans, Abraham Lincoln, with a heart heavy from experience of war, in his second inaugural address declared it to be the duty of the Government—

To care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphans.

And then, after Theodore Roosevelt, who had resigned as Assistant Secretary of the Navy to lead his now famous Rough Riders up San Juan Hill against the veteran Spanish troops, became President he made this declaration:

War veterans have a greater claim upon us than any other class of our citizens.

These declarations by Washington, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt embody the true spirit of America. They established a policy which served as a basis for all veteran legislation. The fundamental policy of the Government toward its defenders was not questioned until the advent of the New Deal. Franklin D. Roosevelt openly repudiated it in his address before the American Legion convention in Chicago, when he said:

No person, because he wore a uniform, must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens.

From this statement one can see there is a direct clash on principles. He thus repudiates the policy established by Washington and Lincoln and consistently adhered to by the Republican Party, and sets up an altogether new theory under which the pension roll ceases to be an honor roll. It was from this New Deal principle that the Economy Act resulted.

Should the New Deal be returned to power and make any effort whatever to cut Government expenditures, the veterans may expect that its first victims will again be the war veterans, their widows and orphans. We have a right to judge the future by the past. We not only know what was done but the President announced the theory on which it was done.

War veterans will do well to consider the veterans' plank in the Republican platform adopted at Cleveland.

This reaffirms the policy enunciated by Washington and in harmony with it reiterates the Republican Party's historic regard for war veterans in the following language:

We pledge continuation of the Republican policy of adequate compensation and care for veterans disabled in the service of our country and for their widows, orphans, and dependents.

This Republican pledge is no idle boast. It is a promise which will be lived up to with fidelity. You will have reason to agree with me, I think, after you have examined the Republican record of justice and fair treatment with the Democratic record of injustice, neglect, and broken pledges to those who were disabled in the defense of all the people—and the widows and orphans of those who have died.

I shall recount a brief history of the facts. At the outset I want to point out that the Republican regard for war veterans is demonstrated even in its choice of leadership in the present campaign.

Alfred M. Landon, the Republican nominee for President of the United States, served honorably in the military forces during the World War.

Col. Frank Knox, the nominee for Vice President, served with Theodore Roosevelt's Rough Riders in the War with Spain, participating in the charge up San Juan Hill; and although Colonel Knox was no longer a youth when the World War broke upon us, he promptly volunteered and saw active service at the front in France with the American artillery.

John D. M. Hamilton, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, entered the service early during the World War and served honorably with the colors for the duration of the hostilities.

I think you have a right to judge the future attitude of the Republican and Democratic Parties toward war veterans by their past performances.

All of you remember that when war was declared on April 6, 1917, the Democrats were in control of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and that President Wilson, a Democrat, was in the White House. The war Congress acted promptly when it came to the enactment of war measures. England had been in the war for 18 months before she passed an act drafting her soldiers. Canada had been in the war more than 3 years before she started drafting men for the trenches. The United States had been in the war only a month before our draft act was passed. In fact, it preceded the Canadian draft act by 3 months.

The reason that I have mentioned this will become apparent when I remind you that we had been at war for 6 months before the Democratic Congress enacted a law to provide our drafted men and volunteers with compensation against death and disabilities, as well as insurance and family allotments to protect the dependents whom the service men left at home.

Americans had already been killed or died, while others were under fire in France before the Congress passed the War Risk Insurance Act, providing the benefits to which I have just referred.

I would not give the impression that I believe the soldiers and their families were purposely neglected by the Democratic Congress, but I would emphasize that the measures taken by the Democratic war Congress—and the record proves this—were more for the protection of the Government than they were for the protection of the soldiers and their families.

A system of allotments and allowances was provided for the drafted men. The Government allowed a soldier's wife $15 a month, a dependent mother $10 a month, and his child $5 a month. If he had both wife and child, $25 a month; a wife and two children, $32.50 a month, with $5 for each additional child. But the system had a catch in it. In order to obtain this money for the loved ones left at home, the soldier, who was perhaps drafted for his service, had to contribute $15 a month out of his own pay. This was called an allotment and was deducted from the amount the soldier received each month.

You remember how these meager sums failed to provide for the wives and children of the soldiers left at home. How savings had to be drawn on to protect them from want, farms and homes sold to raise sufficient money for their necessities.

The cost of living increased by leaps and bounds during the war. Yet the Democratic Congress never recognized this so far as the soldiers were concerned, although it recognized it continually in voting billions for war supplies which never saw the western front.

The last feature of the War Risk Insurance Act allowed the men in the service to purchase term insurance at cost. Premiums averaged about $6 a month, and these also were taken from the men's pay.

As you remember, the men in the United States received $30 a month, those in France $33 a month. When deductions were made from this pay because of the insurance and family allotments the maximum monthly pay which the men could receive in the United States was $9 a month, and $12 a month in France. But you will remember that there were countless other expenses which the soldiers were forced to undergo, and these, too, were deducted from their pay.

All of you remember that many a month passed when a soldier did not receive sufficient pay to provide himself with cigarettes, and how in many instances a man had so many deductions made against his pay that he literally had nothing coming to him at the end of the month.

So much for the solicitude of the Democratic Party for the welfare and happiness of the men they had drafted into the service. Those who volunteered received the same treatment.

The War Risk Insurance Act, to which I have referred, provided only $30 a month for a man who was totally and permanently disabled. That was all. Think of it. Think of the mental attitude of the Democratic Congress which would draft men and then provide compensation at only $30 a month where they were so hopelessly disabled as to be bedridden for the remainder of their days. The sum of $25 a month was provided for the widows of the men who were killed in action, smaller sums for dependent parents and orphans.

Such is the manner in which the Democrats neglected to protect the soldiers, sailors, and marines who fought the World War. This attitude is not, however, unlike the traditional attitude which the Democratic Party has maintained toward veterans of other wars. Although they were in power during two administrations, no provision was made for the veterans of the War with Spain and their dependents until 1920, after a Republican Congress had been elected, and likewise it was the Republican Party which sponsored all legislation bestowing benefits upon the veterans of the Civil War and Indian wars. As I have said, the Republicans through the years have the responsibility of the Government to protect and defend those who have protected and defended it.

Dissatisfaction at Democratic mismanagement continued to grow during the war, and in the election held a few days before the armistice in November 1918 a Republican Congress was elected. But that was prior to the Norris amendment to the Constitution, and the succeeding session of Congress, December 1918 to March 1919, still continued the old Democratic majority, and was dominated by Democratic "lame ducks"—Senators and Congressmen who had been defeated for reelection the preceding November.

The soldiers had been treated as stepchildren from the very beginning. The Democrats had failed to furnish hospitals for the disabled soldiers, to relieve their disabilities after they were discharged from the service. Thousands of these disabled men were soon roving the streets, without money to obtain badly needed medical treatment and without funds for anything like an adequate support.

They saw the silk shirts of the munitions workers and the shipyard workers, without any place to turn, and reflected upon the ingratitude of their Government.

CARTER GLASS, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, recognized the manner in which the Government was unprepared to care for its disabled soldiers. On December 5, 1918, he submitted to the Congress a recommendation from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service that $85,000,000 be immediately appropriated for hospital beds for disabled veterans, predicting 36,000 beds would be needed by 1932.

The answer this "lame duck" Democratic Congress gave was to appropriate $9,050,000, although in January 1919 there were 120,000 soldiers in A. E. F. hospitals, and the Surgeon General had reported that 81,000 disabled veterans were in need of hospitalization. The estimate of Colonel Banks, Chief of Medical Service of the War Risk Bureau, went even further than this. He stated that more than 20,000 applications for hospital treatment had been received already, and that more than 200,000 disabled war veterans were known to be entitled to hospitalization.

The Democratic attitude toward the war-disabled veterans is well illustrated by this fact: Just before this Congress voted the utterly inadequate $9,000,000 for disabled veterans' hospitals they voted $100,000,000 to feed the people of various European nations.

Now I do not say that it was wrong for us to give this $100,000,000 to the peoples of Europe—on top of other billions which we were loaning them—but I do say that the Democratic Congress owed an obligation to its disabled soldiers which was far superior to any obligation owed the people of various European nations.

Its neglect of the disabled war veterans at that time was nothing less than shameful.

Another matter which should be mentioned in connection with this neglect was that under the authority granted the Secretary of the Treasury before the armistice was signed the United States Government loaned the Allies after the armistice—mark this well—after the war was won, and our troops were on the way home—the United States Government loaned to the governments of Europe the stupendous sum of $2,521,000,000 in cash, and on top of this sold them billions of dollars of war supplies on credit, for which we charged the nominal sum of $740,000,000.

Well, I don't have to tell you what the European nations have done about these debts and the billions that were loaned them after the armistice by the Democrats in control of the Government. The debts have been repudiated and we are now holding the bag for both the millions of the prearmistice debts, and the billions of the postarmistice debts.

President Wilson had been at the Paris Peace Conference during the winter of 1918–19. On his return to the United States in the spring of 1919 he summoned the Congress into special session to consider the peace treaty and the League of Nations.

This session of Congress was controlled by the Republicans, in both the Senate and the House. One of the first actions of this Republican Congress was to throw into the discard the niggardly laws which the Democrats had enacted for governing payments to war-disabled veterans.

The War Risk Insurance Act had authorized vocational rehabilitation for men disabled in the service. By a law passed in 1918 the payments they might receive were limited to the monthly sums they had gotten in the service.

In normal times it would have been practically impossible for a disabled man to exist upon $30 or $33 a month. In those abnormal times of high prices, these sums were so inadequate that practically nobody took advantage of the Government training offer.

A short time after the Republican Congress convened in the spring of 1919 Senator Kenyon (Republican), of Iowa, introduced a bill to increase these payments, and this bill was passed by both Houses and signed by President Wilson on June 11, 1919. It provided $80 a month training pay for a single man without dependents and $100 a month plus family allowances for disabled men with dependents.

This caused many eligible disabled to immediately apply for vocational training. But, unfortunately, the administration of training was in control of the Democratic administration, and it broke down to an extent which was nothing less than scandalous. Men who were eligible had great difficulty in being accepted for training, while the training they did receive after they were accepted was inadequate to meet the situation.

In many instances 6 months or more elapsed after a man got out of an Army hospital before he could prevail upon the Federal Board for Vocational Education to accept him for training. In its helplessness, the Government advised disabled men to apply to the Red Cross for aid. It was indeed a black administrative record.

In the spring of 1920 Marquis James, of the American Legion, discovered and published a Federal board order to its agents contacting wounded men, which read, in part, as follows:

> The organs used in approving cases are the eyes and the brain. The ears and the heart do not function. Be hard-boiled. Put cotton in your ears and lock the door. If you are naturally sympathetic, work nights when nobody is there.

The exposure of this heartless order caused an explosion in Government circles. Conditions were slowly improved, but the Federal board never did function efficiently, and in 1921 its duties were taken over by the Veterans' Bureau, which had just been created through the actions of a Republican President and a Republican Congress.

The next major relief bill which the new Republican Congress enacted in 1919 was sponsored by Representative Burton Sweet, Republican, of Iowa. This bill increased compensation to a man temporarily and totally disabled to $80 a month, plus family allowances, and to a man permanently and totally disabled $100 a month. Veterans with disabilities less than total received percentages of these sums, according to the degree of disability they were rated.

President Harding was inaugurated in March 1921. A few days after he came into office he appointed a committee of eminent men and women to consider the plight of the disabled veterans and recommend legislation which would do justice to their needs and fulfill in part the Nation's neglected obligation to them. The chairman of this committee was Gen. Charles Gates Dawes, of Chicago, a distinguished World War soldier who later was to become Vice President of the United States.

The committee recommended the consolidation of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and the hospital and medical service being extended veterans by the Public Health Service. This was accomplished in a few months through the enactment of a second Sweet bill, which created the Veterans' Bureau, and was known as the act of August 8, 1921. This act not only consolidated the activities of the three Government agencies mentioned but it decentralized these activities into regional offices established throughout the United States, so that service to the veterans was immediately brought closer to their homes and humanized in its administration.

In addition to this, the Dawes Committee recommended an enlarged and permanent hospital building program, and within the next year $35,000,000 was provided for that purpose. Other hospital-construction laws were passed from time to time by Republican Congresses, until now the veterans' hospitals are more than 80 in number and constitute the finest and most modern group of its kind to be found in the world.

Many subsequent laws were enacted by Republican Congresses for the relief of the disabled veterans, but their details are too numerous to recount here.

However, brief space must be devoted to the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, which was the most liberal, humane, and forward-looking piece of veterans' legislation ever enacted into law by the Congress of any nation. This act is sometimes referred to as the Reed-Johnson bill, after its Republican sponsors, both of whom were veterans with outstanding World War records, as well as able legislators. These were Representative Royal C. Johnson, of South Dakota, and Senator David A. Reed, of Pennsylvania.

This act was approved by President Coolidge on June 7, 1924. It contained more than twoscore amendments to the laws governing benefits for the disabled and the dependents of the men who died as a result of their service. Its two outstanding provisions were free hospitalization regardless of service connection of disability, which had been recommended by President Coolidge, and the extension to January 1, 1925, of the period where tuberculosis and mental disease were presumed of service origin.

This new law saved the lives of thousands of veterans. It has benefited other scores of thousands, who have been returned to health and productivity by its far-reaching provisions.

A Republican law, which proved of great benefit to veterans who had contracted tuberculosis in the service, provided them $50 a month for life when their affliction had reached a condition of arrest. This small monthly payment has enabled many a disabled veteran to stage a come-back.

A Republican Congress recognized that the soldiers had been underpaid while in the service and as a result passed the adjusted-compensation law, which has finally reached full fruition—the cash-payment plan recently enacted over the veto of President Roosevelt.

Only a few other laws of major importance to disabled World War veterans were enacted by a Republican Congress, although a great many minor ones were passed. The most far-reaching of these was the disability-allowance law of July 1930. It was initiated by President Hoover in response to a congressional demand for laws which would provide payments to the so-called borderline cases; that is, to men who were unquestionably disabled, but who had not been able to prove the service origin of their disability under the rigid regulations the Veterans' Bureau had erected for the protection of the Government.

There were many reasons for this lack of proof. Lost or destroyed company records, failure on the part of civilian doctors in rural communities to keep written records of treatments administered, and the death of comrades who could testify as to the service origin of the disability, were among the contributing factors. President Hoover decided to provide relief for these veterans. He recommended the disability-allowance law to the Congress, which promptly enacted it. This was the first measure to provide disability payments to World War veterans regardless of service connection. The benefits provided were considerably smaller than the service-connected payments. The maximum for permanent total disability was $40 a month, while the payments for partial permanent disabilities were $12 for 25 percent, $18 for 50 percent, and $24 a month for 75 percent permanent disability. No payments were authorized for temporary disability.

Now, a word about benefits extended by Republican Congresses to the veterans and dependents of other wars. The Congress in 1920 provided service pensions for age and disability to the Spanish War veterans, and payments to their widows after the veterans' death. Subsequent Republican enactments increased both types of payments. The Republican Congress also increased the old-age and disability service pensions to the veterans and widows of the Civil War, so that these aged people who had suffered that the Union might be preserved would be protected by the Government in their declining years. Proportionate increases were also provided for the veterans and dependents of other wars.

In 1932 the economic depression had reached great depths. At that time the major source of Federal revenue was income taxes. The depression had caused a great shrinkage in these, with the result that in 1932 Federal revenues were only a little more than $2,000,000,000. Despite the fact that Government expenses had continued to grow in the effort to relieve the depression, veterans' expenditures during that year constituted more than 19 percent of the total expenditures of the Federal Government.

This created a situation which caused thoughtful Senators and Representatives to realize that a reasonable economy should be exercised over all Federal expenditures, including those for veterans. President Hoover suggested a measure which would temporarily reduce expenditures, including certain of the veterans' benefits. These latter were chiefly expenditures on account of disability not proven of service origin. But after much debate the Congress rejected the proposal.

On March 4, 1933, the New Deal came into control of both Senate and House and President Roosevelt entered the White House. Disabled veterans were then to learn the terrible suffering which persons can be forced to endure when authority over their lives and fortunes is transferred by the Congress to the President of the United States.

President Roosevelt sent the Economy Act message to the Congress on March 10, 1933. In it he said:

> The Members of the Congress and I are pledged to immediate economy * * * I am asking for * * * legislation * * * giving * * * the Executive * * * authority to prescribe * * * details.

There was no hint in the message of the cruelty of the cuts in veterans' benefits which were planned. Senators and Congressmen were privately assured that the new act would be administered with justice and consideration. It was introduced under the high-sounding title of "To maintain the credit of the United States Government." The Economy Act was approved by President Roosevelt on March 20, 1933, after furious but vain congressional battles, waged by those who opposed this revolutionary delegation of congressional authority to the President, and by others who doubted that the act would be administered humanely and justly. But the opposition was of no avail. Both Senate and House contained Democratic majorities of 3 to 1, and the President had his way in his first congressional struggle of major importance. Under then-existing circumstances it required courage to oppose the so-called Economy Act, but within a short time it was seen that opposition to this cruel and insincere measure had been more than justified. The Roosevelt regulations which were issued under the authority which Congress had delegated had the force and effect of law.

They cut payments to veterans and their widows and orphans by more than 50 percent. The deepest cuts were inflicted upon veterans disabled as a result of World War service. These men, who by every right and decency were entitled to adequate protection from their Government, were cut 70 percent, or from $222,000,000 a year to $65,000,000. Other cuts on other classes, including widows and orphans, brought the total cuts to $450,000,000 a year.

The unscientific cutting methods which President Roosevelt had caused to be hurriedly devised made the battle-casualties and amputation cases suffer the greatest reduction. At least four-fifths of these fell upon men who had labored with their hands, such as farmers, city laborers, and mechanics; in other words, upon the least-prosperous classes.

After a number of weeks the Republican war veterans in the Congress began quietly organizing opposition to the more severe of the penalties imposed under the Economy Act. Word of this reached the President. In the meantime, to the astonishment of the Nation, he had launched forth upon his great spending spree. This dismayed many Members of the Congress, who had mistakenly taken his economy pledges at 100 percent of their face value.

Under the leadership of Republican veteran Members, congressional opposition to the cuts continued to grow. President Roosevelt attempted to stem the rising tide by granting a few restorations in May 1933 through Executive order, but these proved only a drop in the bucket. They were insufficient to head off the impending attack.

Led by Senator FREDERICK STEIWER, of Oregon, and the late Senator Bronson Cutting, of New Mexico—both Republicans and distinguished World War soldiers—the Congress revolted, and the battle for restoration of veterans' benefits lasted for more than 2 weeks. Success was greatly aided by a memorial of protest signed by Republican war veterans of the Senate and House, which branded the cuts as utterly brutal, and pointed out that President Roosevelt had failed to live up to his promise "that he would deal justly, fairly, and humanely with the veterans." Partial restorations were made as a result of this congressional battle.

In the spring of 1934 the same group of Republican Senators and Representatives returned to the attack, with the result that a bill was enacted into law over President Roosevelt's veto—March 28, 1934—which restored the major portions of the benefits taken away by the Economy Act. This bill was known as the Taber amendment. One of the outstanding features of this law was that it took away from President Roosevelt for all time the authority to set rates and eligibility restrictions upon service-connected death and disability, and by this act the Congress properly resumed its constitutional authority over the benefits for veterans disabled and the dependents of those dead as the result of wars.

Did President Roosevelt live up to the economy pledge which he gave when he forced the Congress to cut the veterans $450,000,000?

He did not. Instead of this he launched upon the greatest spending spree ever recorded in the history of any nation in time of peace.

One of the many things President Roosevelt has done which disabled veterans and widows will find it difficult to forgive is this:

After he cut them so cruelly under pretext of necessary economy, he added a quarter of a million Government employees to the rolls, whose salaries total almost $600,000,000 a year.

In other words, the disabled veterans were to be sacrificed so that President Roosevelt could build up a political army.

But to get back to the contrast of general spending, President Rooseevlt spent more than $6,000,000,000 the first year of his administration, which was a far larger amount than the previous year's spending which he had so severely criticized in his campaign. The second year of his administration President Roosevelt boosted his expenditures to $7,367,000,000. The third year of his administration—which ended on March 3, 1936—he spent $7,608,000,000. Nobody knows how much money he will spend before he goes out of office on January 20 next, but a reasonable estimate for the concluding 10 months' spending of his administration is $8,000,000,000.

As a result of President Roosevelt's gay and careless extravagances we have already accumulated deficits under his administration which amount to more than $14,000,000,000, and he has boosted the public debt from less than $21,000,000,000 to about thirty-four and one-half billion dollars.

The Economy Act was only one of the many acts under which President Roosevelt forced the rubber-stamp New Deal Congress to delegate its powers to him and his college professors. Such laws constitute a dictatorship, as they deprive the Congress of the ability to legislate for the benefit of the people and center all authority—legislative as well as administrative—in the hands of one man, and make the welfare of the entire Nation subject to his whims, experiments, and personal theories of government, subject only to the Supreme Court, which is now being so bitterly attacked.

The World War veterans know better than most classes of citizens the dire effect of the efforts of President Roosevelt's New Deal to change our form of government through thus centering all power in the President. They realize the necessity of maintaining the authority of the Supreme Court to declare such laws unconstitutional, for thousands of them would today have invalid Government insurance upon which they had paid premiums for years, were it not for the Supreme Court's decision which threw out President Roosevelt's edict that they be denied payments under the insurance they had bought with their own money.

Other classes of citizens—including many businessmen—have learned through New Deal injustices that the edict method of government is both unfair and contrary to our American form of government, which was erected by our forefathers a century and a half ago, under their ideals of human liberty, but perhaps none of these classes have suffered from the attempted New Deal dictatorship to the same degree as the disabled war veterans, for this class of unfortunates were less able to protect themselves than other groups of our citizens.

ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION FOR RECOVERY AND SOCIAL JUSTICE

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, under the consent accorded me I am taking this opportunity to review important enactments of the Congress, particularly as they affect the constituency which I have the honor of representing—the Fifth District, Pennsylvania. It is a privilege to serve them, because they can be properly characterized as typically American. They have their roots in all the racial stocks, but most of them are American clean through. These people have suffered with understanding the hardships of the depression and turned their eyes to the administration and its leader for security in their homes and hope for the future of their young.

As an administration Democratic Congressman, elected from a district which had not sent one of my political persuasion to Congress in a quarter of a century, I face a unique fight this fall. I am asking to be returned on the administration's record of having corrected the desperate banking situation of early 1933, of having fed the hungry and thereby averted revolution, and of having put business definitely on the upgrade. I have been told by sincere Republican friends of long standing not to spend a dime on reelection; that I can coast in without even tacking up a poster. But I do not concur with them, for the opposition will pour money into our district in a desperate effort to regain it.

In last year's Philadelphia municipal election one man alone, Mr. Pew, president of the Sun Oil Co., donated several hundred thousands of dollars to the opposition campaign chest. As newly named chairman of the Pennsylvania Republican committee, he will be far more generous this time. The Pews and the Du Ponts will center their largess upon districts like mine, because they have but recently turned from long-term Republican dominancy. In their forced optimism, the moneyed boys believe that this change was but the passing whim of a fickle electorate. They have not sensed what really caused the swing of so many lifelong Republicans to Roosevelt. In this speech I intend to tell them some of the facts and answer some of their criticisms. No adequate appraisal of this administration's accomplishments could be given unless we start with conditions it inherited from the previous administration.

Unemployment had been growing in the Coolidge regime, despite apparent prosperity. It increased measurably with the market crash in October 1929, only 7 months after the Hoover inaugural. Business failures reached an all-time high. Bread lines were forming throughout America, and appeals were made by hastily organized agencies for private donations in our various counties and municipalities all over the Nation. Finally, this manner of treating the crisis collapsed when it became evident that private charity could no longer meet a problem of such magnitude. It was up to the counties and States to assume it. Most of these were so harassed with delinquent taxes that they could do little with available funds to alleviate the situation.

About this time, the bonus army marched upon Washington to collect a debt when they needed payment the most. It was, excepting a very, very slim minority within its ranks, a peaceful, well-intentioned group. Many of the vets brought wife and children, a sign that they were not bent upon violence and pillage. But for some unfathomable reason this band of Americans scared President Hoover stiff. He could have addressed them and made friends, but he chose to cloister himself in the White House, not realizing that this small detachment of destitute veterans was but a symbol of the millions of Americans who were starving. The bonus army petitioned Congress in an orderly manner, but they were getting on Hoover's nerves, and this was before the wise-cracking period in his life, previous to any connection with hired "gag men." He was too befuddled then to consort with the boys who write jokes for pay.

They got on Hoover's nerves, these veterans, and we all know what followed—one of the darkest pages in American history. It was written when Hoover evicted the bonus marchers, their wives and children, in the middle of the night. They were driven from their camp on Anacostia Flats with tear gas and bayonet, by the Regulars of the United States Army. God, what a job to give the new generation in khaki! The heartless attitude of Hoover toward hungry men who had served America in her dark hour was not altogether a surprise. With the flood victims of Arkansas he had decided to feed not them, but their mules. This caused Senator NORRIS to remark: "Blessed are they that starve while the asses and mules are fed, for they shall be buried at public expense." Now I give you all this to show you previous attitudes and to remind you that not one word of dissent was heard from Republican leaders, many of whom called the shots at the Cleveland convention in June. We have a right to believe that their silence expressed approval. Contrast the difference in the Roosevelt attitude. It is important, for we might have had red revolution if Hoover's ideas had persisted a few months after his welcomed exit. People do not starve supinely. They do something about it. With our destitute the term "rugged individualism" had the same effect as "let 'em eat cake" had on the hungry of Marie Antoinette's day.

Meanwhile and elsewhere in America, the bright plan for relieving the needy was to make apple vendors of them and, of course, the idea was predestined to a short life. It is well to bear in mind that many of the unfortunate of this time were thrifty, well-doing people who had laid away a competence, wiped out in the collapse of the security markets and in wholesale bank failures. These latter multiplied at such an alarming rate that in late 1932 the average American was making his bank deposits downstairs in his safe deposit box instead of at the receiving-teller's window. Bank runs were everywhere. All of this rapidly growing crisis culminated in the spectacular transfer of funds to save the Dawes bank in Chicago and in the collapse of several very large banks in Detroit. This was the unenviable condition that Franklin D. Roosevelt faced on his inauguration day, March 4, 1933. American finance and business was on its knees; many of our people suffering hunger; confidence at its very lowest ebb.

His inaugural address breathed back that confidence to a distraught America. It is one of the gems that will live with Lincoln's Gettysburg speech. And immediately Roosevelt began to translate words into action. The bank holiday was declared so as to learn the really good financial institutions from the bad, and put the questionable ones in order where possible. In short order the new Congress, preponderantly Democratic, enacted a deposit insurance which restored the confidence of the people in our banks and caused them to form long lines at the receiving teller windows throughout the land. Today we deposit money in any bank in the country without thought of possible loss.

The Seventy-third Congress, with the President, faced the worst economic problem that America was ever called upon to tackle when it began where Hoover left off. Homes by the thousands were going under the sheriff's hammer, breadlines, young men drifting around the country in the vain hope that employment could be secured elsewhere, or lounging on the corners when they wanted work worse than anything else; business stagnant or nonexistent, and agricultural prices lower than the cost of production. Here are some of the agencies that were set up to correct these conditions.

H. O. L. C.

During the Hoover days of deflation, all investments nosedived into new lows, and real estate, that most widely held of all investments, suffered with the rest. An avalanche of distress and sheriff sales shot the market down at an alarming rate. In Philadelphia, some of the big banks acquired R. F. C. funds in the Hoover administration and used them to buy up mortgages. They immediately informed the home owner that he must reduce his mortgage by a given date. These institutions were actually using Government money to make a bad condition worse. So it was apparent to all that solution of the problem was not to be found in feeding money at the top, but by taking care of the distressed home owner in a direct and personal way. This the Roosevelt administration did when it set up the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Its operation stemmed the downward plunge of real-estate values and saved millions of homes throughout the land. The average residence property in Philadelphia will now bring approximately twice the sum it could be sold for in 1932. In Philadelphia alone 14,738 homes were saved, involving $36,400,485. Once more there is some semblance of activity for Philadelphia real estate and it is not of the distress order.

The administration was anxious to take the Government out of the real-estate business just as quickly as the crisis abated, and now we find the banks performing the function previously accomplished by the H. O. L. C. The Government is guaranteeing 80 percent of the mortgage, through the F. H. A., with the bank transacting the business. H. O. L. C. is but a skeleton of its former self. However, thousands of home owners will look back upon it as the Heaven-sent agency that saved their dwellings.

N. R. A.

This was a quickly thrown together plan that was bound to acquire some of the imperfections inherent to hasty organization. When it came into being, the crisis was too acute to permit of much deliberation. The Supreme Court has since killed N. R. A., but we can think of it in terms of the ballad, "You will miss me when I'm gone." Many small-business men who threw their hats in the air at its passing have since wished that they had at least a portion of it back. England thought enough of it to copy a number of its features. The Washington correspondent to a Philadelphia Republican paper, the Evening Ledger, recently reflected this in his column: He reported an interview with a businessman who said, "We hailed the passing of N. R. A., but I'd give a lot to have about 40 percent of it back again. It did much to stop cutthroat practices in my business." When the Supreme Court killed the N. R. A. it opened the door for the return of child labor. In some families in this country the child is the only employed person in the household. Right now in Philadelphia, strike pickets walk in front of the stores of a large grocery chain. Immediately after the N. R. A. decision of the Supreme Court this chain increased hours. Then it chopped wages and the clerks formed a union that affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Here was unionism, not for agitation but for protection of the employees. Ask these clerks if they hail the Supreme Court's N. R. A. decision. Ask yourself if we can always depend upon big business to regulate itself and measure up to its civic responsibilities.

It is interesting to note the fate of the Schechter Bros., who instituted the famous "sick chicken" proceedings that eventuated in the demise of the Blue Eagle. They have failed in business and have been unable to save their aged father's home. They and their attorney, in an interview, agreed that there was much good in the N. R. A. Let us look at the accomplishment of the reactionaries in their successful fight against the National Recovery Administration. Cutthroat practices have returned to business, child labor is back with us, longer hours and reduced pay is the order in many places. Are these what made the Liberty Leaguers so gleeful when the Blue Eagle was interred? Well, that is what we got with the passing of N. R. A. The victory is theirs and they are welcome to it. Ask the textile manufacturer and worker in my district if he would like to have the N. R. A. Since its passing they have been thrown into serious competition with other areas which employ child labor and who view adult wages in a different light from we in Philadelphia. They now contend that national legislation is imperative if the textile industry in the North is to be saved.

A. A. A.

Many people place the beginning of the depression at the point where farm prices began their downward move. Any business such as agriculture, which employs one-third of the Nation's workers, must thrive if the mills of industry are to be kept busy. High European tariffs, some of them retaliatory against the high rates set by the Smoot-Hawley schedules, precluded any chance of marketing our huge surpluses abroad. The farmer was ruining himself by the very abundance of his product. Manufacturers within a given industry had long since cooperated with each other in limiting production for the good of all concerned. We looked upon it as a sensible and logical thing for them to do. The farmers being geographically detached, producers lacked ready means of getting together to form the same kind of production agreements. But their problem was absolutely identical with that of the industrialists. Unable to do the required job for themselves, the administration, through A. A. A., accomplished for the agriculturists what the manufacturers could do on their own. We hear a lot of criticism of plowing under and crop restriction, and so forth, but the farmers liked A. A. A. and voted 6 to 1 for its retention. If you think it did not help business in general, ask the people who sell things to the farmer—the automobile, radio, implement manufacturers, and the mail-order houses. Read what the president of Montgomery-Ward, no lover of the New Deal, said at the stockholders' meeting. Said Mr. Sewell Lee Avery: "Hell, you're going to get your dividends. Here's a company that 4 years ago was ready to roll into the river, and every unit today is profitable." (Time, May 4, 1936.)

The farmer is a spender when he has money, and that means more employment for workers in our mills and factories. With the advent of A. A. A. one-third of the workers of America were taken out of the nonspending class and put in the market for goods. The A. A. A. was thrown out by the Supreme Court. The Court decreed that such a measure was in violation of State rights. Economists have been telling us for years that we must think of wheat, for example, in terms of world economy; that the price of wheat in the Argentine affects the price of the loaf of bread I eat in Philadelphia. The Court edict will not even permit us to consider wheat in the light of national economy, but compels us to view it from the standpoint of 48 separate economies.

With such a decision threatening to put a brake on the momentum gained through A. A. A. the soil-erosion bill was passed, which accomplishes the objective via conservation. When the farmer thrives industry hums, and much of the gains reported on the financial pages of our papers can be ascribed to the economic comeback of the man behind the plow. Criticize the legislation all you wish, Liberty Leaguers, but the financial reports of your own companies belie your criticism. The farmer is spending, and we in the Fifth District, Pennsylvania, find reflection of that in increased pay rolls and better business.

C. C. C.

In normal times a portion of a high school graduating class matriculated into college, while a fraction left school and was absorbed by business. With the acute economic situation, many of these boys of the "depression generation" were unable to find employment, and the family exchequer was not in condition to afford them a higher education. There was danger for America if these lads were compelled to spend their hours on street corners in idleness. That is how criminal gangs begin.

The C. C. C. took these young men to the out-of-doors, engaged them in healthful and useful work, and had them send a portion of their wages back to their families on relief. The tasks performed were of immediate and future usefulness—forest-fire prevention, flood control, soil and forest conservation. Not even a Liberty Leaguer can find anything to shoot at when it comes to C. C. C. This New Deal idea has met with universal acclaim.

W. P. A.

When a Liberty Leaguer speaks derisively of "boondoggling" he is losing sight of the principal purpose of Works Relief and W. P. A. This agency is accomplishing many needed improvements throughout the country but we should bear in mind that its chief aim is to take people off the relief rolls and put them to work, for the good of their morale and hence the good of America. While most of the projects have been in the construction field, an artist, an actor, a manicurist, and a violinist grow just as hungry when unfed as do persons engaged in construction or landscaping, and all of these people would rather perform some work for their money than accept a dole. Many a 50-year-old violinist would collapse in 1 day if you put him on the push end of a wheelbarrow, but he can help to bring joy to thousands if you place him in an orchestra with other musicians on relief. When he receives work relief he has lost none of his pride and feels infinitely better inside of him than when he was on a dole. The permanent value of W. P. A. work will be better appreciated after we have passed into normal business activity and have abandoned the program. Of course, we all like to think of the spectacular and efficient work performed by W. P. A. workers in the flood-stricken areas of Pennsylvania. Just a few short months ago they not only assisted in rescue work but prevented the spread of disease by immediately cleaning up the muck left by the receded waters.

Republican politicians in Pennsylvania are attempting to make a football of W. P. A. with the thought of accumulating political capital for November. They claim that the Democrats have used the agency for promoting their political ends. If that is so, most of our Pennsylvania Democratic Congressmen have been short-changed. From my observation, and with no definite data before me, I would say that there are many more Republicans on the W. P. A. pay roll in my city than Democrats. The President of the United States handed down the order to keep politics out of works relief and as far as is humanly possible this has been done in Philadelphia through Governor Earle's stand.

For years security racketeers have mulcted billions of dollars every year from American investors. Blue-sky laws have not afforded sufficient protection to the average person with money to invest and none too much knowledge of securities. The market crash of 1929 showed us that crooked manipulation could go on in high places. Confidence in securities was shattered by the dishonest methods of men who were once esteemed. That is the reason the administration suggested the creation of the Securities and Exchange Commission; to regulate the sale of securities, to license the vendors, and to look over their offerings before they became available to the public. There will never be such a thing as failure-proof securities, but the old piracy has passed and the racket boys will no longer be able to operate high, wide, and handsome.

As expected, the brokers and investment houses cried to high heaven when this legislation was passed. Since its operation many investment men have agreed that the enactment restored a much-needed confidence and dignity to their business among the public. The honest broker and investment house has nothing to fear, and the public enjoys a measure of protection that it never previously had. Business needs the investor's money for expansion and the investor requires good securities. It is important to America's development that a Government agency has at last set up sane regulation for the vendor and protection for the buyer. This is an example of New Deal corrective enactment.

SOCIAL SECURITY

If the Seventy-fourth Congress had enacted no other legislation, it would be long and favorably remembered for passage of social security. The depression wiped out many a nest egg that had been laid up against old age. The provident joined the improvident on the relief rolls when bank failures combined with building-and-loan collapses to wipe out the life savings that were accumulated for the declining years of life. Bewildered men and women felt that there was no such thing as security and that there was no safe place to put money. More than a few of the aged who have visited me in Philadelphia lost their all in the Hoover cataclysm of 1929–32. Were it not for the prospect of old-age pensions they would be faced with the almshouse instead of experiencing the comfort they saved for. If the Republican senate in my State will forget politics, the special session now in deliberation will coordinate Pennsylvania social security laws with the Federal and thereby double the number of aged who can be pensioned on the present State appropriation. Of my work in the last 2 years there is none of which I am prouder than that given to passage of this enactment for the old folks.

Under the act, too, practically all employees enjoy a plan heretofore confined to Federal employees and workers in some of the larger industries where private pension plans operate. A small percentage of their salaries will be set aside each month, and they will draw a pension when they retire from active employment. There is further security afforded the worker in the form of unemployment compensation. We all hail the way the enactment enables the Federal Government to cooperate with the States in taking care of the blind and of dependent children. Social security has taken the fear out of living for many of our people and has humanized government. A recent poll shows it to be one of the most popular of the New Deal measures. Roosevelt was no trail blazer in social security. We were a backward Nation in this particular, and he merely brought us up to date. Europe and even South America were ahead of us until the Seventy-fourth Congress brought up America on even terms.

BANKING

One of the most serious problems to confront the incoming administration in early March 1933 was the banking situation. While catastrophe came to our banking structure with a sickening impact, the contributing causes were strung out over a period that began with President Harding's administration. Unnoticed by the average American because of an alleged prosperity, these conditions became more accentuated in the Coolidge regime and arrived at their deadly climax under Hoover with the stock-market collapse in October 1929. The waning days of his administration saw confidence in our banking institutions utterly destroyed.

The Hoover formula was to restore assurance through mass meetings where depositors were requested not to withdraw accounts. This had the psychological effect of advertising the weakness of the situation and making more people conscious of it. But it was the best Mr. Hoover had to offer the depositor, futile though it was. The slightest rumor brought runs, and increasing failures of banks threw the public into panic. Lifetime savings were wiped out among the working classes, and many a businessman lost his bank balance overnight. Mortgages held by closed banks were soon called and the workingman had to quickly produce the money or lose the equity in the home he was struggling to buy. Many of these closed bank buildings stand as monuments in my district to the memory of Republican inaction in a desperate situation.

To cull the weak from the strong, to save what was left of the structure and restore confidence, President Roosevelt was forced to declare a bank holiday. This direct and immediate action both stunned and relieved the public mind. After many tense months of futility here at last was a man with a plan—a leader who was headed places. The banking situation was saved and with it the very bankers who now cry "regimentation" and the other mouthings of the Liberty League. With astuteness and vision, the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. J. F. T. O'Connor, has built upon the solid administration foundation, so that the banking situation is now more solid than ever before. To protect the depositor, particularly the workingman who sets aside a small sum from his earnings, and the small-business man, who comprise the backbone of our business life, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was organized. This affords protection through Government insurance to sums up to $5,000. At its inception a cry went up from big bankers who were compelled to pay for this insurance that it would create loose banking methods. The fallacy of their reasoning is proved by the record made during the last 3 years. Never before in our history was banking more secure nor our banks in such a favorable position. Let us scan the record. Whether or not we attribute it to deposit insurance, the Liberty Leaguers must reluctantly admit that failures have been fewer under Franklin D. Roosevelt than in any previous administration.

It is well to hark back to the long line of bank failures under Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover to properly appreciate the progress made under Roosevelt. The Harding record shows 91 failures in 3½ years, the Coolidge record shows 533 failures in 4½ years, the Hoover record shows 1,035 failures in 4 years, and the Roosevelt record shows 8 failures in 3 years. Of the eight failures during the present administration, five suspended in 1934–35. All deposit accounts up to $5,000 were insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. From November 1932 to March 4, 1933, during the Hoover regime, there were 101 national-bank failures, totaling deposits of $101,676,600. Compare this with the Roosevelt record. During the report year of 1934 only one national bank closed, with deposits of $41,950, and during 1935 only four with deposits of $5,398,802.

The facts are evident that the policy of this administration toward banking has not only brought confidence to the depositor but with it a solidarity to our banking system. Better than any words I can utter are the semiannual reports of banks that appear in the newspapers. They offer conclusive evidence of how the erstwhile sickly banks have regained their health.

I have outlined but a fraction of the Roosevelt accomplishments, but in a limited time I have tried to touch some of the high spots. It is not a pleasant task to take you over the ground of previous administrations, but in no other way can we properly gage the change in attitude and plan that has taken us from the very depths of depression to the high road of recovery. When we survey the Declaration of Independence and the Revolutionary War we must dig down to causes and events which had their culmination in our freedom from the mother country. So if we would understand what has been attempted and accomplished in our war on depression, we must first turn our minds back to the Coolidge era of false prosperity and trace through to the calamity that came under Hoover. Such experts as Babson and Walter Lippmann tell us that greed and avarice were in no small measure responsible for the catastrophe. They are only telling us what is very apparent—that prosperity cannot be long lived if any considerable portion of our public is underpaid. Leaving aside the valid Christianity back of this thought, we can see the common sense of it, to say nothing of the sound economics. We have seen the light—that purchasing power in the hands of many, spells work for all in this age of the machine and line production.

The Roosevelt administration has taken into combat this giant we know as machine production and has realized that wages paid by a corporation are very much the concern of all, because they have a direct bearing on your financial well-being and mine. Man has long since abandoned the idea that he is the helpless victim of gods and we are ready to cease believing that we must be blown here and there by the economic forces that prevailed in the past. If we cannot meet new conditions with new applications, we are stupid and deserve any fate that may befall us. It is agreed that what we need is a widely diffused purchasing power and we cannot secure it if we continue to look upon workingmen as "tools with life in them." It is heartening to see that some of our most successful corporations are those who have the most advanced and enlightened attitude toward employees.

You cannot and will not place a proper measuring rod on the Roosevelt program unless you realize that the whole world is now in transition and that many of the old formulas simply will not apply. Go back to the old order and you are breeding revolution. Evolve, go forward cautiously and fearlessly, and America will save democracy for future generations. In one of the European countries big-business men were among the chief backers of fascism. In our own country the plot to have a dictator "ride a white horse" into Washington was traced to the boys with the big money bags. The so-called "grass roots" conference in Georgia, the dissemination of literature designed to engender religious and racial prejudice "where it would do the most good", and other undercover tactics were traced to the same sources. This group of wrong-minded wealthy men represents the real underworld of today in America. It works with that deadliest of weapons—propaganda. Considering the wholesale manner in which blood has been spilled elsewhere, we must protect these very wealthy dissenters from themselves. As they clutch the vast sums which America gave them the opportunity to earn, they may lose all if we allow our Nation to turn back in its march of progress. As Pearl Buck said in the Good Earth, "When the rich get too rich and the poor get too poor, something always happens."

Franklin Delano Roosevelt captured my imagination and catapulted me into a congressional seat. My enthusiasm for the great leader is not one whit less than when he first appeared on the Presidential horizon. So that all may know and all may read, I say now that I am in this war for duration, too, come what may. We have the leader that Providence has given us. Let us honor this and following generations by following him.

FARM RELIEF—AN APPRECIATION OF HON. W. C. LANKFORD

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Washington as a new Member of Congress nearly 4 years ago, I found a good friend of my people and of the common folks everywhere, as well as my good personal friend, Judge Lankford of Georgia, serving his last days as a Member of this body, unless his people should elect him again. I had met him out in the good State of Idaho, when he was endeavoring to help my people solve their problems, and where Mr. Lankford showed himself to be the friend of the farmers and common people, not only of his own district, but of the whole Nation.

I was very much impressed by the last speech Judge Lankford made as a Member of Congress on March 3, 1933, in which he discussed practically every phase of the numerous problems of the farmer, the laboring man, and the common people, pointing out that these good people must be saved if this Nation is to long endure. He said the solution of their problems and the problems of their children will at once bring about the solution of all the problems of all the people and of the whole Nation. Judge Lankford's every sentence, as he pleaded for the children of the Nation, showed that he felt with Hans Christian Andersen that—

> The best love man can offer
> To a God of Love, be sure,
> Is mercy to God's little ones
> And kindness to God's poor.

Having met Judge Lankford in my home State of Idaho, I was especially impressed when, in his last speech in Congress, he said:

> I had the privilege of visiting the great West on three occasions during my service here as a Member of Congress and once prior thereto, and learned to love those people who live out there on the wonderful, magnificent Pacific coast. I found that out there they have great mountains, great trees, and great men and women.

Further along in his discourse Judge Lankford said:

> I learned to love those people out West, and I found that they have the same kind of problems that we in the South have.

In speaking of his love for this country and for country folks, Judge Lankford said:

> The best people in all the world live out in the country, away from the big cities. Out in the woods the birds sing more sweetly, the flowers are prettier, the sunrise and sunset are more entrancing. The skies are bluer, the stars are brighter, and heaven and earth are nearer. Out there are men and women and children and God.

While Judge Lankford is now out of Congress, he is still very much interested in his folks in his district, especially the farmers and average folks. Only the other day, while I was discussing the farm problem with him, he said:

> The trouble with the present farm program is that it provides too much for the land and not enough for the man.

Further discussing the farmer and his troubles, Judge Lankford said:

> I am very much opposed to all forms of taxes on production, and especially do I object to processing taxes.

Judge Lankford pointed out that under the A. A. A. program the large landowner was rewarded for discharging tenants and for grabbing up little farms, forcing small country home owners from the farms and into abject poverty by taking large areas out of cultivation.

No farm-relief plan—

Said Judge Lankford—

> will be a success which does not have a strong tendency to stop ownership of large areas of land by single individuals and bring about more small farms owned, operated, and occupied by happy, prosperous, average farmers and their families.

Mr. Lankford let it be known that he is opposed to crop allotments unless there is coupled with them guaranty of farm prices and crop insurance. He further said:

If crop allotments are justified at all, they should be made to the man and not the land.

I am calling attention to these ideas on farm relief to show Mr. Lankford's special interest in this respect and in order that his suggestions may be preserved in the RECORD and receive careful consideration in connection with the farm problem. Regardless of whether Judge Lankford is right or wrong in these views, he is sincere in his effort to do the very best thing, not only for his district but for the whole Nation.

CONGRESSMAN TONRY'S REPORT TO THE PEOPLE OF THE EIGHTH CONGESSIONAL DISTRICT, WHICH EMBRACES THE SECOND, SIXTEENTH, AND NINTH ASSEMBLY DISTRICTS IN KINGS COUNTY

Mr. TONRY. Mr. Speaker, I believe the people of the Eighth Congressional District are entitled to know my complete record of achievement as their representative in the Halls of Congress during the years 1935 and 1936, so that they may judge for themselves whether I have served them faithfully and also that they may determine whether they desire to return me to Congress that I may serve them in the future as I have in the past.

This has been a most strenuous session. It has flayed the nerves of everyone. During this Seventy-fourth Congress, 11 of my colleagues in the House, including our beloved Speaker, and 5 Senators have prematurely passed away, largely caused through nerve-racking overwork. It has been most trying and exacting on us all.

I have worked in my Washington office on Sundays, holidays, and at least four evenings in each week until midnight in order to attend to my official duties, and to keep up with the growing demands of my district, which is the largest in the entire United States. I am not a doctor, nor a lawyer, nor a professional man, and I have spent my every hour in an endeavor to be of service to the people of my district. I have not belonged to any club, or played any golf, or attended any game of baseball, or gone to any races, or to any of the numerous entertainments in and around nearby Washington that are a constant attraction. And this in spite of the fact that being 42 years of age, I could derive a great deal of enjoyment from any of the aforementioned pastimes.

I have been so busy, Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to think of a campaign for reelection. I have assumed that if I would stay on the job and would actively and conscientiously perform my work well, my constituents would take care of me on primary and election days. I have diligently worked with but a single purpose, and that was to be of some real, lasting benefit to my constituents and my country. I have shirked no responsibility. I have even paid office help from my own pocket in an endeavor to keep abreast of the avalanche of mail which I receive daily in my Washington office from the people of my district.

My belief in social security was put into action when I worked for and voted for the following measures in Congress:

First. The banking act. Only four failures, as compared with some 1,300 under Hoover's administration.

Second. The Home Owners' Loan Act. Saving thousands of homes from falling under the sheriff's hammer.

Third. The Tonry bill, introduced and sponsored by myself, to help relieve the unemployment situation and to create a greater purchasing power for Mr. and Mrs. Citizen without inflating the currency or increasing taxation.

Fourth. National Securities Exchange Act, an act designed to keep the swindlers from gold bricking the people.

Fifth. Currency system. An act that prevents international bankers and the like from cornering the money market and creating depressions and panics.

Sixth. Enlarging the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which now also gives assistance to the little fellow.

Seventh. The Old Age Security Act—makes provisions for pensioning the old.

Eighth. Acts providing for the operation of various agencies, such as the C. C. C. camps, Public Works Administration activities, home building and repairs, and so forth.

Ninth. Guffey-Snyder Stabilization Act which gives labor certain rights in collective bargaining and wage adjustments.

Tenth. The Railroad Pension Act.

Eleventh. The Wagner-Connery Labor Act.

Twelfth. Legislation adjusting tariff to the effect that we now have a greater tariff income.

Thirteenth. The work-relief bill.

Fourteenth. Immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, commonly called the "bonus."

Fifteenth. To prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense, and promote peace.

Sixteenth. To repeal the Pink Slip Act.

Seventeenth. The National Youth Administration program.

As a veteran who served in the World War, I have diligently labored to secure justice wherever possible for the veterans of all wars, and voted for the bill restoring to the Spanish-American War veterans and their dependents rights taken away from them by the so-called Economy Act.

Mr. Speaker, my training, derived from 8 years as an assemblyman, from 5 years as an alderman, and from 2 years as a Congressman, compels me to be a supporter of our constitutional form of Government. I cannot and will not support any of these communistic or other "istic" phases of so-called government.

The people in my district want an opportunity to work for a living. My people do not want doles or hand-outs. My record in Congress indelibly stamps me as fighting for legislation that will give every man an opportunity to go out and make an honest living and earn an honest wage. I stand for legislation that does not discriminate when it comes to race, creed, religion, or condition of servitude. In fact, this Roosevelt administration has done more to break down the barriers that for years caused class distinction than any other administration.

The home owners, the laborers, the little-business man have received real, substantial help through the measures enacted by this Congress. These groups received promises for years and years, but never very much actual help until the Roosevelt administration started to function.

Youth—the young men and young women—has received substantial help during this administration. At the beginning of 1933 some 4,000,000 boys and girls were walking the streets and highways and byways. Today the number walking the streets is no longer in the millions.

In the Good Book it is written, "By their works ye shall know them."

My record as a Democrat and a Congressman is an open book, and I hope my record here in the Halls of Congress has met with the approval of the electorate in the second, ninth, and sixteenth assembly districts.

CELLER ANTILYNCHING BILL

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in the House of Representatives H. R. 148, a bill to assure persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching. In the next Congress I shall strive with might and main to have favorable action taken on this measure, to the end that it may be placed on the statute books of our country; for lynching is the most dreadful of all threats to our public and private safety; it is a death blow to our most sacred institutions.

The members of a lynching mob, as well as those who condone the action of the mob, violate many if not all of the rights guaranteed to each and every one of us by the Constitution. Unlawfully, the mob seizes and imprisons its victim, who is ordinarily taken from the custody of peace officers. Accusation is conviction. All rights of fair hearing and trial are brutally and summarily dismissed and denied. Usually by torture, the victim is driven to self-indictment.

And finally he is put to death, often with the community of young and old looking on, under circumstances hardly to be found in the annals of ancient savagery. Full of real meaning are the words of a great statesman, Senator COSTIGAN, of Colorado, who terms lynching "open and boastful anarchy."

Lynchings are popularly supposed to result from the outraged public feeling following a criminal assault upon white women. A careful study of the circumstances surrounding lynchings proves that this is not so. Thus, out of 224 lynchings of the past 9 years, only 70 of the victims were accused of rape or attempted rape, 77 were accused of murder, and in at least 20 cases no definite accusation appeared. In other cases, accusations resulted from "not knowing his place" to "improper conduct and insulting language"; or from "acting as a witness against two white men charged with crime" to "insisting on eating in a restaurant when refused service."

We must accept this challenge of mob violence, and strip from the lyncher his false mask of being the "guardian of the chastity of womanhood" or of anything else. We must remember that public enemy number one is the lyncher and the lynching mob. The wave of mob hysteria that has resulted in many lynchings in our country has brought contempt upon America, its dignity, its good name, and its authority, and has discredited us the world over. We must call upon our public officials to use every power at their disposal to protect from mob anarchy the laws they are sworn to defend. We must call upon our religious leaders to cry aloud against this crime until it ceases to exist. We must call upon parents and teachers and upon all right-thinking men and women to do their utmost so that this crime may be completely eradicated.

It is often argued that lynching tends to deter irresponsible and criminal classes from further crime. This is not correct. What it does do is to destroy inevitably all respect for law and order. It represents a complete break-down of government and the triumph of anarchy. It brutalizes children who frequently witness its orgies, and particularly the youth, who are usually conspicuous participants. In its indiscriminative haste for revenge, the mob ofttimes takes the lives of innocent persons, and not infrequently inflicts death for very minor offenses.

Those who condone lynching, and even attempt to defend it, argue that its motive is a basic sense of justice, an outraged community arising in arms, and so forth. It is nothing of the kind. The lynching spirit has little of anything to do with justice, basically or otherwise. A lynching mob does not want justice; it wants blood. It is ofttimes composed of petty cowards bent on killing another human being, but who have not the courage to carry out their desires until they are collected en masse.

One of the chief difficulties in the way of passing a Federal antilynching law is the attitude of many Members of Congress in regard to the constitutionality of such a measure. These Congressmen either hold or hide behind the opinion that lynching is murder, and, therefore, they reason, the Federal Government has no more constitutional right to step into a State and punish lynching than it has to do likewise and punish murder. This analogy, however, between murder and lynching is not a true one. In murder, one or more individuals take life, generally for some personal reason. In lynching, a mob sets itself up in place of the State and acts in place of the processes of law to mete out death as a punishment to a person accused of a crime. The mob sets itself up as judge, jury, and executioner. In murder, the accused violates the law of the State. In lynching, the mob arrogates to itself the powers of the State and the functions of the Government. It is, therefore, not only against the act of killing that the Federal Government should exercise its powers, but also the act of the mob in arrogating to itself the functions of the State and substituting its actions for the due processes of law.

Some Members of Congress are opposed to antilynching legislation because of their views on States' rights. Whatever may be our views in this regard, we must recognize the fact that under present-day conditions, in the solution of national questions, State boundaries are becoming less and less distinct. This change is due to social development, to science and invention, and rests upon the closer relations of trade and amity which exist between communities and the different States. More and more the national resources are called upon for the making of local improvements within the several States and for the relief of their population from economic and physical distress. The National Government, therefore, should not be denied an interest and a voice in preventing, in any part of the country, recurrence of mob insurrection which destroy the security of the National Government and which undermine the strength of the national credit and of the national institutions. Ofttimes lynching mobs cross State lines. In such cases there should be no doubt of Federal jurisdiction. Certain it is, the mind of Congress, in the face of this menace, should not be helpless. Something should and must be done.

Of course, legislation alone cannot quench the fires of intolerance and of hate; and passage of the bill which I have introduced will not of itself put an end to the wave of banditry, lynching, and kidnaping that has threatened our security. It is my hope and belief, however, that the speedy passage of a Federal antilynching bill will rally and sustain all the forces of enlightenment in the United States and will arouse public opinion amongst right-thinking people in their courageous battle against the scourge of lynching in their midst. My bill may not be perfect. It may have constitutional flaws. It can at least serve as a basis of discussion and hearings before my Judiciary Committee.

That there has been some progress in the determination of an aroused citizenry to rid itself of this evil is to be found in the fact that, although lynching and mob violence under the common law had no technical significance, nevertheless statutes have made lynching a crime sui generis in six States—Alabama, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina. The same is true of mob violence in four States—Illinois, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and West Virginia. Four States have provisions for accessorial liability—Alabama, Indiana, Kansas, and Kentucky. Kentucky also provides penalties for attempted lynching.

So great is the national concern as regards lynching that the President has felt called upon to denounce this "vile form of collective murder" and to berate its apologists. Thus, about 14 months ago, following the lynching of two youths at San Jose, Calif., when the Nation was shocked and indignant over the endorsement by the then Governor of that State of mob ruthlessness, President Roosevelt unreservedly denounced lynching as "collective murder" and declared: "We do not excuse those in high or low places who condone lynch law."

Let us follow the lead of our enlightened leader in the White House. Let us urge upon Congress the vital importance of this legislation. Let us once and for all times do away with this horrible lynching blot on the pages of American history.

PARTIAL REVIEW OF ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION AND SOCIAL-SECURITY LEGISLATION

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, if I were to review the record of the Roosevelt administration and present the facts to people of my district, I could easily enough pick out any one of a score of major measures which are now law and on this basis alone appeal to the people of my district for their support in the coming campaign.

To think, Mr. Speaker, that under the H. O. L. C. more than a million homes were saved for our distressed citizens; that countless farms were saved from foreclosure; the low interest rate of 3½ percent was made available to the farmers; 15,000 impaired banks were put on a sound basis, reopened, and again made available for two score or more millions of depositors. Following the bank crash of the Hoover administration the pay-off in full of millions of depositors became the problem which was satisfactorily solved by the Roosevelt administration. Enactment of the social-security law and its provisions for the care of the aged, the blind, and the handicapped, and assistance to the widows and orphans; unemployment insurance; payment of the soldiers' bonus; reciprocal trade agreements; guarantee of bank deposits; and too many other important measures to discuss at length, all of which were intended for the benefit of the great mass of our people and for the restoration of prosperity, were made law.

However, Mr. Speaker, I want to say clearly and definitely that I am not satisfied with our accomplishment thus far. Above all else it is our hope and prayer that we may amend the social-security law in such a way as to increase the Federal allowance to the States from $15 to at least $20 per month. This in turn would increase the average paid to the individual pensioner by the Federal Government and the State to double that amount. I am hopeful that the old-age pension law can be further amended to reduce the 65-year limit to 60 years so as to include within the provisions of the law more of our worthy aged citizens.

I intend to advise with members of the State legislature and the gubernatorial candidates with the hope that we may liberalize the law in the State of Michigan which, as it now stands, is grossly inadequate in that it bars from participation many who in all fairness should be on the pension rolls.

One of the pressing needs of the Nation, as I see it, is the reduction of interest rates on home loans. I realize that we are confronted with possible constitutional objections, but insofar as it is possible, the problem of bringing about reduced interest rates to distressed home owners is the problem of the incoming Seventy-fifth Congress.

The most vexing and pressing problem of the hour, as I see it, is the question of unemployment. Since machinery has replaced millions of men and women in industry, it appears to me that the only solution of overcoming unemployment lies in a sharp reduction of working hours without reducing the pay of the worker. In other words, we must provide the worker with a saving wage. The rights of labor too must be protected to the fullest possible extent. In the development of machinery and mass production the worker as well as the employer is entitled to his fair share. The Robinson-Patman bill, which passed the House but is not as yet a public law, was intended to protect the consumer and the independent merchant. It is without a doubt a step in the right direction. However, it will be necessary to correct and strengthen the law as soon as experience points to the flaws and weaknesses of the measure. I am in hearty accord with the principles set forth in this bill. I was privileged to serve with Mr. PATMAN as a member of the steering committee.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me state that I have been an advocate of liberal old-age pensions long before it became popular to do so. I feel that it is not only a matter of moral obligation for us to make ample provision for our worthy aged citizens, but I insist that the old folks of this country, the builders of this Nation, have a right to expect security in old age and all that it means in happiness and contentment. I pledge myself to work continuously for the liberalization of such progressive laws as have been enacted by this administration, and for the enactment of such further laws as will complete the plans of this administration.

I am certain that the people of this Nation understand the difficulty of correcting the sins of the past 12 years in less than one-third of that time. This work, well started under Roosevelt, must be finished by direction of and under President Roosevelt.

REMARKS CONCERNING AN EFFORT TO UNDERMINE CONGRESSIONAL SUPPORT FOR THE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. TONRY. Mr. Speaker, there are some within the Democratic Party who seek to undermine the remarkable work undertaken by our President by boring from within. A typical example of this treachery has come forward in the district I am privileged to represent.

The Eighth Congressional District, New York, has more voters than any other congressional district in the United States. By depriving the administration of this support it is possible to embarrass the President during the coming election. The leader of the ninth assembly district, Mr. McGee, is endeavoring to do this by preventing the administration from receiving the support I am able to give it. Mr. McGee has designated his tool, Mr. O'Toole, as nominee for Congress.

No one can criticize my record in Congress without attacking the policies of President Roosevelt. I have consistently voted to support the President's program to create a new era for the poor and middle classes. The movement to supplant me in Congress is prompted by motives unworthy of a true Democrat.

For the past 15 years I have been an elected legislator acting for the best interests of my constituents. I have been free to cast my vote where I thought it would be of most benefit to those I represent. Petty local politics never influenced my voting for measures to further enrich the privileged few.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to warn the Democratic Members of Congress to beware of those wearing the cloak of Democracy but at heart aiming to unseat worthy Democratic Congressmen who wholeheartedly supported our President and the administration and have every right to expect to be returned to office.

EXPLANATION OF THE TWENTIETH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, having received many inquiries relative to the twentieth amendment to the Constitution—"lame duck" amendment—as it will affect the time and method of the election of President and Vice President, I am making a statement which will make clear the change of time and method of electing and inaugurating Presidents and Vice Presidents of the United States. In doing this, I am quoting the Federal statutes relative thereto, in the hope that I will be able to answer many questions which have arisen in the minds of the people relative to this question.

One of the very substantial possible changes which might affect the election of a President is that whereas prior to the ratification of the twentieth amendment the old House of Representatives, elected 2 years before, would have the privilege of electing the President should it go to the House; while under the new twentieth amendment the House of Representatives elected next November 3 would elect the President.

The twentieth amendment to the Constitution, which became effective on October 15, 1933, is the third constitutional provision relating to the term of the President and the selection of the person to hold that high office.

Section 1 of article II of the Constitution, as originally adopted, fixed the term of President at 4 years, provided that the selection of the President should be by electors chosen in each of the several States in such manner as the respective legislatures should direct, and by the third clause of this section defined in the following language how the electors should proceed in making their selection:

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner choose the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them by ballot the Vice President.

It is obvious from this that it was not in the minds of the persons who drafted this original clause that the voters of the Nation should express a choice for President but that they should delegate to electors chosen by them the power and responsibility of naming the person to fill the highest office in the land.

When it became necessary in 1801 for the House of Representatives to choose the President under this clause of the Constitution it is apparent that confusion arose as to the Vice President, for, while the House made its selection from among the five highest on the list of candidates for whom electors had voted, the person having the second highest number of votes, in the absence of a tie for second place on the list, was the choice for Vice President. This was immediately corrected, for an amendment was proposed on December 12, 1803, which was proclaimed as the twelfth amendment to the Constitution on September 25, 1804, reading as follows:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; the President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

While this amendment permits the present practice which pledges the appointed electors to a previously nominated candidate for President and a candidate for Vice President, giving each the same number of electoral votes, it seems that for some years after its adoption the electors were not so pledged, for in 1825 the House was called upon to select a President even though a Vice President was duly elected in the electoral college, and in 1837 the Senate named a Vice President after the votes of the electors named the President.

Although there was no mention prior to the adoption of the twelfth amendment of the date for the commencement of the President's term, the "two Houses of the first Congress, after examination, found that by provisions made in the Federal Convention and by the Continental Congress, the term of the first President began March 4, 1789." Up to this time, therefore, each fourth anniversary of that date has been the recognized date for the inauguration of a new President.

In the early days of the new Government, because of the uncertainty of the mails, the practice was established of having a messenger from each State, usually one of the electors in that State, carry to the seat of the Government and deliver in person to the President of the Senate the certified lists of the ballots cast by the electors at their regular meeting. These certificates were counted in the hall of the House of Representatives at 1 p. m. on the second Wednesday of February succeeding every meeting of electors. This is a special joint session of the two Houses of Congress for the purpose of making the electoral count, and up to the present time this has been the date observed in making the electoral count and declaring the election of each President since Washington. There have from time to time been changes in the law prescribing the details of procedure in transmitting the certificates and the procedure at the county, which at this time are immaterial.

The twentieth amendment was proposed by the Congress on the 3d day of March 1932, and was declared a part of the Constitution of the United States by the Secretary of State on February 6, 1933. It reads:

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President-elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice-President-elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President-elect nor a Vice-President-elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

It will be noted that the prime effect of this amendment is to change the dates for the commencement of the terms of President, of Vice President, and of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. By the action of the Continental Congress and the Federal Convention, which fixed the beginning of the term of the President under the new Constitution as March 4, 1789, the commencement of the terms of Senators and Representatives was also fixed. By reason of this and of the constitutional provision that the Congress should meet on the first Monday in December of each year, there existed what was known as a "lame duck" session in each Congress, in which Members defeated at the previous election served. It was, therefore, the old Congress which would participate in the choosing of President and Vice President should that right devolve upon the House and the Senate, respectively.

President Roosevelt was the first President to be elected subject to the provisions of the twentieth amendment, so that, in fact, he is the first President to serve a full term which will be less than 4 full years, for his term which began on March 4, 1933, will end on January 20, 1937. Members of Congress served a shorter term than 2 years in the Seventy-third Congress from March 4, 1933, to January 3, 1935.

The existing Federal statutes prescribing the procedure for the choosing of a President and a Vice President provide:

1. That the electors shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice President.

2. That the number of electors shall be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which the several States are by law entitled.

3. The electors in each State shall meet and give their votes on the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December next following their appointment.

4. Contests concerning the appointment of electors shall be determined at least 6 days prior to the time of their meeting.

5. The executives of each State, as soon as practicable after the conclusion of the appointment of electors, shall communicate by registered mail under the seal of the State to the Secretary of State of the United States a certificate setting forth the names of the electors, and shall deliver to the electors on or before the date of their meeting six duplicate originals of this certificate under the seal of the State. The Secretary of State of the United States shall transmit copies of all certificates received at the State Department to both Houses of the Congress at the first meeting of the Congress thereafter.

6. The electors shall vote for President and Vice President, respectively, in the manner directed by the Constitution.

7. The electors shall make and sign six certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

8. The electors shall seal up the certificates so made by them and certify upon each that the lists of all the votes of such State given for President and of all the votes given for Vice President are contained therein.

9. The six certificates so made shall be disposed of as follows:

(a) One shall be sent by registered mail to the President of the Senate.

(b) Two shall be deposited with the secretary of state of the State, one to be held subject to the order of the President of the Senate, the other to be kept for 1 year as a public record.

(c) Two shall be forwarded by registered mail on the day after the meeting to the Secretary of State of the United States, one to be held subject to the order of the President of the Senate, the other to be kept for 1 year as a public record.

(d) One shall be delivered to the Federal judge of the district in which the electors assembled.

10. If no certificate has been received from any State by the President of the Senate or by the Secretary of State of the United States by the fourth Wednesday in December after a meeting of electors, the copy deposited with the secretary of state of the State shall be called for by the President of the Senate or by the Secretary of State of the United States, and shall be forwarded forthwith by registered mail.

11. If no certificate has been received at the seat of government from any State by the fourth Wednesday in December after a meeting of electors, the President of the Senate, or, in his absence, the Secretary of State, shall despatch a special messenger to the Federal judge in that district with whom a certificate has been lodged, who shall transmit the certificate by the messenger sent.

This procedure for effecting the transmission of the results of votes cast by electors to the seat of government was established by the act of March 29, 1928, and was first followed in the election that year.

Under the twentieth amendment and the statute enacted pursuant thereto, the two Houses of Congress meet in joint session to count the electoral votes on January 6, following a meeting of electors, at the hour of 1 p. m. The President of the Senate presides. The tellers, after listing the votes, shall deliver the result to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and such announcement shall be sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice President of the United States.

CONGRESS SHOULD PROTECT THE INDEPENDENT OIL MEN OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE OIL INDUSTRY OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, the Ways and Means Committee has now under consideration H. R. 10483, introduced by Hon. W. E. DISNEY. To the provisions of that bill and the necessity of its enactment I wish to call the attention of the House.

I speak particularly on behalf of the people of my own district, the Twentieth Pennsylvania, and on behalf of the people in what is known as the Pennsylvania oil field, which includes 18 counties of western Pennsylvania, a small area of southwestern New York, and extends into eastern Ohio and the northwestern part of West Virginia. The oil industry in this territory centers in my district. In each of my six counties the production of oil is an important industry, and in four of them it is the major industry. In Venango and Warren Counties the largest manufacturing industry is the refining of oil. My district has been the center of oil production and oil refining of the world since the oil business began 75 years ago. Wherever oil is produced and processed the people know and have heard of Oil City, Franklin, Emlenton, Warren, Titusville, and Bradford, and from all points of the world the oil industry looks to those towns for the guidance and leadership which through all the years have never failed.

In the Pennsylvania oil counties we have one-third of the population of my State.

The Pennsylvania oil producers and oil refiners are known as independents. Many thousands of small farmers and landowners in Pennsylvania derive an income from the royalties on the oil pumped from their premises. This oil comes from about 80,000 oil wells. The amount produced from each well is so small that they have to be pumped, yet the oil is of superior quality, and we are proud to think that Pennsylvania grade fixes the standard of quality on which price classifications are based throughout the world.

In Pennsylvania we have about 30 independent refineries, which are in competition with the large refineries of the United States and many of the refineries of the world.

While the amount of oil produced from any well is small, the total amount in the year means in many instances the one certain ready-cash income that our small mountain farmers have. In many sections the average production of a well is less than one-third of a barrel a day. The royalty has always been one-eighth of the value of the oil produced. With oil selling at $2.25 or $2.40 a barrel—remembering that it takes from 4 to 8 days to produce a barrel from a single well—you can readily see that the amount the landowner receives is small, but he is sure of that much money. Many of our farmers look today to oil royalties as the source from which to pay their taxes.

When the price of oil is lowered and the producer in my territory has to face foreign competition, that meager income of the landowner is cut off, and frequently the oil has to be produced at a loss to the operator for the reason that if the wells are not regularly pumped the subterranean salt water soaks through and holds the oil back and ruins the wells.

I am advised that we have 30,000 men employed in the production and refining of oil in Pennsylvania—about two-thirds in the production. These are the men to whom the continued prosperity of the oil industry means something. While the few dollars a month the farmer receives in royalties does not affect materially the economic structure of our communities, the amount of money spent for wages is most important. Three years ago the pay rolls for the men out in the oil fields of Pennsylvania were $562,000 a month. In July 1934, under the workings of the Petroleum Code, the monthly pay roll had increased to $898,100—an annual pay roll in 1934 in that territory of almost $11,000,000. The 30 independent refiners in our field employ about 4,300 men. In 1934 they paid out in wages $30,000,000.

Here is the trouble our independent oil producers must face: The large producers control four branches of the oil industry. They control production in the world's great fields, transportation through pipe lines, refining, and marketing through the world's financial centers. We have the production, and we have the refining, but we do not have the transportation or the marketing in our field. A larger company interested heavily in foreign oil fields and in transportation may lose on production and yet make money in transportation through its pipe lines, and so control the market that at the end of the year it has a profit, and by manipulating the part of the business in which the independents cannot successfully compete they may entirely wipe out the independents.

For the reasons I have indicated the people in my district and in the 18 counties of Pennsylvania for which I speak, as well as the people of the adjacent parts of Ohio, New York, and West Virginia, want the Disney bill, H. R. 10483, enacted. We should be protected by an excise tax of 1 cent a gallon on imported oil and particularly we feel that the limitation of imports provided in section 3 of the bill should be written into the law of the United States.

This bill if enacted would enable the domestic petroleum industry to employ an increased number of workers whose pay is much higher than the average rate paid in many other industries. It would enlarge the consuming power of the oil-producing regions and we could thus continue to be important and more profitable customers of the industrial and manufacturing communities of our own and other States.

Section 1 of the Disney oil bill repeals the exemption from payment of excise tax of 1 cent a gallon now enjoyed by importers of oil for fuel purposes on ships, or what is known as "bunker oil." Through this exemption the Federal Treasury lost over $2,000,000 in 1935, and over $1,600,000 in 1934, and about half that sum in the last 6 months of 1933, the period when it first became effective. The consumers of this fuel oil have not benefited from this exemption. The price of bunker oil has risen steadily and it is apparent that the large concerns engaged in this importation are making that much more profit, for we do not learn that the cost of production has increased in any of the foreign oil fields from which they import it. Three years ago bunker oil was sold in New York at 75 cents a barrel. It steadily increased month by month until it reached the price of $1.20 per barrel in December 1933, and in March 1934 the price was $1.30. For the last year it has been selling at about $1.05. The purchasers of oil "for supplies of vessels" are paying 40 percent more for their oil than they were paying when oil "for supplies of vessels" was subject to the same tax as fuel oil imported for other purposes.

These giant importers of bunker oil are not subjected to the taxes which are carried today by every branch of the petroleum industry. They make no contribution whatever to the expenses of government, although they enjoy our market and take an undue proportion of the business, leaving on the domestic producer the burden of local, State, and Federal taxes.

Wages of labor constitute a large proportion of the cost of the oil industry. These importers pay nothing to the American workingman. They enjoy an exemption of tax and they deprive the American producer of his share of the market.

These are some of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why this measure should be enacted into law.

CELLER'S PROTEST AGAINST GERMAN PERSECUTION OF CATHOLICS AND JEWS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the present intolerable persecution of the Catholics in Hitlerland dismays and frightens all liberty-loving and fair-minded people. With seemingly unabated strength, the Nazi misgovernment continues its fiendish attack on those religious minorities within its borders who have committed the "grave sin" of espousing a faith other than the pagan faith of the Nazis.

To reach their final goal, one people, one Reich, one faith, based on a dictum of blood, race, soil, and the deification of the state, those who now rule in Germany are attempting to stamp out and to crush all religious freedom of their compatriots.

This reversion to medieval methods and a supposedly outworn point of view forces us to the discouraging, but none the less inescapable, conclusion that in some parts of the world little real progress has been made since the Dark Ages.

To us, here in America, intolerance of any kind is especially obnoxious. The United States was founded essentially as a free country, based on principles of complete personal freedom in all phases of daily life. This is an integral part of our American birthright. It is therefore with great horror that we witness the reversion to barbarism that now exists in Germany.

The present Nazi attack on the Roman Catholic clergy of that country, in which charges of immorality have been made against a large number, is another brutal assault on an innocent people. It is but another step which began in 1933, June 4, when the Nazis dissolved the Catholic Center Party. During the same year of 1933 many Catholics were victims of the Nazi terror. Members of the Catholic group were constantly molested by the Hitler youth group and their activities curtailed; priests criticizing the Hitler youth movement were jailed; Catholic priests, nuns, and monks were persecuted and prosecuted on charges of smuggling foreign exchange out of the Reich. It is estimated that the total fines imposed on Catholic charitable and monastic orders for such smuggling amounted to about 5,000,000 marks. Moreover, the Nazis have purposely made great issue of the trials and have endeavored to discredit Catholicism and to prove to the German people that Catholic priests and leaders are enemies of the Third Reich. Surely we cannot, we should not, remain silent in the face of such rapine, plunder, and cruelties inflicted upon the Catholics by the Nazis.

The Catholic Church in Germany is denied juridical personality. It cannot freely determine who shall be its representatives. No land or endowments can be held. No schools for training priests are permitted, nor popular schools of primary, secondary, or normal grade allowed. Appointments to the ministry may be made only to the number permitted by the state. Representatives of the church cannot vote, hold office, participate in political meetings, or seek publicly or privately the modification of the religious clauses of the constitution. The right of assembly, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press are abridged. Papers defending the church are denied use of the mails. Except for limitations such as these—and the list is not complete—the church is "free." What irony! What a tragedy!

Sadder still is the plight of the Jew in Germany. An outcast in the land of his birth, the German Jew today lives in a veritable ghetto. If he was in the service of the state, he has been dismissed. If he was a member of the liberal professions, his privileges have been taken, his practice ruined. If he was an artisan, he has been cast out of the guild and goes begging for a master. If he is a worker of hand or brain, he is denied admission to the labor front and thus can hardly find a day's work. If he is a student, he is segregated, "Jim Crowed", denied accommodation altogether. Attempts to turn to agriculture are not permitted. Jewish agricultural schools have been closed. Even trade is no longer fully open to the German Jew. Not only will no good German traffic with him, but a recent decree forbids renewal of the licenses of Jewish traveling salesmen, depriving about 30,000 additional Jews of a livelihood. Administrative regulations define the extent to which Jews are to be permitted to engage in every economic activity. Herr Hitler has already warned that should this administrative process fail of "satisfactory" results, the "Jewish question" will be entirely "turned over" to the Nazi Party. It is not difficult to surmise what this will mean.

Only where the Jew is indispensable do the Nazis still tolerate him. Dr. Theodor Lewald, for example, a gentleman of mixed Aryan and Jewish origin, continues as president of the Olympic Games Committee. Doubtless he will last no longer than is necessary to fulfill his task of making sure the Olympic Games are held in Germany. Perhaps, too, under the protecting wings of Dr. Schacht there is still to be found a man of Jewish descent. And it is not impossible that the army itself hides an officer who has not yet been dismissed for the sin of having a Jewish grandmother. One privilege only has been left to the German Jew, that of serving in the army of his Nazi benefactors, of entering the labor battalions, and one day, perhaps, dying for the glory of the Third Reich.

One of the most pathetic aspects of the Nazi Jewish program is the plight of the non-Aryan children. Westbrook Pegler, outstanding correspondent, sets forth the tragedy of the Jewish child in the following vivid language:

> It will be impossible for the Nazi Germans of the present time to deny the atrocities which are being perpetuated on the children of the Jews under the orders of Adolf Hitler as a policy of the German Government. * * * It is absolutely certain that their (Jewish) childhood, the few hours of innocence which are given to all of us and which civilized people try to invest with beauty and joy, have been destroyed by a man with a mustache who has been seriously nominated by some of his followers not for king, not merely for ruler, but for God, the redeemer of the German race. It would be a mistake to call him a baby killer. You can't torture a dead child.

In another article Mr. Pegler calls the Jewish children "the most pathetic victims of Hitler's Nazi regime."

> Their souls—
> He writes—
> will be crossracked with a thousand cuts, for they will never know anything in childhood but insults to themselves and the foulest aspersions on the only adults to whom they can turn for comfort—their parents and other relatives.

The disgraceful anti-Catholic and anti-Jewish campaign in Germany is indeed a black spot in the history of Germany. Hitler and his gang of savages apparently overlook the fact that all countries that harass any religious group finally come to grief. Civilizations that have arisen by attacking minorities finally crumble to the dust. The Caesars tortured and burned Christians at the stake. They are no more. The Russian czars pillaged the Jew and encouraged pogroms. The czars are no more. The Hapsburgs lent a deaf ear to the pleas of the oppressed, and they are no more. For, as has been proved by history in the past, unfair and unwarranted persecution merely serves to stimulate and increase the natural ardor for freedom and religion; it strengthens and spurs on the oppressed until the tyrant is destroyed. Likewise will it be with the present regime in Germany.

In the meantime, however, the goings-on in Germany we may regard as a definite threat to the security of our own freedom, not merely where religion is concerned, but personal liberty of every kind; for it is an established fact that hate or prejudice or intolerance never remains limited to a small portion of existence—either it is overthrown completely and liberalism takes its place, or it grows and strengthens its hold until it has choked liberty everywhere and from every possible angle.

For this reason I have introduced in the House of Representatives House Joint Resolution 381, to prohibit the allotment of funds for the participation of American athletes in the Olympic Games to be held in Germany, and House Resolution 368, to authorize the Judiciary Committee of the House to make an appropriate investigation so that remedial legislation might be devised to protect American investors with reference to German credits and debits, and in regard to the arbitrary conversion of dollar debts into blocked mark credits in Germany.

There are two weapons to use against Germany; one is the boycott. The people of the world—of all races, creeds, and colors—must unite in a boycott of Germany and German products. The nations of the world must unite in a program of economic sanctions against the Reich. The second is insistence that Germany repay American holders of German obligations, with refusal of any extensions and renewals of loans or any new loans. Upon failure (after peremptory demand) to pay the loans in a reasonable time all moneys or assets in this country due Germany or German subjects shall be seized and applied to payment of German debts.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the Congress passed the National Housing Act less than 2 years ago with a two-fold expectation; that, on the one hand, it would contribute to recovery of employment and business in the building trades and the heavy-goods industries; and that, on the other hand, it would aid the families of America to achieve better homes and better living standards for themselves and their children. The situation at that time was urgent. Millions of unemployed workers were praying for work, that they might once more have jobs and be able to provide decently for their wives and children. The housing of vast numbers of our families had been disgracefully bad even in 1929, and with the shutting off of new building during the depression it was rapidly becoming worse. Millions of families that had been striving for years to find wholesome surroundings in which to give their children a fair start in life found themselves frustrated and had to retreat. The National Housing Act aimed to reinforce the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in stemming the tide of defeat and to rally the forces of recovery.

The Federal Housing Administration was established to accomplish these great purposes, through a temporary measure, the modernization credit insurance plan and a permanent measure, the mutual mortgage insurance system. These measures are bringing private capital into direct use, right here and now. The Federal Housing Administration lends no money, it acts by insuring private lending institutions against loss.

Mr. Speaker, I have been requested by many Members of the House to inquire into the operations and results of this great undertaking, and to give them a brief outline of my findings. At all points I have endeavored to penetrate behind the statistics to determine what effect the activities of the Federal Housing Administration are having upon the lives of the people. One million modernization loans insured by April 30 last, having a total value of $365,000,000, may seem like a dry statistic when stated in that way, but what it really means is that a million families are living in better homes, that millions of workers have received jobs or have brought home fatter pay envelopes, and that countless families in every community throughout the length and breadth of our Nation have had a boost and are looking forward to the future with renewed hope and energy. Sixty-four thousand mortgages accepted for insurance for a total of $260,000,000 under the mutual mortgage insurance plan is an impressively large figure. Most of the loans have been granted on more liberal terms, as to percentage of the value loaned and term in years, than have ever been granted before by the private lending institutions making the loans. But these figures alone do not begin to tell the story. You all know the good effects of vigorous, clean-cut competition, and that a business concern does not have to capture the entire trade in its field in order to benefit consumers generally. Just so the insuring of these mortgages has thawed out and successfully eased the whole home mortgage market, and has been a major factor in the revival in home building activity that is now one of the most conspicuous and wholesome features of present day business.

As evidence of accomplishment, we may first consider the recovery already made in the building and allied industries. In addition to the modernization work directly financed through Federal Housing Administration insured loans, a large volume of work has been stimulated by local better-housing campaigns and other voluntary activities carried out in cooperation with the Federal Housing Administration. The total work so generated has amounted to at least $1,500,000,000. Building permits for residential construction increased 172 percent during the 12 months ending March 30, 1936, as compared with the preceding 12 months. Such an increase during the first full year during which the mutual mortgage insurance plan was in effective operation is certainly outstanding. Shipments of construction materials in March 1936 were 42 percent higher than in March 1935, and were the highest for any corresponding month since 1930; employment in the production of six major construction materials was 16 percent higher in March 1936 than a year earlier, and was the highest for any March since 1930. Despite some falling off in certain other types of building, employment in the building trades was 15 percent higher in March this year than in March last year. From scores of communities throughout the Nation reports come in that all available skilled building-trades workers are employed and that home owners and others are having to wait their turn to employ them.

Mr. Speaker, this all means that men who have not had jobs for 1, 2, 3, and 4 years are now back in the ranks of the employed, back at the counters of stores buying merchandise, back in the market for all manner of goods and services. It means that millions of families, instead of living in houses that were progressively running down, are improving their homes. It means that once more, after a lapse of 6 or more years, the people of many of our cities are beginning to build enough houses to take care of the yearly increase in population and that the still larger programs required to better our standards are coming into view.

A second objective was to aid and encourage private capital investments in the home-mortgage field. The long-term, high-percentage home mortgage has been made a more suitable form of investment for banks, building and loan associations, insurance companies, and other financial institutions. More than 8,700 such institutions have sought and been granted approval as mortgagees under the mutual mortgage insurance plan. Of these, nearly half have submitted mortgages for insurance. The very fact that 47

States have enacted legislation permitting State-chartered financial institutions to invest in insured mortgages, coupled with similar provisions embodied in the National Housing Act applying to banks under Federal supervision, shows that sources of funds for amortized home mortgages have been greatly increased.

For 52 percent of the mortgages accepted on new construction, the ratio of principal to valuation is from 76 to 80 percent, and the ratio is 66 percent or greater in 83 percent of the cases. In view of the fact that prior to the passage of the National Housing Act, many classes of financial institutions were not permitted to make real-estate mortgage loans for more than 50 to 66 percent of the value, this record indicates a notable development. It shows definite progress away from the vicious types of second mortgage.

Some 71 percent of the mortgages on new construction are for terms from 17 to 20 years, and 92 percent of such mortgages are for terms of 13 or more years. Prior to the passage of the National Housing Act it was unusual to find home mortgages written for a term of more than 12 years.

In view of the low monthly payments required to amortize a long-term mortgage, the insured mortgage plan has brought new homes within reach of many families previously unable to acquire them. Thus the system is providing a definite impetus to new home building.

The term of insured mortgages for refinancing existing properties tends to be somewhat shorter, since old houses on the whole have a shorter expectancy of useful life than new houses. However, as many as 49 percent have terms from 17 to 20 years, and 78 percent have terms from 13 to 20 years.

It is especially significant that many of the life-insurance companies have returned actively to the mortgage-lending field during the past 12 or 14 months. The new investments of 45 such companies in urban real-estate mortgages during the first 4 months of 1936 were nine times as great as in the same period of 1934 and over three times as large as in the same period of last year. Loans made by building and loan associations during the first quarter of 1936 are estimated to have amounted to approximately $207,000,000 compared with about $126,000,000 in the same period of last year.

Third, there has been a more uniform flow and wider distribution of home-mortgage funds. Insured mortgages are now discountable at Federal Home Loan banks and may be used in part as collateral for advances at the Federal Reserve banks. Insured mortgages for new construction may be sold to the R. F. C. Mortgage Co., and Federal Reserve member banks are permitted under the Banking Act of 1935 to purchase and hold mortgages on properties other than in a restricted local area. Already the greater liquidity which mortgage insurance has given to home mortgages has created an active market for them.

Fourth, a lower and more uniform rate on home-mortgage securities has been effected through the Nation-wide maximum interest rate prescribed by the President for insured mortgages. Hitherto there have been wide differences in rates, explicable only on the basis of local custom and restricted mortgage markets. Home-mortgage funds may now be secured at an interest rate consistent with rates in the general money market and with the special considerations involved. In several States where home-mortgage interest rates averaged 8 percent or more, the administration has insured loans amounting to many millions of dollars, carrying an interest rate of 5 percent plus one-half of 1 percent service charge and one-half of 1 percent insurance. Several life-insurance companies have announced home-mortgage financing plans involving the reduction in interest rates from 6 to 5 percent since the inauguration of the Federal Housing Administration plan.

Fifth, the administration is effecting widespread improvements in home-mortgage lending practice. Its standards of procedure for appraisal and for analyzing the elements of risk in mortgages have been embodied in a widely circulated manual and are being utilized not only by the staff appraisers but by all types of mortgage-lending institutions throughout the country.

Sixth, building standards are being raised through an inspection of construction methods and materials. Houses upon which mortgages are insured must conform to reasonable standards of convenience, liveability, quality of construction, and even the subdivision and planning of the neighborhood. This contribution is most timely, for in the past the building of houses of poor quality has flourished most extensively during the years immediately succeeding a period of slack building.

Seventh, the owners of small homes are receiving an increasing measure of protection. Mr. Speaker, it is recognized that the purchase of a home is an epochal step for most families. It is a step that must be safeguarded insofar as possible, and the Federal Housing Administration is being administered so as to assure the fullest possible protection to persons buying, building, or refinancing the homes which they occupy or hold as landlord. Under the insured-mortgage plan the borrower does not start with inflated costs. Even though he may borrow up to as much as 80 percent of the value, the monthly payments are relatively small owing to the allowance of up to 20 years for amortization. The mortgage does not have to be renewed and this means no renewal fees. The borrower is assured of a sound plan of amortization. Taxes and insurance are included as part of the monthly payments, so that there is less danger of failing to make provision for these items.

All this procedure helps borrowers to avoid buying beyond their means or at inflated prices on a narrow margin. It helps to insure that the dwelling is in good condition and that the neighborhood is not particularly vulnerable to rapid deterioration. In general, the Federal Housing Administration plan is designed to help stabilize the whole real-estate market; and to maintain an orderly home real-estate market during periods of depression.

Eighth, the creation of private limited-dividend corporations which finance large-scale housing developments is becoming an active element in the present-day residential building field. Through its power to insure mortgages on such projects, the Administration is encouraging private capital to enter the field of housing on a large scale and to establish standards of planning and construction of large groups of dwellings well in advance of customary practice. Particular emphasis is given to the matter of community and neighborhood planning.

Generally speaking, each project is large enough to constitute a new neighborhood of its own, or at least to affect very favorably an existing neighborhood. To date 21 projects involving a total cost of nearly $42,000,000, and mortgages amounting to $33,000,000, have been approved and commitments to insure mortgages have been issued. In addition, proposals are under consideration for insurance of underlying mortgages amounting to $104,000,000 on 52 projects, all of which have undergone preliminary examination. They range in amount from mortgages of around $100,000 up to $10,000,000, the limit allowed by the law, with the average around $2,000,000. Additional applications indicate the possibility of construction running into several hundred million dollars per year.

Ninth, essential statistics and economic data on real estate and housing are being obtained in connection with the mortgage-insurance program. These are being focused upon the central problem of mortgage instability. Instability not only creates the need for mortgage insurance but is the ever-menacing foe of progress in housing. As witness to that fact, there are the blighting of neighborhoods; the tearing down of new and serviceable buildings to make way for still newer ones; the heartbreaks of those families who buy at the top of a booming real-estate market only to find themselves later with their resources and equities gone; and the appalling fluctuations in home-building activity which make that industry one of the most unstable and inefficient.

During the past few years the repercussions of a major downswing in real-estate values and building activity reached the proportions of a national calamity.

Even in the best of times individual houses by the thousands fall into decay and become worthless because they were badly planned or badly located, and successive owners have felt that it would not pay to keep them in repair and to keep them modernized. Even neighborhoods of well-built and well-kept-up homes may gradually yield to blight and become a liability. Hence the Federal Housing Administration is obtaining data that will aid in safeguarding not only its own mortgage-insurance operations, and the interests of those home owners who are paying premiums into the mutual mortgage-insurance fund, but the security of home owners, mortgage-lending institutions, the building industry, and the public generally.

Mr. Speaker, the successful activities of the Federal Housing Administration have met with the most widespread recognition. Spokesmen of organized labor, bankers, building and loan associations, and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States have all freely voiced their commendations.

All in all, the Members of the House of Representatives may rest assured that the organization set up under the National Housing Act to establish new and improved relationships between borrowers and lenders in the home real-estate field is handsomely fulfilling its promise. The record of accomplishment of the Federal Housing Administration already constitutes an impressive tribute to the wisdom of the legislators who created it.

Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to have had no small part in the framing and passing of this legislation. In the second session of the Seventy-third Congress considerable opposition developed to the passage of the National Housing Act, particularly to the provisions designed to effectuate low-cost housing and slum clearance. This opposition was engendered by certain groups of building and loan associations, notably in Chicago and other parts of the Middle West and also in certain of the Southern States. Invariably it came from sections where high rates of interest were secured by mortgage lenders whose money went into mortgages on homes. The part which I took in putting this plan into law and in protecting it against the attacks upon it by these same interests in the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress and again in the present session is a part of the record of this legislation. We were told back in 1934 and again in 1935 by the opponents, who were sniping at this legislation, both from outside and from within Congress, that it would not amount to anything. During the past several months mortgage loans on homes have amounted to over $10,000,000 a week or at the rate of one-half billion dollars a year. About 45 percent of this has gone into the building of new homes. The prediction of those who had the vision to project and plan and prepare this act have already been fulfilled.

I FOLLOW THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, on March 4, 1933, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt was inaugurated President of the United States, a tremendous and overwhelming task confronted him. The country was in an alarming and critical condition. Very many of our citizens, through no fault of their own, were unemployed and in dire straits. The bankruptcy courts were overcrowded. The financial institutions of our country faced ruin. Banks had closed their doors. Business and commerce everywhere was blocked, unable to move. Hopelessness and helplessness and fear gripped the people.

Our President was determined to raise the American people from the sloth of despair and depression into which they had fallen; and he therefore asked of Congress and was given greater powers than have ever been granted a President of the United States. And Congress, alarmed by the condition in which the country found itself and spurred on by the popular President, passed more important legislation in a few months than in any similar period in our history. Important measures were given life in a determined effort by those at the helm of Government to give to each of us the greatest amount of personal, financial, and social protection and aid.

Under the New Deal, in the short space of time that elapsed since President Roosevelt called a special session, Congress enacted into law legislation to bring about the repeal of prohibition, the stabilization of tottering banks, the abolition of child labor. The civil-works program was established under the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, providing food, clothing, and shelter for millions of needy people. Under this program, more than 250,000 miles of roads were built or repaired, 60,000 public buildings were repaired or rebuilt, 1,000 airports built or completed, and many other worth-while white-collar projects completed. In addition thereto, under this program, more than 3,000,000 unemployed persons on relief rolls have been given work and many important projects have been carried forward. Almost 3,000 projects aimed toward flood control and other conservation have been begun; hundreds of airports and airway markers have been built or improved; almost 5,000 parks and playgrounds have been constructed or improved; 130 electric utilities systems have been installed or repaired. The Civilian Conservation Corps was brought into being. Hundreds of thousands of young men from the slums of our cities and the waste places of our land have been placed in these C. C. C. camps, where they will be given a chance to find health and to make of themselves happy and useful citizens. This is the very first time that our Government has taken formal notice of the obligation it owes to the youth of our country. Nor has it stopped with the C. C. C.; instead it has established the national youth movement, whereby hundreds of thousands of young people are receiving N. Y. A. wages for many kinds of work useful both to themselves and to the communities in which they live. As has previously been stated, by virtue of the funds provided for in the public-works building program, millions have secured employment. But in addition thereto the projects under the P. W. A. will have a lasting social and economic value. Many thousands of schools have been built in which to educate the youth of the land. Many thousands of sewers and waterworks to protect the health of our citizens have been erected. Thousands of hospitals and sanitariums, public buildings, bridges, and power plants, as well as other first-class improvements to add to the moral and physical strength and comfort of American citizens have been made a part of the great American Commonwealth. Furthermore, under this administration, crime and racketeering are being legislated out of existence. The adjustment of differences between employer and employee has been made possible. Through the establishment of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation thousands of home owners have been able to save their homes against foreclosure proceedings. Loans made by the H. O. L. C. aggregate three and one-half billions of dollars. Second mortgages and short-term mortgages are replaced by the Federal Housing Administration. Thus have millions of American homes been saved through this beneficent administration. Loans to the States for unemployment relief; loans to cities and States for construction projects; farm relief; Muscle Shoals legislation—all these are but a few of the many splendid accomplishments of the Roosevelt administration during its first 2 years.

Since that time, much additional of a worth-while nature has been enacted into law. Thus, for the first time in the history of our Government, due recognition has been taken of the Nation's obligation to the aged and the infirm. Consequently, there was enacted into law such epochal legislation as the Social Security Act, to remove from the aged and the infirm the hazards of economic insecurity. Under the same measure, a program of unemployment insurance has been begun to care for our working-class people in times of low business activity.

One of the most helpful measures of the New Deal has been the law guaranteeing bank deposits. The benefits of this act, its stabilizing influence are acknowledged by all. Great progress has been made, under this Administration, to make more secure the lot of the laboring man. Trade agreements have been concluded with 14 countries and are now in operation in 10. The results have indeed been most encouraging. In enlarging the powers and functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, there has been placed at the disposal of legitimate business the credit of the Nation to be used in a vast reconstruction and stabilizing effort.

Through the medium of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Administration has taken an important step in doing away with the evils existing in the stock exchanges and in the private manipulation of securities.

The Wheeler-Rayburn Act regulating public-utility holding companies is a long needed reform for the protection of utility stockholders as well as consumers.

Under the provisions of the act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority, waterpower rights have been preserved, electric utility rates have been reduced, and a great plant of inestimable value in time of war has been maintained.

The banking laws have been strengthened and improved.

The Neutrality Act makes it unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States or its possessions to any port of a belligerent state, or to any neutral port for transshipment to, or for the use of, a belligerent country, and so forth.

The Railroad Retirement Act establishes a system of retirement annuities for railroad workers who have reached the age of 65 years, and for any under that age who have had 30 years' service with the rail carriers and who either make application for retirement or are retired because of physical or mental disability.

These are but a few of the many important measures that have been placed on the statute books of our country during this administration.

It can be seen from all of the above that the great social objective of this administration has been to try to increase the security and the happiness of a larger number of people in all occupations of life and in all parts of the country; to give them greater distribution of not only wealth in the narrow term, but of wealth in its wider term; to give them the assurance that they will not starve in their old age; to give honest business a chance to progress and to make fair and reasonable profits; and to give everyone a chance to earn an honest and comfortable living.

We who champion the New Deal and have studiously supported the administration well realize that the hoped-for utopia and the goal of an economic millennium cannot be created by acts of Congress. But we do feel that the true path toward this goal has been carved out by this administration under President Roosevelt's leadership—a leadership that has been courageous, effective, humane, and wise. Under our President's guidance we have begun to eliminate the evils of financial centralization and to replace this with the blessings of economic freedom. Business is returning to normalcy. The values of securities have increased in an amount five times as great as the total amount spent for relief purposes. Real estate has again become a thing of value. Our banks are in a very sound condition. Corporation earnings have shown a tremendous increase. Agriculture is gradually finding its place in the sun, and now it is practically on a basis of equality with industry. Farm incomes have increased from the low of approximately four and one-half billions of dollars at the beginning of 1933 to a present high of approximately eight and one-half billions of dollars. Bank deposits are larger today than they were even at the peak of the so-called paper prosperity period of 1929. In a word, there are millions whose lives have been permanently blessed by the New Deal.

Thus shall we continue in our endeavors to build for a future in which we will have both material and social prosperity. And because this administration has taken the great steps to make possible such prosperity—all the while keeping intact our fundamental heritage of liberty of action, equality of opportunity, freedom of speech, of public assembly and of religious worship—the name and record of Franklin Delano Roosevelt will shine forth in everlasting greatness and inspiration.

PENNSYLVANIA FARMERS COMING OUT OF THE RED

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Pennsylvania farmer does not have to be reminded of his condition in 1932 to realize now how much better off he is under the Democratic administration of President Roosevelt. He does not have to search his memory to recall that in 1932 he was getting 57 cents a bushel for his wheat, 49 cents for his corn, 29 cents for oats, $4.75 a hundred for his hogs, and 18 cents a dozen for eggs. He remembers those dark days when he did not know whether he was going to get enough for his crops to pay the interest on his mortgage. He had an old automobile and was figuring that he would have to make it do for a long time. Back in those days under the Hoover administration, farmers in Pennsylvania and all over the country were wondering whether they would ever again be able to make a living off the farm. They had lost confidence; hope was rapidly vanishing.

Then came along the election of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Hope almost instantly revived. Pennsylvania farmers began to see the dawn of a new day. Within a year the Pennsylvania farmer, taking stock, found that prices for his products had steadily climbed upward, and he found also that he had some surplus cash over and above all expenses.

But let us go back just for a moment. The Republicans had been in power for 12 long years. They had made repeated experiments to aid the farmer. The Hoover Farm Board's efforts to increase and stabilize farm prices had resulted only in further decline and it cost the taxpayers of the Nation nearly half a billion dollars. The cash income of farmers in the Nation had gone down to a low of $4,300,000,000 in 1932; and farmers, representing more than 25 percent of the population, got only a pitiful 7½ percent of the national income. Farm prices, as a group, in March of 1933 had sunk to the lowest level since prior to the Civil War.

That was the record of 12 long years of Republican control of the Federal Government.

Now, let us look at the record of the Democratic administration under President Roosevelt. Farm prices immediately started to advance. In 1935 wheat had gone from 57 cents a bushel in 1932 to 80 cents a bushel; the price of corn went up from 49 cents to 70 cents; oats from 29 to 42; potatoes from 48 cents a bushel to 60; hogs from $4.75 to $9.10; eggs from 18 to 26 cents; and the cash receipts of Pennsylvania farmers had increased from $151,590,000 in 1932 to $211,763,000 in 1935, including $1,663,000 in rental and benefit payments under agricultural adjustment programs. And in the Nation as a whole farm cash income had risen from $4,300,000,000 in 1932 to $6,900,000,000 in 1935.

That is not all. Farmers under Republican administrations had seen the value of their farm lands go steadily downward, until in March of 1933 the value of farm real estate in Pennsylvania had reached a low of 78, the State average value from 1912 to 1914 being 100. But with the coming of the Roosevelt administration the decline was halted, and there has been a steady increase ever since.

The farmers of Pennsylvania under Republican administrations saw their purchasing power steadily decline. They had no money to buy new farm machinery, let alone automobiles. Just to show how their purchasing power has increased: In 1932 new-car registrations in Pennsylvania were 111,000; in 1933 they had gone up to 141,000; in 1934 they reached 177,000; and in 1935 there were 234,000 new-car registrations, or an increase of 111 percent over 1932. According to Automobile Facts and Figures, a publication of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association, sales of new automobiles were greatest in small towns and on farms. From 1933 to 1934 new passenger automobile registrations on farms and in towns under 10,000 population showed an increase of 24 percent.

Let us see how this increased purchasing power of Pennsylvania farmers has helped other industries. A recent study of railroad freight waybills on carlot shipments of industrial products over five railroads from Pennsylvania shows an increase from 197,110,698 pounds to 375,605,989 pounds, a gain of 90.6 percent.

Individual bank deposits in Pennsylvania aggregated $3,816,967,000 for the year ending June 30, 1935, an advance of $540,058,000, or 16 percent, over deposits in the year ending June 30, 1933. The number of commercial failures in the State dropped from 2,152 in 1932 to 831 in 1935, a decrease of 61 percent.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE CANADIAN TRADE TREATY

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, early this year, and even before that, I began to receive letters asking me if the Canadian trade agreement would not ruin this country, particularly its dairy farmers. Lately I have heard increasing rumors that it was sure to do that. Naturally, being vitally concerned in the matter, I looked into it.

The gist of the rumor is that Canada now is being allowed to flood this country with fluid cream in almost unrestrained competition with our own American dairy farmers.

That is very far from the truth. The persons originating this rumor are seeking opportunity again to betray our farmers and our milk producers on the altar of high tariff for their own favored industries, the same special interests that made a mockery of our domestic form of government in the hectic twenties.

The total amount of cream which Canada is allowed to ship into this country under the trade pact figures out to slightly more than one-tenth of a gallon per capita. A little over one-tenth of a gallon a year per consumer.

And on each and every gallon Canadian producers send here they must pay a tariff rate almost twice as high as the rate they paid until 1930.

Furthermore, the present quota permits them to sell us only about one-third as much fluid cream as they sold us each year between 1923 and 1928.

The story behind these little-known facts is simple. Until 1909 there was not any such thing as a tariff on Canadian cream; that year we established a 5-cent duty on each gallon. Two years later, though, that was rescinded, and from 1911 until 1921 Canadian cream was shipped in duty free. In 1921 the 5-cent tariff was reestablished, and a year later it was raised to 20 cents a gallon. In 1930, however, the cream tariff was jacked up to no less than fifty-six and a half cents a gallon.

Now, some of us thought that that would be a fine thing for the dairy farmers, a very fine thing, indeed. But subsequent developments proved quite the opposite. A cream tariff was needed, but 56 cents was too high, as it turned out.

Between 1922 and 1928 Canadians shipped into this country an average of 4,400,000 gallons of cream each year. Now, under the new trade pact, they must pay a tariff of 35 cents a gallon and their quota is only 1,500,000 gallons. On all cream over that figure they must pay the 56½-cent rate. This rate has proved to be virtually prohibitive, so the "flood" in the light of these facts dwindles down to a mere trickle, only enough to lubricate the vastly important machinery of Canada-American trade.

It so happens that Canada is Uncle Sam's very best customer, and usually buys more than she sells. Naturally when we hiked our tariffs, some of them by more than 100 percent, in 1930 our Canadian trade immediately dropped to less than half of its previous volume. Between 1922 and 1930 Canadians bought about $5,000,000,000 worth of goods per year from America. When our high tariffs went into effect the Canadians cut their buying from us sharply; the figure for 1932 was only a little more than a billion and a half.

Uncle Sam was trying to charge his best customer admission to his store.

Naturally, coming almost simultaneously with the general depression, the huge reduction in Canadian purchases from this country hurt each and every one of us more than we shall ever be able to realize. When the million-dollar orders stopped coming from our cousins to the north, American workmen were thrown out of jobs by the hundreds and thousands. Grass could not grow in our streets because of the jobless men tramping up and down them in search of work. And as our unemployment lists mounted toward the twenty-million mark, our American dairy farmers found themselves able to dispose of less and less cream each week at lower and lower prices.

It is all too obvious now that we were trying to eat our Canadian cake and have it, too. To the surprise of some, we shortly began to realize that we could not do that. We had climbed up to the top of the tariff ladder and found that we were much too high to be able to reach the fruits of international trade. So, the reciprocal trade treaty policy was evolved as the most natural, if not the only practical, solution to our pressing problem.

The figures show that less than a pint of cream per person is allowed to come in from Canada under the 35-cent tariff rate. To this rate add the additional transportation costs, and we find our own dairy farmers more than adequately protected from Canadian imports. Now let us see about the matter of cheese.

I have heard it rumored that Canadian cheese is about to ruin our American cheese industry. As a matter of fact we eat almost no imported cheese, Canadian or otherwise. And here's how the tariff situation on cheese stands under the new trade treaty:

If Canadian producers are willing to sell their cheese to us for 20 cents per pound or less, then they can ship it in but they must pay a 5-cent tariff on each and every pound of it. If they want more than 20 cents, they must pay a higher tariff. This rate leaves little if any profit for the importer, so we can still expect almost no cheese from Canada. The minimum cheese tariff of 5 cents represents a reduction of only 2 cents from the 7-cent rate which was effective from 1930 through 1935.

As I previously mentioned, our cheese imports are negligible. Of all the cheese consumed in this country, only 2 percent is made elsewhere, and many years we export more than we import. So it becomes apparent that our cream producers—whether their cream is to be sold as such or made into cheese—have absolutely nothing to fear from the Canadians, and there can be no doubt as to the material benefits from the much-maligned trade treaty.

The figures on this matter are available to everyone, and are quite worthy of the attention of those interested in the welfare of the American dairy farmer.

And these figures inescapably indicate that the Canadian trade pact, with its 35-cent tariff and its low cream quota, cannot fail to aid our dairymen as well as the Nation as a whole.

NATIONAL HIGH SCHOOL DEBATING CHAMPIONS

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, it becomes the pleasant duty of a Member of Congress from time to time to call the attention of this body to outstanding achievements of the young men and women of America, particularly in view of the splendid effort made by this Congress in restoring to the youth of this country, in a degree at least, the opportunity which America in bygone years has held out proudly and justifiably to the youth of the world.

Much has been said in just tribute to the youth of yesterday. Not enough, in my judgment, is said in tribute of the youth of today. I can in no sense agree with the cynicism of some who in glowing terms point out the struggle, the sacrifice, and the success of the young men and women of "my day" and in the same breath observe that the younger generation today is not made of the same material. That youth has changed there is little doubt, but that change has been a natural progressive change that is the result of intelligent application and healthy response to a greater change in conditions. Speaking as one just as greatly interested and proud of the youth of yesterday, as I am of the youth today, I am compelled to observe that the change has been for the better.

It is with genuine pleasure that I now call to your attention the great honor that has recently come to the city of Du Quoin, a splendid Midwestern community, located in the heart of the great Soft Coal Belt in southern Illinois, in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent.

The Du Quoin High School debating team, made up of four outstanding young Americans, coached by Mr. Paul Hibbs, overcame all opposition in the recent National Forensic League meet held in Oklahoma City and established themselves as the champion high-school debaters of America. It is a signal honor, and we in southern Illinois have recognized it as such and invite you to share with us in our pride.

The four members of this team, namely, James Harper and Dwight Croessmann, of the affirmative; Ruth Weltge and Richard Dunn, of the negative, debated the question, "Resolved, That the several States should enact legislation providing for a complete system of medical care available to all citizens at public expense." Their victory came after they had defeated the splendid teams of Paducah, Ky.; Waynesburg, Pa.; Nashville, Tenn.; Britton High School, Oklahoma City, Okla.; Rapid City, S. Dak.; Topeka, Kans.; Springfield, Mo.; and, in the final round, the great team of Carrollton, Mo. Three of these champions are native sons and daughters of southern Illinois, while the fourth, Mr. Dunn, received most of his education there. The other members of the team are John Brummet, Billy Case, Wilma Rains, Ruth Lee, and Virginia Allen.

Until this year no team in the national contest had ever used four debaters, but had selected their best two as the rules permit and allowed them to argue both sides of the question. Du Quoin used four debaters, however, and in winning became the first team east of the Mississippi River to ever win the national contest.

In addition to the debating championship, all of the Du Quoin debaters were entered in the individual speaking contests and became the first team to attain as great success in this phase of the work while under the strain of debating at the same time as a team. Mr. Harper reached the final round in oratorical declamation, finishing third in the Nation. Mr. Croessmann worked his way to the final round in the extempore speaking, and finished third. Mr. Dunn survived six rounds in the oratorical declamation, losing only in the semifinals; while Miss Weltge reached the final round in original oratory, finishing fourth. Mr. Harper had tied for first place in his event the year before in the national contest while speaking as a junior, and Mr. Croessmann in the same contest, as a sophomore, won fourth in his event. Du Quoin has won the State championship of Illinois the past 4 successive years, and won all but one of the 16 speech tournaments in which it participated the last year, placing second in that event.

From that record it appears that the people of Du Quoin, like their neighbors in Egypt have done for so many years in being able to take care of themselves in any forensic encounter, have developed a most unusual interest in public speaking, and that a great part of this success is due to that interest and the careful work of Mr. Paul Hibbs, the high-school director of public speaking in Du Quoin.

May I not further, in closing, suggest it has been my great pleasure on many occasions to call the attention of many people to the fact that from our own "little Egypt" has come John A. Logan, soldier, statesman, lawyer, and orator; Robert G. Ingersoll, soldier, lawyer, and one of the greatest orators of all times; Senator William E. Borah, lawyer, and statesman par excellence; and finally William Jennings Bryan, lawyer, humanitarian, orator, and political leader. In addition, "little Egypt" has produced many others equally great whom lack of opportunity alone failed to give fame which these properly received.

In commenting on these men I have made this statement: No country in the world, considering its area, population, and length of time, has produced so many men whom the world has considered great as our own "little Egypt." "Little Egypt" is, indeed, the land of ability, oratory, and humanity.

LEGISLATION FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE FARMER

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, this Congress has enacted several measures of major significance, some good, some which probably will have to be revised. Among the most important have been the measures pertaining to the improvement of farm conditions. It is an oft-repeated story, but none the less true, that, as a national economic unit, we stand or fall by the farmer.

I believe that the most profitable thing we, as Members of Congress, can do during the coming months is to go out into our respective districts and learn from our own farmers just how the legislation we have enacted is affecting them.

Now, this may sound surprising to some, coming from me, for my district is composed of two important counties of New York State. But I have the honor to represent one of the Nation's greatest farming areas. Though New York is not usually considered among the traditional agricultural States, it has only 7,000 fewer farmers than Kansas and by far more milk cows. New York has 18,000,000 acres in farm land—farms worth more than a billion and a quarter dollars. It is one of America's mammoth dairy sections, with 1,350,000 cows. Its production of hay is exceeded only by that of our second largest State, California.

Because of the importance of dairy farming in my own district I want to say before we adjourn that I am not altogether satisfied with the farming legislation passed during this session of Congress. And I propose to work toward the end that some of the inequities can be rectified as soon as possible if I remain a Member of this House next year.

As the record will show, certain omissions in it—namely, the lack of protection of dairy farmers—forced me to oppose the recently enacted Soil Conservation Act. It should be amended as soon as is practicable to provide that none of the land retired from active production under the act shall be used for the grazing of dairy cows. Unless this safeguard is established there is no reason why farmers not primarily dependent upon the sale of milk cannot graze sizable herds on this subsidized land in unfair competition to the regular dairy farmers.

By the next session of Congress the Federal Trade Commission undoubtedly will have completed its current investigation into the several large corporations which buy and distribute milk produced in my district, composed of Oneida and Herkimer Counties. I have reason to believe that results of this investigation will show the necessity for measures to guarantee milk producers an honest deal from the distributing companies, which now have the sole control of the price the dairy farmer gets for his product. I am glad that I was able to be instrumental in the ordering of the F. T. C. inquiry into the milk companies, and I am confident that both producers and consumers will gain ultimate profit by it.

If the findings of the F. T. C. in New York prove the need for Federal safeguards to protect America's hundreds of thousands of dairy farmers from unfair trade practices, I for one will fight to establish them.

A reform which should certainly be enacted next session is the passage of a measure to exempt farm cooperatives from taxation on their capital stock. This is urgently needed because of a recent ruling that the cooperatives are to be exempt only if all of their common stock is held by member producers.

This proposal, which I have introduced as a bill in the House, would exempt the cooperatives when 75 percent or more of their voting stock is "owned by producers who market their products or purchase their equipment and supplies through the association."

In many cases all of the initial stock is issued exclusively to active members, but through various transactions, estate transfers, and so forth, part of it passes into the hands of nonproducers. At present all of the stock of any cooperative is taxable even if 90 percent of it is held by member producers. For example, the Little Falls (N. Y.) Dairy Co., one type of cooperative, is taxable even though three-fourths of the stock is held by active members. My proposal will rectify such situations.

Needless to say, I am proud to have been a Member of the Congresses which have passed so much legislation to promote rural electrification. This program undoubtedly has been one of the major factors in aiding recovery and its benefits to the millions of American farmers cannot be measured.

The Government's rural-electrification agencies have called upon me to aid in their legislative program. I have come into close contact with them and consider them among the finest in our Federal system. It is my sincere hope that they will be retained for many years, until the needed power is available to practically every farm family in the Nation.

I also have been able to aid in the movement to firmly establish the Farm Credit Administration, and that agency should also be continued as needed.

Among the most important farm measures likely to come up at the next session will be several to encourage the establishment of more cooperatives. It is my firm conviction that anything that the Congress can do to promote the welfare and growth of these agencies should be done without hesitancy.

All of us, surely, realize that prosperity cannot be legislated into reality, but it has been shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the congressional enactments of the past 4 years have aided the Nation's producers in gaining their present degree of recovery.

To cite but one instance of the recovery, a total of 208,000 previously jobless workmen found work on our farms in a single month, April, this year. This represents the largest agricultural employment gain for April since the depression really started. Our total farm income has increased more than 40 percent in the past 3 years.

Such facts are encouraging, but we will do well to bear this in mind: Our farm recovery is not keeping pace with gains being made in industry and commerce. And when these run too far ahead of the farmers—well, all of us know what happened in 1929 and the 4 succeeding years.

I do not desire to appear pessimistic but facts of the matter force me to remind you that unless the present rate of farm recovery continues or increases, we are certain to be face to face with another national economic crisis within a few short years. America has got to enable the farmer to keep up with industry and commerce by safeguarding his right to a fair return for this work.

Despite our experience of recent years, not everyone realizes this fact, but I for one am convinced that enough of us are aware of it to continue our vigilance against the recurrence of circumstances which led to the maelstrom of the depression. Surely this generation has learned through bitter experience not to allow exploitation of farmers to go unheeded.

Business and industry, organized as they are for their own protection, are better able to battle for their rights. Unless or until America's farmers also are able to unite in common cause, the National and State legislatures must help them in their fight for a rightful living. To those who charge that this is "interference with individualism", I reply: So is lifesaving.

There is little need for me to point to what the Government's farm-loan agencies have done in the last 3½ years. One of them alone has saved 150,000 farm homes, and others have saved additional thousands. Permanent agricultural improvements through Federal loans have been of inestimable value. In addition, interest rates on farm mortgages have been reduced in almost every section of the country.

Let me repeat that I am not altogether satisfied with the measure recently enacted as a substitute to the A. A. A.—it should furnish more protection for the dairy farmers, and will be altered to do that within 2 years if such is at all possible. But I want to go on record as believing that we are on the right road. We as a nation have begun to recognize our obligation to the farmer, the man who feeds us all.

WHAT SHOULD BE OUR POLICY WITH REGARD TO NATIONAL DEFENSE?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, for the next fiscal year Congress has appropriated a sum in excess of $1,200,000,000 for military and naval purposes. This tremendous sum, the largest ever set aside in peacetime, to furnish an adequate national defense has as its immediate task the building up of a military and naval machine ostensibly to keep us out of war. The admirals and generals have requested even more funds as necessary to protect the people of the United States from war.

There is no need to go into the old arguments regarding preparedness, its cost, its usefulness, or its psychological results. In the present temper of the world there is no arguing with the fact that the people of the world feel they must place some reliance upon the armies and navies of their respective countries in order that they may be protected in case of a diplomatic break-down. Granting that this feeling exists in the world, it behooves us as Members of Congress to examine the program and the policies of our national-defense system to see, first, that it furnishes the maximum amount of protection; second, that its status is not that which encourages fear on the part of other nations; third, that it is part of a well-planned national policy placing the emphasis on the peaceful solution of disputes between our Nation and other nations; fourth, that in these times of dire social and economic need the cost of our program is kept at the lowest figure consonant with our needs.

I have said on the floor of this House that I am in favor of an adequate Army and Navy, an Army and Navy which will protect our Nation against invasion but not an Army and Navy which is based upon a system of fighting foreign wars for the profits of the Standard Oil Co. or other financial interests in any part of the world. I have consistently fought those items in our military and naval budgets which I felt were opposed to this principle. I shall continue to oppose such expenditures in the future. In doing so, however, I will work on every occasion for the development of a program and policies which are conducive to our protection against invasion from overseas.

The Nye Committee has revealed, in its far-reaching investigation into our munitions industry and our national defense system, that at the present time the principles and policies of our naval and military leaders are not based upon defense against invasion but rather upon the premise that we as a Nation shall be engaged in a war overseas. The War Department has in keeping with this doctrine, while disclaiming any attempt to build a military machine, created an organization which, upon a moment's notice, could be set into motion not to mobilize for defending our country but to mobilize for the transportation of 3,000,000 officers and men overseas. Such is the policy of our War Department.

Our Navy in official statements has declared that its policy is based upon the following points:

To maintain the Navy in sufficient strength to support the national policies and commerce, and to guard the continental and overseas possessions of the United States.

To create, maintain, and operate a navy second to none and in conformity with treaty provisions.

To develop the Navy to a maximum in battle strength and ability to control the sea in defense of the Nation and its interests.

To organize the Navy for operations in either or both oceans so that expansion only will be necessary in the event of war.

To maintain the Marine Corps in strength sufficient to furnish detachments to vessels of the fleet, guards for shore stations, garrisons for outlying positions, and to provide expeditionary forces in immediate readiness * * *

To protect American lives and property.

To support American interests, especially the development of American foreign commerce and the merchant marine.

To encourage civil industries and activities useful in war * * *.

A careful reading of this official statement from the General Board of the Navy reveals the real purpose of the Navy as being that of protecting our economic interests all over the world.

While the Army and Navy have been developing their plans which, if carried out, can result almost in the development of a military dictatorship in the event of war, our Congress has been attempting to deal with the problem of helping to keep the United States out of war and to cooperate in the prevention of war in the event that conflicts become dangerous. We have fought for the past 2 years for the enactment of a strong neutrality law. Such a law would by itself be powerless to keep the United States out of war but it would help discourage situations leading to war. We have not been able to enact the complete neutrality policy which is necessary to do what little neutrality, itself, can accomplish.

I am reminded of the fact that our Nation is a signatory of the Pact of Paris in which we have renounced war as an instrument of national policy and pledged ourselves to seek a peaceful solution of international disputes. I am aware that we have attempted to achieve an international agreement for the limitation of our naval armaments. The administration has been slowly but surely carrying out its policy of the "good neighbor." This policy has been especially successful in Latin America and in keeping with this doctrine the President of the United States has declared that we as a nation have no interest in aggression.

While Congress and the President have been cooperating in the above policy, the Army and the Navy have continued to ignore this policy and concentrate their attention upon their old program of fighting, not against an invader, but against a foreign foe on foreign soil. Such, I am convinced, is not the policy nor the desire of the American people.

It is not the desire of those veterans of the last war to shed their own blood or the blood of their comrades in France. It is not the policy of the women of the Nation, whose homes will be broken up if war comes. It is not the policy of the youth of the land, the young people who will be the cannon fodder in the next war. The young people, with whom we have been so concerned in this depression, trying to find them jobs, trying to provide them with economic security, trying to create a system of social and economic security which will mean something to the coming generation. It is not the policy of the farmers of the country, who will find themselves in the throes of another tremendous depression after such a war takes place. The farmers of the Nation realize that the temporary prosperity of wartime brings with it economic destitution a few years afterward. It is not the policy of the laboring people of the country. Organized labor knows that war means fascism and under fascism labor's rights are lost. In other words, war is denounced by the vast majority of the American people. They do not want war; they do not want governmental policies which lead toward a misunderstanding and possible armed conflict with other nations; they do not want to pay $1,200,000 a year to support a program which is dangerous. They are willing to pay for a program which will protect our Nation against invasion.

The time has come, in my judgment, when an inventory of our needs, our resources, and our program must be taken. I feel that our military and naval leaders should no longer be given a free hand to commit the United States to a policy which will lead toward war and economic bankruptcy. I have endorsed all positive constructive developments for protecting our Nation. I am happy to endorse the principles of the resolution introduced in the Senate of the United States by Senator BENSON, of Minnesota, and in the House by Congressman LUCKEY, of Nebraska. This resolution provides for a civilian survey of our national-defense establishment and a recommendation to the Congress of the United States of a policy of national defense that shall be—

In harmony with our agreement to renounce war as an instrument of our national course in international affairs;

Designed only to defend the boundaries of the Nation against invasion;

Actually as well as theoretically in keeping with our neutrality laws;

Instrumental in insuring our peaceful relations with other nations of the world;

Conducive to the elimination from the defense establishments of all agencies designed or primarily useful for aggressive purposes; and

Determinative of a basic policy to guide expenditures for national defense so that people in time of peace may not be burdened in the future by war appropriations fast exceeding $1,000,000,000 annually.

To accomplish this purpose the resolution instructs the President of the United States to appoint a committee of civilians—

And that the committee is hereby authorized and directed to make a survey of all the facts affecting the existing establishments of the Army and the Navy, to hold public hearings, and to recommend to the Congress of the United States—the foregoing policy of national defense.

If such a resolution is enacted into law by the Congress of the United States, we shall have a fair-minded, impartial judgment of our needs and of the equipment and program necessary to carry out that policy.

I am aware of the fact that we are one of the few nations of the world which has an uncoordinated system of national defense. Almost every other important nation has coordinated its army and navy under one head. Such a program does away with a great deal of costly duplication and provides a smaller, integrated defense establishment. A system of this type serves to curb competition between the Army and Navy for access to the Public Treasury and results in a much lower tax bill.

At a time when practically every man, woman, and child of the Nation is interested in decreasing taxes, it is well to remember that every person living within the United States pays an annual tax bill of approximately $10 a year to support our Army and Navy. Military and naval experts could, if they wanted to, reduce this tax burden and provide a better system of protection against invasion. Gen. Douglas McArthur, formerly Chief of Staff of the United States Army, now retired, has been engaged by the government of the Philippine Islands to establish a national defense program for the islands.

According to recent statements emanating from Manila, General MacArthur has decided that for the sum of $8,000,000 a year for a period of 10 years the Philippine Islands can be protected against the invasion of any foreign foe. It is astounding to contrast this finding with what our War and Navy Departments claim is necessary by way of expenditure for our national defense. The Philippine Islands are nearer by 4,000 miles to a potential enemy than is the United States. Her coast line is almost as long as that of the United States and up to the present time they have little or no defense establishment.

If the Philippine Islands, situated as they are, can, by the development of a policy based upon defense against invasion, pay for such a program at a total cost of $80,000,000, there seems to me little reason why the people of the United States should be burdened with an expenditure in 1 year of 15 times that sum.

What we need to do is to have such an impartial survey conducted by civilian leaders as that proposed by the Benson-Luckey resolutions. Such a survey and the development of a policy of coordination of our Army and Navy, combined with neutrality legislation to keep our country out of war and supplemented by a policy of international cooperation for the peaceful settlement of disputes, should ensure a greater degree of safety and a much lower cost to the American people. The size of our military and naval budgets, large as they are, does not mean that we are being adequately protected. Protection comes in quality, not quantity. Peaceful relations with other nations comes with the enunciation of a clear-cut, decisive policy of cooperation in peace and the readiness to defend ourselves against invasion in the event of war. The American people know what they want. Such a policy would answer their wishes and ensure ourselves against misunderstandings, whether they be in the Far East or in Europe.

THE BENEFITS OF THE ROOSEVELT AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Speaker, 147 years ago, in his first message to Congress, the first President of the United States recommended to Congress that it give consideration to the welfare of agriculture. Eight years later, in his eighth annual message, President Washington uttered these words:

With reference to either individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance.

I think it should be noted here that the great Washington referred to agriculture in connection with national welfare. Similar expressions and recommendations were made subsequently by Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and Grover Cleveland, but very little legislative action dealing directly with agriculture was taken by Congress until the present generation. I would like to discuss briefly some of the steps that have been taken.

Twenty-four years ago this month, in June 1912, the Democratic Party, in conference at Baltimore, Md., wrote in its platform a plank proposing a study of agricultural credits and endorsing legislation permitting national banks to loan a reasonable proportion of their funds on real-estate security. Woodrow Wilson was nominated for President by that convention, and his election in November 1912 was the birth of legislation for real financial benefit to American farmers. Under his direction the first step was taken to set up a system of Federal farm credits to relieve American farmers of high interest rates and overhead charges in connection with farm loans. Prior to that time agriculture laws passed by Congress related almost entirely to the dissemination of information, the suppression of disease and pests, the compilation of statistics, and the distribution of seeds and plants.

The Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916 proposed to meet the demand for rural credit at reasonable interest rates. It was the first law which dealt with the major financial problem of millions of American farmers, and it brought to farm people the realization that Federal legislation for the assistance of agriculture was possible.

The World War interrupted President Wilson's agriculture program, and in the last 2 years of his administration a Republican Congress, dominated by high-tariff industrialists, refused to follow the President's leadership, and passed the Fordney Tariff Act of 1920. One of President Wilson's last official acts was to veto that bill. If his three Republican successors in the White House had followed his example they would have done much to have prevented the decline of agriculture that followed March 4, 1921, and that reached a climax in the economic collapse of the Hoover administration.

President Wilson had no illusion about the effect of tariffs on agriculture. He analyzed the situation clearly and read the answer accurately. He vetoed legislation to revive the War Finance Corporation to loan money to European countries. He understood that buyers could not always be buyers or borrowers. He knew that borrowed money must be repaid or that the lenders must stop lending sooner or later. The war changed us from a debtor to a creditor nation, and every loan we made abroad increased the debt burden upon our former creditors who are now our debtors. President Wilson realized that these debtors had no money. He knew that they could repay our loans in only one way and that was by selling us enough of their products or their services to pay interest on their debts and something on the principal.

The foreign market for the products of 40,000,000 acres of American farm lands that were brought into production during the World War ceased to exist when the war ended, and the soldiers of Europe returned to their farms. The foreign market for many of the products of American factories ceased to exist theoretically at the same moment, because Europe was financially bankrupt, but American manufacturers in cooperation with American and international bankers supported the foreign market for the products of American factories upon a false and unsound foundation for 10 years by loaning $15,000,000,000 of American money abroad.

The Republican Congress in the last 2 years of President Wilson's administration and during three successive Republican administrations thereafter, either could not see or would not admit that self-evident fundamental commonsense business situation. More foreign loans and higher tariffs were the only answers they had to the problem.

New York international bankers who made most of the foreign loans made them in support of sales of products of factories in which they were interested. The money they loaned was drained in a large part from the banks of the agricultural areas of the country. At the same time, prices of agricultural products were declining almost steadily, and as a result of this unsound post-war industrial boom the disparity between agricultural products and industrial products increased year after year.

The depression for agriculture began in 1920. There were no foreign loans to support exportation of agricultural products. Our international bankers and three successive Republican administrations left the American farmer to shift for himself. During practically the entire period from 1921 to 1929, farm prices were below the cost of production and farmers were being crushed financially between the millstones of debt and insufficient income. While three successive Republican administrations did nothing to help or to prevent the economic debacle that was approaching, the cash reserves of farmers and Midwest businessmen in banks of the Midwest area were being siphoned off to New York and loaned to Europe.

Twice in this period, Democrats in Congress joined Progressive Republicans and gathered sufficient votes to force a bill through Republican Congresses designed to enable the farmers to help themselves. That bill was the McNary-Haugen bill. It proposed to finance the export of agricultural surpluses by the export-debenture plan. Farmers of the United States asked for that plan. They were able to muster sufficient strength between Democrats and Progressive Republicans to pass it through Congress twice, but it was vetoed each time by Republican Presidents and could not be passed over their vetoes.

The American farmer produces the new wealth upon which most of the Nation does business. For many years after the war, despite a steady decline in prices of agricultural products, his reserves were drawn upon to support billions of dollars of foreign loans so our international bankers and their industrial plants might continue to fatten on rich foreign business. While farm prices were going down, the prices of the things the farmer bought were going up. American agriculture was strangled ruthlessly and heartlessly, and those who did it gradually cut away the principal support of American industry. They destroyed the jobs of millions of American workingmen.

Ultimate collapse of the entire economic structure was as certain as that night follows day. As agriculture's distress grew, bank failures spread over the agricultural area. Hundreds of banks in the agricultural area closed under the strain of those trying years of 1921 to 1929. Thousands of farm mortgages were foreclosed. When agriculture reached the exhaustion point, the source of foreign loans dried up, farm and foreign buying ceased, thousands of factories closed, and millions of workingmen became idle.

The agricultural depression began in 1920. The industrial depression began in 1929, when a weakened and exhausted agriculture could not carry the load any longer. Then industrial unemployment swept over the land; then the American farmer and the American laboring man stumbled on, hand in hand, to the brink of economic chaos and social revolution as the whole house of cards, built on the unsound economic practices of three Republican administrations crumbled in the greatest economic collapse in history—the panic of 1932–33.

The gross agricultural income in the United States was estimated at about $17,000,000,000 in 1929. It ranged between $11,000,000,000 and $12,000,000,000 from 1923 to 1929. In 1930 the gross farm income was $9,454,000,000. In 1931 it was $6,968,000,000, and in 1932 it was $5,337,000,000, a decline of almost 70 percent from the high point in 1919 and of more than 50 percent in 12 years from 1921. In the 3 years from 1921 to 1923 available cash income from farming operations, that is, cash income minus cash production expenses, declined from $5,000,000,00 to barely a billion and a half dollars.

This decline in farm income had far-reaching effects on the flow of business and the credit structures in agricultural areas. Farmers were forced to economize in the purchase of fertilizer, seed, and other products and to defer replacement of machinery. This led to sharp contraction of industrial sales of such products. It is significant that the greatest decline in any single industrial group occurred in the manufacture of agricultural implements.

Moreover, farmers were unable to readjust their tax and debt burdens to correspond with reduction in farm income. Widespread mortgage defaults, unpaid taxes, and bankruptcies followed. These undermined the financial solvency of States and local governments. Forced sales of farms tripled between 1929 and 1932.

I would like to review briefly the legislative record on the tariff and farm relief of the three Republican administrations from 1921 to 1933.

The Fordney Tariff Act of 1921 became a law when President Harding signed it on June 27, 1921. According to our Republican friends, this act was to solve the agricultural problem. Speeches made in Congress in support of the bill indicated the Republican administration believed it would. A higher tariff was the Harding administration's proposed solution of the farm problem, but the entire country knows now that the Fordney Tariff Act did not solve the problem. It made the condition of Agriculture worse.

Several months later, Secretary of Agriculture Henry C. Wallace, father of our distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, insisted that President Harding call a national agricultural conference to discuss the situation. At that time farm mortgage foreclosures were increasing, a wave of bank failures was sweeping over the agricultural areas of the country, and land values and farm prices were declining steadily.

The conference sat during the winter of 1922. It was the first time in the history of the country that farmers were asked to assist in planning for agriculture. More than 300 farmers and 90 other persons representing various agricultural interests attended the conference. A total of 39 legislative recommendations were made to Congress and the President.

Among other things, the farmers asked Congress and the President to take steps immediately to reestablish a fair exchange value for all farm products. The Republican administration answered that request by enacting another tariff bill raising the rates established in 1921. The Tariff Act of 1923 merely increased the farmer's distress by increasing the price of things he bought on the protected and controlled industrial market, while his products sold at the world price, because of uncontrolled surpluses.

Farmers could not prevent or correct the foreign or domestic demand situation. After the World War, wheat and other exportable products were superabundant due to the general inability of farmers to reduce their expanded acres as Europe restored her farm production. By 1925 Europe had generally restored her agriculture to its pre-war productivity. At the same time the wartime expansion in overseas exporting countries continued to press unwanted surpluses on European markets. This situation, coupled with extremely high tariffs in the United States, resulted in the erection of trade barriers in European countries that wanted to restrict the use of foreign products and to protect their domestic agriculture. As agricultural prices declined in world markets, restrictive measures in Europe became more and more prohibitive embracing not only tariffs, import quotas, and domestic consumption restrictions, but numerous other devices—all reducing the volume of foreign trade.

Europe increased her output of wheat from 1,050,000,000 bushels in 1931 to 1,500,000,000 bushels in 1932. In the same period American exports of wheat to Europe declined from 150,000,000 bushels in 1922 to 15,000,000 bushels in 1932. Our exports of hog products, which had exceeded the equivalent of 10,000,000 hogs a year at the close of the World War, declined to barely half that amount by 1932. Our tobacco exports and our cotton exports were reduced sharply as foreign production increased and as European nations turned to sources of supply where high Republican tariffs against European products did not exist. It should be apparent that our foreign market for agricultural products contracted almost to the point of disappearance before 1933 and not since 1933, as many opponents of the Roosevelt administration assert.

The doctrine of the McNary-Haugen bill was in the air in 1923. In 1924 the first McNary-Haugen bill was introduced in Congress. It failed to pass by 40 votes and as if to hide the rising tide of agricultural strength, our rugged Republican individualists handed farmers another meaningless sop in the shape of a 12-cent increase in the tariff on wheat; but although the tariff on wheat was fixed at 42 cents a bushel and on corn at 25 cents a bushel, farm prices continued to decline, farm-mortgage foreclosures continued to increase, and the wave of bank failures remained unabated in the agricultural areas. It is significant, I believe, that with such tariffs in effect, wheat sold for less than 30 cents a bushel in 1932 and corn sold for less than 8 cents a bushel.

Again in 1925, the McNary-Haugen bill was before Congress, but friends of the farmers were unable to get sufficient strength to force a vote in the Republican Congress controlled by the Coolidge administration. In March 1925, President Coolidge addressed the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation. He condemned the McNary-Haugen bill as price fixing, defended the tariff system as a boon to agriculture, and asserted that agriculture was nearly back to normal. However, it took more than words of a Republican President to stop farm foreclosures and bank failures.

A new McNary-Haugen bill appeared in 1926, but it was defeated in the Republican Congress. Finally in that year, businessmen in the country began to show some interest in the farmers' plight. The National Industrial Board representing farming and business interests took note of the business situation and urged stronger legislation for the relief of agriculture. Farm groups became insistent, but the Republican administration did nothing.

In 1927 the McNary-Haugen bill was ushered in again. This time the bipartisan agricultural strength of Democrats and Progressive Republicans was sufficient to push it through Congress, but the bill incurred a veto at the hands of a Republican President, Calvin Coolidge.

The McNary-Haugen bill was passed again in 1928. Again it was vetoed by President Coolidge and from 1928 to 1932 the farmers of America sank deeper and deeper into the mire of the depression. In 1930, after the collapse of industry and with unemployment spreading over the land, the Republicans raised the tariff again. Under the leadership of President Hoover, the Republican Congress passed the infamous Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. In the next 12 months the annual gross income of the American farmer declined from $9,414,000,000 to $6,911,000,000, or more than 25 percent.

In an attempt to save themselves, the farmers raised every bushel of grain and every pound of fiber possible, and produced every possible pound of meat and animal products. Their efforts to meet fixed charges of taxes, interest, and living costs in this way were defeated by still further decline of prices and still lower gross incomes.

During the period of 1916 to 1920, when food prices were high, the farmer gained and held a slight economic advantage over industry. Farm prices advanced faster than the price of the things the farmer buys. The farmer lost this advantage in 1921 and his disadvantage increased steadily until March 4, 1933, when Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States.

During three successive Republican administrations, the American farmer engaged in a losing fight against the effects and results of a high protective tariff policy that finally caused over 40 foreign nations not only in Europe but including Canada and the South American Republics as well to pass retaliatory tariff laws, fix import quotas, and establish embargoes which destroyed almost the last bit of foreign market for our agricultural and industrial products.

Canada raised a high tariff wall against all American products—both manufactured and agricultural, put a tariff of 25 cents a bushel on corn and similar tariffs on other agricultural products; yet they cannot raise corn profitably in Canada. In the fall of 1932, Iowa corn was selling in Iowa for 7 to 12 cents per bushel. Corn was being used as fuel to heat Iowa farm homes and public buildings. At the same time, Canada was paying 35 cents a bushel for inferior corn imported from South Africa and South America. Iowa corn should and would have been purchased by Canada except for the retaliatory tariffs raised by Canada against the tariff enacted by Republican Congresses.

The big manufacturers of America had a way to meet the situation. They simply took some of the millions of dollars they had accumulated under the special-privilege, high-tariff policy of the Republican administrations, went to Canada and other foreign countries, built branch factories, installed new machinery, used foreign raw materials, employed foreign labor, and manufactured the identical products they had formerly manufactured in the United States with American raw materials and American labor. In that way, they avoided the payment of foreign retaliatory tariffs and escaped the limitations of quotas and embargos. This industrial policy brought about the discharge of thousands of American workers from factories and mines. It made it impossible for these workers to purchase the products of farms and to pay a fair price for them. As a result, the American farmer lost a large part of his former domestic market in addition to losing all of his foreign market.

The agricultural record of the Republican Party has been written. It was written during the years 1921 to 1933 in indelible facts that the people of this country, particularly the American farmers, will not forget soon. It is a record of neglect and failure, deceit, and double dealing. The harvest of that record was hundreds of thousands of farm foreclosures, the collapse of farm values, thousands of bank failures, incalculable financial distress and suffering among millions of farm people, utter discouragement and despair in the agricultural areas of the country, and in a large measure the industrial and financial collapse of the country from 1929 to 1932.

Yet, in the face of all that, the Republican Party wrote into its platform in 1932 the following statement:

> Under Republican administration, the position of agriculture was gradually improved.

In accepting the nomination for a second term, President Hoover said:

> The farmer was never so dependent upon its tariff protection for recovery as he is at this time. We shall hold to that.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated President of the United States on March 4, 1933. At that time farm products were selling at the lowest price in 40 years. Iowa farmers were burning corn in their stoves. Public buildings in Iowa were being heated by corn that officials had purchased at 10 cents or less a bushel.

For more than 6 months before President Roosevelt took office, farmers of the United States were on the verge of revolt against economic conditions that had been imposed upon them by Republican administrations. Farm strikes, farm-holiday movements, and open resistance to farm foreclosure sales occurred throughout the country. Distressed farmers organized to keep their homes in the face of steadily increasing distress and hardship. The belief that President Roosevelt and the Democratic Congress in cooperation with newly elected Democratic governors and Democratic State legislatures would do something to help them was the only hope of millions of farm people in those dark days when the powerful forces of depression were tightening around them.

President Roosevelt and his fellow Democrats did not fail the farmers. The President promised action, and he kept his promise. He summoned farm leaders to Washington for conferences with him and with Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace. Three Republican Presidents had denied the farmers what they asked, but President Roosevelt said to the farmers: "Tell us what you want done, and we will do it."

The Agricultural Adjustment Act was written to conform with the ideas of farm leaders and was presented to a special session of Congress in 1933 by the Roosevelt administration.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act became a law May 12, 1933. In that act, Congress declared that an economic emergency existed in part because of the breaking down of farm prices and the resultant disparity between the price of agricultural commodities and other commodities. Congress declared its policy to reestablish prices to farmers at a level that would give agricultural commodities purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the prewar period of 1909–14.

The inability of farmers to adjust production within the limits of effective demand was clearly stated by the Federal Farm Board in its second annual report:

> There are more than 6,000,000 farmers in this country producing according to their own personal decisions. It is without effect to base appeals on what American farming might do if it were all organized as a single unit for it is not so organized. Until farmers are organized for production planning, it is useless to expect them to act as if they were.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act provided a way for millions of farmers to cooperate; to adjust production to demand through voluntary contract between individual producers and the Government. Under these contracts, cooperating farmers agreed to adjust acreage or marketings of farm products for rental or benefit payments.

The principles of the act were tested in the cotton program of 1933, the wheat program of 1934 and 1935, and the corn-hog program of 1934–35. In each of these programs the great majority of producers voluntarily accepted the necessary adjustment and cooperated. Acreage and production were adjusted and export surpluses were reduced.

In view of the known facts regarding the relation of supply of farm products to farm prices and farm income and the relative stability of retail prices of manufactured products as compared with farm prices, it was reasonable to expect that with adjustment of production, farm prices and incomes would rise and would do so much more sharply than retail prices. This expectation was fulfilled by the events. The drought, the Administration's monetary policy, and other conditions played a part, but the adjustment of production was without doubt a major factor in producing the marked rise in farm prices, the increase in farm income and the reduction in disparity between the farm price level and the industrial price level.

This readjustment of farm income was not complete when the Agricultural Adjustment Act was destroyed by the Supreme Court, but a comparison of prices in the winter of 1932–33 and the winter of 1935 shows how well the program succeeded. In December 1932 the price of wheat was 32 cents a bushel. In December 1935 it was $1 a bushel. In December 1932 the farm price of corn was 19 cents a bushel. Corn actually sold as low as 10 and 12 cents, and even 7 cents a bushel. In December 1935 it sold at 53 cents a bushel.

In December 1932 the price of cotton was 5 cents a pound. In December 1935 it was 11 cents a pound and prosperity was returning to the southern cotton districts.

At the close of 1932 the farmer was receiving the lowest price in 54 years for his hogs. The Chicago hog market was $2.73 per hundred pounds. Many farmers in Iowa, where more hogs are raised than in any other State, sold hogs for less than 2 cents a pound. At the close of 1935, the Iowa farmer was getting $9 a hundred for his hogs.

Prices of other farm products advanced in comparison. In addition to all this, under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, hundreds of millions of dollars were paid in benefits to agricultural adjustment contract signers. On March 31, 1936, the total rental and benefit payments to contract signers amounted to $1,135,929,072.23. The total cost of administration of all divisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in Washington and throughout the country totaled only $84,953,267.23 up to March 1935.

Rental and benefit payments to farmers in the State of Iowa through March 31, 1936, were $93,389,410.13. The general administrative expense chargeable directly to the State of Iowa was only $935,126.40 or less than 1 cent for each dollar of payments to farmers. Iowa payments were distributed as follows: $1,187,703.40 to wheat growers, $244,823.54 to sugar-beet growers, $91,956,883.19 to producers of corn and hogs.

Iowa, which has long been the leading corn- and hog-producing State of the Union, received $41,000,000 more in benefits from corn-hog contract payments than the next highest State.

In Iowa and throughout the country every farmer has received approximately $2 more in price increases for every dollar agricultural adjustment contract signers received in rental and crop benefits. All farmers, whether they signed the crop-adjustment contracts or not, shared in the price increases that were brought about by the agricultural-adjustment program.

In 1932 the gross farm income of the United States was $4,328,000,000.

In 1933, the first year of the agricultural-adjustment program, the gross income of American farmers was $5,051,000,000, an increase of 17 percent over 1932.

In 1934, the second year of our agricultural-adjustment program, the gross income of American farmers was $6,100,000,000, an increase of 41 percent over 1932.

In 1935 the gross income of American farmers was $6,900,000,000, and every farmer in the United States was expecting it to increase still further when the Supreme Court handed down its unfortunate decision on the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that this decision was well taken. I have always agreed with the minority opinion. The majority decision of the Court was based upon the premise that in a Government of delegated powers, all powers that are not delegated are prohibited. In 1857 the Supreme Court used exactly the same reasoning in the famous Dred Scott decision to deny the power of Congress to regulate slavery in the Territories. No power to regulate slavery in the Territories was given in the Constitution; therefore, legislation for that purpose was prohibited, said the Court. Yet, today, virtually every student of American history agrees that the Constitution granted implied power to regulate slavery and that the judicial denial of it was the most calamitous act of the Supreme Court in American history, helping to bring on the Civil War.

The great Abraham Lincoln took the view that the Dred Scott decision was a tragic abuse of judicial power.

In the decision on the Agricultural Adjustment Act the majority of the Court asserted a principle which the Supreme Court has reversed every time it has come up since the Nation was founded, namely, the right of the Supreme Court to judge whether an appropriation is for the general welfare or whether it may be declared unconstitutional on the ground that it is for local benefit. Always before the Supreme Court has stated that it rests with Congress alone to decide what use of money is for the general welfare. The majority of the Court reversed that historic policy and declared boldly that the farmers' problems are unrelated to the general welfare.

Six Justices said they can see no connection between agricultural prostration and the flow of interstate commerce, yet almost every school child in the Nation knows that the collapse of American agriculture, due to overproduction and disordered marketing, was a major factor in the economic collapse of 1929–33 and brought about the closing of thousands of factories and the dismissal of millions of workmen.

In all the years during which the Federal Government, acting through the Department of Agriculture by virtue of acts of Congress and appropriations by the Congress, has used its power to increase the production of agricultural commodities, that power has never been questioned. The courts have never interfered in the use of those powers. No one has ever suggested that the Federal Government was violating State rights, but on January 6, 1936, the Supreme Court of the United States, by a vote of 6 to 3, declared that an act which provided for adjustment of agricultural production through voluntary cooperation of farmers with the assistance of the Federal Government is unconstitutional because it invaded the rights of the States.

It is evidently the opinion of the Court, as now constituted, that the Federal Government has the power to stimulate production but not to help farmers obtain balanced production in the interest of the general welfare and that the States only have the power to control production.

Not only do I think that the decision of the Court on the Agricultural Adjustment Act was wrong but I believe the Court's peremptory order for the refund of $300,000,000 of impounded processing taxes was indefensible. There is no doubt in my mind but that the processors of agricultural products upon which taxes were levied either collected these taxes from the producers by reducing the price to the farmers or from the consumer by increasing the retail price. In the first months after the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed a substantial part of the processing tax was probably paid by the producer because large surpluses then existing produced a buyer's market. However, after the Agricultural Adjustment Act became fully effective, these surpluses were reduced and brought within reasonable limits. Then the processor was forced to pay higher prices to the farmers, but he protected himself by passing the tax along to the consumer.

It is to the credit of some processors, perhaps with the major exception of the great meat-packing corporations of the country, that they do not look upon these impounded processing taxes as their rightful property and will welcome any fair method of dealing with them.

It is obviously impossible ever to return to the consumers or the producers the processing taxes that were collected from them under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, but it is possible to reclaim that money, or a large percent of it, for the Federal Government's use and indirectly for the benefit of the consumers and the producers who paid it. This is to be accomplished under the provisions of the "windfall" tax of the Revenue Act of 1936.

Fortunately for the farmers of America they had a true friend in the White House, a sympathetic Democratic Party in control of both Houses of Congress on Capitol hill, and a distinguished agricultural administrator at the head of the Department of Agriculture.

Immediately after the Supreme Court handed down its decision on the Agricultural Adjustment Act, President Roosevelt, members of the Agriculture Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and Secretary Wallace and his assistants in the Department of Agriculture and Agricultural Adjustment Administration conferred on steps they might be able to take to overcome the situation which endangered the farmers of America and the entire economic recovery program. In those days every Member of Congress from the agricultural districts of the country received many letters and telegrams from farmers who realized the import of the Court's decision and who understood the disaster awaiting agriculture unless some new remedy could be provided by Congress to avert it.

President Roosevelt, Secretary Wallace, and their assistants did in 1936 what they did in 1933. They summoned representatives of agricultural organizations and of the agricultural press to Washington for a conference. From this conference and from studies of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the Agriculture Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives the Soil Conservation Act was evolved. This act was passed by Congress in a form which every friend of agriculture hopes will meet any test that may be made of it in the courts. I hope it will, and I hope and believe that it will successfully take the place of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and insure steady prosperity to the American farmer and stability to the food supply of the Nation through its long-range provisions.

Briefly, the plan provides for grants by the Federal Government to the States, which, in turn, may reward farmers who follow practices of soil conservation on their farms. Since some time will necessarily elapse before a sufficient number of States can enact laws to take advantage of this Federal act, provision is made for the grants to go from the Federal Government direct to individual farmers who make application and who show by their records that they have met conditions laid down by the Department of Agriculture.

Not only will this plan help protect and conserve the land that is still productive, but it should go a long way toward maintaining a healthy supply and demand situation in the export commodities. The plan should assist farmers in practicing the kind of good farming that they have long wanted to follow but were unable because of the necessity from month to month and year to year of making both ends meet. When assisted by the Government in producing the soil-building crops and practicing the soil-conservation methods which are needed both for the present-day welfare of agriculture and the welfare of the Nation in the future, farmers will be under less pressure to produce surpluses of crops which are not needed. If fair prices for farm products are thus achieved and maintained the present level of farm income will be maintained and I hope improved.

Not only did this Congress take immediate steps to pass new legislation to take the place of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, but it recognized the moral obligations to farmers who had signed agricultural-adjustment contracts. It appropriated $256,000,000 by a special act to pay those contracts in full.

During the World War farmers were encouraged to plow up land which never should have been plowed in order to produce food for our Allies. Surely now the Federal Government is justified in encouraging the return of that land to grass and trees and to make it worth the farmers' while to improve the soil's fertility by planting soil-building crops. This generation owes a duty to generations yet unborn to hand down to them an agricultural heritage which will supply this country in the future and on which those generations may make a living Could anything be more squarely in line with the words of the preamble of the Constitution:

To promote the general welfare.

Only those who are unsympathetic to the welfare of the farmer and the country as a whole can logically oppose the agricultural program of the Roosevelt administration. This program has brought order out of chaos. It has enabled millions of farmers to retain their homes and to gradually regain financial independence. The increased buying power of agriculture is reflected today in higher factory pay rolls, increased factory production, remarkable increases in sales of manufactured products, and an improvement in all general business conditions. Over a long period of years from 1920 to 1935, farm income and labor income have been practically equal in this country. They rise and fall together. When farm income is high, labor income is high; when farm income is low, labor income is low. It is to the interest of workers in the cities that farm income increase because the income of workers will increase also.

The financial pages of any newspaper tell the story today of what has happened in America in the last 3 years. Once more millions of men are back at work in factories. These factories are using material raised on the farms of the United States or lumber from our forests or metal from our mines. Millions of men are transporting these raw materials to the factories, and millions of men are transporting the finished products to every part of our country, and the American farmer, with his renewed buying power, is again taking his place as leading consumer.

Action to increase the income of farmers was quick and effective under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Under authority granted in the act, the Secretary of Agriculture approved an emergency hog-marketing program and a corn-loan program. The Government purchased 7,000,000 pigs that would have flooded the market later as mature fat hogs. These pigs were killed and the edible meat was used for unemployment relief. Farmers benefited therefrom by an increase in the price of marketable hogs. Corn that would have been fed at a loss to growing pigs was conserved on the farms, where it was available to feed livestock during the severe drought of 1934. Had it not been for this wise conservation measure, millions of surplus hogs would have been fed in 1933 at tremendous financial loss to farmers and millions of hogs would have died of starvation in 1934 because there would have been no feed for them.

The corn-loan program made it unnecessary for the farmers to sell their corn to get money. There was an abundant supply of corn in most of the Corn Belt during the winter of 1933–34. In connection with the effort the Agricultural Adjustment Administration was making to advance the price of corn, it was desirable to keep surpluses of corn off the market not only to prevent the market price from being depressed but also to keep the grain out of the hands of speculators and on the farms so that farmers might continue to receive the full increase in price that was to result from the Agricultural Adjustment program.

With corn selling at 8 cents to 15 cents a bushel in November 1932 and at approximately 35 cents a bushel in November 1933, the Secretary of Agriculture announced the corn-loan plan. Corn was sealed on farms and 45 cents a bushel was loaned to the owners. In the fall of 1934 corn loans were made on the basis of 55 cents a bushel. During the past winter they have been made on the basis of 45 cents a bushel.

The corn-loan program kept millions of bushels of corn off a depressed market. Farmers who needed money to pay their taxes, interest, and living expenses were loaned 10 cents more a bushel than the market price when the corn-loan program was first put into effect, and they have loaned an amount reasonably comparative to the market price in the last 2 years. All these loans have been paid before or when they came due. Not a dime has been lost by the Government.

With Iowa farmers suffering from the financial distress brought on by 12 long years of Republican Party misrule, the Roosevelt administration, under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, loaned $57,150,000 on corn in the State of Iowa during the winter of 1933–34. At the time the loan was announced, the farm price of corn in Iowa was 35 cents a bushel. At the announced expiration of the loan, July 15, 1934, the price of corn had reached 51 cents a bushel, but in the meantime, thousands of farmers had paid their loans and sold their corn at prices as high as 75 cents a bushel.

Millions of bushels of corn sealed on farms under the corn-loan program were in the hands of farmers in the drought area when needed. The sun burned the corn and other crops in the fields, but corn on which the Government had loaned 45 cents or 55 cents a bushel was available in the cribs. Thus, these farmers had feed for their livestock at a reasonable cost when otherwise they would have had to pay grain speculators upward of $1 per bushel.

Many farmers did not seal all their corn; some farmers sealed none; but all farmers benefited by the price increase that followed not only in the price of corn but of livestock and other farm products. The corn-loan program has been justly acclaimed a great success. It never could have been possible except for the Agricultural Adjustment program under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I hope it may be continued equally as successfully under the Soil Conservation Act of 1936.

A discussion of the farm program of the Roosevelt administration would not be complete without referring to the farm credit measures that have been enacted. The best available statistics indicate that on March 4, 1933, more than 2,500,000 farms in the United States were mortgaged. Of this number, more than 500,000 were subject to foreclosure. The old Farm Board had been in charge of the credit activities of the Government for farmers. It had become stagnant with maladministration. In 1932, when foreclosures were every-day occurrences in farming areas, the Farm Board loaned only $28,000,000 on farms. In several middle-western States farmers assumed control of their own destinies by preventing foreclosure sales through force.

In convention in 1932 the Democratic Party gave assurance to the American farmers that constructive efforts would be made to cope with the problem of agricultural credit.

The Democratic Congress in 1933 in setting up the Farm Credit Administration, changed the situation. Maladministration had become so deeply imbedded in the organization taken over by the Farm Credit Administration that immediate progress was greatly impeded, but the number of loans increased rapidly. Farmers' homes were saved. To show how serious the farm credit situation had affected the national credit situation, it is almost necessary to review some facts concerning general agricultural credit.

It was inevitable that the sudden and tremendous decrease in farm incomes should have caused a serious strain on the farm-credit agencies which had already been weakened by the long price decline and general liquidation which had characterized agriculture since 1920. A gross income which had been estimated at about 17 billions of dollars in 1919, and which had varied between eleven and twelve billions from 1923 to 1929, had suddenly dropped, in 3 years, to less than half of that amount—to $5,337,000,000 in 1932. Local credit agencies were largely dependent for their leading power on the flow of income into their communities, and when farm prices went down, this flow decreased or dried up. By the beginning of 1933, demand deposits of country banks, following closely the decrease in farm prices, had fallen to about 50 percent of the average for 1923–25. As farm prices advanced, and gross farm income increased to $6,406,000,000 for 1933 and $7,300,000,000 for 1934, demand deposits rose correspondingly.

Thus, when the flow of farm income was diminished, old loans could not be collected and new loans were not made. What in ordinary times was actually a very large revolving fund of short-term credit had ceased to revolve. Non-real-estate loans, upon which farmers and banks alike had relied heavily for general short-term financing, decreased sharply as farmers became unable to pay their old loans or to offer adequate security for new ones. Moreover, the pressure upon rural credit institutions was disproportionately high, because payments of a fixed nature, such as taxes, interest on mortgages, and necessary supplies, many of which had to be made outside the community, showed only a slight decrease.

The decrease in the values of farm products had an equally serious effect both upon the supply of long-term farm-mortgage credit and upon the institutions by which it was furnished. The average per-acre value of farm real estate, which had been slowly declining since 1920, dropped abruptly from 1930 to 1933 with the fall in farm prices, and commercial banks and insurance companies, as well as the Federal agencies which had been set up to supply mortgage credit to agriculture, were faced with a serious decline in the value of the collateral securing their advances.

In 1920 the index number for the average value per acre of all farm real estate in the United States reached the high point of 170 percent of the average 1912–14 value. It dropped to 157 percent in 1921, and from then until 1930 the decline was gradual. However, between 1930 and 1933 the index dropped from 115 percent to 73 percent.

Actually the outstanding mortgage contracts were, with the drastic reduction of farm incomes, impossible of fulfillment. The prevailing type of mortgage was for a comparatively short term, averaging 4.7 years for other than land-bank loans, which comprised less than one-fifth of the total. Approximately $1,250,000,000 of farm mortgages were normally falling due each year and required refinancing. Decreased real-estate values and widespread delinquency in 1932 and 1933, however, disqualified many loans for renewal by their creditor agencies and other sources for refunding were not available. Collection of loans and of current interest due on them became generally impossible. On January 1, 1933, 45.2 percent of a representative group of 12,000 mortgaged farms, and 52.2 percent of the mortgage debt upon them, were reported delinquent.

The result of these combined factors was a wave of commercial bank failures in the rural areas, increasing in numbers as farm prices continued to decline, until the whole banking structure had collapsed. Many agricultural communities were left without credit facilities of any sort, and even those banks which survived found it necessary to make radical changes in their investment policies, which even further curtailed the credit available. It was apparent that a more stabilized farm income with which to offset the fixed payments required to enable these institutions to keep their credits in manageable condition was essential to preserve the financial institutions and to keep the credit structure generally intact. During the decade ending December 31, 1932, bank failures had largely been confined to the agricultural areas, 56 percent of the total having occurred in the North Central States and 31 percent in the South.

The Federal credit agencies, particularly the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks, were in a correspondingly dangerous condition. In 1932 these two groups of institutions held farm-mortgage loans amounting to $1,536,000,000, or about 18 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt. The delinquent loans of the Federal land banks increased from $48,000,000 in 1925 to $594,000,000 in 1932, and the percentage of their loans which were delinquent increased from 4.8 percent to 53.2 percent during the same period.

The "distress assets" of these institutions had also been increasing rapidly. By 1932 they equaled 8.3 percent of the amount of outstanding loans of the Federal land banks and 13.4 percent of the amount of the outstanding loans of the joint-stock land banks. In December 1931 the Federal land banks owned land valued at $24,347,681.11 and held sheriffs' certificates, and so forth, on $13,734,819.44 more. By the end of the following year the land owned had increased to $35,608,099.76, and the sheriffs' certificates, and so forth, to $25,492,411.84, increases of 46 percent and 86 percent, respectively. The land owned by the joint-stock land banks, excluding those in liquidation through receivership, increased from $15,856,986.13 in 1931 to $29,963,691.49 in 1932, an increase of 87 percent, and sheriffs' certificates, and so forth, increased from $4,163,016.79 at the end of 1931 to $13,169,125.66, an increase of 214 percent. Three of the latter banks had been forced into receivership and many of the others were actually in voluntary liquidation because of the necessity of purchasing their own bonds at a discount in order to show a profit.

Moreover, these institutions were becoming less able to furnish the credit which they were intended to supply. The price at which their bonds could be sold fell to a point where they could not relend at a rate high enough to meet operating expenses. The annual amount of new loans by the Federal land banks decreased from an average of approximately $133,000,000 in the 3-year period ending in 1927 to $28,000,000 in 1932, and those by the joint-stock land banks decreased from $112,000,000 to $2,181,000 during the same period.

The effect of decreased farm income and depressed real-estate values on the lending of life-insurance companies had an equally serious effect on the credit supply. These agencies have supplied or held a greater amount of long-term mortgage credit to agriculture than any other single class of institutions; 40 of the largest of them in September 1932 had outstanding $1,433,000,000 in farm-mortgage loans. However, the catastrophic decline in the value of farm products and farm real estate and the high percentage of delinquencies had caused many of them to withdraw their lending from this field and had caused others to curtail their investments drastically. The volume of new investments in farm-mortgage loans reported by 25 insurance companies which had averaged $3,130,000 per week in the last half of 1928 dropped to $2,827,000 in 1930; $2,111,000 in 1931; $904,000 in 1932; and to $600,000 in the early part of 1933. The percentage of total new investments which these companies placed in farm mortgages averaged over 9 percent from 1928 to 1932, but fell sharply in the late months of 1933 to 2.2 percent. Their farm holdings, in consequence, decreased from 17.7 percent of their total assets in 1925 to 8.9 percent in 1932.

This decreased supply of credit could be supplemented in part by increased Federal emergency advances, and such advances on a large scale were made. The Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of May 12, 1933, authorized $2,000,000,000 of bonds by the Federal land banks and provided a sum of $200,000,000 for land bank commissioner loans for cases in which special risks were involved or for refinancing indebtedness too large to be covered by Federal land-bank loans. The Farm Credit Act of June 16, 1933, established a revolving fund of $120,000,000 in addition to setting up 12 production credit corporations, each with an initial capital of $7,500,000 subscribed for by the United States, and 1 central and 12 regional banks for cooperatives. By December 31, 1933, the total volume of outstanding credit of the various lending institutions under the jurisdiction of the Farm Credit Administration amounted to $1,856,110,403.

When it is recognized, however, that, in the absence of an improvement in farm incomes, such advances can be essentially only palliative, the direct and intimate relationship between the increase in the prices of agricultural products and the stability of the credit structure becomes even more clearly evident. Unquestionably, emergency refinancing by direct Federal loans was necessary to prevent absolute bankruptcy throughout large parts of the country and the tremendous losses which that would entail; but the essential problem, that of increasing the farmers' incomes to a point where the ordinary credit system could again be able to function properly, could never be solved by such means. Borrowing is not and cannot be a substitute for income. The tremendous relative increase in fixed charges and the decreased returns per acre from 1920 on had in reality forced large numbers of farmers to live on their capital, actually operating their farms at a loss. Only by increasing the purchasing power of the farmer could the stability of the financial system be restored and the large investments which the Federal Government had made in this field ever be liquidated.

More important insofar as inaugurating agricultural recovery was the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The title of the Agricultural Adjustment Act stated that its first purpose was "to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power." The mechanism provided by the act to promote adjustment of production of basic products was based upon a voluntary contract between individual producers and the Government. Under these contracts cooperating farmers agreed to adjust acreage or marketings in return for rental or benefit payments.

The principles of the act were tested in the cotton program in 1933, the wheat program in 1934 and 1935, and the corn-hog program in 1934 and 1935. In each of these programs the great majority of producers voluntarily accepted the necessary adjustment and cooperated in the program; the acreage was readjusted; production was likewise readjusted; and the export surpluses were markedly reduced.

In view of the known facts regarding the relation of supplies of farm products to farm prices and farm income, and the relative stability of retail prices as compared with farm prices, it was entirely reasonable to expect that with adjustment of production farm prices and incomes would rise and would do so much more sharply than retail prices. This expectation was borne out by the events. It is recognized that the drought, the monetary policy, and other conditions also influenced developments, so that the rise in farm prices and farm incomes has been greater than might have been expected from the operations of the adjustment program alone. The adjustment of production and consequent reduction of surpluses, however, was no doubt a major factor in producing the accompanying marked rise in farm prices, the increase in farm income from the products concerned, and the greater relative increase in farm prices than in retail prices.

Although the receipt of cash benefit payments contributed materially to the increasing farm income since the act was passed, the major increase in farm income was due to the resulting improvement in the market situation and the consequent better prices for farm products. Of the increases in farm income in 1933 and 1934 over the low level of 1932, more than two-thirds was due to the improved market position and less than one-third to direct cash payments as such.

In view of the known facts concerning the relation between farm income and expenditures, it was entirely reasonable to expect that an increase in farm income would be accompanied by economic recovery in related industries. From 1929 to 1932, as gross income to farmers declined, their expenditures for farm supplies such as feed, fertilizer, and implements had likewise fallen. Registrations of automobiles in farm States fell 73 percent from 1929 to 1933. Their funds for purchases of products for family consumption had fallen even more sharply. Mail-order sales—largely sales to farmers—had declined 37 percent, and department-store sales, in cities located in several agricultural regions, had declined 30 to 43 percent. Farm machinery and buildings were badly run down; purchases and repairs in 1931 and 1932 had replaced less than half the depreciation during those years.

Since 1932, the level of mail-order sales increased 54 percent; sales of department stores in predominately agricultural regions expanded from 13 to 21 percent; farmers' expenditures for machinery and buildings increased 90 percent; and new-car registrations in typical agricultural States more than doubled. Shipments of industrial products from industrial States to agricultural States increased 39 percent from 1932 to 1934, and shipments of goods used by farmers in their farm operations increased 75 percent. In automobiles, the expansion in sales in rural areas was much more than in industrial areas. In the first half of 1935, new-car registrations in agricultural States were 147 percent larger than in the first half of 1933, whereas in predominately industrial States, the increase was 97 percent.

During the decline from 1929 to 1932, industrial activity, employment, and pay rolls in industries producing these products had fallen off as sales had declined. It was reasonable to expect that restored farm income and purchases would lead to renewed production and employment in these industries. This expectation, likewise, was borne out by the subsequent developments. From 1932 to 1934 the purchasing power of employees in the farm machinery industry increased 136 percent; in automobiles, 77 percent; in fertilizer, 56 percent; in cotton goods, 61 percent.

It was logical to expect that the recovery in agriculture and in related industries would be reflected broadly in other industries, due to the direct and indirect effects of renewed spending both by farmers and by workers in industries related to farming. A major proportion of the industrial unemployed were out of work directly or indirectly because of farmers' reduced ability to buy. While by no means all the recovery in pay rolls and employment from 1932 to date can be ascribed to the increased income in agriculture, it is significant that marked increases in the buying power of factory pay rolls occurred in industries directly affected by farm buying power; that similar marked increases occurred in related industries, such as iron and steel products, 62 percent; general machinery, 58 percent; rubber, 40 percent; chemicals, 25 percent. This improvement was reflected generally through other industries. The physical volume of industrial production expanded 24 percent from 1932 to 1934; the volume of car loadings increased 11 percent; and factory employment increased 24 percent.

During the period of declining farm prices, credit institutions collapsed generally in rural regions. It was reasonable to believe that increases in farm incomes would enable farmers to meet their taxes and interest payments, and to cease their drains on rural bank balances, and that the higher prices of farm products would raise land values, increase the security behind farm loans, and so stabilize rural credit conditions. These expectations have been confirmed by subsequent experience. Improvement in business began in the Cotton Belt, as the first adjustment program got under way. Commercial failures in farm regions have shrunk to a small fraction of their previous level; deposits in country banks have risen sharply, and values of farm land have recovered materially.

That the increase in farm income was a very important factor in the business recovery which has taken place since 1933 is now generally recognized by economists and financiers.

It is generally conceded that the impetus to the general business improvement originated on the farms, in the improved relationship between farm and industrial prices, which gave farmers greater ability to purchase the products of industry.

The increase in farm prices and income was calculated to expand incomes of industrial workers to a greater extent that it would increase living costs. The foregoing facts make it clear, I believe, that the provisions of the Agriculture Relief Acts, under discussion, were soundly constructed to promote not only the welfare of agriculture but that of industry generally.

By way of summary, this conclusion can be made even more plain. The exceedingly low prices of farm products prevailing in 1932 did not mean simply that consumers could secure goods at low cost. On the contrary, such prices meant that farmers had lost in large measure their ability to buy industrial products; that industrial workers were without employment; and that the production and exchange of products between city and country was rapidly coming to a standstill. The expectation that increased prices and higher incomes to farmers would result in expanded production and employment in industry was supported by the experience in the last preceding depression. An expansion in agricultural purchasing power in 1921 to 1922 was a large factor in bringing about subsequent expansion in purchasing power of other groups and emergence from the first phase of the 1920–21 industrial depression. That expectation was further supported by the fact that the decline in farm income from 1929 to 1932 had been accompanied by a corresponding decline in the income of factory workers. It has been confirmed by the fact that the increase in farm income from 1932 to date has been accompanied by an almost exactly corresponding increase in the income of industrial workers.

Briefly, this is the record of the agricultural program of the Roosevelt administration from March 4, 1933, to now, with particular reference to benefits that have accrued to farmers of the Central West. The agricultural program of the Roosevelt administration has been popular with the farmers. It has been a Democratic program from the start. The farmers told President Roosevelt and Congress what they wanted. It was given to them. Insofar as possible, farmers have administered the program through local associations in their own counties. Before the Agricultural Adjustment Act was declared unconstitutional, almost 3,000,000 farmers voted in four referendums to continue the program. More than 86 percent of the votes were favorable. It is my opinion that the farmers of the United States will go to the polls in November and record an overwhelming majority for the reelection of President Roosevelt and his administration who have enacted into law and have administered this program.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, cash receipts from the sale of principal farm products in Wisconsin increased from $158,016,000 in 1932 to $251,152,000 in 1935, including $7,077,000 in rental and benefit payments. This is an increase of 59 percent. Cash receipts represent approximately 97 percent of the total farm cash income from production.

Price changes during the period from 1932 to 1935 on certain selected commodities, which brought about a considerable share of the increased cash receipts indicated above, were as follows: Wheat, bushel, 53 cents in 1932, and in 1935, 95 cents; rye, bushel, 34 cents in 1932 and 43 cents in 1935; corn, bushel, 36 cents in 1932, and in 1935, 65 cents; oats, bushel, 20 cents in 1932, and 30 cents in 1935; barley, bushel, 35 cents in 1932 and 55 cents in 1935; buckwheat, bushel, 45 cents in 1932, and 52 cents in 1935; flaxseed, bushel, 93 cents in 1932, and $1.40 in 1935; potatoes, bushel, 24 cents in 1932, and 50 cents in 1935; apples, bushel, 64 cents in 1932, and 66 cents in 1935; hogs, hundredweight, $3.30 in 1932, and $8.60 in 1935; beef cattle, hundredweight, $3.05 in 1932, and $5.10 in 1935; veal calves, hundredweight, $4.06 in 1932 and $6.90 in 1935; sheep, hundredweight, $1.75 in 1932, and $3.10 in 1935; wool, pound, 10 cents in 1932, and 21 cents in 1935; chickens, pound, $0.096 in 1932, and $0.144 in 1935; and eggs, dozen, $0.138 in 1932, and $0.230 in 1935.

BUTTER, MILK, AND CHEESE

The farm price of butterfat during the first 4 months of this year, 1936, was 74 percent higher than that for 1933. The wholesale price of milk was 45 percent higher; the wholesale price of cheese was 40 percent higher than in 1933. Comparing the present price situation with what it was in March 1933, we find the farm price of butterfat for the first 4 months of 1936 was 117 percent higher than in March 1933; the farm price of milk at wholesale was 72 percent higher than in March 1933; the wholesale price of cheese was 72 percent higher than in March 1933; and the wholesale price of 92-score butter at Chicago was 84 percent higher than in March 1933.

Farm prices for the country as a whole increased from 65 to 108 percent of the pre-war level during the period of 1932–35. In 1935, farm prices averaged 74 percent of their 1929 level. The low point occurred in March 1933, when prices were only 55 percent of pre-war, whereas in December 1935, they averaged 110 percent of that level.

These figures do not include rental and benefit payments. The gain in exchange value of farm products per unit was somewhat less than the gain in farm prices, since prices farmers pay for commodities used in living and production also advanced about 17 percent during the period. The exchange value, per unit of farm products, increased from 61 percent of the pre-war level in 1932 to 86 percent in 1935, a gain of about 41 percent.

FARM LAND UP IN VALUE

A new appreciation of farm real estate in Wisconsin has been one result of increased farm income. For the first time in several years, the number of voluntary farm sales and trades showed an upturn for the year ending in March 1935. The number of forced farm sales declined from 40.4 per thousand for the year ending March 15, 1933, to 24.5 per thousand for the year ending March 15, 1935. For the first time since 1920, the decline in value of farm real estate per acre halted in the year ending March 1, 1933, when it stood at a low of 80, the State average value from 1912 to 1914 being 100. From this low of 80 in 1933, the estimated value per acre rose to 82 for the year ending March 1, 1935. Further improvements in these respects are indicated for the current year.

SOIL CONSERVATION UNDER A. A. A.

The programs of agricultural adjustment, from their launching in the spring of 1933, were concerned with good use of the land of cooperating farmers, as well as with adjustment of crop acreage in line with effective demand. Farm leaders and administration officials recognized from the start that relieving a proportion of farm land from the soil-exhausting burden of major crop production created an unprecedented opportunity for putting this land to the soil-conserving uses which farm specialists had been advocating for many years. The first corn-hog contract—that for the 1934 crop year—authorized use of the rented acreage only—

For planting additional permanent pasture, for soil-improving and erosion-preventing crops not to be harvested, for resting or fallowing the land, for weed eradication, or for planting farm woodlots.

The first wheat contract contained similar provisions regarding the rented acreage. The cotton contract for 1934–35 specified use of the rented acres only for—

Soil-improving crops, erosion-preventing crops, food crops for consumption by the producer on his farm; feed crops for the production of livestock or livestock products for consumption or use by the producer on his farm, or fallowing, or such other uses as may be permitted by the Secretary of Agriculture or his authorized agent.

Food and feed crops for home use were authorized on rented acres in the South, as it was recognized that the standard of farm living in that region might thereby be improved. The tobacco contracts further specified that the total acreage planted to commercial crops on a given farm be not increased over the acreage during the base period less the amount of the rented acreage.

These provisions meant a real net increase in the proportion of land on a given farm that would be put to less intensive uses through the adjustment contract.

In the 1934 crop year, the first in which the adjustment programs were in full swing, farmers agreed to shift their production on nearly 36,000,000 acres. These shifted acres represented 1 out of every 9 acres of cultivated land in the country. Farmers in Wisconsin in 1934 shifted more than 194,000 acres from the production of corn, tobacco, and wheat.

CATTLE-DISEASE ERADICATION

Milk has been the most important single source of farm income in Wisconsin for several years. Since 1932 the annual cash income from it has averaged nearly $100,000,000; milk producers are, consequently, interested in measures for the health of their herds.

Approximately $50,000,000 of Agricultural Adjustment Administration funds have been made available for use in the United States in eradicating cattle diseases, primarily bovine tuberculosis, Bang's disease, and mastitis. This work is being done in cooperation with the Bureau of Animal Industry. As of December 31, 1935, some 1,133,000 cattle in Wisconsin had been given the tuberculin test and approximately 1,112,000 the agglutination test for Bang's disease. Of the $150,000 allocated for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis in this State, $130,998.49 had been expended in operating expenses and indemnities as of December 31, 1935. Wisconsin was allocated $4,000,000 for the eradication of Bang's disease, more than was received by any other State, and of this amount indemnities and operating expenses as of December 31 last, totaled $2,907,468.

EXTENT OF FARMER PARTICIPATION IN PROGRAMS

From the inauguration of the adjustment programs in 1933 through January 6, 1936, a total of 111,070 crop-adjustment contracts, signed by Wisconsin farmers, had been accepted by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Of this number of contracts, 78,090 were corn-hog, 3,225 were wheat, 24,682 were cigar tobacco, and 5,073 were sugar beet.

Four important referenda among producers were held in Wisconsin during the continuation of the adjustment programs. During the first 2 weeks of October 1934 corn-hog producers were asked whether they favored an adjustment program for 1935. In this referendum, returns showed that 16,401 producers favored a 1935 program, while 3,260 opposed. A Nation-wide wheat referendum was held on May 25, 1935, in which farmers were asked: "Are you in favor of a wheat-production adjustment program to follow the present one which expires with the 1935 crop year?" In Wisconsin 868 votes were cast by producers, of which 614, or about 71 percent, favored a program and 254 votes opposed. In the early summer of 1935 cigar-tobacco producers voted upon a continuation of an adjustment program after the ending of the current crop year. In Wisconsin approximately 8,483 producers voted in this referendum, of whom 8,107, or 96 percent, favored the program's continuation. The last referendum in this State was that conducted on October 26, 1935, in which corn-hog producers were asked whether they favored a corn-hog program for 1936. Official returns indicated that 19,162 producers favored such a program, while 2,190 opposed.

SURPLUS REMOVAL OF DAIRY PRODUCTS

In addition to surplus reduction through adjustment programs, surpluses of several farm products have been purchased by the Government and removed from the market in order to support prices for these products. These commodities have for the most part been distributed through relief channels.

The program for removing surplus agricultural products from commercial channels was begun late in 1933. It was coordinated with the drought-relief activities during the drought of 1934. The program included purchases for relief distribution, of hogs and pork products, dairy products, and sugar.

The expenditures by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for the removal of surplus dairy products in the United States and Wisconsin amounted to $23,261,673.62 down to April 30, 1936. Of this sum $1,831,359.19 went to purchasing surplus Wisconsin cheese; $965,144 went to purchasing surplus Wisconsin evaporated milk; and $233,974.47 went to purchasing Wisconsin surplus dry skim milk.

These surplus-removal activities in Wisconsin undoubtedly had some effect in the increase of prices of dairy products. The price of wholesale milk rose from 88 cents per hundredweight in 1932 to $1.30 per hundredweight in 1935; that of farm butter, from 21 to 29 cents per pound; and that of butterfat from 22 to 31 cents per pound.

THE DROUGHT EMERGENCY

Wisconsin was one of the States that suffered from the drought of 1934, 19 counties of the State being within the emergency area. In this emergency, A. A. A. rental and benefit payments, calculated on the farmers' production during a previous base period rather than upon the current year's production, served as a form of crop insurance. For their 1934 corn crop, reduced to 73,904,000 bushels by the drought, Wisconsin farmers received only $280,000 at the market; but their rental and benefit payments, acting as crop-income insurance, brought their cash income from that crop to $1,979,000. The 1934 wheat crop in Wisconsin was reduced to 1,647,000 bushels by the drought. Without crop income insurance payments, wheat producers would have received a cash return at the market of only $294,000, or $27,000 less than they received for the 1932 wheat crop of 2,109,000 bushels. With their crop income insurance payments, however, they received $335,000 for this 1934 wheat crop, or $14,000 more than for their 1932 crop.

The drought threatened Wisconsin farmers with the loss of thousands of cattle by thirst and starvation. On June 19, 1934, the Emergency Appropriation Act was approved. It allotted $525,000,000 to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for financing a drought program to relieve distress in certain areas of the United States. The object of the program was (1) to maintain the foundation for a balanced or diversified farming system in the drought areas, (2) to preserve animals or herds of high-producing quality, (3) to relieve some of the financial load carried by both borrower and lender, and (4) to perform these tasks quickly, efficiently, and economically. The purchases and disposition of cattle was conducted jointly by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the Bureau of Animal Industry, the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, and the Federal Emergency Administration through the local emergency relief agencies. In Wisconsin approximately 57,000 head of cattle were purchased under the emergency livestock purchase program at a cost to the Federal Government of about $866,100.

In the seed-conservation program the A. A. A. acquired about 18,000,000 bushels of grain for seed in the Nation's drought-stricken areas. The cost to the Government of purchasing and selling these seeds amounted to about $19,000,000. The seed, later offered for sale, was accumulated to meet an emergency and was intended to supplement rather than supplant locally obtainable supplies. In Wisconsin alone more than $263,000 were spent in this work.

FARMERS AT THE BUYING COUNTERS

The extent to which increased farm income during the past 3 years enabled farmers to increase their purchases of city-made goods is reflected in several ways.

New automobile registrations in Wisconsin during the period 1932–35 were approximately as follows: 29,932 in 1932; 33,719 in 1933; 50,321 in 1934; and 85,686 in 1935. The increase from 1932 to 1935 was 186 percent.

According to Automobile Facts and Figures, a publication of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association, the 1934 retail automobile sales gain in Wisconsin was greatest in small towns and on farms. From 1933 to 1934 new passenger-car registrations on farms and in towns under 10,000 increased 50 percent, whereas in towns over 10,000 the increase was 41 percent.

New automobile purchases, among other things, meant an increased gasoline consumption. According to the American Petroleum Institute, consumption rose from 387,490,000 gallons in 1933 to 442,444,000 gallons in 1935, an increase of 14 percent.

Sales of new, ordinary, paid-up life insurance in Wisconsin increased 14 percent, from $112,947,000 in 1933 to $129,019,000 in 1935.

Along with these indexes of increased business activity, resulting in part from renewed farm purchasing power, there has been another. Monthly statements issued by the Federal Reserve System indicate that debits to individual accounts increased greatly from 1933 to 1935. For 1933, the debits in the Chicago Federal Reserve district amounted to $32,129,366,000, but in 1935, according to preliminary figures, they totaled $49,643,653,000, an increase of about 55 percent over the 1933 figures. In the Minneapolis district, where debits for 1933 amounted to $5,079,027,000, by 1935 they had increased to $6,471,445,000, according to preliminary figures.

All of these facts and figures tell the story of the farmers' return to the buying counters of the Nation, as a result of the increased prices received for their farm products in the past 3 years. In 1932 when the farmers harvested a crop that was only worth about $5,000,000,000 they did not have any money to buy automobiles with or to buy even what might be considered as the necessities of life. The fact of the matter is they could not even pay their taxes and their interest. But when they raised a crop in 1935 that was worth about $3,000,000,000 more than their crop for 1932, the farmers again became important factors in bringing about a revival of industry in this country and the putting of their city cousins to work.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE RELIEF EXPENDITURES REFUTES THE FALSE POLITICAL PROPAGANDA

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, a million headlines are telling us what is wrong with the Roosevelt relief policy. A million words flow over the ether to find fault with the things the President has done during these "3 long years."

Now, let us not defend him as a great and kindly Executive. Let us not defend anything he has done in regard to relief. As the President's mother so aptly put it: "The people already know whether they want Franklin to stay in the White House."

Let us, you and I, simply try to analyze his administration's record of relief spending and, to borrow a phrase, let us try to see how it got that way.

We start with the knowledge that our national debt now is much larger than it was 3 years ago. It has mounted rapidly and a great deal of it has gone for relief purposes. Of course, let us remember that a huge percentage of this money has been loaned by the Government to our towns and cities, our factories, and to individual home owners. This portion of the debt is to be repaid to the Government, but let us just leave the entire total on the debit side of the ledger for the time being.

Money is always an interesting subject, and while we are on this particular branch of it, let us see where our Government got what it has expended and loaned during these 3 years.

We did not borrow a cent of it from foreign nations. They owe us; we do not owe them. Our Government, acting for the people as a whole, borrowed what was needed from those of its citizens who had the money to invest in United States securities. When we are talking about what the Government owes, let us not confuse that with the mortgage on the old homestead. Nobody is going to try to foreclose on the post office here or on the White House in Washington—this is all in the family. The Government simply has given part of its people fully secured notes and bonds for money they all voluntarily invested and which Uncle Sam needed for purposes we shall now explore.

Few of us like to recall the early part of 1933, particularly the latter weeks of February and the first of March. But that period is a necessary part of our survey.

All of us were scared—we did not know what was going to happen, or whether anything could save us from complete chaos. Banks were crashing in every part of the Nation. Business was at a virtual standstill. Fear had paralyzed our leaders as well as the rest of us. Our economic system was barely breathing.

Some try to tell us now that the worst of the depression was already over on March 4, 1933, but you and I know all too well that any such statement is poppycock and nothing else. Never has our Nation experienced such a crisis as that one.

In the midst of that the Roosevelt administration took office. And there was not a man in the country that envied him. He was, as they say, on a spot. Good, bad, or indifferent, he had to pull through. He faced not only the question of straightening out the banks but also of preventing a relapse and strengthening our entire economic system if there was to be any such thing as recovery.

The first group of administration laws were drafted and rushed to Congress. They were emergency measures. We in Congress felt pretty sure they were not perfect, and we knew that the men who had drafted them felt the same way. But we also realized that immediate action was absolutely necessary to prevent a serious if not fatal relapse of our economic system.

That is how the first of the Roosevelt relief laws got on the books and into action in an amazingly short time.

Unemployment—the family without any way to feed itself—was our big problem. It has not been entirely solved yet, but let us see what else happened.

After the first laws got into action, there was a spurt of false recovery. Our ailing economic system raised its head from its sickbed pillow but found itself still too weak for anything more than mild exertion. A few of our twenty-odd million then jobless began to find regular work and many others were given temporary jobs on work relief.

Naturally there were not nearly enough work-relief jobs to go around at that time, so a system of direct relief had to be established temporarily. That type of relief—actually a dole—has been criticized most severely, mainly on the charge that it was wasteful and the relief checks much too high. I heard that assertion time and again, and was inclined to suppose it must be true until just recently I obtained the figures on direct relief.

Here is what I learned:

Direct relief had cost the Government exactly $10 per month for each relief client, as of the first of this year. By that date direct relief was virtually discontinued as far as the Federal administration was concerned. Ten dollars a month was the figure—33⅓ cents per person per day.

Perhaps that is high, but few of us would want our aged parents or anyone else in America to have to subsist on less.

Work relief: There is a term to make some of the administration's critics fighting mad. But let us, you and I, act as though we did not know about that tendency. Let us walk right up and have a look at work relief, look it right in the eye.

We, the American people, did not like the idea of the dole before we tried it, and liked it even less after we had tried it. We still do not like it. I was once told that the difference between a bum and a genuine hobo was that the hobo had enough self-respect to offer to do some sort of work for his food.

That may not be 100 percent accurate, but that is the general idea. Few of us, mighty few of us, want to be bums. Therefore, it was the most natural thing in the world that our Government should evolve plans for work relief rather than for continuing the dole to the able-bodied unemployed.

So the Federal Government offered to help the States, cities, and townships finance public projects to furnish jobs to the jobless, to take the people off the dole. The Government's offer was to make an outright grant of part of the necessary funds and to lend the municipalities their share. Project plans were hastily drafted and operations soon began.

Naturally, a good many cities and some States expended their share of these funds on projects in which almost all of the money could go for wages and little of it for materials for permanent improvements. This Nation had had almost no experience with work relief, nobody knew much about it, there simply were no trained directors.

The miracle of it all is that more than 75 percent of the money spent for work relief has gone into lasting improvements, into investments in permanent public assets, into our national welfare.

Seventy-five percent. Well, that is pretty good, but what of the other 25 percent? I have looked into that matter and, as an attorney, a home owner, and a taxpayer, I approached it in a critical frame of mind. They had to show me. I had heard that my money was being frittered away, and if that is going to be done at all, I want to be the one to do it.

So I looked into the records and I have traveled about a bit to see just what boondoggles really were. I found some; not many, but a few. I chose Baltimore as a typical eastern city and visited one of the places where I had been told they were squandering the public's money. It was a large old building, once used as a church, and in it I found several types of relief activities usually termed boondoggling.

I did not say I was a Congressman, but merely told the lady who appeared to be in charge that I was FRED SISSON, a taxpayer, and would like to see what they were doing there.

She seemed to think I looked honest and detailed one of her assistants, a middle-aged woman, to show me around. Most of the various activities in this particular relief center were for women, I learned. First we went to a huge sewing section, but all of the women in it were busy making men's shirts, women's dresses, and clothing for children, so I asked to go on to other departments.

In the next large room a number of young women were being taught how to cook economically, to keep house properly, and how to care for babies. In fact, they were learning by experience, tending the young children of the women in the sewing room. However, I remarked to my guide that it seemed to me the girls should have been taught such things at home. She smiled and explained.

Like most girls in needy city families, these young women quit high school to take jobs before the crash, and now had to continue to help support their parents in any way they could.

That was all right for the cooking class, but I was still suspicious, so we moved on into what seemed to be a five-teacher classroom, except that all the pupils were grown persons. Again I questioned my guide sharply, and again she replied. She told me that the pupils were illiterates, but most of them were employed at other hours and attended these grammar-school classes in the afternoon. Immediately I asked how such a school could be classed as a relief project, but my guide explained that it furnished employment for the teachers, and that 5 other previously unemployed instructors taught similar classes in the same room each evening, thus giving work for 10 teachers in all, as well as benefiting over 200 adult pupils.

The last room was one where some twenty-odd crippled men were being taught to make furniture. By that time I was beginning to feel slightly ashamed of my suspicions, so I thanked my guide and departed.

In New York City, I understand, they started some dancing classes at one relief center, but after my experience at Baltimore and hearing some of my friends tell of similar experiences elsewhere, I decided I had had almost enough sleuthing of that sort.

I did ask one park official to tell me about the much-disputed leaf-raking projects. He laughed, said everyone asked the same thing. It seems he had been ordered to put so many men to work in his parks, paying them $40 a month for it. But his allocation of funds covered only the pay roll, with nothing for materials. Some of the men even brought their own rakes. The parks official said further that the men were able to rake the leaves away considerably faster than they were falling from the trees throughout the park, so he purposely had them take it easy.

Well, that is boondoggling for you, and it does not bite. That other 25 percent of work-relief appropriations has gone for wages.

Now there is just one other point I want to touch on in regard to this problem of relief, and that is the dispute over "prevailing pay." That term did not appeal to me when I first heard it, so I investigated that too, and here is what I found.

Let us take an example. Say there is some hauling to be done on a W. P. A. project in a certain town, and the prevailing wage for truck driving there is $2.50 a day. The jobless truck drivers point out that if the W. P. A. pays them any less, private employers are likely to lower wages of the employed truckmen and that once reduced, wages usually remain reduced for a long, long time.

The prevailing wage is $2.50, but the W. P. A. proposes to pay its truck drivers a total of $40 a month. The way that is arranged is for the W. P. A. to pay $2.50 a day—but furnish only 16 days' work per month, for a total of the $40 work-relief wage. The same arrangement holds true for all types of workers given employment on the work relief projects where the prevailing wage issue is a factor.

And there are few to dispute that wages for work of some sort—wages and not the dole—constitute the American way of furnishing our people with necessary relief until they can find regular, permanent jobs.

THE WASTE AND EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE PRESENT ADMINISTRATION IS A NATIONAL SCANDAL

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the waste and extravagance of the present administration is a national scandal and a political crime. The last New Deal Congress has been the most extravagant in all history. It provided expenditures of $20,000,000,000, and this in the face of vastly curtailed national income and in the face of the fact that the administration's policy of scarcity is preventing any increase in the national wealth. Generations yet unborn will ponder upon what manner of men they were that they could hold up honesty and thrift as national virtues and at the same time in a cowardly way saddle upon those generations debts which were contracted by them with a mental reservation that they never expected to pay them.

To obligate themselves to spend $20,000,000,000 when not half that amount, at the very most, could reasonably be expected to be collected by the Government, is their record for the Seventy-fourth Congress. It is astonishing to think that any man would seek to justify such a colossal financial piracy. For any administration to boldly spend $15,000,000 per day more than its receipts must make its followers hang their heads in disgust and feel in constant political discomfort. None but those like Jim Farley, whose consciences have become calloused through long resistance to the chidings of the still small voice of conscience will attempt to justify such a course. They must believe that a public treasury is a public trough at which the political animals must be fed at all hazards.

This extravagant saturnalia is due to the desire of the President to be reelected and to the desire of his faithful cohorts to be continued in office, all regardless of expense. Another reason is the fact that the Democratic Party is, as it always is, in control of southern Democracy. It would appear that to some of these Southern States their most important reason for maintaining their statehood is to be able to extract from the Federal Government by far a greater amount of money than they contribute. Year after year we are confronted with the spectacle of many of these States drawing from the Federal Government millions of dollars more than they contribute. That the Southern States are so successful in this financial harvest is due to the fact that they plant their political seed carefully by selecting intelligent men for places in Congress. And after making such selection they exert every influence to continue these men in Congress so that they might grow into places of prominence and power. Northern Democrats rally to elect Democratic Presidents only to find that Southern Democracy gets all the places of importance.

At the present time the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives is from North Carolina, while the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate is from Mississippi. At the present time the great State of Texas boasts of the fact that from its congressional delegation have been selected the chairmen of five of the major committees of the House. That gives them the practical working control of the Committee on Agriculture, Committee on Appropriations, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and the Judiciary Committee. Practically every other important committee is controlled by men who come from the Solid South. One exception is the Immigration Committee, which is controlled by a Tammanyite.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the last session of Congress contains many speeches where Members have boasted of the millions upon millions of dollars that they have been able to bring into their districts. Yet not a word is said by most of them as to the small pitiful amount that their districts have contributed toward the maintenance of the Republic.

The present administration has been operating since March 4, 1933. Previous to the advent of the present administration practically all money appropriated was appropriated by Congress for a special purpose. Very little was given to the President for distribution as he saw fit. More than $12,000,000,000 has been placed in his hands for distribution according to his own discretion. When this money was appropriated, it was intended that it should be used for relief and recovery purposes, but, judging from the manner in which it has been spent, it would seem that those who furnished the enthusiasm and the votes to carry such a program through evidently expected to be rewarded by its great expenditures in their respective States and districts. The President himself has come forward with many projects that are unbelievably unreasonable and visionary. In fact, millions upon millions of dollars have been spent under the orders of the President for projects so unreasonable as to shock the conscience and challenge the judgment of many who themselves had gone about as far as they thought the public conscience would permit.

Without any special authority from Congress the President has expended millions upon millions of dollars wastefully and without any justification whatsoever.

THE FLORIDA SHIP CANAL

The Florida ship canal is probably the most shining example of Presidential extravagance. The President, upon his own volition, allocated $5,400,000 from the P. W. A. funds for the construction of this canal, which did not meet the approval of any competent engineers anywhere. Congress has intervened and rejected further expenditures by the President on this project. Without such intervention, the President, no doubt, would have proceeded until he would have spent $142,000,000, which was the intended cost of the canal when completed. Congress, by its refusal to approve the President's reckless course, compelled a saving of $137,000,000 on this wild and fanciful scheme, which emanated largely from the brain of the President.

PASSAMAQUODDY

The Passamaquoddy project carrier the most unusual name. In view of the unusual aspect of the project it must be an appropriate name. The President allocated $7,000,000 for the completion of this project. After spending a large proportion of this amount of money, Congress called a halt, and Passamaquoddy was stopped. There, in the Bay of Fundy, will probably rest a mass of cement and stone which will be a silent monument to the wastefulness of the most extravagant administration in the history of the Republic.

THE SHELTERBELT

Some of the administration's fanciful plans were too fanciful even for the most extravagant of all Congresses. The shelterbelt was a product of the fertile imagination of the President and his "brain trusters." It is probable that if all the shelterbelt was to be constructed in the Southland it might have met with congressional approval, but since most of the money was to be spent in the Northern States it did not meet with congressional approval. The idea was to construct a belt of forests 100 miles wide and 1,000 miles long, extending from the Canadian line down to Texas. This would have involved the purchase of a great stretch of land and the planting of millions upon millions of trees at a total cost of nearly $300,000,000. Although the President persisted in his wish to have this foolish project carried forward and although he had a servile Congress ready to do his bidding, it refused to follow him with this project. The refusal of Congress to do this was one of the few instances where the Seventy-fourth Congress showed that it had any virility and any capacity to act upon its own volition. It is entitled to credit for having thwarted the President in his purpose to inflict upon us this monstrous mistake at this terrific expense.

PARADISE PARK

The name of Paradise Park is original with me. I know of no other name that would be appropriate for the parkway which the last Congress provided to be constructed from the Shenandoah National Park in Virginia to the Smoky Mountains Park in North Carolina. This is the most gigantic and stupendously extravagant and unreasonable expenditure of the last Congress. A few years ago Congress established the Shenandoah National Park in Virginia. It comprises 160,000 acres. Through it for about 40 miles the United States Government has constructed a beautiful driveway known as the Skyline Drive. Millions of dollars are yet to be spent in extending this roadway and in further beautifying the park. It is a beautiful park and its establishment might be reasonably justified in view of its proximity to millions of people who live in the congested eastern sections of the country.

The Smoky Mountains Park, located principally in North Carolina, is also a new park taken over by the Government in the last few years. It comprises 400,000 acres. This is also a beautiful park and although not immediately accessible to any great congested section, it could probably be justified as an effort on the part of the Government to retain in its control one of the beautiful spots of the Southland. These two parks taken by themselves, located as they are, would have been sufficient to furnish outdoor retreats to our people in the eastern and southern portions of the United States.

But to him who conceived the idea of building a parkway 800 feet wide and 477 miles long from the Shenandoah Park in the north to the Smoky Mountains Park in the south should get the prize for having outdone the President and his visionary "brain trusters" in finding the most unnecessary projects of all, and the most extravagant and unreasonable opportunity to increase the already unbearable load of debt under which the Nation is staggering. The expense of constructing Passamaquoddy and the Florida canal would reasonably be expected to come to some end at some time, but the expense of this project will continue as long as the Republic stands. A driveway 200 feet wide and a parkway 800 feet wide for 477 miles up and down the hills and hollows of the backwoods of Virginia and the mountain lands of North Carolina would involve the expenditure of untold millions and would call for a continual annual upkeep that would probably exceed the upkeep of the Secretary of State's office and all the expenditures connected therewith.

It is estimated that the initial expense would be $48,000,000. This would only be the entering wedge. There is no more reason for the construction of this parkway than there would be to build a parkway connecting Niagara Falls with Yellowstone National Park. The principal reason for the establishment of this parkway is that all this money would be spent in two or three States where only Democratic Senators and Democratic Congressmen are elected and where history does not record the selection of any Republican Congressman or Senator in the whole territory.

The maintenance of this extravagant undertaking will be terrific. The constant stream of money will be flowing from the Federal Treasury into that territory as long as the Republic exists.

We Republicans made a galant fight to defeat this project. We did defeat it when it came up on the Consent Calendar. We defeated it again when it came up under a motion to suspend the rules. Not to be outdone, the influential Members from the sections that would be immediately benefited by this unwise extravagance, succeeded in having a special rule brought in from the Rules Committee, which provided for the immediate consideration of this legislative monstrosity. We made a gallant fight on the final passage and were able to win to our side many Democrats who would not approve such unreasonable extravagance. This bill passed the House, however, by a few votes in spite of our efforts, and it is little short of a shame that such unreasonable legislation should have been passed. The principal impetus that carried this bill through came from the fact that the President tacitly approved it and those who benefited by it were powerful enough to force it through. The final vote was yeas 145 and nays 131. Many Members changed their votes under last-minute pressure; otherwise the bill would have been defeated.

To my notion, this is the most high-handed and unreasonable extravagance of the most extravagant administration in the history of the Republic.

THE TENNESSEE VALLEY PROJECT

Another instance of the profligacy with which the administration has poured its money into the Southland is the Tennessee Valley project. Already this project has cost millions of dollars, and from all indications it will require one thousand million to complete this whole project. Whole communities have been moved. Dense forests have been transformed into modern cities at Government expense. Beautiful homes are now occupied by Government employees under a purely socialistic set-up. The Government owns a whole town and controls all its social, religious, and educational activities.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY FLOOD CONTROL

The legislative program for the continuance of the Mississippi Valley flood control was probably the smoothest and best thought out program of the last session of Congress. This was a program whereby the Government would again be called upon to provide untold millions to be expended in the Southern States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Probably no section of the South is more effectively represented in the United States Senate than is Mississippi, with PAT HARRISON, the chairman of the Finance Committee; and Arkansas, with JOE ROBINSON, the Democratic floor leader; and Louisiana, with Senator OVERTON, the successor of the famous Huey Long. These distinguished gentlemen have won their distinction not by inaction and inactivity but on the contrary. No one questions their loyalty to their own States, for the proof is overwhelmingly to the contrary.

The Government has heretofore appropriated and spent some $300,000,000 for the improvement of the lower Mississippi Valley. In the last session of Congress the Overton bill was passed in the Senate and sent to the House. It provided for the expenditure of $272,000,000, most of which was to be used for the construction of additional spillways in the States of Mississippi and Louisiana, and for the construction of some reservoirs in that section also. The bill provided that all of the expense of this gigantic improvement should be borne by the Government and that all lands necessary should be purchased and paid for by the Government, and all resulting damages should be compensated for by the Government. The local subdivisions were not required to contribute in any way. When the bill came to the House it was amended so as to provide for the additional construction of some 26 reservoirs in the States of Arkansas and Oklahoma and in the waters of the Arkansas River and the White River. These reservoirs would have added an additional cost of $126,000,000. The local subdivisions were not required to furnish any money or to do any matching of any kind in this program. This total amount of $126,000,000 would therefore be a voluntary contribution on the part of the Government into these States, whose contribution to the maintenance of the Government was probably as slight as almost any other States in the Union.

While this bill was being speeded toward its final passage, a similar bill, known as the Copeland bill, which had originated in the Senate and was well on its way toward passage, provided for the construction of reservoirs on the headwaters of the Ohio, the Connecticut, and other northern rivers. The President had indicated that in order for that bill to become a law it would be necessary for it to carry a provision for contribution by the territory to be benefited. It was therefore very evident that, while the lower Mississippi was about to be handed the colossal sum of $398,000,000 without any contribution by the people of that territory, the sections in which the Copeland bill would operate would be required to furnish all rights-of-way and to assume all damages resulting from changes of highways and railroads, and so forth. The responsibilities which the local subdivisions that would be benefited under the Copeland bill would have to assume amounted practically to matching dollar for dollar with the Federal Government. There is no question but that these two bills would have passed under their original momentum had it not been for the interference of Republican Members of the House of Representatives. It is palpably plain that the spending of so many millions in one section of the country without any contribution on the part of local authorities and the expenditure of a similar but smaller number of millions in another section of the country and requiring local contribution by practically matching the amounts was unfair and should not be tolerated. The Republicans of the House of Representatives figuratively went out to meet this situation. They met the Overton bill on the threshold of the House of Representatives after it had passed the Senate. We met it by an amendment, known as the Jenkins amendment, which sought to place into the Overton bill the same restrictions and regulations with reference to local contributions as that which had been required by orders of the President to be included in the Copeland bill. After a hard fight and only upon a vigorous appeal made upon the floor of Congress to the honesty and integrity of American Congressmen were we able to amend the Overton bill so as to carry this principle of fair-dealing into all sections of the country. This battle resulted in a saving to the American people of at least $150,000,000, for many of the reservoirs provided for in the Overton bill will never be constructed if the local communities are compelled to contribute anything themselves toward their construction.

To have defeated this well-planned program engineered by some of the most brilliant men in Congress and encouraged by the administration itself is an accomplishment of which the Republican membership may well be proud.

OTHER EXTRAVAGANCES

The extravagances of the present administration reach out into every conceivable direction. The administration sought to provide in many places homesteads for poor people. Many of these undertakings have been abandoned after costing the Federal Government millions of dollars. In a project at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., the cost to the Government per family unit was $20,320. At Arthurdale, in West Virginia, the cost was $10,370 per house. In several so-called suburban green belt developments, the cost per family unit has been nearly $10,000. These units are supposed to be constructed for the benefit of poor people and to be sold to poor people with small incomes. The inevitable outcome is that the Government will soon be the heaviest real-estate owner in many communities. Likewise, millions upon millions have been spent on the Indian Service and reclamation projects of various kinds. Probably the largest of these is the Central Valley project in California, which, if completed, will cost $170,000,000, and the Grand Coulee in the State of Washington, which will cost probably sixty-five millions. Each of these projects has been started without congressional authorization. Because of this Presidential profligacy, the last bill passed by Congress, which provided that the President be given $1,425,000,000 additional money, carried this saving clause:

No Federal project shall be undertaken or prosecuted under the foregoing appropriation unless and until an amount sufficient for its completion has been allocated and irrevocably set aside for its completion.

RELIEF

I repeat that it behooves the taxpaying States of the Nation to look carefully into the manner in which the present administration has been spending the money. No one denies that the Federal Government as well as the State governments should hold itself in readiness to relieve human suffering. Under our theory of Government, it was well-considered that the States themselves should first be required to exhaust every reasonable means for the care and maintenance of their poor before the Federal Government should be called upon. It is very interesting to note the difference between some of the States of the Union in the efforts which they have taken toward carrying their own burden of relief. It is quite singular that the States which pay the largest contribution to the maintenance of the Federal Government are the ones which ask the least by way of support to their poor from the Federal Government. The following table will show the percentage of relief from Federal relief funds required by 10 of the States requiring the highest percentage and by 10 of the States requiring the lowest percentage. It will be noted that those requiring the lowest percentage are all located in cold countries where relief is more expensive and in sections of the country where contributions to the maintenance of the Government is large from a per-capita standpoint.

The percentages of relief in the various States are as follows:

Percentage of relief from Federal funds

	Percent
Southern States:
South Carolina	98.0
Louisiana	96.9
North Carolina	96.8
Arkansas	96.5
New Mexico	96.5
Mississippi	96.2
Florida	95.3
Alabama	94.7
Georgia	94.7
Tennessee	93.4
Northern States:
Rhode Island	39.4
Delaware	40.5
Connecticut	43.9
New Hampshire	44.7
Maine	50.6
Massachusetts	52.3
New York	53.0
Vermont	56.6
Iowa	57.8
Indiana	64.6

I might add that the 10 Southern States above mentioned paid approximately 5 percent of the total Federal income-tax collections in the fiscal year 1935, while the 10 Northern States referred to paid over 42 percent of the total.

So far as the matter of political projects is concerned, it seems to be an established fact that even relief expenditures are largely political. Recently the American Institute of Public Opinion took a poll throughout the country on the following question:

In your opinion does politics play a part in the handling of relief in your locality?

In every State a majority of those polled answered in the affirmative. A portion of the tabulation is as follows:

Does politics play a part in the handling of relief?

States	Yes	No	No opinion
	Percent	Percent	Percent
Arkansas	83	14	3
New Jersey	78	12	10
West Virginia	77	13	10
Louisiana	76	9	15
Rhode Island	76	14	10
Connecticut	75	14	11
Mississippi	75	15	11
Washington	73	12	15
Massachusetts	72	14	14
Oklahoma	71	19	10

Separating those polled by political parties, it was found that even Democrats voted 2 to 1 in the affirmative on the question asked. The Republicans voted in the affirmative by 10 to 1, and the Socialists by 8 to 1.

In separating those polled by groups, it was found that those actually on relief voted 2 to 1 in the affirmative on the question asked, while farmers voted nearly 4 to 1 in the affirmative. Thus in every State, among persons of different political parties and different groups, the people are decidedly of the opinion that the relief agencies, as set up under the New Deal, are a part of a vast political machine to continue the new dealers in office.

It is very unfortunate that under the guise of relief to the poor the present administration has wasted billions of dollars and has saddled upon the American people the most stupendous debt under which any nation has ever struggled, and that beyond any question much, if not most, of this money has been squandered with a constant purpose in mind, to wit, the reelection of Roosevelt and the perpetuation in office of the greatest horde of Government employees that ever inflicted a nation. There is no question but there are millions of honest Americans who believe in the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson and yet who refuse to sanction this wild and useless extravagance. Every American who has the best interest of his country at heart must conclude that it is impossible for us to continue long as a nation if we persist in piling up the national debt at the rate of $15,000,000 per day. The good sense of the American people has always manifested itself. It is bound to assert itself at every opportunity. Farley and his blustering prize-fight tactics cannot take the place of Andrew Jackson and Thomas Jefferson in the affection of the Democrats of the country. They will record their protests at the November election.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROVIDES HUGE SUMS FOR ROAD AND STREET IMPROVEMENTS IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it has been my belief all through this depression that one of the most constructive procedures that the Government can engage in along the line of putting men to work, is building farm-to-market roads and a system of Federal highways adequate to take care of future highway transportation.

I knew the administration was doing much along the line of helping the several States and the counties within the States in giving Federal aid toward building such roads as I have just referred to. However, I did not realize that we had done so well by the States and the counties, until I checked up on my own district. After checking in my own district, I discovered that other districts in the United States were receiving just as much attention.

To say nothing of the State money that has been expended for roads in my two counties, Fayette and Somerset, Pa., I find that Federal money in the following amounts has gone into these two counties for the building of highways, roads, and bridges. Most of this work has been completed and some of the projects are still under way.

Fayette County road projects

(1)	Route 26008, Woodside to Smithfield	$40,000.00
(2)	Route 26081, Nicholson, Springhill Township	39,500.00
(3)	Route 26028, Franklin Township	24,786.70
(4)	Route 26015, Lower Tyrone Township	28,950.00
(5)	Route 26055, Saltlick Township	30,850.00

(7)	Route 26046, Bullskin Township	26,949.00
(8)	Route 26021, North Uniontown	22,922.68
(9)	Route 26397, Wharton, North Uniontown	36,053.00

(21)	Route 26113, Wharton Township	20,871.35
(22)	Route 247, bridge, south of Fayette City Borough	10,577.96
(23)	Road project to Richview School	33,500.00
	Total	1,163,901.23

This amounts to a total of $1,163,901.23 of Federal money granted to the Pennsylvania State Highway Department, and by it allotted to Fayette County.

In addition to this amount made available through road projects in the two counties, sponsored by the highway department, the sum of $3,420,275.61 of Federal money was allotted to Fayette County for road projects undertaken directly by the Works Progress Administration.

Moreover, the sum of $608,468.20 came to Fayette County for W. P. A. projects other than roads.

Thus, a total amount of $4,637,212.01—$1,163,901.23 plus $3,420,275.61 plus $608,468.20—has come to Fayette County from the Federal Government.

When you stop to think what it means to the taxpayers of Fayette County to have these funds allotted for road building, then you begin to appreciate what Congress and the Roosevelt administration are doing to take the tax burden off the local community.

In other words, it is simple to calculate. If the valuation of Fayette County is $80,000,000, in order for Fayette County to raise $1,163,901.23 for road building it would be necessary for them to increase their road millage approximately 14 mills. Imagine the citizens of Fayette County being taxed 14 additional mills for road construction at this time. They are near enough now to the poorhouse because of past blunders in county and State management of financing.

The Works Progress Administration, in order to keep men, women, and children in Fayette County from going hungry, and the men from becoming loafers, has allotted to Fayette County since its inception the enormous sum of $3,420,275.61. This is being spent in the construction of highways and bridges.

Still another way to get a clear picture of this splendid lift the citizens and taxpayers of Fayette County are getting from the Federal Government—if you had to raise the millage on the $80,000,000 valuation of Fayette County sufficiently to get $4,028,743.81, you would have to raise your millage 50 mills plus.

Of course, the fellow who stands around and tells you on a nice bright day that it is going to rain tomorrow, or it is going to snow, as the case may be, will tell you that we—he means the little farmers and home owners—will have to pay this all back. However, you are in a position to tell him that he is all wrong. That is, as far as the little farmer and home owner are concerned they will not be paying back more than a few percent of this total that comes to our community or district.

This Roosevelt administration has set up a tax procedure that is requiring and will require the fellows in the higher financial brackets who have escaped taxation under former administrations to pay their just share, which will be the 80 or 90 percent, or whatever it is, of this sum that comes to our district.

Likewise in Somerset County, the other county in my district, a total of $905,381.18 has gone into road projects sponsored by the State highway department, as follows:

Somerset County road projects

(1)	Route 808, Berlin to Wellersburg	$41,000.00
(2)	Route 119, sec. 4, Jennerstown, west	227,903.94
(3)	Route 52, Benson Borough line, bridge	19,805.72
(4)	Route 52, Berlin	13,923.30
(5)	Route 119, sec. 4, Jennerstown Borough	19,724.47
(6)	Route 547, sec. 3, Rockwood Borough	27,009.72
(7)	Route 269, sec. 1, Somerset Borough	14,160.72
(8)	Route 55, 321, New Lexington	15,500.00
(9)	Route 49, sec. 2	59,229.00
(10)	Route 186, sec. 4, Westmoreland County line, east	67,187.15
(11)	Route 119, sec. 5, Jennerstown to Jenners Cross Roads	58,759.69
(12)	Route 119, sec. 6, Stoyestown, east	250,000.00
(13)	Route 808, Wellersburg, Berlin	5,771.84
(14)	Route 222, southeast of Windber	524.48
(15)	Southeast Shanksville	224.64
(16)	Route 55, 049, Fayette County, east	36,748.25
(17)	Route 269–317, Somerset Borough, north	47,905.26
	Total	905,381.18

For road projects under the Works Progress Administration the amount is $963,179.73.

W. P. A. projects other than roads received $452,534.13.

Thus, Somerset County received a total of $2,321,094.94 ($905,381.18, plus $903,179.73, plus $452,534.13).

Therefore, in my congressional district, composed of Fayette and Somerset Counties, a grand total of $6,958,306.95 of Federal money has been applied for the benefit of the farmer, the laborer, and the little-business man.

Mr. Speaker, we can make the same comparisons in any district in the United States, but I am using my own congressional district as a unit for measuring the splendid service this administration, through the W. P. A., the P. W. A., and all the other Government agencies, are rendering to the people of the several districts in the United States.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE A. PIATT ANDREW

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, again the Grim Reaper has visited this House and taken from our membership a scholar, a soldier, a financier, a statesman—truly a marvelous record. In addition to that he was a warm friend and a genial gentleman. It is my sad duty at this time to announce the peaceful passing away of our friend and colleague, A. PIATT ANDREW, at an early hour this morning at his home in Gloucester, Mass. At some later time more extended and suitable memorials to him will be offered. I present the following resolution and ask for its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of four members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

861. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated May 29, 1936, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers, on a preliminary examination of Chetco Cove, Oreg., authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved August 30, 1935; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

862. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 4, 1936

The House was called to order at 11 o'clock a. m. by Hon. South Trimble, Clerk of the House.

The CLERK. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it becomes my sad and painful duty to announce to the House the sudden death of your beloved Speaker, the Honorable JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

Speaker BYRNS presided over the House on yesterday, presumably in his accustomed good health, but shortly after his arrival at his apartment he was stricken and soon thereafter passed away. In his death this House has suffered the loss of an able, fair, and impartial presiding officer; the country a legislator of long experience, a statesman of courage and marked ability; and his State of Tennessee a noteworthy citizen.

The duty of selecting one to preside over the deliberations of the House now rests upon you.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Clerk, in view of the unfortunate circumstance in which we find ourselves, and with no disrespect to our beloved Speaker who has left us, it becomes necessary, in order that the House may function and the machinery of government may not stop, that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker.

I present the following resolution and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 543

Resolved, That Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, a Representative from the State of Alabama, be, and he is hereby, elected Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the President and the Senate be notified by the Clerk of the election of Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD as Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The CLERK. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The CLERK. The Clerk appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] to escort the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the chair.

The committee escorted Mr. BANKHEAD into the Chamber, and he assumed the chair. The oath of office was administered to the Speaker-elect by Mr. SABATH.

The SPEAKER. Prayer will be offered by the Reverend Allen A. Stockdale, formerly pastor of the First Congregational Church, Washington, D. C.

Rev. Allen A. Stockdale, D. D., formerly pastor, First Congregational Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea.

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark.

For though from out our bourne of time and place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

Gracious Father of all men, Thou who dost understand the mysteries too deep for human understanding and the problems too big for the mastery of men, look down upon us this morning as we sit in the shadows of an unexpected providence of death. Master the fear in our trembling hearts and comfort our disturbed souls. By Thy gracious fatherly spirit we acknowledge the weakness of man's body as we accept the certainty of the immortality of his soul.

As children go to their parents with broken toys, disturbed plans, and bruised fingers, so we, Thy children, not yet grown up, come to Thee with the interrupted plans of our days and the disturbed procedures of our lives.

Let Thy gracious comfort come to us as we are subdued by the thoughts and feelings that come from the sudden death of our beloved Speaker. Bend Thine ear to the silent tributes of love and friendship. Increase our courage and faith to do the unfinished tasks of our day.

Be near to the wife and loved ones, who mourn the sudden passing of one held so dear. Help us to know that in the midst of life we are in death, and may our hope be firmly founded in a God that never fails and a life that never ends. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, and that the Journal stand approved.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION OF HOUSE TO TAKE RECESS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 538

Resolved, That during the remainder of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress it shall be in order for the majority leader or the chairman of the Committee on Rules to move that the House take a recess, and said motion is hereby made of the highest privilege; and it shall also be in order at any time during the remainder of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress to consider reports of the Committee on Rules, as provided in clause 45, rule XI, except that the provision requiring a two-thirds vote to consider such reports is hereby suspended during the remainder of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make an announcement, in view of the circumstances the special session to be held this evening on the Private and Consent Calendars will, of course, not be held.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS].

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I am about to offer what to me is the saddest resolution it has ever been my duty to offer on the floor of the House. It relates to the death of our very much beloved Speaker, JOE BYRNS.

I have been with him in every fight for years. I was by his side when he passed away, but could be of no assistance. JOE BYRNS was true and loyal to his friends. He loved the Members of this House, and they loved him. He always tried to be fair to both political parties and to all individuals. He was just in his rulings. The influence he exercised in this House was demonstrated many times. He went through one of the most trying times any Speaker of the House has ever had to face, and, in my opinion, when history is written he will go down as one of the great Speakers of this assembly.

In the passing of JOE BYRNS we not only lose him as a friend and as the Speaker but his death has left a vacancy in his district which cannot be filled. Not only will his constituents miss him but the Nation will miss his influence and wise advice. He was one of the leading sons of Tennessee, the only one who has graced the Speaker's chair for 100 years, and the people of his State today mourn his loss.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot say more at this time. I trust I may have the opportunity later of speaking in reference to the life, character, and public service of JOE BYRNS.

Mr. Speaker, I send the following resolution to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 544

Resolved, That the House has learned with profound sensibility and sorrow of the death of Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-fourth Congress.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. BYRNS in the House of Representatives at such time as the said committee shall fix.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the remains of Mr. BYRNS be removed from Washington to Nashville, Tenn., in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That a committee of 60 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral at Nashville, Tenn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the appointment of the following committee of four under the resolution to superintend the order for the arrangement of the funeral: Mr. O'CONNOR, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. McREYNOLDS, and Mr. SNELL.

The Clerk will report the remainder of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn to such time on tomorrow, June 5, 1936, as the Speaker shall fix.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that the Chair will advise the press later in the afternoon of the time arranged for the funeral in the House of Representatives.

The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 18 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned subject to the call of the Speaker.

Whereas the loss of income due to the loss of work by reason of unemployment, old age, or disability has resulted in the unparalleled destitution of millions of workers throughout the United States, lowered the living standards of all workers, and seriously jeopardized the welfare of all the people; and

Whereas it is impossible for individual workers to secure themselves against such loss of work because mass unemployment and the other factors responsible for such loss primarily due to the operation of social and economic forces which are beyond the control of individuals or private bodies, and because the earnings of most workers during employment are barely sufficient to provide for more than immediate living expenses; and

Whereas it is in the interest of protecting the living standards and general welfare of the people that Government shall insure every worker against loss of income due to unemployment, old age, or other disability, and this obligation must be recognized by each State government; and

Whereas a fully adequate system of social insurance can best be created and administered on a national basis, since industry is predominantly national in scope, since the Federal Government, with its vast resources and imponderable taxing power, can best provide the necessary funds to administer such a system, since State systems cannot adequately provide for workers who necessarily change residence from State to State, and since, finally, there are unquestionable administrative advantages in a uniform and integrated Federal system as against the contradiction and chaos of different systems in different States; and

Whereas the Federal workers' social insurance bill, introduced in the United States Senate by Senator LYNN J. FRAZIER and the House of Representatives by Representative ERNEST LUNDEEN, and identified as S. 3475 and H. R. 9680, provides for the establishment of an adequate Federal system of social insurance, providing for compensation for the unemployed, the aged, the disabled, and others: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Louisiana hereby memorializes the United States Congress to enact the Federal workers' social insurance bill, S. 3475 and H. R. 9680, without further delay; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States, United States Senator LYNN J. FRAZIER, Representative ERNEST LUNDEEN, the Secretary of the United States Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of Congress of the United States, and that the Members of Congress be urged to use their best offices to procure the speedy enactment of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Senate of the State of Massachusetts protesting against the enactment of legislation relative to price fixing of coal, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Newark, N. J., branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, favoring the prompt enactment of antilynching legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the mayor and Common Council of the City of San Bernardino, Calif., and the Council of the City of Springfield, Ill., favoring the prompt enactment of Senate bill 4424, known as the Wagner-Ellenbogen low-cost housing bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented memorials of sundry citizens, being members of New York Sign Writers Local Union 230, of New York City, and of citizens of New York State, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Russell sedition bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of citizens of the State of New York remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to suppress efforts to incite members of the enlisted forces of the Army and Navy to disobedience of orders, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Worcester, Mass., Laundry Owners Club, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Bailey amendment imposing a tax on tallow or soap-making materials, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred resolutions of the Massachusetts State Senate memorializing Congress in opposition to certain pending legislation relative to price-fixing of coal.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions memorializing Congress in opposition to certain pending legislation relative to price-fixing of coal

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill to provide for Government price-fixing of coal; and

Whereas the enactment of said bill would inevitably be followed by a substantial increase in the cost of coal to American homes and industries; and

Whereas it would be contrary to the public interests for the Congress to pass laws to compel our citizens to pay higher prices for coal than competitive conditions really warrant; and

Whereas there is grave doubt that Congress has power to fix the price of coal, particularly in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent Guffey Coal Act case, so-called; and that if any such power does exist in Congress it should be used for the protection of the people against excessive charges for coal and not for the purpose of establishing a monopoly for the benefit of a privileged group of coal operators; and

Whereas the Senate of Massachusetts believes that the enactment of any such measure to fix prices for coal would be but the first step in the enactment of laws to similarly regulate prices of innumerable articles shipped in interstate commerce and that the exercise of any such power would tend to weaken or destroy the power of the States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of Massachusetts respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to reject the aforesaid bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth be directed to send forthwith copies of these resolutions to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to the Members of Congress from this Commonwealth.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 320), which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Whereas it has been openly published and charged for a period of years that the American Book Co. and other textbook concerns, commonly known as the Book Trust, all dealing in textbooks and school books, throughout the country have been engaged in unlawful practices in obtaining of contracts for furnishing school books through State legislation, and from public officials in States, and that, in the obtention of these contracts to furnish textbooks, it is charged that they have used large sums of money for entertainment and use of various officials; and

Whereas it was published in the newspapers on Saturday, May 5, 1934, that, in a secret N. R. A. code hearing held in Washington, D. C., in April 1934, it was disclosed that $500,000 had been paid out by the textbook manufacturers for "meals" and other gratuities to public officials having to do with the purchase of school textbooks for the children and the youth of our country; and

Whereas these books are sold in interstate commerce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a subcommittee, which subcommittee is authorized and directed, during the session of the Senate or during the recess of the Congress, to examine into such charges made concerning the book manufacturers selling books in interstate commerce and report its findings to the next Congress.

For the purpose of this resolution the Committee on the Library, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress until the final report is submitted, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable.

ADMINISTRATION OF RELIEF MEASURES IN NEVADA

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to submit a brief statement concerning the administration of relief measures in the State of Nevada, and to include in the RECORD an article published in the New York Sun of May 13, 1936. I shall set forth the facts, which are taken from the official records here in Washington.

The facts disclose that the alleged facts set out in the New York Sun article are absolutely incorrect and misleading. The most charitable construction to place upon the Sun's article is that in the writer's desire to attack President Roosevelt and belittle relief projects he was criminally negligent in ascertaining the facts. His negligence, however, resulted in gross exaggerations, as will be seen from a comparison of the official statement of facts with such alleged facts.

The writer says, "In 1935 the Federal Government spent $1,086 on each relief family in Nevada." The fact is that the Federal Government spent exactly $539.18 on each family. The writer does not take into consideration that Nevada is almost solely dependent upon mining and stock raising. Both mining and stock raising have been at the lowest ebb in history during the last 3 or 4 years, and the price of cattle was the last to feel the revivifying effect of general recovery. Added to this, Nevada, together with several other Western States, has for several years, reaching its peak in 1934, experienced the most disastrous drought in the history of the State.

As to the answer to the question, "Who keeps them out of work, industry or Roosevelt?" Industry refused to put men to work until there was an advanced consumptive demand for its products. Roosevelt put men to work because industry would not put them to work. Roosevelt created the consumptive power of these laborers, thus creating a demand for further production, which is the only cause for the increased production of manufactures from around an average of 20 percent to around an average of 60 percent.

This controversy demonstrates that newspapers in many cases are no longer news papers, but organs of private propaganda of their owners.

I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred and the statistics in answer thereto may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the newspaper article and the statistics were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Sun of May 13, 1936]

WHO KEEPS THEM OUT OF WORK, INDUSTRY OR ROOSEVELT?

Consider the State of Nevada:

State: Nevada.

Relief cases, November 1933	1,400
Relief cases, year 1935	2,400
W. P. A. workers, 1936	5,894
Federal relief, 1935–36	$12,103,165

Franklin D. Roosevelt has bought $2,118,000,000 worth of (useless) silver and one reason for so doing was to help the State of Nevada and his ally, Senator PITTMAN of that State. The population of Nevada is 94,000. It is a mining and farming State.

In 1929 Nevada had only 123 manufacturing establishments with 2,200 wage earners, whose wages for the year amounted to $3,585,425.

In 1936 Nevada has 5,894 workers on W. P. A.; that is, 1 out of every 6 workers in the State. In 1935 the Federal Government spent $1,086 on each relief family in Nevada. In New York it spent $373 on each family.

Despite the silver purchases and $150,000 in A. A. A. checks, Nevada's relief rolls are four times what they were in November 1933.

In per capita wealth Nevada is the richest State in the Union.

STATE OF NEVADA—OFFICIAL STATISTICS RELATIVE TO FEDERAL RELIEF

Average number of relief cases, State of Nevada, from May 1934 through October 1935	3,678
Under the general relief program for this same period the average relief cost per family was	$539.18
The average relief cost per case was	$425.64
W. P. A. workers for the State of Nevada as of week ending Feb. 29, 1936,[1] was	3,067

[1] This was the peak period of the works program; that is, when the maximum number of workers were employed.

The figure of 5,894 given in the newspaper article as W. P. A. workers for 1936 was the figure released as the total number of workers under the Government works program at this same peak period. It is worth nothing that this includes in all 44 agencies. While it is true that not all of these agencies function in Nevada, some of those which do are: C. C. C. camps, Public Works Administration, public road work through the Highway Department, Resettlement Administration, Rural Electrification Administration, and numerous others under the Department of Agriculture such as Extension Service, Forest Service, Public Roads, and Soil Conservation. There are employed in emergency-conservation work such as C. C. C. camps, wherein most of the men come from other States, and chiefly from Eastern States, 1,072. Other agencies, exclusive of W. P. A. and Emergency Conservation Work, employ 1,755.

Total expenditures to Feb. 29, 1936, under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 were	$4,685,216.44
Of these, the W. P. A. expenditures were	482,995.79
The total Federal Emergency Relief Administration grants from May 1934 through October 1935 were	4,893,232.00

Included in the Federal emergency-relief grants for this period were all incidental programs other than State relief to State residents. Chief among these was $1,010,000 for drought-relief work, $316,000 for cattle buying and processing, $147,000 for rural-rehabilitation program, and $747,000 for transient relief wherein a monthly average of nearly 5,000 other than State residents were cared for in work camps or otherwise.

THE PUBLIC LANDS—ARTICLE BY P. H. SHALLENBERGER

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "Our Federal Provinces." This article was published in the Wyoming Stockman-Farmer, and its author, Mr. Percy H. Shallenberger, of Lysite, Wyo., has been a resident of the State for many years and has been engaged in the livestock business. He not only is thoroughly conversant with that industry but with all questions affecting public lands.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR FEDERAL PROVINCES

By Percy H. Shallenberger, of Lysite, Wyo.

The cautious framers of our National Government decreed that the only purely Federal area should be the small District of Columbia, with a few square miles of territory to contain a Federal capital city with its necessary congressional and departmental buildings and a Presidential mansion.

Properly set apart from any State jurisdiction, it is the only territory in the United States where the Federal power has hitherto been absolute.

But so amazing has been the growth of Federal authority and departmental assumption of still further sovereignty that an average of 53 percent of the area of 11 Western States is now placed beyond private ownership and taxation.

Prior to the passage of the Taylor Act in June 1934, 30 percent of these States was federally controlled. The total is now increased to 400,000,000 acres, or an average of 53 percent of their total area.

The State of Nevada is more than 80 percent under Federal control.

In this great domain the law of the land is not an act of Congress, but that tyrannous substitute known as the discretion of the Secretary.

In many ways the Congress has lately delegated its right and duty to legislate, but never in a larger degree than in this gift of absolute power to appointive officials.

The Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture have been made omnipotent dictators in this great domain, yet citizens of these 11 States, irritated by long-range mandates, can cast no votes for or against these department heads.

We still make impassioned claims to being a Republic, yet we here have the spectacle of a group of allegedly sovereign States governed in matters most vital to them by officials in whose selection they have no vote or voice.

President Coolidge put a very plain truth in very plain language when he said: "When authority is located afar off, it is necessarily less well informed, less sympathetic, and less responsive to public requirements. When it is close at hand, it is more likely to be executed, and in the public interest.

"Having a personal contact, it is more humane and more charitable."

These Western States are now forever deprived of sovereignty, settlement, growth, and taxation. Their hope of augmented strength in Congress, as the years might increase their populations and representation, is destroyed.

Several of them have but one Member in the House of Representatives.

By secretarial annulments of the several homestead acts further settlement is made impossible.

Many of these States are in the great region cursed by summer aridity and arctic winters, by alkaline waters and ceaseless winds. Yet allowed possession of but half their area they must endeavor to maintain a State government, courts, roads, schools, and police.

During President Hoover's administration, Ray Lyman Wilbur, as Secretary of the Interior, suggested a new land policy which would transfer to the States the control of the surface rights on the public domain.

Mineral rights were to be reserved to the Federal Government.

President Hoover then appointed a public-lands committee of 22 members to consider the whole matter of conservation and administration of the public domain.

The chairman was Hon. James A. Garfield, of Ohio.

Ex-officio members were the Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture.

Members nationally known as avowed conservationists were Mary Roberts Rinehart, author; George H. Lorimer, editor, Saturday Evening Post; Col. W. B. Greeley, former Chief of the United States Forest Service; and Hon. Huntley N. Spaulding, former Governor of New Hampshire.

In their report they recommended cession to such States as desired it.

The States interested were to have the long period of 10 years in which to determine their choice.

After these lands had lain on the counter for 10 years, such as were not claimed by the States were to be put under Federal control and subject to lease and fees.

Nothing could have been more fair. It was approved by the Conference of Western Governors at Portland, Oreg., and gratefully accepted throughout the entire West as a complete solution of the problem.

The only opposition voiced was that of Governor Dern, of Utah, now Secretary of War.

Unfortunately, the depression came on with its greater problems, President Hoover went out of office, and the labors of this committee were set at naught.

A bill was pending which bore the name of Representative Colton, of Utah, placing all public lands under Federal control and a fee system, but it also contained the feature of local option.

Later the same bill was introduced by Congressman TAYLOR at departmental request, and it was known as the Taylor bill. It still gave State legislatures the right to refuse or accept its provisions.

Immediately upon taking office, Secretary Ickes, in an article written for the Saturday Evening Post, announced that he would urge the passage of the Taylor bill but would oppose the feature of local option.

He asserted that nothing would satisfy but complete and absolute control, regardless of State and local sentiment or pleaded rights.

He said, "These lands must be removed from the sinister influence of State governments."

These words were considered by many to be offensive and unsupported by facts.

The record of his own Department of the Interior is much more sinister than that of any State government in the West.

There hangs over it the Ballinger land scandals and trial and the later Teapot Dome affair, which left us the sorry picture of Secretary Fall walking out of the oil magnate's office with his $100,000 in a suit case.

There are cavilers in the shadows of the Rockies who feel that the Navy's oil might have been safer in the clutches of some sinister State government than in the conserving pockets of the Interior Department.

A politically important State like Ohio or Massachusetts, with its large electoral vote, need not fear that a Cabinet member or a President will speak of its State government as exerting a sinister influence which must be curbed.

No more would a King of England or a Duke of York use a sentence casting an aspersion on Australia or Canada.

The irritation of the arid States is intensified by the thought that their political insignificance makes them a constant target for bureaucratic artillery.

When President Roosevelt signed the Taylor Act of June 28, 1934, he returned it to Congress with a congratulatory note lauding its provisions.

One sentence in that note was remarkable: "It confers broad powers on the Secretary of the Interior * * * the authority to exercise these powers is carefully safeguarded against impairment by State or local action."

When the President was Governor of New York he said:

"The preservation of this home rule is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country."

But now there is apparent determination that home rule or local interference in secretarial management of these vast Federal provinces is not going to be tolerated.

The United States Supreme Court in its A. A. A. decision said that agricultural production was a State and local matter, not to be regulated by Federal laws.

The hog and corn contracts are invalidated for the Middle West, but in the western principality of 11 States production will be restricted by a much simpler and more Hitlerlike method.

At a grazing conference in Casper, Wyo., in January 1935 the director of grazing explained that hog production had been regulated by a very intricate and vexatious system of personal contracts with the individual farmer. He stated that the number of these contracts reached one and a half million and that each one required inspections, appraisals, and enumerations, both frequent and costly.

He then explained that in the public-land States the number of cattle and sheep would be annually regulated by secretarial order, calling for perhaps a 10-percent cut on cattle and a 20-percent cut on sheep. If, at a later date, conditions in the Nation seemed to require it, there might be another czarist ukase calling on each man to make an additional cut.

Stockmen present were asked to rejoice that matters were to be thus simplified.

It is daily made more evident that the hand of the Washington planner is to be heavily laid on the stock growers of the semidesert States.

These lands can produce little but grass, and the only marketable crop has been feeder cattle and sheep, which are shipped to the Corn Belt to be fattened. Such were Mother Nature's plans and orders, but they are to be superseded by Father Planner's superior rules.

A maglet called Cow Country is the organ of the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association. It has lately made the following comment on the new soil-conservation program:

"The greater part of the land area of Wyoming, in common with that of most of the arid Western States, is nonmineral, untimbered, and unfit for farming. Its only product is the grass and other herbage that grows upon it, and so it is fit only for grazing livestock, for which purpose it is admirably adapted. Livestock production is, therefore, the foundation industry which supports our people. Should that industry be destroyed, entire communities would become 'ghost towns', just as the cessation of mining in a small way depopulated former mining towns.

"The suggested plan would create millions of acres of hay and pasture within the farm belt, heavily subsidized by the National Government at the expense of taxpayers. Inevitably there would occur a great increase in livestock production upon these heavily subsidized farms. The surplus of livestock thus created would seriously cripple the entire livestock industry and surely defeat the declared purpose of the administration to promote parity prices unless western stockmen are to be forced to reduce production to compensate for this increase in the farm belt."

The Corn Belter has been accused by the ubiquitous experts of having overproduced, overplowed, overborrowed, and overbought, but it appears that he is to be trusted not to overgraze.

That is a purely western delinquency.

Government agencies, to impress the Nation with the need of their salaried supervision, irritate westerners by their constant assertions that something of value in the way of natural resources has been destroyed in the processes of settlement and development.

The native is ready with quotations from Parkman, Bonneville, our old geographies, and journals of the forty-niners and Mormons to prove that there was nothing to destroy.

There was little grass, less water, and little timber for fuel outside of the almost inaccessible mountains.

The man from Utah, Idaho, or Arizona is proud of what has been accomplished with most meager resources. He does not like to be called an exploiter, a scavanger, a looter of the public domain, or a destroyer of wildlife and scenic beauty.

He may tell you that when he travels to old haunts in Indiana or Illinois he hears at pioneer's picnics much praise for hardy fathers and grandfathers who developed the resources of those States. The picnic orators make much use of the words "development" and "sacrifice."

Everyone seems proud of descent from those who changed a wilderness into fields rich with homes and harvests.

But in the public-land States official Washington calls the same urge and determination "exploitation."

Federal press bureaus are fond of such words as "devastation" and "looting." The rancher on his little desert oasis has outraged the soil conservationists by plowing and irrigating land that never previously knew a forage cover of any sort. Not since Tertiary upheavals spread these grassless lands before the scowling face of the sun.

Sons of Idaho and Arizona fathers are not to be allowed to boast as do those of the Corn Belt.

The mountain-born can only look at the alfalfa fields, the haystacks, the sugar-beet factories, the city parks, and the farm orchards, and as Secretary Wallace framed it, "glory in their shame."

The Secretary of Agriculture paid his initial visit to Wyoming in June 1934. He came by plane from Salt Lake City to Cheyenne. In that flight his opportunities for study of range conditions were certainly limited.

He was then driven in an auto to Douglas, Wyo., where he had been invited to address a cattlemen's convention. This is a distance of about 165 miles. In this speech he said: "You have destroyed your pastures and ranges and appear to glory in your shame."

Washington officials too often come to their western principality with misconceptions and prejudices which even an aerial inspection cannot soften or dissipate.

In February 1935, western stockmen were summoned to Denver to confer on plans for administering the Taylor Act, which, in the previous June, had placed the public lands under Federal control and possible lease.

It was announced that Secretary Ickes would make a hurried trip from Washington to address the gathering.

The day before his arrival a statement was given to the Denver press by F. R. Carpenter, director of grazing, in which he said:

"The Secretary will address the conference tomorrow afternoon, and what he will say will spell happiness or unhappiness for the western stockman."

It is disturbing to a citizen of a great republic to know that an appointive official can hurry across the continent to regions and people with whom he has had no previous contacts and, in a speech of less than an hour, spell happiness or unhappiness for the citizens of 11 States.

Yet Director Carpenter was absolutely correct in his statement.

Such autocratic authority is actually in the Secretary's hands.

He issues rules and regulations for this vast area which have all the force and dignity of law.

If his subordinates offended the citizen, or some ruling seems unfair, the only appeal lies to the honorable Secretary, in whose office the rules were made, and whose appointees have acted under his written instructions.

The State courts are denied jurisdiction, and the cost of recourse to a Federal court is prohibitive.

The Secretary makes the law and then sits as defendant, judge, and jury.

At Washington the novels of Zane Grey and the biography of Wild Bill are still considered essential textbooks for those asked to familiarize themselves with western conditions.

Secretary Ickes is too close to the realities, too thirsty for facts, to give much heed to the high flavors of fiction, yet in his speech at Denver he put in a level teaspoonful of this official vanilla.

He emphasized his Department's determination to end range wars, range monopolies, and strong-arm stuff throughout the West.

He would arouse such shepherds as he found abiding in the fields and announce to them the gospel of "peace on earth."

Only in the story books and the outworn cant of the bureaucrat does the cattle baron and the mutton monarch exist. But to admit that the West is well behaved and well intentioned might lead to a suggestion that expensive surveillance is unnecessary.

It can be said with truth and pride that in no part of the United States of America has the young man, the "little fellow", the penniless and the deserving, found more of opportunity and assistance than in the range livestock country of the far West.

When a faithful herder had no money to buy sheep of his own, his employer gave him a band on shares. If the cowboy was both competent and sober, the cow man took him in as a partner. No one is seeking a monopoly of hardships.

One band of sheep usually brings a man all the grief that nature equipped him to endure.

Politicians in all times and climes have been found marching to the rescue of the little fellow and the under dog.

But it is a saddening truth that laws are usually made by the strong and to benefit the strong. If the weak organize to protect themselves the strong men of the organization seek their own personal profit and the weak go down again.

But to extol the weak and to utter determined vows of immediate assistance is an oratorical device which withstands much repetition and wear.

Too much of what is being done for the farmer and for industry is based on an assumption of ignorance and incapacity in the individual owner.

It smacks of the scientific and intellectual to fault the farmer for all the calamities which befall him, and assert that his great need is intelligent leadership and wise supervision.

The possible leaders and supervisors are in the anteroom discussing salaries.

The unusual dust storms west of the Missouri River are said to be due to the cultivation of lands which should never have been plowed. Six successive years of drought is not a sufficient explanation.

We are told that the wrong crops were planted and the furrows were run to windward when they should have run to leeward.

Assertions are made that erosion by wind and water, coupled with vicious farming practices, will in 50 years make a sterile desert of the great Mississippi Valley. The hunger for Government jobs makes this tide of pessimism and accusation run alarmingly high.

There was a time when the pioneer was applauded for his course, tenacity, and endurance of hardship. But today his every victory over nature is branded as a mistake. He has either overproduced, overexpanded, or overgrazed.

But it is very calming and reassuring to look at the history of agriculture in Europe. Lands in Italy, France, Germany, and England have been ceaselessly tilled by untaught, unscientific farmers since 2,000 years before Christ.

If there be truth in the startling tales of erosion losses and soil depletion, there would not today be one fertile acre left on the continent of Europe.

Yet those fields are more productive today than in the time of Julius Caesar. The soils have been given no analysis or protection by government experts or saviors.

There was no department of agriculture to put the bull in the bulletins.

No parliaments or kings attempted to tell the farmer how to conduct the business to which he was born. They did not fear that the toiler would destroy his own source of livelihood.

They trusted him as an individual to check such dangers as might threaten. They considered erosion, manures, and cultural methods the farmer's own problems, and wisely left him to solve them.

It is government's only duty to see that the farmer gets fair play in the public markets and an income which enables him to care for his lands and his family as his intelligence shall prompt him.

When Hannibal wished to cheer his soldiers, toiling over the Alps to Italy, he told them of the rich wheat fields of Apulia, of the oil and the wine.

That was 2,100 years ago, yet those Apulian fields are today producing better wheat than Hannibal ever saw.

President Roosevelt has lately said that we must not ship our fertility abroad. The most analytical minds of the New Deal appear puzzled over the exact meaning of this statement.

If we are to ship any agricultural products to other lands we are, in a sense, shipping our fertility.

Humans have been eating up the world's fertility for a million years, and yet it is still there.

The Democratic Party has always stood for liberal trade relations with the outside world, as opposed to the Republican stress on a home market.

Every sack of wheat and bale of cotton shipped abroad represents some measure of soil fertility.

All commerce of the world is an exchange of fertility; the fertility of Colorado for that of Japan; the fertility of India for that of Canada; the fertility of the brain for that of the soil.

So it has ever been, yet there is no waste. It is another proof of the indestructibility of matter.

A milk cow returns to the field 85 percent of the fertility she consumes.

Is it the soil that is in danger of being robbed, or is it the tax victims?

A Montana stockman, irritated by accusations of overgrazing made by Federal agents, exclaims:

"The national pay roll is overgrazed. Let us try to check the erosion of public funds. I am told that the grass is badly trampled out around the United States Treasury Building. Those Federal feed lots are getting pretty dusty."

Conservation is a good word and a good doctrine, but a serious menace rears its head when there is more money for those who conserve than for those who operate.

We cannot have more than 50 percent of our people in Federal uniforms, supervising the other half who are doing the work.

It is getting to be a close count as between the overseers and the overalls. This cancer of too much Government will soon eat out the Nation's heart.

Shall we give heed to all this criticism of the world's workers by experts and supervisors, seeking new worlds to admonish, or will we be calm enough to look over the record of human accomplishment in both America and Europe and say again that the average man can be trusted to do his own work well?

Citizens of the Federal provinces have been recently given a remarkable proof of how utterly bureaucratic and executive authority has superseded congressional action and time-honored laws.

This example is in the nullification of the various homestead acts, all of which stand unrepealed by Congress, and so far as legislative action by elected Representatives may affect them, are still in full force and effect.

Yet the Secretary of the Interior says that they have served their purpose, and they now lie on the large but still mounting scrap pile.

The reason given is that the lands left subject to entry are too poor to guarantee the applicant a living.

That has, for 75 years, been considered the entryman's business. He is on the ground, experienced in agriculture and accustomed to hardships.

Shall we continue to permit him to make the effort or shall we beckon him to the relief rolls as a Government foundling?

The original homestead act, signed by Abraham Lincoln in 1862, was perhaps the most beneficent piece of legislation ever passed by the Congress.

It has given homes to millions. It has passed into private ownership and taxable status almost the entire area of Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, the two Dakotas, Washington, and Oregon.

Iowa and Missouri were in process of settlement at the time of its passage, but they owe, perhaps, half of their taxable real estate to the homestead acts.

Yet an honorable Secretary is permitted to nullify it all by one flourish of his potent pen.

The following colloquy brightens the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for March 11, 1935. Mr. Poole, of the Interior Department, was testifying before the Public Lands Committee of the House.

"Mr. POOLE. There was a basic reason for the issuance of the Executive order of November 26. It was felt by the President and by the National Resources Board, which has gone into this homestead question very fully, that practically all lands that were economically sufficient to support a family—which is the guiding standard, you might say, or rod of measurement to determine what lands should go into private ownership—had been patented and that the homestead laws had served their purpose."

"Mr. WHITE. That was the opinion of whom, that it had served its purpose?

"Mr. POOLE. The National Resources Board, the Secretary of the Interior, and the President.

"Mr. LEMKE. I certainly am amazed at that statement. I think that is a question for Congress to determine, whether the homestead law has served its purpose or not, not any executive, or even the Chief Executive."

In none of the homestead acts did Congress demand that a man make a living on his tract. Very few did more than exist. The whole history of homesteading is a record of poverty, hardship, and tenacity.

People worked on them, starved on them, and died on them; for in the beginnings of the now populous States of Iowa, Nebraska, and Missouri crops were too often complete failures.

Congress, in all its homestead legislation, never enacted anything but residence and improvements.

Success or failure was the entryman's affair. He had to testify that he was familiar with the tract, its soil, and vegetation; he knew what he was buying and was asking to assume the obvious risks.

Although the Department of the Interior puts commendable emphasis on its regard for the little fellow, its first act, after the passage of the Taylor bill, which made its rule absolute, was to cancel all homestead entries made prior to the passage of the act which were still in such a preliminary status as to be affected by a retroactive Executive order.

There were 500 of these in the State of Wyoming and proportionate numbers in the other public-land States.

The total of canceled entries ran into thousands.

The majority of these entries had been made by the cherished little man, by sons and daughters of pioneers, just reaching their filing age.

These were young men, eager for a start in business, and asking for their first foothold, and daughters who thought to add 640 acres to the scanty pastures of a debt-ridden father.

But no diminution of secretarial acreage was to be permitted.

Presidential ukase and secretarial discretion waved the impoverished thousands back and opened the gates of livelihood and comfortable salaries to more Federal guardians, rangers, graziers, surveyors, and appraisers, who will soon form a helpful army of political rooters and organizers for the home folks on Pennsylvania Avenue.

In several Western States the great host of appointees in these federalized areas have organized themselves into a holding company, comprising groups in green uniforms, some in blue, and others in khaki.

They hold annual meetings to devise ways and means to perpetuate their jobs.

They include as members postal clerks and postmasters, Federal court members, United States district attorney's retainers, the income-tax collectors and instructors, the Biological Survey, United States forest supervisors and rangers, and the personnel of the Bureau of Mines, which controls production of ore and oil.

Now will come the grazing administration, with its superintendents, surveyors, appraisers, and graziers.

It will take larger buildings at Helena, Boise, Cheyenne, and Salt Lake to house Federal administration than is now required for State officials and legislatures.

New Federal buildings will overshadow the State capitols. The young man seeking secure position and ample salary will know on which side of the street to make his bow and solicitation.

Such organization of strangers, anchored to good positions, create much ill will in the minds of the native born on whose backs alone is laid the burden of taxation.

Alien rule has always been detested.

The southerner hated the carpetbagger sent at the close of the Civil War to reconstruct him.

The Irish came to hate the name and uniform of England's black-and-tan constabulary. The German people of the Saar Valley voted 90 percent to lower the French flag which had been floating over them.

As these numerous Federal agencies are granted augmented personnels and broader powers there will be an increase of sectional bitterness.

Conflicts between sheepmen and cattlemen belong to a forgotten day. They belong to the movies and the pages of lurid fiction.

But strife between western people and bureaucratic overseers will be an enduring animosity until that day when high-powered Federal control gives place to those equal rights and that complete sovereignty promised in the deeds of cession to all new States upon their admission to the Union.

OPINION OF SUPREME COURT ON MINIMUM-WAGE LAW

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the majority opinion of the Supreme Court holding the New York minimum-wage law unconstitutional; also the dissenting opinion delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes and the minority opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Stone. With those opinions I ask also to have inserted in the RECORD editorial comments upon the decision which were published in the New York Times, in the Washington Post, and in the Washington Daily News.

There being no objection, the opinion and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAJORITY OPINION OF THE SUPREME COURT HOLDING WAGE LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Supreme Court of the United States. No. 838, October term, 1935

Frederick L. Moorehead, as warden of the city prison of the Borough of Brooklyn, petitioner, v. People ex rel. Joseph Tipaldo. On writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

Mr. Justice Butler delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a habeas corpus case originating in the Supreme Court of New York. Relator was indicted in the county court of Kings County and sent to jail to await trial upon the charge that as manager of a laundry he failed to obey the mandatory order of the State industrial commissioner prescribing minimum wages for women employees.

The relator's petition for the writ avers that the statute, ch. 584 of the Laws of 1933 (Cons. Law, ch. 31, art. 19), under which the commissioner made the order, insofar as it purports to authorize him to fix women's wages, is repugnant to the due-process clause, article I, section 6, of the constitution of the State, and the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

FEDERAL STATUTE CONDEMNED

The application for the writ is grounded upon the claim that the State statute is substantially identical with the minimum-wage law enacted by Congress for the District of Columbia (40 Stat. 960) which in 1923 was condemned by this Court as repugnant to the due-process clause of the fifth amendment (Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U. S. 525).

The warden's return, without disclosing the commissioner's order, the prescribed wages, the findings essential to his jurisdiction to establish them, things done in pursuance of the act, or the allegations of the indictment, merely shows that under an order of the county court he was detaining relator for trial. The case was submitted on petition and return. The court dismissed the writ (156 Misc. 522).

Relator took the case to the Court of Appeals. It held the act repugnant to the due-process clauses of the State and Federal Constitutions (270 N. Y. 233). The remittitur directed that the order appealed from be reversed, the writ sustained, and the prisoner discharged; it certified that the Federal constitutional question was presented and necessarily passed on. The Supreme Court entered judgment as directed. We granted a writ of certiorari.

The act extends to women and minors in any "occupation", which "shall mean an industry, trade, or business, or branch thereof, or class of work therein in which women or minors are gainfully employed, but shall not include domestic service in the home of the employer or labor on a farm" (sec. 551 (6)).

NOT EMERGENCY LAW

It is not an emergency law. It does not regulate hours or any conditions affecting safety or protection of employees. It relates only to wages of adult women and minors.

As the record is barren of details in respect of investigation, findings, amounts being paid women workers in laundries or elsewhere prior to the order, or of things done to ascertain the minimum prescribed, we must take it as granted that, if the State is permitted, as against employers and their women employees, to establish and enforce minimum wages, that power has been validly exerted.

It is to be assumed that the rates have been fairly made in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the act and in full compliance with the defined standards.

If, consistently with the due-process clause, the State may not enter upon regulation of the sort undertaken by challenged enactment, then plainly it cannot by diligence to insure the establishment of just minima create power to enter that field (cf. St. Joseph Stock Yards Co. v. United States, U. S. —, — (pamphlet, p. 6); Baltimore & Ohio R. R. v. United States, — U. S. —, — (pamphlet, pp. 13–14)).

COURT RESTRICTS ITS ACTS

The Adkins case, unless distinguishable, requires affirmance of the judgment below. The petition for the writ sought review upon the ground that this case is distinguishable from that one. No application has been made for reconsideration of the constitutional question there decided.

The validity of the principles upon which that decision rests is not challenged. This Court confines itself to the ground upon which the writ was asked or granted (Alice State Bank v. Houston Pasture Co., 247 U. S. 240, 242; Clark v. Willard, 294 U. S. 211, 216). Here the review granted was no broader than that sought by the petitioner (Johnson v. Manhattan Railway Co., 189 U. S. 479, 494).

He is not entitled and does not ask to be heard upon the question whether the Adkins case should be overruled. He maintains that it may be distinguished on the ground that the statutes are vitally dissimilar.

The District of Columbia Act provided for a board to ascertain and declare "standards of minimum wages" for women in any occupation and what wages were "inadequate to supply the necessary cost of living to any such women workers to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals" (sec. 9).

Violations were punishable by fine and imprisonment (sec. 18). The declared purposes were to protect women from conditions detrimental to their health and morals resulting from wages inadequate to maintain decent standards of living (sec. 23).

NEW YORK ACT QUOTED

The New York act declares it to be against public policy for any employer to employ any woman at an oppressive and unreasonable wage (sec. 552), defined as one which is "both less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered and less than sufficient to meet the minimum cost of living necessary for health" (sec. 551 (7)).

"A fair wage" is one "fairly and reasonably commensurate with the value of the service or class of service rendered" (sec. 551 (8)). If the commissioner is of opinion that any substantial number of women in any occupation are receiving oppressive and unreasonable wages, he shall appoint a wage board to report upon the establishment of minimum fair-wage rates (sec. 554). After investigation the board shall submit a report, including its recommendations as to minimum fair-wage standards (sec. 555).

And for administrative guidance, the act declares: "In establishing a minimum fair wage for any service or class of service under this article the commissioner and the wage board, without being bound by any technical rules of evidence or procedure, (1) may take into account all relevant circumstances affecting the value of the service or class of service rendered, and (2) may be guided by like considerations as would guide a court in a suit for the reasonable value of services rendered where services are rendered at the request of an employer without contract as to the amount of the wage to be paid, and (3) may consider the wages paid in the State for work of like or comparable character by employers who voluntarily maintain minimum fair-wage standards" (sec. 551 (8)).

ACTS ARE COMPARED

If the commissioner accepts the report, he shall publish it, and a public hearing must be held (sec. 556). If, after the hearing, he approves the report, he "shall make a directory order which shall define minimum fair-wage rates" (sec. 557).

Upon hearing and finding of disobedience, the commissioner may publish the name of an employer as having failed to observe the directory order (sec. 559). If, after a directory order has been in effect for 9 months, the commissioner is of opinion that persistent nonobservance is a threat to the maintenance of the prescribed standards, he may, after hearing, make the order mandatory (sec. 560). Violation of a mandatory order is a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, imprisonment, or both (sec. 565 (2)).

Thus it appears: The minimum wage provided for in the District act was one not less than adequate "to supply the necessary cost of living to any such women workers to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals."

The New York act defines an oppressive and unreasonable wage as containing two elements. The one first mentioned is "less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered." The other is "less than sufficient to meet the minimum cost of living necessary for health."

POWER BASED ON FINDING

The basis last mentioned is not to be distinguished from the living wage defined in the District act. The exertion of the granted power to prescribe minimum wages is by the State act conditioned upon a finding by the commissioner or other administrative agency that a substantial number of women in any occupation are receiving wages that are oppressive and unreasonable,

i. e., less than value of the service and less than a living wage. That finding is essential to jurisdiction of the commissioner.

In the State court there was controversy between the parties as to whether the "minimum fair-wage rates" are required to be established solely upon value of service or upon that value and the living wage. Against the contention of the attorney general, the court of appeals held that the minimum wage must be based on both elements.

Speaking through its chief judge, the court said: "We find no material difference between the act of Congress and this act of the New York State Legislature. The act of Congress, it is said, was to protect women from conditions resulting from wages which were inadequate to maintain decent standards of living."

The opinion then quotes from the brief of the attorney general: "The purpose of the statute in the Adkins case was to guarantee a wage based solely upon the necessities of the workers. The statute did not provide for the wages to have any relationship to earning power; was applicable to all vocations and not to the character of the work."

LAW SET WAGE STANDARD

As contrasted with this statute, the New York minimum-wage law provides a definite standard for wages paid. It provides that the worker is to be paid at least the value of the services rendered. The opinion continues:

"This is a difference in phraseology and not in principle. The New York act, as above stated, prohibits an oppressive and unreasonable wage, which means both less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered and less than sufficient to meet the minimum cost of living necessary for health.

"The act of Congress had one standard, the living wage; this State act has added another, reasonable value. The minimum wage must include both.

"What was vague before has not been made any clearer. One of the elements, therefore, in fixing the fair wage is the very matter which was the basis of the congressional act. Forcing the payment of wages at a reasonable value does not make inapplicable the principle and ruling of the Adkins case. The distinctions between this case and the Adkins case are differences in details, methods, and time; the exercise of legislative power to fix wages in any employment is the same."

The petitioner does not suggest and reasonably it cannot be thought that, so far as concerns repugnancy to the due-process clause, there is any difference between the minimum-wage law for the District of Columbia and the clause of the New York act, "less than sufficient to meet the minimum cost of living necessary for health."

Petitioner does not claim that element was validated by including with it the other ingredient, "less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered."

BACKS STATE COURT

His brief repeats the State court's declaration: "The act of Congress had one standard, the living wage; this State act has added another, reasonable value. The minimum wage must include both. What was vague before has not been made any clearer. "One of the elements, therefore, in fixing the fair wage is the very matter which was the basis of the congressional act."

Then he says: "The italicized lines carry the court's misconception of the statute. It is a basic conception. From it flows the erroneous conclusion of the court of appeals that there exists no material difference between the two statutes.

"Those two factors do not enter into the determination of the minimum 'fair wage' as in the statute defined nor as determined in this case. The only basis for evaluating and arriving at the 'fair minimum wage' is the fair value of the services rendered."

There is no blinking the fact that the State court construed the prescribed standard to include cost of living or that petitioner here refuses to accept that construction. Petitioner's contention that the court of appeals misconstrued the act cannot be entertained. This Court is without power to put a different construction upon the State enactment from that adopted by the highest court of the State.

ACCEPTED AS LEGISLATURE'S AIM

We are not at liberty to consider petitioner's argument based on the construction repudiated by that court. The meaning of the statute as fixed by its decision must be accepted here as if the meaning had been specifically expressed in the enactment (Knights of Pythias v. Meyer, 265 U. S. 30, 32).

Exclusive authority to enact carries with it final authority to say what the measure means (Jones v. Prairie Oil Co., 273 U. S. 195, 200).

The standard of "minimum fair-wage rates" for women workers to be prescribed must be considered as if both elements, value of service and living wage, were embodied in the statutory definition itself (International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 216, 220).

As our construction of an act of Congress must be deemed by State courts to be the law of the United States, so this New York act, as construed by her court of last resort, must here be taken to express the intention and purpose of her lawmakers (Green v. Lessee of Neal, 6 Pet. 291, 295–298).

The State court rightly held that the Adkins case controls this one and requires that relator be discharged upon the ground that the legislation under which he was indicted and imprisoned is repugnant to the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment.

The general statement in the New York act of the fields of labor it includes, taken in connection with the work not covered, indicates legislative intention to reach nearly all private employers of women. The act does not extend to men. It does extend to boys and girls under the age of 21 years, but there is here involved no question as to its validity in respect of wages to be prescribed for them.

TWO QUESTIONS RAISED

Relator's petition for the writ shows that the charge against him is that as manager of a laundry he "disobeyed a mandatory order prescribing certain minimum wages for certain adult women employees of the said laundry." The rights of no other class of workers are here involved.

Upon the face of the act the question arises whether the State may impose upon the employers State-made minimum-wage rates for all competent experienced women workers whom they may have in their service.

That question involves another one. It is: Whether the State has power similarly to subject to State-made wages all adult women employed in trade, industry, or business other than house and farm work. These were the questions decided in the Adkins case.

So far at least as concerns the validity of the enactment under consideration, the restraint imposed by the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment upon legislative power of the State is the same as that imposed by the corresponding provision of the fifth amendment upon the legislative power of the United States.

EQUAL BARGAINING DEFENDED

This Court's opinion shows (pp. 545, 546): The right to make contracts about one's affairs is a part of the liberty protected by the due-process clause. Within this liberty are provisions of contracts between employer and employee fixing the wages to be paid.

In making contracts of employment, generally speaking, the parties have equal right to obtain from each other the best terms they can by private bargaining. Legislative abridgement of that freedom can only be justified by the existence of exceptional circumstances. Freedom of contract is the general rule and restraint the exception.

This Court has found not repugnant to the due-process clause statutes fixing rates and charges to be exacted by business impressed with a public interest, relating to contracts for the performance of public work, prescribing the character, methods, and time of payment of wages, fixing hours of labor.

Physical differences between men and women must be recognized in proper cases, and legislation fixing hours or conditions of work may properly take them into account, but (p. 553) "we cannot accept the doctrine that women of mature age, sui juris, require or may be subjected to restrictions upon their liberty of contract which could not lawfully be imposed in the case of men under similar circumstances.

HEALTH ISSUE RAISED

"To do so would be to ignore all the implications to be drawn from the present-day trend of legislation, as well as that of common thought and usage, by which woman is accorded emancipation from the old doctrine that she must be given special protection or be subjected to special restraint in her contractual and civil relationships. * * * (p. 554).

"Enough has been said to show that the authority to fix hours of labor cannot be exercised except in respect of those occupations where work of long-continued duration is detrimental to health.

"This Court has been careful, in every case where the question has been raised, to place its decision upon this limited authority of the legislature to regulate hours of labor and to disclaim any purpose to uphold the legislation as fixing wages, thus recognizing an essential difference between the two. It seems plain that these decisions afford no real support for any form of law establishing minimum wages."

The decision and the reasoning upon which it rests clearly show that the State is without power by any form of legislation to prohibit, change, or nullify contracts between employers and adult women workers as to the amount of wages to be paid.

OBJECTIONS ARE CITED

Then the opinion emphasizes objections specifically applicable to the requirement that the minimum wages to be prescribed under the District act shall be adequate "to supply the necessary cost of living to any such women workers to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals."

Some of them were: The price fixed by the board need have no relation to earning powers, hours, or place or character of work; it is based wholly on opinion of the board as to what amount will be necessary to comply with the standard; it applies to every occupation without regard to the kind of work; the standard is so vague as to be impossible of practical application; the act takes account of the necessities of only the employee; to the extent that the sum fixed exceeds fair value of service rendered, it amounts to a compulsory exaction for the support of a partially indigent person for whose condition there rests upon the employer no peculiar responsibility; the statute exacts from the employer an arbitrary payment for a purpose and upon a basis having no causal connection with his business or the contract or the work the employee engages to do; the declared basis is not the value of the service rendered but the extraneous circumstance that the employee needs to get a prescribed sum of money to insure her subsistence, health, and morals.

The Court said: "The ethical right of every worker, man or woman, to have a living wage may be conceded. The fallacy of the proposed method of attaining it is that it assumes that every employer is bound at all events to furnish it. The moral requirement, implicit in every contract of employment, viz, that the amount to be paid and the service to be rendered shall bear to each other some relation of just equivalence, is completely ignored."

EMPLOYEE ALONE CONSIDERED

The necessities of the employee are alone considered, and these arise outside of the employment and are as great in one occupation as in another.

Illustrating particular constitutional difficulties encountered by the enactment then before us, the opinion proceeds (p. 559):

"Should a statute undertake to vest in a commission power to determine the quantity of food necessary for individual support and require the shopkeeper, if he sell to the individual at all, to furnish that quantity at not more than a fixed maximum, it would undoubtedly fall before the constitutional test. The fallacy of any argument in support of the validity of such a statute would be quickly exposed.

"The argument in support of that now being considered is equally fallacious, though the weakness of it may not be so plain. A statute requiring an employer to pay in money, to pay at prescribed and regular intervals, to pay the value of the services rendered, even to pay with fair relation to the extent of the benefit obtained from the service, would be understandable.

"But a statute which prescribes payment without regard to any of these things, and solely with relation to circumstances apart from the contract of employment, the business affected by it, and the work done under it, is so clearly the product of a naked, arbitrary exercise of power that it cannot be allowed to stand under the Constitution of the United States."

PETITIONER'S CLAIM REJECTED

Petitioner does not attempt to support the act as construed by the State court. His claim is that it is to be tested here as if it did not include the cost of living and as if value of service was the sole standard.

Plainly, that position is untenable. If the State has power to single out for regulation the amount of wages to be paid women, the value of their services would be a material consideration. But that fact has no relevance upon the question whether the State has any such power.

And utterly without significance upon the question of power is the suggestion that the New York prescribed standard includes value of service with cost of living, whereas the District of Columbia standard was based upon the latter alone.

As shown above, the dominant issue in the Adkins case was whether Congress had power to establish minimum wages for adult women workers in the District of Columbia. The opinion directly answers in the negative. The ruling that defects in the prescribed standard stamped that act as arbitrary and invalid was an additional group of subordinate consequence.

The dissenting opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Taft (in which Mr. Justice Sanford concurred) assumes (p. 564) "That the conclusion in this (Adkins) case rests on the distinction between a minimum of wages and a maximum of hours."

That is the only point he discussed; he did not refer to the validity of the standard prescribed by the act.

HOLMES FINDING QUOTED

The dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes begins (p. 567): "The question in this case is the broad one whether Congress can establish minimum rates of wages for women in the District of Columbia with due provision for special circumstances, or whether we must say that Congress has no power to meddle with the matter at all."

And after assuming that women would not be employed at the wages fixed unless they were earned or unless the employer could pay them, the opinion says (p. 570): "But the group on which the law is held to fall is fundamental and therefore it is unnecessary to consider matters of detail."

If the decision of the Court turned upon the question of the validity of the particular standard, that question could not have been ignored by the Justices who were in favor of upholding the act. Clearly they understood, and rightly, that by the opinion of the Court it was held that Congress was without power to deal with the subject at all.

To distinguish this from the Adkins case, petitioner refers to changes in conditions that have come since that decision, cites great increase during recent years in the number of women wage earners and invokes the first section of the act, called "factual background."

ACT A PERMANENT POLICY

The act is not to meet an emergency; it discloses a permanent policy; the increasing number of women workers suggests that more and more they are getting and holding jobs that otherwise would belong to men. The "factual background" must be read in the light of the circumstances attending its enactment.

The New York Legislature passed two minimum-wage measures and contemporaneously submitted them to the Governor. One was approved; it is the act now before us. The other was vetoed and did not become law.

They contained the same definitions of oppressive wage and fair wage and in general provided the same machinery and procedure culminating in fixing minimum wages by directory orders. The one vetoed was for an emergency; it extended to men as well as to women employees; it did not provide for the enforcement of wages by mandatory orders.

It is significant that their "factual backgrounds" are much alike. They are indicated in the margin. (2) These legislative declarations, in form of findings or recitals of fact, serve well to illustrate why any measure that deprives employers and adult women of freedom to agree upon wages, leaving employers and men employees free so to do, is necessarily arbitrary.

MEN EQUALLY SUBJECT TO EVILS

Much, if not all, that in them is said in justification of the regulations that the act imposes in respect of women's wages apply with equal force in support of the same regulation of men's wages. While men are left free to fix their wages by agreement with employers, it would be fanciful to suppose that the regulation of women's wages would be useful to prevent or lessen the evils listed in the first section of the act.

Men in need of work are as likely as women to accept the low wages offered by unscrupulous employers. Men in greater numbers than women support themselves and dependents and because of need will work for whatever wages they can get and that without regard to the value of the service and even though the pay is less than minima prescribed in accordance with this act.

It is plain that, under circumstances such as those portrayed in the "factual background", prescribing of minimum wages for women alone would unreasonably restrain them in competition with men and tend arbitrarily to deprive them of employment and a fair chance to find work.

This Court, on the authority of the Adkins case and with the acquiescence of all the Justices who dissented from the decision, (3) held repugnant to the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment statutes of Arizona and Arkansas (4), respectively, fixing minimum wages for women (Murphy v. Sardell, 269 U. S. 530; Donham v. West-Nelson Mfg. Co., 273 U. S. 657). We have adhered to the principle there applied and cited it as a guide in other cases (Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399; Wolff Co. v. Industrial Court, 262 U. S. 522, 534; Ribnik v. McBride, 277 U. S. 350, 356; see Near v. Minnesota, 283 U. S. 697, 707–708). States having similar enactments have construed it to prevent the fixing of wages for adult women (Topeka Laundry Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations, 119 Kan. 12; Stevenson v. St. Clair, 161 Minn. 444; see Folding Furniture Works v. Industrial Commission, 300 Fed. 991; People v. Successors of Laurnaga & Co., 32 P. R. 766).

ADKINS RULING DECLARED SOUND

The New York court's decision conforms to ours in the Adkins case, and the later rulings that we have made on the authority of that case. That decision was deliberately made upon careful consideration of the oral arguments and briefs of the respective parties and also of briefs submitted on behalf of States and others as amici curiae. In the Arizona case the Attorney General sought to distinguish the District of Columbia Act from the legislation then before us and insisted that the latter was a valid exertion of the police power of the State.

Counsel for the California commission submitted a brief amicus curiae in which he elaborately argued that our decision in the Adkins case was erroneous and ought to be overruled. In the Arkansas case the State officers, appellants there, by painstaking and thorough brief presented arguments in favor of the same contention.

But this court, after thoughful attention to all that was suggested against that decision, adhered to it as sound. And in each case, being clearly of the opinion that no discussion was required to show that, having regard to the principles applied in the Adkins case, the State legislation fixing wages for women was repugnant to the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment, we so held, and upon the authority of that case affirmed per curiam the decree enjoining its enforcement. It is equally plain that the judgment in the case now before us must also be affirmed.

BRIEFS IN CASE LISTED

(1) Briefs amici curiae in support of the application were filed by the city of New York and the State of Illinois. Briefs on the merits supporting the New York act were filed by the State of Ohio and by the States of Conecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Rhode Island. Briefs for affirmance were filed by the New York State Hotel Association, National Woman's Party, National Association of Women Lawyers, et al.

(2) Omitting the words in brackets, the following is the factual background in the first section of the act before us. Adding the words in brackets and omitting those in italics, there is indicated the background in the bill that was not approved.

"The employment of [men and] women and minors in trade and industry in the State of New York at wages unreasonably low and not fairly commensurate with the value of the services rendered is a matter of grave and vital public concern. Many [men and] women and minors employed for gain in the State of New York are not as a class upon a level of equality in bargaining with their employers in regard to minimum fair-wage standards, and 'freedom of contract' as applied to their relations with their employers is illusory.

"Since a very large percentage of such workers are obliged from their week-to-week wages to support themselves and others who are dependent upon them in whole or in part they are, by reason of their necessitous circumstances, forced to accept whatever wages are offered them.

WAGES FIXED BY CHANCE

"Judged by any reasonable standard, wages are in many cases fixed by chance and caprice and the wages accepted are often found to bear no relation to the service rendered. Women and minors employed for gain are peculiarly subject to the overreaching of inefficient, harsh, or ignorant employers and under unregulated competition where no adequate machinery exists for the effective regulation and maintenance of minimum fair-wage standards, [and] the standards such as exist to be set by the least conscionable employers.

"In the absence of any effective minimum fair-wage rates for women and minors, the constant lowering of wages by unscrupulous employers constitutes a serious form of unfair competition against other employers, reduces the purchasing power of the workers [a large proportion of the population of the State], and threatens the stability of industry. The evils of oppressive, unreasonable, and unfair wages as they affect women and minors employed in the State of New York are such as to render imperative the exercise of the police power of the State for the protection of industry and of the [men and] women and minors employed therein and of the public interest of the community at large in their health and well-being and in the prevention of the deterioration of the race. In the considered judgment of the legislature this article is constitutional."

ARIZONA ACT IS QUOTED

(3) Mr. Justice Brandeis took no part in the consideration of the Adkins case. He noted dissent without more in the Arizona case and Arkansas case.

(4) The Arizona act declared: "No person * * * shall employ any female in any store, office, shop, restaurant, dining room, hotel, rooming house, laundry, or manufacturing establishment at a weekly wage of less than $16 per week; a lesser amount being hereby declared inadequate to supply the necessary cost of living to any such female, to maintain her health, and to provide her with the common necessities of life" (Laws of Arizona, 1923, c. 3, sec. 1).

The Arkansas act declared: "It shall be unlawful for any employer * * * to pay any female worker in any establishment or occupation less than the wage specified in this section, to wit, except as hereinafter provided: 'All female workers who have had 6 months' practicable experience in any line of industry or labor shall be paid not less than $1.25 per day. The minimum wage for inexperienced female workers who have not had 6 months' experience in any line of industry or labor shall be paid not less than $1 per day'" (sec. 7108, Crawford & Moses Digest).

MINORITY OPINION OF JUSTICE STONE IN NEW YORK MINIMUM WAGE CASE

Mr. Justice Stone:

While I agree with all that the Chief Justice has said, I would not make the differences between the present statute and that involved in the Adkins case the sole basis of decision. I attach little importance to the fact that the earlier statute was aimed only at a starvation wage and that the present one does not prohibit such a wage unless it is also less than the reasonable value of the service. Since neither statute compels employment at any wage, I do not assume that employers in one case, more than in the other, would pay the minimum wage if the service were worth less.

The vague and general pronouncement of the fourteenth amendment against deprivation of liberty without due process of law is a limitation of legislative power, not a formula for its exercise. It does not purport to say in what particular manner that power shall be exerted. It makes no fine-spun distinctions between methods which the legislature may and may not choose to solve a pressing problem of government.

It is plain, too, that unless the language of the amendment and the decisions of this court are to be ignored, the liberty which the amendment protects is not freedom from restraint of all law or of any law which reasonable men may think an appropriate means for dealing with any of those matters of public concern with which it is the business of government to deal.

There is grim irony in speaking of the freedom of contract of those who, because of their economic necessities, give their service for less than is needful to keep body and soul together. But if this is freedom of contract, no one has ever denied that it is freedom which may be restrained, notwithstanding the fourteenth amendment, by a statute passed in the public interest.

PUBLIC PURPOSE ACTS SUSTAINED

In many cases this court has sustained the power of legislatures to prohibit or restrict the terms of a contract, including the price term, in order to accomplish what the legislative body may reasonably consider a public purpose. They include cases which neither have been overruled nor discredited in which the sole basis of regulation was the fact that circumstances, beyond the control of the parties, had so seriously curtailed the regulative power of competition as to place buyers or sellers at a disadvantage in the bargaining struggle, such that a legislature might reasonably have contemplated serious consequences to the community as a whole and have sought to avoid them by regulations of the terms of the contract. (Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113; Brass v. Stoeser, 153 U. S. 391; German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S. 389, 409; Terminal Taxicab Co. v. District of Columbia, 241 U. S. 252; Block v Hirsch, 256 U. S. 135; Marcus Brown Co. v. Feldman, 256 U. S. 170; Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel, 258 U. S. 242; Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502; see also Frisbie v. United States, 157 U. S. 160; Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13; McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 539; Mutual Loan Co. v. Martell, 222 U. S. 225.)

No one doubts that the presence in the community of a large number of those compelled by economic necessity to accept a wage less than is needful for subsistence is a matter of grave public concern, the more so when, as has been demonstrated here, it tends to produce ill health, immorality, and deterioration of the race.

NOT AN UNREASONABLE REMEDY

The fact that at one time or another Congress and the legislatures of 17 States, and the legislative bodies of 21 foreign countries, including Great Britain and its 4 Commonwealths, have found wage regulation is an appropriate corrective for serious social and economic maladjustments growing out of inequality in bargaining power, precludes, for me, any assumption that it is a remedy beyond the bounds of reason.

It is difficult to imagine any grounds, other than our own personal economic predilections, for saying that the contract of employment is any the less an appropriate subject of legislation than are scores of others, in dealing with which this Court has held that legislatures may curtail individual freedom in the public interest.

If it is a subject upon which there is power to legislate at all, the fourteenth amendment makes no distinction between the methods by which legislatures may deal with it any more than it proscribes the regulation of one term of a bargain more than another if it is properly the subject of regulation. No one has yet attempted to say upon what basis of history, principles of government, law or logic, it is within due process to regulate the hours and conditions of labor of women, see Muller v. Oregon (208 U. S. 412); Riley v. Massachusetts (232 U. S. 671, 679); Hawley v. Walker (232 U. S. 718); Miller v. Wilson (236 U. S. 373); Bosley v. McLaughlin (236 U. S. 385); and of men, Bunting v. Oregon (243 U. S. 426), and the time and manner of payment of the wage, McLean v. Arkansas, supra; Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, supra; Patterson v. Bark Eudora (190 U. S. 169); Compare New York Central Railroad Co. v. White (243 U. S. 188); Arizona Employers Liability cases (250 U. S. 400), but that regulation of the amount of the wage passes beyond the constitutional limitation; or to say upon what theory the amount of a wage is any the less the subject of regulation in the public interest than that of insurance premiums, German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Kansas, supra, or of the commissions of insurance brokers, O'Gorman & Young, Inc., v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co. (282 U. S. 251), or of the charges of grain elevators, Munn v. Illinois, supra; Brass v. Stoeser, supra, or of the price which the farmer receives for his milk, or which the wage earner pays for it, Nebbia v. New York, supra.

OTHER DECISIONS CITED

These considerations were developed at length in Tyson v. Banton (273 U. S. 418, 447, et seq.) and in Ribnik v. McBride (277 U. S. 350, 359, et seq.), and need not be further elaborated now. It is true that the Court rejected them there; but it later accepted and applied them as the basis of decision in O'Gorman & Young, Inc., v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., supra; Nebbia v. New York, supra; Hegeman Firms Corporation v. Baldwin (293 U. S. 163); Bordens Farm Products Co. v. Ten Eyck (no. 597), decided February 10, 1936. Both precedent, and, what is more important, reason requires their acceptance now. See Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co. (285 U. S. 393, 405). In upholding State minimum price regulation in the milk industry, in Nebbia v. New York, supra, the Court declared, page 537:

"So far as the requirement of due process is concerned, and in the absence of other constitutional restriction, a State is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it. If the laws passed are seen to have a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose, and are neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied, and judicial determination to that effect renders a court functus officio."

SHOULD CONTROL PRESENT CASE

That declaration and decision should control the present case. They are irreconcilable with the decision and most that was said in the Adkins case. They have left the court free of its restriction as a precedent, and free to declare that the choice of the particular form of regulation by which grave economic maladjustments are to be remedied is for legislatures and not for the courts.

In the years which have intervened since the Adkins case we have had opportunity to learn that a wage is not always the resultant of free bargaining between employers and employees; that it may be one forced upon employees by their economic necessities and upon employers by the most ruthless of their competitors. We have had opportunity to perceive more clearly that a wage insufficient to support the worker does not visit its consequences upon him alone; that it may affect profoundly the entire economic structure of society and, in any case, that it casts on every taxpayer, and on government itself, the burden of solving the problems of poverty, subsistence, health, and morals of large numbers in the community.

Because of their nature and extent these are public problems. A generation ago they were for the individual to solve; today they are the burden of the Nation. I can perceive no more objection, on constitutional grounds, to their solution by requiring an industry to bear the subsistence cost of the labor which it employs than to the imposition upon it of the cost of its industrial accidents. (See New York Central Railroad Co. v. White, supra; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 119.)

WOULD LEAVE LEGISLATURE FREE

It is not for the courts to resolve doubts whether the remedy by wage regulation is as efficacious as many believe, or is better than some other, or is better even than the blind operation of uncontrolled economic forces. The legislature must be free to choose unless government is to be rendered impotent. The fourteenth amendment has no more embedded in the Constitution our preference for some particular set of economic beliefs than it has adopted, in the name of liberty, the system of theology which we may happen to approve.

I know of no rule or practice by which the arguments advanced in support of an application for certiorari restrict our choice between conflicting precedents in deciding a question of constitutional law which the petition, if granted, requires us to answer. Here the question which the petition specifically presents is whether the New York statute contravenes the fourteenth amendment. In addition, the petition assigns as a reason for granting it that "the construction and application of the Constitution of the United States and a prior decision" of this Court "are necessarily involved", and, again, that "the circumstances prevailing under which the New York law was enacted call for a reconsideration of the Adkins case in the light of the New York act and conditions aimed to be remedied thereby."

Unless we are now to construe and apply the fourteenth amendment without regard to our decisions since the Adkins case, we could not rightly avoid its reconsideration even if it were not asked. We should follow our decision in the Nebbia case and leave the selection and the method of the solution of the problems to which the statute is addressed where it seems to me the Constitution has left them—to the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Cardozo join in this opinion.

TEXT OF CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES' DISSENTING OPINION ON MINIMUM WAGE LAW

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion in this case. In view of the difference between the statutes involved, I cannot agree that the case should be regarded as controlled by Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U. S. 525). And I can find nothing in the Federal Constitution which denies to the State the power to protect women from being exploited by overreaching employers through the refusal of a fair wage as defined in the New York statute and ascertained in a reasonable manner by competent authority.

First. Relator in his petition for habeas corpus raises no question as to the fairness of the minimum wage he was required to pay. He does not challenge the regularity of the proceedings by which the amount of that wage was determined. We must assume that none of the safeguards of the statute was ignored and that its provisions for careful and deliberate procedure were followed in all respects.

It is important at the outset to note the requirements of that procedure, as they at once dispose of any question of arbitrary procedural action.

OBJECTIVES OF STATUTE

The statute states its objectives. It defines an "oppressive and unreasonable wage" as one which "is both less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered and less than sufficient to meet the minimum cost of living necessary for health."

It defines a "fair wage" as one "fairly and reasonably commensurate with the value of the service or class of service rendered." It relates to an industry, trade, or business other than domestic service or labor on a farm.

The industrial commissioner is authorized to investigate and ascertain the wages of women and minors. If he is of the opinion that any substantial number of women or minors are receiving "oppressive and unreasonable" wages, he must appoint a wage board to make report. That board is to be composed of not more than three representatives of employers, and equal number of representatives of employees, and not more than three disinterested persons representing the public.

The wage board is fully equipped with authority to conduct a comprehensive investigation. It may differentiate and classify employments in any occupation according to the nature of the service rendered. It may recommend minimum fair wage rates varying with localities. It may recommend a suitable scale of rates for learners and apprentices which may be less than those recommended for experienced women or minor workers.

REHEARING PROVIDED FOR

The wage board may take into account all relevant circumstances affecting the value of the service or class of service. It may be guided by such considerations as would guide a court in a suit for the reasonable value of services rendered. It may consider the wages paid in the State for work of like or comparable character by employers who voluntarily maintain minimum fair wage standards.

The commissioner may approve or disapprove the report of the wage board. If the commissioner disapproves, he may resubmit the matter to the same or a new board. In case the report is approved, the commissioner is to make a "directory order" which defines minimum "fair wage rates" and is to include appropriate administrative regulations.

The latter may embrace regulations governing learners, apprentices, piece rates or their relation to time rates, overtime or part-time rates, bonuses or special pay for special or extra work, deductions for board, lodging, and other items or services supplied by the employer, and other special conditions.

Special licenses authorizing employment at lower rate may be issued to a woman or minor whose earning capacity is impaired by age or physical or mental deficiency or injury.

PROCEDURE IS REVIEWED

If the commission has reason to believe that an employer is not observing the provisions of the "directory order", he may, upon notice, summon the employer to show cause why his name should not be published as having failed to comply with the order. And, after hearing and in case of a finding of nonobservance, the commissioner may cause the name of the employer to be published.

After a "directory minimum fair wage order" has been in effect for 9 months, if it appears that there has been persistent nonobservance, notice may be given of the intention to make the order mandatory and of a public hearing at which all persons in favor of or opposed to such a mandatory order may be heard. And it is after such hearing that the commissioner may make the previous directory order, or any part of it, mandatory and publish it accordingly.

It is disobedience to such a mandatory order which is punished by fine or by imprisonment. It is the violation of such an order, made after the inquiries, report, the tentative order, and the hearings which the statute enjoins, that is the basis of the prosecution in the case at bar.

CONSTRUCTION NOT BINDING

Second: In reaching its conclusion the State court construed the opinion in the Adkins case and deemed that ruling applicable here. That, however, is a construction of the decision of this court. That construction is not binding upon us.

When the opinion of the State court is examined in order to ascertain what construction was placed upon the statute, we find little more than a recital of its provisions. The State court says:

"The New York act, as above stated, prohibits an oppressive and unreasonable wage, which means both less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered and less than sufficient to meet the minimum cost of living necessary for health."

This is a repetition of the words of the statute in subdivision 7 of section 551 defining an "oppressive and unreasonable wage." The court adds: "The act of Congress (in the Adkins case) had one standard, the living wage; this State act has added another reasonable value. The minimum wage must include both.

"What was vague before has not been made any clearer. One of the elements, therefore, in fixing the fair wage is the very matter which was the basis of the congressional act."

ASSUMES STANDARD IS SET

But the court expressly recognizes that a wage is not denounced by the New York act as "oppressive and unreasonable" unless it is less than the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered. The statute also provides in explicit terms that the "fair wage" which is to be prescribed is one that is "fairly and reasonably commensurate with the value of the service or class of service rendered."

I find nothing in the opinion of the State court which can be taken to mean that this definite provision of the statute is not obligatory upon the authorities fixing a fair wage. Certainly, the court has not said so, and I think that we must assume that the standard thus described is set up by the New York act.

And there is no suggestion that the "fair wage", as prescribed in the instant case, was not commensurate with the reasonable value of the service rendered by the employees.

When the opinion of the State court goes beyond the statement of the provisions of the act, and says that the setting up of such a standard does not create a material distinction when compared with the act of Congress in the Adkins case, the State court is not construing the State statute. It is passing upon the effect of the difference between the two acts from the standpoint of the Federal Constitution. It is putting aside an admitted difference as not controlling. It is holding, as the State court says, that "forcing the payment of wages at a reasonable value does not make inapplicable the principle and ruling of the Adkins case."

That, it seems to me, is clearly a Federal and not a State question, and I pass to its consideration.

LIKE CASE NOT HEARD BEFORE

Third. The constitutional validity of a minimum-wage statute like the New York act has not heretofore been passed upon by this court. As I have said, the required correspondence of the prescribed "fair wage" to the reasonable value of the service which the employee persons stands out as an essential feature of the statutory plan.

The statute for the District of Columbia, which was before us in the Adkins case, did not have that feature. That statute provided for a minimum wage adequate "to supply the necessary cost of living to women workers" and "to maintain them in health and to protect their morals" (40 Stat. 963).

The standard thus set up did not take account of the reasonable value of the service rendered. As this court said, it compelled the employer "to pay at least the sum fixed in any event, because the employee needs it but requires no service of equivalent value from the employee."

In the cases of Murphy v. Sardell (260 P. S. 530) and Donham v. West-Nelson Co. (273 U. S. 657), the statutes of Arizona and Arkansas, respectively, were of a similar character, and both these cases were decided upon the authority of the Adkins case.

LAW CORRECTED OLD ERRORS

New York and other States have been careful to adopt a different and improved standard, in order to meet the objection aimed at the earlier statutes, by requiring a fair equivalence of wage and service.

That the difference is a material one, I think is shown by the opinion in the Adkins case. That opinion contained a broad discussion of State power, but it singled out as an adequate ground for the finding of invalidity that the statute gave no regard to the situation of the employer and to the reasonable value of the service for which the wage was paid. Upon this point the court said (261 U. S. pp. 558, 559):

"The feature of this statute which, perhaps more than any other, puts upon it the stamp of invalidity is that it exacts from the employer an arbitrary payment of a purpose and upon a basis having no casual connection with his business or the contract or the work the employee engages to do.

"The declared basis, as already pointed out, is not the value of the service rendered, but the extraneous circumstances that the employee needs to get a prescribed sum of money to insure here subsistence, health, and morals.

EFFECTS OF UNIONS CITED

"The ethical right of every worker, man or woman, to a living wage may be conceded. One of the declared and important purposes of trade organizations is to secure it. And with that principle and with every legitimate effort to realize it in fact, no one can quarrel; but the fallacy of the proposed method of attaining it is that it assumes that every employer is bound at all events to furnish it.

"The moral requirement implicit in every contract of employment, viz, that the amount to be paid and the service to be rendered shall bear to each other some relation of just equivalence, is completely ignored.

"A statute requiring an employer to pay in money to pay at prescribed and regular intervals, to pay the value of the services rendered, even to pay with fair relation to the extent of the benefit obtained from the service, would be understandable. But a statute which prescribes payments without regard to any of these things and solely with relation to circumstances apart from the contract of employment, the business affected by it, and the work done under it is so clearly the product of a naked, arbitrary exercise of power that it cannot be allowed to stand under the Constitution of the United States."

CASE HAS NEW ASPECT

As the New York act is free of the feature so strongly denounced, the question comes before us in a new aspect. The Court was closely divided in the Adkins case, and that decision followed an equal division of the Court, after reargument, in Stettler v. O'Hara (243 U. S. 629), with respect to the validity of the minimum-wage law of Oregon.

Such divisions are at times unavoidable, but they point to the desirability of fresh consideration when there are material differences in the cases presented. The fact that in the Adkins case there were dissenting opinions maintaining the validity of the Federal statute, despite the nature of the standard it set up, brings out in stronger relief the ground which was taken most emphatically by the majority in that case, and that there would have been a majority for the decision in the absence of that ground must be a matter of conjecture. With that ground absent, the Adkins case ceases to be a precise authority.

We have here a question of constitutional law of grave importance, applying to the statutes of several States, in a matter of profound public interest. I think that we should deal with that question upon its merits, without feeling that we are bound by a decision which on its facts is not strictly in point.

JUDGE LEHMAN QUOTED

Fourth. The validity of the New York act must be considered in the light of the conditions to which the exercise of the protective power of the State was addressed.

The statute itself recites these conditions, and the State has submitted a voluminous factual brief for the purpose of showing from various official statistics that these recitals have abundant support.

Judge Lehman, in his dissenting opinion in the court of appeals, states that the relator "does not challenge these findings of fact by the legislature, nor does he challenge the statements in the 'factual brief' submitted by the respondent to sustain and amplify these findings."

The majority opinion in the court of appeals have nothing to the contrary. Nor is the statement of the conditions which influenced the legislative action challenged, or challengable, upon the record here (Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 78–80; Radice v. New York, 264 U. S. 292, 294; Clarke v. DeKebach, 274 U. S. 392, 397; O'Gorman & Young v. Hartford Insurance Co., 282 U. S. 251, 258; Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502, 530; Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194, 209).

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT "ILLUSORY"

The legislature finds that the employment of women and minors in trade and industry in the State of New York at wages unreasonably low and not fairly commensurate with the value of the services rendered is a matter of vital public concern; that many women and minors are not as a class upon a level of equality in bargaining with their employers in regard to minimum fair wage standards, and that "freedom of contract" as applied to their relations with employers is illusory; that, by reason of the necessity of seeking support for themselves and their dependents, they are forced to accept whatever wages are offered, and that judged by any reasonable standard, wages in many instances are fixed by chance and caprice and the wages accepted are often found to bear no relation to the fair value of the service.

The legislature further states that women and minors are peculiarly subject "to the overreaching of inefficient, harsh, or ignorant employers" and that in the absence of effective minimum fair wage rates, the constant lowering of wages by unscrupulous employers constitutes a serious form of unfair competition against other employers, reduces the purchasing power of the workers, and threatens the stability of industry.

PAY VARIATIONS FOUND

The legislature deemed it essential to seek the correction of these evils by the exercise of the police power "for the protection of industry and of the women and minors employed therein and of the interest of the community at large in their health and well-being and in the prevention of the deterioration of the race" (sec. 550).

In the factual brief, statistics are presented showing the increasing number of wage-earning women, and that women are in industry and in other fields of employment because they must support themselves and their dependents. Data are submitted from reports of the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, showing such discrepancies and variations in wages paid for identical work as to indicate that no relationship exists between the value of the services rendered and the wages paid.

It also appears that working women are largely unorganized and that their bargaining power is relatively weak.

The seriousness of the social problem is presented. Inquiries by the New York State Department of Labor in cooperation with the emergency relief bureau of New York City, disclosed the large number of women employed in industry whose wages were insufficient for the support of themselves and those dependent upon them. For that reason they had been accepted for relief and their wages were being supplemented by payments from the emergency relief bureau.

Thus the failure of overreaching employers to pay to women the wages commensurate with the value of services rendered has imposed a direct and heavy burden upon the taxpayers. The weight of this burden and the necessity for taking reasonable measures to reduce it, in the light of the enormous annual budgetary appropriation for the Department of Public Welfare of New York City, is strikingly exhibited in the brief filed by the corporation counsel of the city as an amicus curiae.

MUST NOT DISREGARD FACTS

We are not at liberty to disregard these facts. We must assume that they exist and examine respondent's argument from that standpoint. That argument is addressed to the fundamental postulate of liberty of contract. I think that the argument fails to take account of established principles and ignores the historic relation of the State to the protection of women.

Fifth. We have had frequent occasion to consider the limitations of liberty of contract. While it is highly important to preserve that liberty from arbitrary and capricious interference, it is also necessary to prevent its abuse, as otherwise it could be used to override all public interests, and thus in the end destroy the very freedom of opportunity which it is designed to safeguard.

We have repeatedly said that liberty of contract is a qualified and not an absolute right. "There is no absolute freedom to do as one wills or to contract as one chooses. Liberty implies that absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community" (Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 567).

LISTS RESTRAINTS SUSTAINED

The numerous restraints that have been sustained have often been recited (Ill., p. 568; Nebbia v. New York, supra, pp. 526–528). Thus we have upheld the limitation of hours of employment in mines and smelters (Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366); the requiring of redemption in cash of store orders or other evidences of indebtedness issued in payment of wages (Knoxvill Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13); the prohibition of contracts for options to sell or buy grain or other commodities at a future time (Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425); the forbidding of advance payments to seamen (Patterson v. Bark Eudora, 190 U. S. 169); the prohibition of contracts to pay miners employed at quantity rates upon the basis of screened coal instead of the weight of loaves of bread (Schmidinger v. Chicago, 226 U. S. 578; Peterson Baking Co. v. Bryan, 290 U. S. 579); the regulation of insurance rates (German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Lewis, 233 U. S. 389; O'Gorman & Young v. Hartford Insurance Co., supra); the regulation of the size and character of packages in which goods are sold (Armour & Co. v. North Dakota, 240 U. S. 510); the limitation of hours of employment in manufacturing establishments with a specified allowance of overtime payment (Bunting v. Oregon, 243 U. S. 426); the regular sales of stocks and bonds to prevent fraud (Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539); the regulation of the price of milk (Nebbia v. New York, supra).

UPHOLDS PROTECTION OF WOMEN

The test of validity is not artificial. It is whether the limitation upon the freedom of contract is arbitrary and capricious or one reasonably required in order appropriately to serve the public interest in the light of the particular conditions to which the power is addressed.

When there are conditions which specially touch the health and well-being of women, the State may exert its power in a reasonable manner for their protection, whether or not a similar regulation is, or could be, applied to men.

The distinctive nature and function of women, their particular relation to the social welfare, has put them in a separate class. This separation and corresponding distinctions in legislation is one of the outstanding traditions of legal history.

The fourteenth amendment found the States with that protective power and did not take it away or remove the reasons for its exercise. Changes have been effected with the domain of State policy and upon an appraisal of State interests. We have not yet arrived at a time when we are at liberty to override the judgment of the State and decide that women are not the special subject of exploitation because they are women and as such are not in a relatively defenseless position.

FICTITIOUS EQUALITY DENIED

More than 40 years after the adoption of the fourteenth amendment we said that it did not interfere with State power by creating "a fictitious equality" (Quong Wing v. Kirkendall, 223 U. S. 59, 63). We called attention to the ample precedents in regulatory provisions for a classification on the basis of sex. We said:

"It has been recognized with regard to hours of work. It is recognized in the respective rights of husband and wife in land during life, in the inheritance after the death of the spouse. Often it is expressed in the time fixed for the coming of age. The particular points at which that difference shall be emphasized by legislation are largely in the power of the State."

1D. Not long before the decision in the Quong Wing case the question had received elaborate consideration (Muller v. Oregon, 208 U. S. 412), where the regulation of the working hours of women was sustained. We thought that the disadvantage at which woman was placed in the struggle for subsistence was obvious, and we emphasized the point that she "becomes an object of public interest and care in order to preserve the strength and vigor of the race."

WOMEN IN CLASS ALONE

We added that "though limitations upon personal and contractual rights may be removed by legislation", woman will still be in a situation "where some legislation to protect her seems necessary to secure a real equality or right."

She therefore still may be "properly placed in a class by herself, and legislation designed for her may be sustained, even when like legislation is not necessary for men and could not be sustained" (Muller v. Oregon, supra, pp. 421, 422).

This ruling has been followed in Riley v. Massachusetts (232 U. S. 671); Miller v. Wilson (236 U. S. 373); and Bosley v. McLaughlin (236 U. S. 385), with respect to hours of work, and in Radice v. New York, supra, in relation to night work.

If liberty of contract were viewed from the standpoint of absolute right, there would be as much to be said against a regulation of the hours of labor of women as against the fixing of a minimum wage. Restriction upon hours is a restriction upon the making of contracts and upon earning power. But the right being a qualified one, we must apply in each case the test of reasonableness in the circumstances disclosed.

WOULD UPHOLD ACT

Here the special conditions calling for the protection of women, and for the protection of society itself, are abundantly shown. The legislation is not less in the interest of the community as a whole than in the interest of the women employees who are paid less than the value of their services. That lack must be made good out of the public purse.

Granted that the burden of the support of women who do not receive a living wage cannot be transferred to employers who pay the equivalent of the service they obtain, there is no reason why the burden caused by the failure to pay that equivalent should not be placed upon those who create it.

The fact that the State cannot secure the benefit to society of a living wage for women employees by any enactment which bears unreasonably upon employers does not preclude the State from fixing its objective by means entirely fair both to employers and the women employed.

In the statute before us no unreasonableness appears. The end is legitimate and the means appropriate. I think that the act should be upheld.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Brandeis, Mr. Justice Stone, and Mr. Justice Cardozo join in this opinion.

[From the New York Times of June 2, 1936]

THE MINIMUM WAGE CASE

The 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court declaring the New York minimum wage law for women and children unconstitutional is unfortunate in more than one respect. It was reached by a majority of only one, as was the 4-to-3 decision of the New York Court of Appeals against the act. That decision in turn was based on a 5-to-3 decision of the Supreme Court 13 years ago holding a District of Columbia minimum wage law unconstitutional. In each case the minimum wage law missed validation by the closest possible margin.

The New York minimum wage law was carefully drawn and admirably administered. Unlike the N. R. A., it was not rushed through hastily and put into effect emotionally, to the accompaniment of parades and noisy "crack-down" threats. The minimum wages in the laundry and in the hotel industries were not adopted until after a board had carefully investigated the relevant facts. The minimum wages in the laundry industry, for example, were desired by the employers themselves, in order to put a competitive "bottom" to wage competition. Under the law, the wages paid to more than 22,000 women and minor employees in the laundry industry in New York State were raised from an average of $10.41 a week to $13.42.

In the case decided by the Supreme Court in 1923, Justice Sutherland, in writing the majority decision, remarked:

"The feature of this statute which perhaps more than any other puts upon it the stamp of invalidity is that it exacts from the employer an arbitrary payment for a purpose and upon a basis having no causal connection with his business or the contract or the work the employee engages to do. * * * A statute requiring an employer to pay * * * the value of the services rendered * * * would be understandable."

The New York State minimum wage law was drawn with this criticism in mind. It declared "a fair wage" to be a wage "fairly and reasonably commensurate with the value of the service or class of service rendered", and directed the industrial commissioner and the wage board, in fixing minimum wages for women in a given industry, to "take into account all relevant circumstances affecting the value of the service or class of service rendered."

The majority decision now holds the New York State minimum wage unconstitutional on the ground that it violates the "due process" clause of the Constitution in that it deprives persons of the right to make contracts. Justice Butler, speaking for the majority, contends that "in making contracts of employment, generally speaking, the parties have equal right to obtain from each other the best terms they can by private bargaining." To this Chief Justice Hughes, in his dissenting opinion, replies that while it is important to protect liberty of contract, "it is also necessary to prevent its abuse. * * * The test of validity is not artificial. It is whether the limitation upon the freedom of contract is arbitrary and capricious or one reasonably required in order appropriately to serve the public interest." The Chief Justice holds the New York law to be reasonable. Justice Stone adds that a wage is "not always the resultant of free bargaining between employers and employees"; that "it may be one forced upon employees by their economic necessities and upon employers by the most ruthless of their competitors."

The majority decision will leave the States at sea regarding how they are to deal with the exploitation of women in industry.

[From the Washington Post of June 2, 1936]

AN UNFORTUNATE DECISION

The implications of the Supreme Court opinion invalidating New York's minimum-wage law for women are far reaching indeed. Two weeks ago the Court decided, in its opinion on the Guffey Coal Act, that Congress has no authority to regulate wages in "purely local" undertakings. Now, by invoking the "due process of law" clause in the fourteenth amendment, it has denied to the States even the right to prescribe minimum wages for women and children.

In the first place, the decision is weakened by the vigorous dissent of Chief Justice Hughes along with Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo. Justice Stone virtually accuses the majority of injecting its own "personal economic predilections" into its opinion on a legal question. And the basis on which the decision was rendered seems to give substance to his complaint.

That phrase in the Constitution on which the opinion of the majority is based reads as follows: "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The majority held that the right of employees to bargain with their employer is part of the liberty so guaranteed. "Legislative abridgement of that freedom," the opinion held, "can only be justified by the existence of exceptional circumstances." But to arrive at this opinion the Court was forced to read a very broad interpretion into the meaning of four words—"due process of law."

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that the Court has gone out of its way to restrict legislative powers of the State. As Justice Stone points out, a contract of employment seems to be no "less an appropriate subject of legislation than are scores of others, in dealing with which this Court has held that legislatures may curtail individual freedom in the public interest." For the Court to reject this reasoning by a bare majority of one vote, and to draw new restrictions upon the States from the uncertain meaning of the "due-process" clause, seems very questionable.

Aside from its probable effect upon legislation to control minimum wages for women and minors within the States, the most important result of the decision will probably be the reaction against the Court itself. In a great majority of the opinions by which the Court has annulled New Deal statutes its action has been based upon positive and clear-cut logic deeply imbedded in the Constitution. But in this case, as well as in the decision which knocked out the Municipal Bankruptcy Act, the majority seems to have taken its stand on much more precarious ground.

The powers of the States are not specifically limited as are those of the Federal Government. Since four of the Justices could "find nothing in the Federal Constitution which denies to the State the power to protect women from being exploited by overreaching employers through the refusal of a fair wage", it does seem strange for the majority to wrench such a meaning from a vague phrase.

Such an attitude will give unfortunate encouragement to those critics of the Court who are seeking to curb its powers.

[From the Washington Daily News of June 2, 1936]

AND NOW WHAT?

The public's power to deal with economic and social problems is now impaled upon two horns of a legalistic dilemma. Or, as the saying goes, "it's damned if you do and damned if you don't."

Last week that power could not be exercised by the Federal Government because that would interfere with States' rights.

This week the power cannot be exercised by State government because it runs afoul of another kind of constitutional barrier.

The first case was the Guffey coal decision. The second, the New York minimum-wage law.

Since both Federal and State Governments are thus made impotent by judicial decree, more sharply than ever rises the question: Now what?

We are living in an increasingly complex civilization. These problems arise, such as saving a sick and far-flung industry and preventing the exploitation of labor and the evils of cutthroat competition through wage slashing. They aren't just academic problems. They are so serious and so real that the whole future of an intricate industrial system is at stake. But government, the only force through which a people can deal, finds itself paralyzed.

Striking comment on the situation comes from the four dissenting justices. Said Mr. Justice Stone, speaking for himself and Justices Cardozo and Brandeis:

"There is grim irony in speaking of the freedom of contract if those who, because of their economic necessity, give their services for less than is needful to keep body and soul together. But if this is freedom of contract, no one has ever denied that it is freedom which may be restrained, notwithstanding the fourteenth amendment, by a statute passed in the public interest. * * *

"It is difficult to imagine any grounds other than our own personal economic predilections for saying that the contract of employment is any less than an appropriate subject of legislation than are scores of others in dealing with which this Court has held the legislatures may curtail individual freedom in the public interest. * * *

"It is not for the courts to resolve doubts whether the remedy by wage regulation is as efficacious as many believe or is better than some other, or is better than the blind operation of uncontrolled economic forces. The legislature must be free to choose unless the Government is to be rendered impotent."

Said Chief Justice Hughes: "I can find nothing in the Federal Constitution which denies the State the power to protect women from being exploited by overreaching employers through the refusal of a fair wage as defined in the New York statute and ascertained in a reasonable manner by competent authority."

But, after all, that was comment only from the minority, and in terms of effect the minority doesn't count. So we have the impasse—a situation made worse than that described last Thursday night by Senator BORAH when he said that the American people would not long tolerate an empire for the purposes of exploitation and a government of 48 States for purposes of regulation. The minimum-wage decision takes the teeth even from the States.

It is pertinent, we believe, to ask the majority, as they leave for their recess, to give some little thought, from the perspective that vacation provides, to the question of where do we go from here.

ADDRESS BY CHAIRMAN FARLEY AT MASSACHUSETTS STATE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at the preprimary convention of the Massachusetts Democratic State committee, at Springfield Auditorium on the 4th instant.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a business community, so I purpose making a strictly business talk to this gathering.

The particular business of your convention tomorrow, as I see it, is to take such steps as may insure that the business of the country shall continue to improve; that there shall be no interruption to the processes of recovery which have brought us so far in the direction of prosperity.

The great majority of the American people desire and have determined that there shall be no such interruption but that full business recovery and general prosperity shall be completely achieved.

President Roosevelt will be reelected by a majority so impressive that nobody in this country can have any doubt as to the faith of our people in the sincerity and ability of the Democratic administration to direct our affairs, so that the old Democratic ideal of the greatest good for the greatest number shall be realized.

Our critics doubtless will say that this is politics and not economics. Well, politics and commercial success at this stage of the national progress are inseparable. It was politics to accomplish the retirement of an administration that had lamentably failed and bring about the election in 1932 of Franklin D. Roosevelt with a mandate to correct the abuses that had brought us to the verge of ruin and to bring us back to a condition where it was possible for manufacturers and merchants to prosper and the rest of us could be reasonably sure of at least an opportunity to make a decent living.

So here we are 4 years later and things are immeasurably better than they were. They are not perfect by any means, but industrial and commercial enterprises, great and small, are making money, and the total of popular well-doing is constantly improving. I will say that the elements that are fighting the administration have not helped in bringing about this state of affairs. We would be much farther on our way if it had not been for the incessant clamor of our political foes, who have fought every step of our progress. Their constant effort is to replace the impulse of faith and hope, engendered by the revival of business activity, with the philosophy of fear.

That is what has delayed complete recovery. That is what has delayed the reinvestment of profits, and that is why there are so many still unemployed even in the face of rising markets, increased incomes, resumption of dividends, and almost universal reports of satisfactory trade balance sheets.

No statistician has yet been able to calculate how many enterprises that would have added to the total of employment have been headed off by the constant declaration of those who know better that the country was going to the dogs and could only be saved by the repudiation of the Roosevelt administration.

Fortunately, the mass of our people have been guided by their common sense, by the obvious logic of the circumstance that an agency that had proved so effective in encouraging and helping business must be an asset and not a liability, a source of promise and not a threat of disaster.

Some of our critics are the heads of corporations that are now able to make their ledger entries in black that had been red ever since the stock market crash of nearly 7 years ago. You might ask what they are complaining about? Trimmed down to simple words, it is that, having been placed again on their financial feet, they are now seeking a return to the old processes that made millionaires of them and bankrupts of the rest of us.

Incidentally, that is politics, also. I leave it to you to decide which is the better politics—that which seeks to continue our steady progress toward the contentment of everybody or that which croaks that the people who are working to that end are bent on destruction and that nothing but chaos lies ahead if the process is continued.

We have laws that make it a crime to circulate reports that a bank is unsound. How much greater a crime is it to give currency to reports that a government is unsound? What about fabrications such as that your President is aiming to make himself a dictator and is moving toward destroying the American system and substituting socialism, communism, and wants to sink the Constitution, abandon the principles of Jefferson, and sail under the grisly flag of Karl Marx?

Here is the hardest-worked man in the United States, plugging away cheerfully, sanely, and devotedly at his monumental task, under a constant barrage of faultfinding. If our enemies are to be believed, President Roosevelt is never right. If one of his recommendations is accepted by Congress, it is because he has terrorized the National Legislature and made it a rubber stamp; if his suggestion is modified or rejected by Congress, it means that he was wrong in the first instance and that Congress—the same one that they insisted was a rubber stamp—has saved the country from something dreadful. Of course, that does not make sense.

Grudgingly the spokesmen for the Du Pont Liberty League and the other Republican agencies admit that conditions have improved and that business is doing pretty well, but they insist that Mr. Roosevelt is not entitled to any credit for bringing this about. They have taken up the statement of ex-President Hoover, to the effect that he had the depression licked in June of 1932, and therefore Mr. Roosevelt couldn't be credited with driving the wolf from the door.

I daresay there are a number among those listening to me who remember the period between June 1932 and the advent of the Roosevelt administration. I wonder if they saw any evidence of a stay in the depression tide? I wonder what significance there is to the circumstance that 1,050 banks folded up during that period, not to mention 19,686 other business failures of various sorts. It seems to me that things grew worse from day to day, and that the nose spin did not cease until Roosevelt stopped it.

We have only to refer to the columns of your home newspapers to check on the question of when the depression showed signs of abating. I note, for example, an editorial in the New Year's edition of the Springfield Union, 2 months before President Roosevelt's advent to the White House. That eminent newspaper gave us no word of a ceasing of emergency distress, but it implied a hope for improvement when the new administration came in. "It is time to look forward," said this editorial, "but to look forward in hopeful expectation. It means the rekindling of faith in the future, a new determination to forget all that is painful in the past, a time to mark off a new date from which to make progress. * * * We can make a fresh start along a new pathway with confidence and faith that better things are ahead."

The headlines of that day were all gloomy. "Prices drop back to level of last summer" was one early in January. Here's another one: "Ragged retreat in bond market. United States Government issues lead way down. Numerous other casualties." That was in the middle of February. And there was like mention of the cutting of the New England Telephone & Telegraph dividends.

Almost the first gleam came with President Roosevelt's inauguration. "Stock market makes gain of 1 to 3 points. Expected developments in Washington factor in rise. Strong rally after selling." And editorially this newspaper declared "The rapid change from public concern to public confidence is to be credited mainly to the bold and effective manner in which President Roosevelt tackled the situation." And further down it announced that "the reopening of banks has changed a general suspicion of all banks into faith and soundness of most of them." By the first of the next year, 1934, the Union was absolutely cheerful, for it said, "As the beginning of 1934 is compared with that of 1933, we have the evidence of distinct gains and a general improvement. In gratitude for it the administration may not be criticized for claiming it all as of its own making, should it choose to do so, or if others make such a claim for it."

By the end of 1935 we find the New England press pretty optimistic. In the Boston Herald, for example, at the close of the year William C. Bell, vice president of the New England Power Association, told us: "Not only are we running ahead of 1934 but in recent weeks we have even exceeded the banner year of 1929."

It was shortly after this time that the highly respected Springfield Union suggested that, after all, the recovery might not be due to the New Deal policies: "It (the upward trend) has been impeded by many measures originated by the Roosevelt administration." And it suggested that the increase was most pronounced when it was believed "that the country was getting out of New Deal domination into normalcy."

Just the same, this home paper of yours on its business pages recounted incident after incident indicating the return of prosperity to this part of the country. Editorially it told its readers, "Clothing and dry-goods circles are optimistic about the outlook. Dun & Bradstreet report an increase of 10 to 18 percent in retail sales in the eastern area with the advent of mild weather. Shoe sales ahead of a year ago", etc.

By the middle of last March we learn, still from the columns of this newspaper, that "department stores of the East are now leading the upturn in retail trade, showing the largest increases of any geographical group in the last 6 weeks. Whatever gains we are making cannot be credited directly to New Deal hand-outs, though public construction elsewhere brings business to our industries along with others."

I need not read you the more recent editorials from this newspaper which are, as you know, directed vehemently to assailing the Roosevelt administration. The President is pictured as seeking to establish a despotism; and recently it advised that "the American people should remember that a vote for the New Deal is a vote for a complete regimentation of the country, and possibly the permanent submergence of all that this country won in 1776."

Of course, the newspaper is entitled to its own opinion, and my quotations from its columns are merely for the purpose of pointing out to you that success and business recovery has accompanied the Roosevelt administration, and that even one of its severest critics, while scolding at that administration, nevertheless is compelled to record that this State has prospered under it.

One of the favorite accusations against the administration is that it has favored the western farmer over the eastern industrialist. Yet we must note that the so-called favor to the farmers has resulted most satisfactorily for your industries. The income taxes paid in this State indicate, despite the moaning about dictatorship and the prophecies of chaos ahead, that the net income of your citizens has increased perhaps $200,000,000 over the 1933 income.

You have heard moans about continued unemployment. But the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports a steady rise in employment in this State of 10 percent and pay rolls averaging 26 percent more than they were in 1933.

The Federal Reserve Board tells us that your bank deposits are $200,000,000 more than they were 2 years before.

You have doubtless noticed comment to the effect that the New Deal was destroying our foreign trade. Well, last year's report showed that Boston last year did 57 percent more foreign business than the year before, and that 1936 is running well ahead of 1935. That means that a couple of thousand New England firms producing merchandise for export are doing pretty well.

It might be not without significance that there were 900 fewer failures in business in the Bay State last year than there were in the year preceding the coming of the Democratic regime to Washington.

Our critics would have you believe that the difference is a mere coincidence. So, they would have you consider in the same light, the circumstance that during the 4 years of Mr. Hoover's administration there were upward of 6,000 bank failures in the United States, while the number of corresponding disasters under Roosevelt total fewer than 400, and a considerable number of these meant little loss to the depositors because of the bank-insurance measure which they, I suppose, construe one of the errors of the present administration.

A favorite criticism from the minority party spokesmen is that the Roosevelt period is one of waste and extravagance. They do not specify just where this waste and extravagance is, conveying the impression that practically all the money expended in relief and emergency efforts is money thrown to the birds. If we could compare what is being spent to keep destitute Americans from starvation, and to uphold our business structure with the waste involved in the suspension of thousands of banks and tens of thousands of other commercial failures during a dozen years of Republican rule, the amount possibly misspent under the present administration would seem like chicken feed. If we balance the total of the national deficit against the increase in the value of properties and securities since the change from Hoover to Roosevelt, the country as a whole is far ahead. Incidentally the Treasury deficit was not a Democratic invention. We inherited several billions of the adverse balance from the previous administration, most of it incurred before there was any Nation-wide destitution to be taken care of.

Among those who talk a great deal about the sqandering of the people's money is a distinguished aspirant for the Republican Presidential nomination. Recently he has received the vote of his party in your sister New England State—New Hampshire. Perhaps I am taking a chance in referring to a State group. Not long ago I described one of our great western agricultural Commonwealths as a "prairie State", and was thereupon accused of speaking slightingly of that State and of insulting the whole country between the Alleghenies and the Rocky Mountains and from Texas to the Great Lakes.

But to get back to the Chicago publisher candidate: He vehemently charges the Roosevelt administration with ruthless, reckless, reasonless extravagance (I do not know if I have given all the colonel's adjectives) and he piles up the figures of expenditure to staggering totals. Now let us see about at least one phase of this summary.

It appears that the farmers and other citizens of Massachusetts have been loaned about $120,000,000 on their farms and homes.

This amount figures in the total of obligations. Would the colonel suggest that the good people of Massachusetts are not going to pay this debt and that the Government will have to take over the farms and homes in satisfaction of the mortgages? You and I know better. We have a demonstration of the validity of loans in Massachusetts. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation advanced your banks and similar institutions—on good security and a reasonable interest rate—about $74,000,000. Already these institutions and individuals have repaid $44,000,000.

Calculate what the grand total of such advances throughout the United States amounts to, and you will see that the actual deficit is some billions of dollars less than the figures offered by the colonel would indicate.

Waste! Do you of this grand old State consider wasted the $27,734,000 the Government spent on the 53 civilian conservation camps, that took 10,790 of your fine boys out of the despairing ranks of the jobless and gave them a training in healthy outdoor work that will be to their own and the Nation's benefit indefinitely? Do you consider what these boys did when the floods came upon you in the way of rescue and restoration as futile and piffling boondoggling? Do you believe that the improvement of your woods, the clearing of your streams, the establishment of forest-fire lanes, the halting of soil erosion that was washing your fertile fields into the rivers, represented mindless profligacy? Yet that is what the conductors of the hopeless Republican campaign are trying to make you believe.

You probably have seen a lot of Republican propaganda charging favoritism, incompetency, and politics in the administration of the relief programs. Let me quote to you what your mayor had to say on this subject:

"All W. P. A. projects are submitted by the various boards to a public works projects committee composed of two aldermen and three common council members, which committee gives very careful scrutiny to each and every project with a view toward protecting the city from a waste of municipal funds and also to guarantee some worth-while concrete results upon completion of each project.

"I want to go on record as saying that we have no 'boondoggling' in this city and that each project sponsored by this city is useful and worth while and will be of lasting benefit to the community and could not have been carried out at this time without Federal aid.

"We have constructed sanitary sewers, storm-water drains, streets and highways, bridges and municipal buildings, sidewalks and curbing. We have widened streets and roads and developed hundreds of acres of parks; built rustic shelters and miles of nature trails and bridle paths. By an extensive program of ditching we have reclaimed hundreds of acres of swampland on our municipal watershed, and by so doing have increased the flow of water into our reservoirs and improved the quality of the water. Fire stops on the watershed have saved valuable timber from forest fires and prevented erosion."

Similar statements have been made by practically every mayor of an important American city.

Now let us look back to the candidate I spoke of. He is enthusiastically in favor of keeping the farmers prosperous, but is singularly silent as to how he would go about doing it. He is likewise vividly concerned about taxes and their effect on business. Well, suppose we take a specimen to illustrate how business is faring. In 1932 General Motors Corporation reported a net profit of $160,000. In 1935 its net profit was $167,000,000. Increased taxes do not appear to have been an unbearable burden to this business.

A little while ago the colonel was calling the President a Socialist. More recently he described him as a Tory, but I suppose it would be too much to expect consistency in a Republican candidate.

Experience in public affairs is supposed to be a rather important requisite of aspirants for high public places. Perhaps this does not apply when the aspirant is a newspaper publisher. You have only to note the ease and confidence with which the Republican editors tell you the facile solutions to the great problems that have puzzled the brains of lifelong students of these subjects since the beginning of government to appreciate the infallibility of our newspaper friends.

In paying tribute to the statesmen who are after the Republican nomination I do not feel I should overlook Senator DICKINSON, of Iowa—the dog-food expert. He made an impassioned speech not long ago to the effect that the Roosevelt administration was so bad that it had reduced men and women to the necessity of eating dog food. His basis for this was a label on a package stating that the canine nutriment was "fit for human consumption." The erudite Senator did not realize that prepared dog foods are for the consumption of pampered pets, and cost more than canned beans, for example. Likewise he did not know that the wording on the label is only a trade device to obtain the benefit of certification by Government inspection, which is limited to foods fit for human consumption.

What these ambitious gentlemen are saying is really of little importance. They are part of the campaign wildness of a party that is devoid of a legitimate issue, and must beat the bushes for a candidate, while it resorts to generalities and fables for arguments.

I feel rather apologetic for taking the time of an intelligent, hard-headed Yankee audience with such matters, but the authors of them must think they are of some political value or they would not keep repeating them, and we may be sure that they will be echoed in the platform of the Cleveland convention.

The people of Massachusetts have shown their courage, wisdom, and patriotism at every crisis in our Nation's history. I know how you feel about President Roosevelt. I know that you appreciate the bravery with which he tackled the problems that faced him on his advent to the White House. I am sure you appreciate the serenity with which he pursues his stupendous task, unvexed and unexcited by the clamors of those who would undo what he has done. And I know that you are excellent businessmen, and that what he has accomplished for recovery is understood by you.

I have no doubts whatever what will be the verdict of this great State when your people go to the polls next November to testify your faith in the sincerity, ability, and efficiency of your President. And let me assure you that the other Commonwealths of the wonderful sisterhood that constitutes our Union will be with you in thought, word, and deed, as they were 4 years ago.

PEACE AND PREVENTION OF WAR—ADDRESS BY CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, that valiant leader of American women, Carrie Chapman Catt, carried the plea for peace and for prevention of war to fifteen hundred women from all sections of the United States and from 15 foreign countries in an address delivered June 4 before the banquet session of the Associated Country Women of the World meeting this week in Washington.

The delegates from these 15 foreign nations will carry Mrs. Catt's work back to their native lands; hundreds of American delegates will carry them back to their various communities; but I believe they should be made available to all the women of this country, and, therefore, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from Mrs. Catt's address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is not long, as time flies, since all schools, open to girls, taught the rudiments of education only. The first women to graduate with degrees in the entire world in the class of 1841 at Oberlin, Ohio, and the women numbered three.

Education is now world-wide for women. In the year of 1932 there were 372,912 women students in the colleges and universities of the United States.

In the early days women speakers in this country were pelted with bad eggs and rotting vegetables. Our famous Independence Hall in Philadelphia was torn down and set on fire by a mob because a woman was speaking there. Now women may speak whenever they have anything to say and equally when they have nothing to say. More, women now vote in more than half the countries of the world. Within a century women have become rational, responsible human beings, endowed with an education, the right to speak, and the right to vote. What should the world expect of educated, self-respecting human beings? And what do we expect of ourselves? The old routine for women is not good enough for us now.

This is a period of problems. Farm women are probably especially interested in some of these problems; city women are interested in others. But there is one thing which I am quite sure interests all women, and that is the abolition of war. To my mind it outranks all other problems, because war is the father of most of the problems of this day. The world is in a predicament with its unemployment, its relief, its business stagnation, and all these troubles and many more are direct results of the Great War.

Why have another before the last one is paid for? Why another before the wounds made in civilization itself by that war are healed?

War is the oldest institution in the world, as it is the most cruel, most destructive, most uncivilized, and most unreasonable. Time was when men went forth in the spirit of adventure and returned as heroes. They killed and looted, but that was long, long ago. Modern society is too complicated, too diversified, to afford or to profit by the waste of war. The Great War cost $93.50 for every man, woman, and child in the entire world. The depression, the inevitable aftermath of war, will probably cost each government as much as the war itself, while the preparation for the next war, that all the nations fear, may yet exceed the cost of both. War fills the world with hate and fear and war has kept these two evils growing for a million years. No war can stop them. Instead, each new war starts new hates and new fears.

War is enemy no. 1 of everything good in the world. Its spirit has spread to business and to politics in all lands. It is the false foundation of civilization itself, shaping its character, and giving direction to all the chief developments. There will never be a really civilized world until war and all its horrible adjuncts are abolished from the earth. It can be done when the people of the world demand it. They and they alone can stop war.

Listen, do you farm women not know that war keeps you poor, that your Nation spends too much money for guns, airplanes, and poison gas, and too little for farm welfare? Do you know that every nation builds too many warships and too few friendships? Do you not know that the worst blow to your farm would be the death of your son, or sons, on a battlefield? Do not forget that today no nation can secure a large enough army by volunteer enlistment. The next war will be fought by conscripted armies, as the last one was, and your sons of the right age will be compelled to go. The way to save your sons is by the abolition of war itself. Say these things to your family, your husband, and your sons, your neighbors. Will they pronounce you a fanatic? They will, and it is by the activity of fanatics alone that war will be abolished. Make fanatics of your family and neighbors and you will not feel lonesome.

It is not necessary for you American women to flounder through the intricacies of neutrality, the political confusion of joining the League of Nations, or the more complicated, so-called economic causes of war in order to understand war. There is no cause, real or false, that justifies war. Such talk merely wastes time and postpones the day when wars will cease. They are the "red herrings" thrown in your way to confuse you.

Become a minute woman for peace—a crusader. Make the abolition of war your chief aim in life. This is the time when a common problem and a common aim unite city and country, farm and factory.

The abolition of war is the biggest and most stubborn problem in the world today. When war goes, most of the other problems which perplex us will disappear. Those that remain can command more money, more time, more wisdom for their settlement than is possible now. War cannot be chiseled down to moderation; it must be abolished, root and branch. Farm women, city women, all women, be crusaders for the total abolition of war. Use your education and your votes to that end. Perhaps your emancipation from the old oppressions has fitted you to serve this particular time like Esther of old.

Crusaders for the abolition of war, I greet you!

Peace is the one common interest of the women of all continents, of all races and nations, of all classes and kinds.

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT IN MINIMUM WAGE LAW CASE

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Record of June 4, and also an editorial from the New York Post of June 4, having to do with the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the minimum wage law case.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of June 4, 1936]

THE KING CAN DO NO WRONG

The king can do no wrong.

Corollary of that great principle "Divine right of kings", to which the best people of the American Colonies and Europe subscribed some two centuries ago.

Hard for us moderns to appreciate such implicit faith in the far-fetched dogma that one man was anointed of God and thereby endowed with superhuman wisdom.

Must have strained the faith of devout monarchists when two members of the royal family contended for the throne, and the one with the quickest assassin won the divine appointment.

But it's human nature for those in the money to embellish the status quo with a sanctity which renders criticism sacrilegious.

Thus the nobles of old were ready to fight and die for the divine right of the king from whom they derived their titles and privileges.

Thus the Tories of today, usually men of large property, throw an aura of sanctity around the Constitution and the Supreme Court to stifle reason and analysis.

Such was not the attitude of the founding fathers. They fought then to destroy the divine-right-of-kings myth. They would fight today just as strenuously against attributing to any man or set of men more than reasonable human ability and character.

It is un-American, dangerous, and foolish to consider the Supreme Court above criticism.

Its decision invalidating minimum-wage laws was a bad decision.

It was a bad ruling, concocted of false premises and faulty logic.

We respect the Supreme Court, but that respect must be circumscribed by our reason and our conscience.

Reason tells us that if the State of New York has the right to fix the price of milk to protect dairy farmers, even more obvious is its right to fix the price of labor to protect women workers from exploitation.

Reason tells us that if these same Justices held the Federal Government could not fix minimum wages to protect miners in the Guffey Act because such a law would violate State rights, they cannot reasonably turn around and say the States cannot fix minimum wages.

Reason tells us that the due-process clauses in the fifth and fourteenth amendments were intended to protect humanity, not to exploit it.

Conscience tells us that a good law protects the weak as against the strong.

It is obvious that Justice Stone has no greater respect for the majority opinion than we have. In dissent he says:

"There is grim irony in speaking of the freedom of contract of those who, because of their economic necessities, give their service for less than is needful to keep body and soul together. But if this be freedom of contract, no one has ever denied that it is freedom which may be restrained, notwithstanding the fourteenth amendment, by a statute passed in the public interest."

Twisting the Constitution by the Supreme Court is not without precedent. Chief Justice Taney used false facts and false reasoning to misinterpret the Constitution as endorsing chattel slavery.

Now Justice Butler and four of his colleagues are using the same methods to twist the Constitution into an endorsement of wage slavery.

Because the Dred Scott decision was clothed in legal trappings, the Nation took too seriously the attempt of six reactionaries to justify their prejudice against the Negro race.

We fought a bloody Civil War to correct that mistake.

Let not that mistake be made again. Let us take this majority opinion for what it is worth—the attempt of five reactionaries to justify their aversion to giving working people a fair break.

Curb this Court before it destroys the Nation.

[From the New York Post of June 4, 1936]

THE AMERICAN HOUSE OF LORDS

Even conservatives are jolted by the Supreme Court's decision on the New York minimum-wage law.

The Times finds the decision "unfortunate." Even the Herald Tribune is shocked and says that "the present decision, adhering so literally to the Adkins case of 13 years ago, can hardly be regarded as the last word on this difficult question."

Is it any wonder? When it is borne in mind that of the 13 Supreme Court Justices to pass on minimum wage legislation, 7—a majority—have declared that legislation to be constitutional?

Minimum-wage laws are unconstitutional today only because no five of these seven Justices were on the bench at one time.

Both Chief Justice Taft and Chief Justice Hughes favored minimum wage laws. Dissenting with Taft in the Adkins case in 1923 were Justices Sanford and Holmes. Dissenting today with Hughes are Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo.

Minimum-wage laws are unconstitutional, then, because of the caprice of fate that Justices Sutherland, Butler, Van Devanter, and McReynolds all were on the bench in both 1923 and 1936, finding Justice McKenna to agree with them in 1923 and Justice Roberts now.

Upon such flimsy basis does the Court's obstruction of social reform rest today.

Is it any wonder even the Tories are worried?

They know that the minimum-wage laws of 16 States, invalidated by this decree, were for the most part approved by Republican legislatures and Republicans as well as Democratic Governors.

They know that these States went to great lengths to tailor their minimum-wage legislation to meet what were believed to be the requirements of the Constitution.

But five Justices say there shall be no minimum-wage laws.

Chiseling is constitutional.

Unwelcome as it may be to politicians of both parties, the Supreme Court's usurpation of power is the issue of the hour.

With all avenues of orderly social reform closed there is but one peaceful alternative: Orderly reform of the Court itself.

That must come if we are to preserve the Court as an American institution; if the Constitution itself is to survive.

The people of England were forced to strip the House of Lords of its veto power.

The people of the United States must end the veto power of our own House of Lords, the Supreme Court.

The President and Congress have it in their power to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, under section 2 of article III of the Constitution. They can increase the number of Judges to override the present arrogant majority. They can compel judicial retirements. They can sponsor constitutional amendments limiting the Court's power and specifically authorizing social reform, although there is scarcely time, in this crisis, to amend the Constitution.

It is not nearly so important at this juncture that one certain way be chosen as it is that some way be chosen.

That aggressive leadership be exerted at once to safeguard public rights while there is yet time, before resentment against judicial rapacity leads to rash demagoguery and demands to abolish the Court and scrap the Constitution.

FEDERAL TAX ON GASOLINE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Tulsa (Okla.) Oil and Gas Journal relative to the continuance of the temporary Federal tax on gasoline.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Tulsa (Okla.) Oil and Gas Journal]

CONTINUANCE OF TEMPORARY FEDERAL TAX ON GASOLINE AROUSING OPPOSITION

The movement for the repeal of the Federal tax on gasoline and the reservation of that tax to the States is making rapid headway. Washington is hearing from the States lulled into acquiescence at the time of the original enactment by the plea that the Federal tax was to be only a temporary measure during the emergency. The gasoline-buying public also is becoming restive and demanding repeal.

The temporary character of the Federal gasoline tax is well recognized by those instrumental in the original passage in 1932, being well illustrated by the fact it was adopted reluctantly and for only 1 year, whereas the Revenue Act of 1932 imposed all other levies for a 2-year period. When the tax was enacted neither time nor opportunity permitted careful consideration, and it was admittedly passed as a matter of expediency in a temporary move to balance the Federal Budget.

DANGEROUS EXTREME

The power to levy taxes for the support of government has long been recognized as a fundamental, necessary exercise of sovereignty; without such power no government is able to function properly. However, the historical phrase, "the power to tax involves the power to destroy", points out the dangerous extreme to which excessive exercise of this governmental prerogative may progress. Consideration of the present Federal gasoline tax must, in all fairness, be weighed in the light of this factor.

Any general review of sales taxes, imposed by Federal, State, and local governments, indicates such assessments were originally applied to so-called luxuries, and then only for the purpose of satisfying revenue needs. The benefit theory was discarded and greater emphasis placed on the ability-to-pay doctrine. However, the recent economic emergency necessitated a departure from these standard doctrines, and now many modern essentials of life are included in revenue schedules, notably gasoline, which in 1935 paid a State and Federal sales tax amounting to 39.04 percent of the service-station price, based on statistics from 50 representative cities.

For a number of years the various States have imposed an excise tax upon the sale of gasoline, the first being Oregon in 1919. Until 1932 this field of taxation was used only by the States and was not encroached upon by the Federal Government.

SENATOR GORE'S PROTEST

However, unknown to the great majority of motorists and to many in the oil industry, the first proposal of a sales tax upon gasoline was that of a Federal gasoline tax, the proposal being made by Congress as early as 1913, when the first income-tax law was enacted. In that year the Ways and Means Committee of the House recommended a 2-cent-per-gallon Federal tax. Later a Federal gasoline tax of 1 cent per gallon was agreed to by the Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee over the protests of Senator T. P. GORE, of Oklahoma, who was then, as he is now, a member of that committee.

Senator GORE lost the fight by only one vote in the committee and carried the fight to the Democratic caucus, where he won by a majority of three votes. It was during this fight against the enactment of a Federal gasoline tax that Senator GORE, also a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, evolved this now-famous slogan: "Conserve both soil and oil—overtax neither oil nor soil."

By the action of the Democratic caucus the Federal gasoline tax was eliminated from the revenue act of that year, and such a law was not enacted until 1932, 19 years after the first proposal was made before Congress.

In his annual message to Congress on December 7, 1915, President Wilson also proposed a Federal gasoline tax, but Congress failed to enact such a law. The next time such a proposal was made was in the revenue bill passed by the House on September 20, 1918, in which was included a provision for a Federal excise tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline, estimated to yield $40,000,000 per year. This provision was eliminated by the Senate Finance Committee.

The State of Oregon enacted the first gasoline-tax law on February 25, 1919, imposing a tax of 1 cent per gallon to finance highway construction, improvement, and maintenance. Within a few years all the States and the District of Columbia had adopted this type of tax for the express purpose of building and maintaining highways.

GROWING EXACTION

Since gasoline-tax rates in the State were, at first, usually low and since the revenues were expended on the highways, there was very little opposition by the consumers. The motoring public was willing to pay for good highways. The gasoline tax, however, proved to be such a splendid source of revenue to the States, and was, in contrast with other forms of taxes, so easily collected, the result was rates were rapidly increased. The rates in the various States now range from 2 to 7 cents per gallon, with the average well above 4 cents. Total gasoline tax collections by the States in 1935 were approximately $625,000,000. Some idea of the present importance of the gasoline tax as a source of revenue for the States is gained from the fact it raises approximately one-third of all the money collected for State government purposes.

All of the States first taxed gasoline on the theory that it should be used exclusively for highway purposes. However, when revenues from other sources began to fall off, or when funds were needed for new purposes, the ease with which tax rates could be increased and the ease with which the tax was collected caused legislatures in some States to divert gasoline-tax funds to uses other than for highways.

Then in 1932 the Federal Government, seeking to augment its revenue, invaded the gasoline-tax field by imposing a temporary tax of 1 cent per gallon on gasoline sold by the producer or importer thereof. Congress recognized the injustice of this duplicate tax, but condoned it on the grounds of extreme emergency and expressed the intention it was a temporary levy.

The House Ways and Means Committee, in the report of its subcommittee on double taxation, submitted December 28, 1932, said:

"When the gasoline tax was first discussed in the House of Representatives of the United States it was felt by many that this field of taxation was fully occupied by the States and should be left to them. The House did not include this tax in the revenue bill as sent to the Senate. The Senate, however, in the light of later figures as to the deficit and as to the probable tax yield, was obliged to amend the bill by including a tax upon gasoline."

DOUBLE TAXATION

The same report on double taxation stated: "The Federal (gasoline) tax is a temporary measure."

In 1933 Congress repealed the provision of the 1932 Revenue Act which set the expiration date for the Federal gasoline tax as June 30, 1933, extending the expiration date to June 30, 1934. However, a report of the Senate Finance Committee dated May 10, 1933, stated: "Your committee is of the opinion that the gasoline tax should be reserved for the States after June 30, 1934."

When this subject came up for discussion before the Ways and Means Committee of the House at the 1933 session of Congress, Chairman DOUGHTON said:

"This was an emergency tax. I am sure Congress was reluctant to impose a tax on gasoline; but in order to balance the Budget, Congress felt that it was necessary temporarily to impose a tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline.

"Over the objection of the House, it was passed in the Senate, and we concurred in it because they said the whole structure of the Government would perish if the Budget was not balanced, and we, too, were anxious to balance it; and consequently, in the rush to close the session of Congress and to balance the Budget, we imposed the gasoline tax." (Hearings, p. 824, Dec. 20, 1933.)

Later in the same session the National Industrial Recovery Act extended the expiration date to June 30, 1935, and increased the rate of tax. While the N. R. A. was being considered various proposals were made to increase the 1-cent Federal gasoline tax to 2 cents and 1¾ cents per gallon. As the bill was finally passed it provided for an increase of one-half cent, making the total Federal gasoline tax 1½ cents.

However, Congress again recognized the temporary nature of the tax by specifying the additional ½-cent tax should expire with the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, or when the receipts of the Federal Government should exceed the expenditures. President Roosevelt proclaimed the repeal of the eighteenth amendment effective December 5, 1933, and on January 1, 1934, the Federal gasoline tax rate reverted to 1 cent per gallon.

The various States early recognized that the Federal gasoline tax is, and should be, only an emergency Federal levy. The first recommendation of the initial report of Interstate Commerce Commission on conflicting taxation, unanimously approved on March 25, 1933, stated:

"Gasoline taxes. Since Congress has declared that the Federal tax on gasoline was levied only as a temporary expedient on account of the emergency, the Commission urges the Federal Government to relinquish this source of revenue for the exclusive use of the States at the end of the next Federal fiscal year, namely, June 30, 1934."

LEGISLATURES PETITION

The legislatures of the States started petitioning Congress as early as 1932, requesting the elimination of the emergency Federal gasoline tax and the leaving of this field of taxation solely to the States for the purpose of building and maintaining highways. To date the following States have memorialized Congress in this manner: Arkansas, Mississippi, Montana, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Michigan, Maine, Minnesota, Nebraska, South Carolina, Maryland, Tennessee, Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, California, Alabama, and Kentucky.

Later the Governors of many States openly expressed themselves as urging Congress to repeal the Federal gasoline tax. Governor Hill McAllister, of Tennessee, stated: "I wish that the Federal Government would abandon its tax on gasoline and leave this source of revenue entirely to the States." Governor Clyde Tingley, of New Mexico, has stated: "It will continue to be the policy of this administration to do everything possible to eliminate the Federal tax on gasoline." Similar statements have been made by Gov. J. M. Futrell, of Arkansas, and governors of other States.

Thus, it appears that the temporary and emergency character of the Federal gasoline tax is well recognized by Congress, by State administrations, and the motoring public. The latter group—those that pay the tax—are by implication virtually promised that when the emergency is past the Federal gasoline tax shall be eliminated.

However, the continued conditions of depression prolonging the national emergency have facilitated retention of this source of Federal revenue, and the ease with which this tax is collected has diverted attention from other equitable and logical sources of revenue. As a result, the 1-cent Federal gasoline tax is still in effect, the expiration date of the tax having been extended to June 30, 1937, at the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

When the Federal gasoline tax was first enacted the motorists offered no concerted opposition. They were willing to acquiesce in view of the emergency confronting the country and the assurance of various Members of Congress that such a tax was only a temporary Budget-balancing expedient. But these taxpayers have since discovered that the economic emergency is likely to become a permanent basis for Federal invasion of this field.

The fact must be admitted that conditions are now immeasurably better than those existing in June 1932, the time when the Federal tax on gasoline was inaugurated. Thus, the emergency argument for the continuance of the Federal levy on gasoline is not now justified, and the repeal of this tax would be a further stimulant to business and industry in every State in the Union.

"HOT OIL" LEGISLATION

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to the editor of the Tulsa World, Tulsa, Okla., with respect to "hot oil" legislation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
April 15, 1935.

Hon. EUGENE LORTON,
The Tulsa World, Tulsa, Okla.

MY DEAR LORTON: Ever since you expressed an interest in oil legislation I have been intending from term to term and day to day to write you in regard to the "hot oil" legislation recently enacted by Congress. I put it off, however, in order to check and double check the actual workings of this measure to see how well it answered the purpose and object which we had in mind.

I am glad to report: As you know, when the Supreme Court held section 9 (c) of the N. R. A. Act to be an unsound delegation of legislative authority, both Senator GORE and I introduced bills in the Senate to meet the contingency and the emergency caused by that decision. There was not much material difference between our two measures. We reconciled those differences by amending my bill which was in due course enacted into law. We felt that the passage of this measure at this time would save the situation and avert any undesirable consequences and would make it unnecessary to adopt further legislation which might undertake to regulate and regiment the entire oil industry, which should be done, if at all, only as a last resort after other methods have been tried and found ineffective.

Of course, I need not tell you nor any other Oklahoman of the interest and efforts which are always being furthered by Senator GORE in connection with any matters or measures affecting the welfare of the oil business or those engaged in the business.

Sincerely,

TOM CONNALLY.

POWERS OF SUPREME COURT—PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, the people of the United States have been challenged to do something about the Constitution of the United States as interpreted by the Supreme Court. It might almost be said that they have been challenged until they have become hardened to challenges and immune to decisions—decisions that rob them of every right to legislate for their own welfare and their own security and relegate them to economic slavery.

When the people of this country have been so challenged, the Congress, which they elect as their representatives, is challenged. The same challenge that has been thrown down to Congress has been hurled at every farm leader, every labor leader, every cooperative leader, every social-welfare advocate, and every person in a position of leadership in the Christian churches which have demanded the application of Christian principles in our social and economic system.

The N. R. A. decision denied the Government the right to regulate industry for the public welfare, even though it was for the welfare of industry itself.

The A. A. A. decision denied the right of Congress to legislate for the Nation's greatest industry, comprising a greater share of its people—agriculture.

In the A. A. A. decision the Supreme Court denied Congress the right to use its tax power to improve agriculture. Yet that same Court has never interfered with the power of Congress to establish tariffs for the protection and benefit of industries and industrial profits.

The Supreme Court declared the Railroad Retirement Act unconstitutional when Congress sought to provide retirement pensions for railroad employees.

On the same day that it knocked out the N. R. A. the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage law, which provided a 5-year moratorium under specified conditions by which the debt-ridden farmers of this country might earn back or win back their farms and homes.

The Supreme Court has invalidated under our present Constitution the rights of Congress to prevent the sweatshop labor of little children in a land where 11,000,000 grown-ups ask in vain for jobs.

It has held null and void the Guffey Coal Act, in which Congress sought to legislate for the benefit of hundreds of thousands of workers in the coal industry and for the ultimate benefit of the industry itself.

And now has come the crowning blow of all in the United States Supreme Court decision written last Monday by Justice Butler, which holds invalid and unconstitutional the New York State minimum-wage law. The interpretation placed upon our Constitution by our present Supreme Court, in other words, has nullified legislation for the benefit of agriculture, labor, and industry on the grounds that such legislation invades State rights. And now it has nullified State legislation on the ground that the States have not this right.

Only a few weeks ago this same Justice Butler, after participating in a split decision holding that social-welfare legislation violated State rights, reversed himself within a few days and handed down another opinion robbing the State of North Dakota of the right to tax the property of a vast railway corporation that lay within its borders.

The Guffey Coal Act decision virtually closed the door to regulation by the Federal Government of the hours, wages, and working conditions in productive industries. The Supreme Court decision on the New York minimum-wage law denied that right to the States.

President Roosevelt has aptly stated that the Supreme Court interpretations of our Constitution has created a "no man's land" in which neither State legislatures nor Congress can legislate for the benefit of the vast millions of our people.

So unbelievable is this plight in which we find ourselves at the mercy of the Supreme Court that even the reactionary press, which has constantly defended a reactionary Court, has been forced to seek refuge this time in the solitary defense that "It must say so in the Constitution." I call to your attention the fact that most of these decisions, so important to the welfare of millions upon millions of American people, have been rendered by narrow margins of split votes of the nine members of the Court itself. Many of them have been rendered by votes of five to four, as was the New York State wage decision. In other words, the vote of one member of the Supreme Court has determined that the Constitution prohibits the people's representatives in Congress from legislating for the people they represent, and prevents the people's representatives in the State legislatures from legislating for the people they represent.

It is clear that only two remedies remain to correct this situation. One is to limit the power of the Supreme Court; the other, to safeguard the people's right by amending the Constitution.

I believe that section 2 of article III clearly gives the Congress the right to regulate the powers of the Supreme Court, and to make whatever exceptions it sees fit to prevent the Supreme Court invalidating any act enacted by the Congress.

But perhaps the time is too short and the stake too precious to the welfare of our people to permit a congressional effort along that line. The Supreme Court in turn would, no doubt, hold this also to be unconstitutional, and thus throw the Nation into a state of confusion and bewilderment.

Several brilliant newspaper commentators have said that the sum total of Supreme Court activities is to hold that chaos, and chaos alone, is constitutional. I do not know but what that might be the very "constitutional" state into which we would be thrown were we to attempt to exercise what I believe is our well-defined authority to regulate the Supreme Court.

My colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] warned of the situation we have today, when on May 27, 1933, in debate on the floor of the Senate, he referred to the attitude of the Supreme Court on railroad valuation cases. He was joined by Senator NORRIS and the late Senator LONG in a discussion which disclosed that Justice Butler faced a bitter fight against confirmation in the Senate. He finally took his seat with the understanding that he would not pass on the railroad rate cases, in view of the fact that he had just prior to his appointment been the leading attorney in the United States as counsel for the railroads in their efforts to establish this method of valuation.

Justice Butler did not sit on the railroad cases perhaps, but he did sit in the Indianapolis Water Works case, which came on before the O'Fallon case, where identically the same question was involved, and the waterworks case, as Senator SHIPSTEAD then pointed out, served as a guide for the later decision in the valuation of railroads for rate-making purposes.

But there is another way, and that way lies in the adaptation of the Constitution itself in unmistakable terms to the social and economic necessities of our people today. We must write into the Constitution specific provisions granting to the Government definite authority to enact legislation essential to the welfare of the people.

William Allen White, one of the closest Republican friends of the man who with little doubt next week will be the Republican candidate for President, has had this to say about the enslaved position in which the wage decision has left us. I quote:

> The Supreme Court has honestly, even if tragically, called our attention to the need of a power in government which now is obviously restricted. That need is the issue of the hour. The Republican convention must not sidestep it. Our party did not dodge the Dred Scott decision. It must not blink at this. The Republican Party must not let the Democrats fire the first shot in the new battle for human freedom.
> No other agency than government can bring justice into the relations of those who work with the machines and those who own the machines.

Representative HAMILTON FISH, of New York, conservative Republican and an oft-mentioned Republican possibility for Vice President, has said on the floor of the House—I quote:

> I am frankly shocked by this unfortunate 5-4 decision that compels millions of loyal Americans to work for wages that will not secure for them the common necessities of life. The Supreme Court has presented the American people with a new Dred Scott decision condemning millions of Americans to economic slavery, and the issue will not down until it has been righted in the public interest.

Congressman FISH announced he will introduce a proposed constitutional amendment.

Are you of the vast Democratic majorities that control these two Houses of Congress going to shut the door to proposals for consideration of constitutional amendments, and let the Republican enemies of everything that is liberal and praiseworthy about the New Deal seize the torch from your hands?

President Roosevelt—the President you Democrats, with the help of the Farmer-Laborites and other liberals and progressives of this country, elected—has declared we are left desolate in a chaotic "no man's land." He has asked every adult person to read the three decisions of the Supreme Court. He has inferred he would like to see action toward a sane elimination of this "no man's land." He would, I believe, like to see every understanding person have knowledge of what this decision means. I understand that there are to be printed in today's RECORD the full text of the opinion of the five-judge majority, and also the illuminating minority opinion of Justice Stone, concurred in by Justices Brandeis and Cardozo, as well as the minority opinion of Chief Justice Hughes, concurred in by Justices Cardozo, Brandeis, and Stone. I shall not, therefore, ask that the opinions be printed as a part of my remarks.

We have the physical means at hand to virtually abolish poverty, to establish security and justice, and opportunity for all. But we have not the legal means, either because our Constitution has never been brought up to date, or because a majority of the Supreme Court that we have intrusted to interpret that Constitution is either woefully antiquated or callously insensible to the needs and demands of our people.

There is time left for this session of Congress to submit a remedy to the crying people of this Nation—the farmers, the workers, the children, the aged, and unemployed, all of whom are being trampled underfoot by constitutional interpretations. Those people, I believe, challenge their leaders and their Congress to act.

We have before this Congress a proposed constitutional amendment, which I have had the honor to introduce in the United States Senate. It is in the form of Senate Joint Resolution 249. I had despaired of action on that resolution before adjournment, but the no-man's-land decision in the New York case, coming as it does on top of the devastating blows already handed to the farmers, home owners, and organized labor, has created an unmistakable and immeasurable demand that this resolution be given a hearing by the present Congress now.

The proposed amendment will make unmistakable the power of Congress to regulate child labor; to fix limits for hours and wages; to protect the right of collective bargaining; to provide relief for the aged, ill, and unemployed; to regulate the marketing and processing of agricultural products; to control natural resources and such vast enterprises as are essential for the social and economic welfare of the people; and to legislate generally for their social and economic well-being.

This resolution has been formally endorsed by hundreds of recognized organizations of farmers, workers, and citizens. It is obvious that I do not ask this Congress to put this amendment into the Constitution of the United States.

I only ask this Congress to give the people of the United States a right to vote on it, an opportunity to write it into their own Constitution if they so desire.

At least I ask that a committee of this Senate, in the time that remains before adjournment, give to proponents of such a constitutional amendment a right to be heard before we close the doors to a hearing and go out to commit the hypocrisy of campaigning for votes by championing issues on which we have had the power but have not had the courage to act.

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXATION

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] on behalf of himself and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the committee amendment on page 30.

The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I tender a motion relating to the pending bill and ask that it lie on the table for the time being and be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion submitted by the Senator from Illinois will be received, printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

The motion referred to is as follows:

Motion intended to be proposed by Mr. LEWIS to the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes:

"As Member of the Senate representing the State of Illinois, for reasons heretofore given in speech presented to the Senate, I respectfully move that the bill designated as the tax bill (H. R. 12395) be recommitted to the Senate committee designated as the Senate Finance Committee for the reconsideration of all phases necessary to the complete understanding of the different objections and contentions made either for or against the bill during debate and in the course of present consideration, and move that there be no report for action upon the bill at the present session of Congress."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Finance Committee have for submission to the Senate a large number of amendments dealing with the administrative features of the pending bill, which have been presented and are now in print. I ask unanimous consent that I may offer them at this time and have them lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will be received and lie on the table subject to call.

(Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on Wednesday last.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, because of the measures which have been taken with the objective of checking the tide of the depression, we are confronted in this year, as I believe we have been in every year since extraordinary expenditures were begun, with the need of increasing the revenue of the Federal Government. So far as I am concerned, early in the depression I advocated the adoption of a program to put people to work. In the first bill which I offered, however, I suggested a form of increased taxation in order eventually to retire the bonds which were provided to be issued under the terms of the bill. In each succeeding session of Congress, when the opportunity has been presented in connection with revenue bills, I have advocated increasing taxes in order to meet the fiscal situation created by expenditures—not that I believed that the Budget could be balanced in the technical sense, but I took the position that the Government needed the increased revenues, because it seemed to me that the economic crisis was similar to the crisis of war.

In a war a government must unbalance its budget in order to conduct the war and carry it to a successful conclusion. However, it has always been the policy of governments that were operating upon a sound fiscal theory in time of war to impose heavy taxes in order to raise from revenues and from war profits as much of the money as possible for the conduct of the war. In this respect, a Nation-wide depression is similar to a war. During a depression of the magnitude of the present one there are certain extraordinary expenditures which must be made; they cannot be avoided. By the same token, however, we should increase the revenues in order to raise from taxation as much as possible of the extraordinary expenditures, with the objective not of immediately balancing the Budget but of maintaining Government credit. As we look back upon the post-war history of the large industrial countries we see that all of them in this period of depression have eventually come to the point where they had to make a fundamental decision. On the one hand, they levy the taxes necessary to maintain government credit, or they could take the easier route and adopt methods of financing through uncontrolled inflation. Only one great industrial country, aside from the United States, has had the courage to follow the former course, and that is Great Britain. I firmly believe that we are confronted at this session of Congress, as I believe we have been at every past session of Congress since 1933, with the necessity of raising more revenue.

The fundamental question that presents itself to the Congress is how and where we shall levy the additional burden. I believe the theory that taxes should be levied in proportion to the ability of the taxpayer to carry the burden is fundamentally sound.

As I see it, there are approximately four sources of income from which we may get additional revenue. One is from business profits. Another source of income is wages and salaries. Another source of income is interest. A fourth source of income is rents. Waving aside the theoretical consideration of a capital levy, these are the four basic sources of income from which we can obtain additional revenue.

What are the facts? The facts are the taxpayers' receipts from interest are not rising. On the contrary they have been falling until today interest, on the average, is lower than at any time in the recent history of the country.

Can we say that those who derive their incomes from rents are in a position to carry a heavy share of the increased burden? I do not think so. While it is true there has been a slight rise in rents generally over the country, in percentage the increased income to the recipients of rents has been relatively small.

Are wages and salaries rising? In answer to that question we may disregard wages, because the bulk of income-tax payers in the country under our existing system are not found among those in the wage-earning income group. Salaries have been rising, but the testimony before the committee was that they have not been increased greatly.

This leaves business profits as the only other source from which we may ask taxpayers to contribute additional revenue to the Government. What are the facts about the increase in business profits? According to the Standards Statistics Index, profits of 1,307 corporations for 1935 were 42 percent above those for 1934. One hundred and sixty-one representative corporations showed an increase of 69 percent in business profits. The figures for the same corporations show that the profits during the last quarter of 1935 were 117 percent greater than the profits for the last quarter of 1934.

In this connection I wish to point out that, in 1933, 67 corporations in the United States had one-third of the total corporated income enjoyed by all corporations of the United States.

Mr. President, with these facts confronting the Congress, we are in a position to say that in the light of the necessity which confronts the Government the one place in which we can demonstrate that there has been a sharp rise in income is in the form of corporate profits.

Any tax system which is long to have the support of the citizens of the country must be an equitable system. There is today in our tax system great inequity. It arises from the fact that there is a great difference between the taxes paid upon corporate earnings by corporations and taxes paid by individuals in the individual income-tax brackets.

During the illusory days of an alleged prosperity before 1929, when the revenues of the Government were rising, the Republicans, who were responsible for the fiscal and tax policies, advocated constant reduction in income-tax brackets until in 1929 the top brackets on $1,000,000 or more of net taxable income in the form of individual income were fixed at 20 percent. The tax paid by a corporation was 12½ percent. In that situation there was no great disparity between the amount of tax paid on corporate profits in the treasury of a corporation and the amount of tax paid upon the same profits had they been distributed to the individual and taken up by him in his individual income tax.

As the depression descended upon the country and it became evident more revenue was needed, the income-tax brackets have been severely increased, particularly above $50,000 of net taxable income, until today on the top bracket of individual income a tax of 75 percent is imposed, while under existing law corporations pay upon their profits 12½ to 15 percent. Therefore it becomes obvious at a glance that for the individual who is in the income-tax bracket of $50,000 of net taxable income or above there is a tremendous incentive to exercise whatever influence he may have upon the policies of corporations in which his funds are invested to have them retain in their treasuries as large an amount as possible of their corporate earnings, since the corporation pays a flat tax at the highest of only 15 percent; and yet the individual, if he should receive the same profits in his individual income in the form of dividends, would have to pay upon them all the way from 50 to 75 percent.

Therefore, Mr. President, when the present administration realized that it must increase the Government's revenue, surveying the situation, seeing that corporate profits were a form of income which had climbed most markedly and substantially since 1933, realizing this inducement for tax avoidance on the part of those in the upper income-tax brackets, it suggested that the inequity in the tax system should be corrected.

From listening to the sound and the fury before the Senate Finance Committee and in the hostile press of the country, one might come to the conclusion that a new, novel, and radical idea had been put forward by the President. On the contrary, the same principle was in the income-tax law during Civil War days. The same principle was considered by the Congress in 1917. It was considered again in 1921. Some of the wisest, ablest—yes, some of the most conservative—experts on taxation in this country pointed out this opportunity for tax avoidance; and for many years—in fact, since 1917—these experts, some of them in official capacities, have been recommending that the Congress should deal with the situation.

Dr. Adams, who was economic adviser to the Treasury Department, and a very conservative economist, is one of those I have in mind when I make this statement. The same proposition, not in this identical form but the same in principle, passed the Senate of the United States in the session of 1924, and was eliminated in conference only because the conferees representing the Senate were not in sympathy with the action of the Senate itself.

Mr. President, I should like now to direct the attention of the Senate to the charts which are hanging on the wall. (See charts on pp. 9049, 9050.)

The purpose of the first chart is not to demonstrate the objective of the President's message, nor the objective of the bill as it passed the House, nor the objective of any of the amendments that may be pending or that may be offered. The purpose of this chart is to demonstrate the inequities in our present tax system; and, in order to make the demonstration, it has been assumed in preparing the charts that all the 1936 corporate earnings would be distributed.

Let me emphasize that this chart is not designed for the purpose of showing what is desired to be obtained by the House bill, or by the Senate bill, or by the amendment which is pending. The chart is to demonstrate the situation that confronts the people of the country insofar as this inequity in our tax system is concerned, which is brought about, as I pointed out, because of the difference between the flat corporate tax now paid upon all the earnings corporations retain and the tax in the high individual income-tax brackets on incomes of $50,000 or more.

With that statement I desire to point out that if the earnings in 1936 of all the corporations in America were distributed 100 percent, the income groups into which that additional income would fall would be as follows:

Three hundred and ten million dollars would go to those who are in the income group of $5,000 or less, $538,000,000 would go to the income group between $5,000 and $10,000, $600,000,000 would go to the income group between $10,000 and $30,000, $762,000,000 would go to income-tax payers who are in the $30,000 to $100,000 brackets, $918,000,000 would go into the hands of those who are in the $100,000 to $500,000 income-tax brackets, and $887,000,000 would go to those who today enjoy net taxable incomes of $500,000 or more.

I desire to point out also that this theoretical distribution of all the corporate earnings to be made in 1936 would result in bringing an additional 176,343 persons into the income-tax brackets below $30,000. On the other hand, only 14,959 additional persons would be brought into the income-tax brackets from $30,000 up. I also wish to point out, referring to the top category on the chart, incomes of $500,000 and over, that only 612 additional persons would be brought into that particular bracket.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin who is the authority for the figures that are being offered. Do they come from the Treasury experts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They were prepared by the Treasury, and are vouched for by Mr. McLeod, the chief actuary of the Treasury Department.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the authority upon which the Senator relies is the same authority which advised with the Committee on Finance in the preparation of the committee amendments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know on what experts the majority of the committee drew. I assume they drew on the experts of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, who do not determine policy, but who carry out orders.

These figures are sponsored by the actuarial division of the Treasury Department, and are predicated upon their exhaustive statistical information.

There has been some criticism of the statistical and actuarial work of the Treasury Department; but I wish to say that since I have had the honor to be a Member of the United States Senate, I have never questioned the integrity or the accuracy of the actuarial data furnished by the Treasury Department. This was true even of the time when the Department was dominated by Mr. Mellon, and was completely out of harmony and sympathy with every idea and theory I have about taxation. I wish to say, furthermore, that I have inquired of reputable actuaries in private life, and they vouch for the fact that Mr. McLeod is a man of the highest scientific and professional attainments.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the same actuaries naturally would find different answers to different problems. I take it that the Senate committee presented to the actuaries a different problem than the one which has been presented here by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The only part that the Treasury actuaries played in the Senate committee's work, or in connection with the amendment which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and I have offered, was to furnish figures as to the revenue which the Treasury estimated would be yielded if any particular proposed plan were enacted into law. The material upon which these charts are based is very exhaustive statistical information in the possession of the Treasury Department, and it has been broken down into this form after very thorough analysis and study.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I asked the Senator the question I did merely in order to ascertain the authority upon which he predicated his remarks and not in any way as reflecting on either the Senator or anyone who has supplied him with the information. I merely wished to have the Senate know the basis of the figures.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I made my statement because some of the witnesses before the committee attacked the soundness of the actuarial data; and after that was done, as I stated a moment ago, I took it upon myself to inquire of some of the best-known actuaries in this country who are in private occupations. All of them state that Mr. McLeod would not permit the policy of any administration or any Secretary of the Treasury or anyone else, in or out of the Government service, to influence him in furnishing statistical and actuarial information.

Mr. President, I do not wish to dwell too long on another aspect of the situation, and I fear that this chart [indicating] is perhaps not easily seen across the Chamber; but what it attempts to do—and I call the chart to the attention of any Senator who is interested in looking at it—is to give in greater detail, by income-tax brackets, the information that is shown in black and white on the chart to which I have been referring.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator has read figures from a chart which assumes that all earnings will be distributed in dividends. Does the Senator contend that the amendment he has offered will compel the distribution of all earnings in dividends?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have made no such statement, and no such inference is to be drawn from anything I have said. I made the very careful statement, before I even referred to the charts, that they were not intended for any purpose in connection with any of the amendments which have been offered, the Senate committee amendment, or the bill as it passed the House. I said that they were simply designed to show the extent of the opportunity for tax avoidance which exists, and which I think every Senator on the committee admits exists, between the higher individual income-tax brackets and the flat corporation-tax rates.

Mr. BYRD. The so-called tax evasion to which the Senator refers——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call it "avoidance."

Mr. BYRD. Well, avoidance—will not be remedied by the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama and myself were to be adopted, it would go a long way toward remedying it.

Mr. President, I now desire to point out briefly the difference between the proposal which has been offered by the Senator from Alabama and myself and that offered by the Senate committee. When this question first came before the Committee on Finance a great deal was said about the small corporation. The argument was made by some members of the committee, and later by witnesses who appeared before the committee, that the bill as it passed the House provided harsh treatment for small corporations; that it extended great favoritism to large corporations, and especially to those which had accumulated tremendous surpluses.

I do not think those contentions are sound; but assume that they are, for the sake of the argument. Protection of the small corporations was the premise from which a majority of the Finance Committee started out to provide a substitute for the corporation-tax features of the bill which passed the House. Yet the net result of their weeks of effort is the recommendation of a proposition by a majority of the committee which, if it is written into law, will tremendously penalize the great majority of the small corporations of the Nation and operate to improve the competitive advantage of the large corporations.

Personally I do not think the Congress should be concerned with the competitive situation, so far as the imposition of taxes is concerned. I am sure that if someone came forward with a naked proposition that we ought to classify corporation A, which is manufacturing a product, in one classification, and corporation B, which is a competitor, and manufacturing the same commodity, in another classification, every Senator would reject it; so I do not attach much significance to that phase of the argument. I only indicate that Senators should hesitate a long time, in the face of this acknowledged situation which exists so far as tax avoidance of those who are in the high individual income-tax brackets are concerned, before accepting, in lieu of an effort to correct the existing situation, a provision which would fall harshly upon the small corporations.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the position of the majority of the Finance Committee, with respect to the subject matter of the remarks now being made, touching the question of discrimination against small corporations, related particularly to a point which I am bringing forward in order that the Senator may discuss it. Take, for example, the small corporation which is in debt, and compare it with a large corporation which is not in debt. Is it not a fact that the surtax rates proposed would tend to prevent the small corporation from paying its debt, and therefore handicap it in the matter of competition with the larger corporation which does not owe?

Now, one other step. Take the small corporation which has no surplus, and compare it with a large corporation which does have a surplus. Is it not true that the surtax rates proposed in the pending amendment would tend to prevent the small corporation from acquiring a surplus, and not affect the right of the large corporation to hold its surplus, and if that be so, would not that be a very bad public policy, in that it would inure greatly to the advantage of the large corporation and very greatly to the disadvantage of the small corporation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator has given me a hatful of questions all at one time. I will try to remember them and answer them seriatim.

First, the Senator asked me whether a small corporation in debt would not be put at a competitive disadvantage with a large corporation which was not in debt under the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. BAILEY. Under the pending amendment, the Black-La Follette amendment, not under the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Since I mentioned the House bill, I desire to point out that the House attempted to meet the situation by providing a cushion provision as to corporate indebtedness.

The amendment which we have offered will enable small corporations which are in debt, insofar as is possible for a small corporation in such circumstances, to compete with large corporations which are not in debt. Obviously we cannot remedy the inherent advantage which a great corporation has over a small one, unless we are willing to use the tax mechanism to break up large corporations; and no one has made any such suggestion as that in connection with the pending bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, on that point——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just let me answer the Senator's questions which I have in mind now, and then I shall be glad to yield to him.

It all depends on what the Senator means by a "small corporation." When we first started discussing this question in the committee, the corporations I heard about were the really small ones. Now the small corporations I hear about are those which have a million dollars or more of net corporate income, and that is statutory net income, after all the liberal deductions which are permitted by the existing income-tax law have been made.

Under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and myself, in the first place, all corporations in the United States making $15,000 or less of statutory net income would not be affected by the tax provided in the amendment at all, and that means 220,000 of the corporations which are operating in this country today.

In the second place, corporations having a larger statutory net income than $15,000 a year under our proposal would likewise be privileged to take $15,000 out of their adjusted net income, or their statutory net income, before any tax on undistributed net income would apply, and then they would be permitted to take off another slice of 20 percent before any such tax would apply.

I contend, therefore, that we give the small corporation a better advantage than does the Senate committee bill, and I do not think any amount of argument can disprove that fact.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One at a time; let me answer the questions which have been asked before any more pile up.

The Senator from North Carolina asked me another question, and I shall attempt to answer it as I recall it, and if I have not remembered the Senator's question correctly, I hope he will inform me. I think the Senator asked me whether the amendment now pending would not work a great hardship against a small corporation which is attempting to compete with a large one which has accumulated a huge surplus.

Mr. President, there is no way on earth that I know of by which to remedy that inherent situation.

No lawyer has come forward with any proposition whereby we could tax the surpluses accumulated in the past. All the lawyers of whom I know have said that is constitutionally impossible. Under the amendment which we have offered I contend that the small corporation, insofar as the imposition of tax is concerned, would be in a better position to compete with the large corporation than it would be under the bill sponsored by the majority of the committee, because the bill proposed by the majority jacks up the flat tax rate 3 percent in every bracket, without regard to the situation of the corporations, so far as any competitive factors growing out of largeness and smallness are concerned. The committee provision has only one cushion, and that is the one providing for retention of income in the case of existing written contracts not to pay dividends. Therefore the committee bill hits the small corporations, about which we have heard so much, squarely between the eyes, because it jacks up their flat corporation tax rate 3 percent in every bracket.

Mr. COUZENS. That would be a 20-percent raise.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true. I may say that a 3-percent raise in actual tax load is a 20-percent increase in the percentage of payment. I do not criticize any Senator defending and supporting the committee's bill, or who believes that bill is better than the proposition which we put forward; but I think that after deliberate, mature consideration no person can come to the conclusion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama and myself does not provide very much more generously for the small corporation than does the committee bill.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The Senator has prepared a chart relative to a $100,000 corporation. If I am correct, in the case of a $100,000 corporation which makes a 100-percent distribution of income, the tax would be $14,420. If by reason of debt or by reason of necessity for accumulating a liquid surplus there is nothing distributed, the tax on such a $100,000 corporation would be $28,763. In other words, the corporation which is obliged to pay its debt and accumulate a surplus has to pay twice as much as the corporation which pays out all of its income in dividends.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, let us compare that situation with the picture presented by the bill of the majority of the committee. I wish first to reemphasize—and I hope Senators will appreciate the significance of the statement—that statutory net income is not the ordinary kind of net income that one thinks of when he receives a statement from a corporation or when it is printed in newspapers. This country is more generous and liberal in its allowable deductions before arriving at statutory net income than is any other country of which I know that makes use of the income tax. The difference between the bill which the Senator from Virginia is supporting and the amendment which I am supporting on a 100-percent retention of statutory net income is a difference of some $5,000 in tax. So he is taking the worst possible situation, namely, that of a corporation which would not pay out a nickel in dividends, and yet from such a corporation the amendment would take only about $5,000 more in tax than would the committee's bill.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I again interrupt the Senator at that point? The Senator, I think, understands that under the plan he advocates there is a 100 percent difference in tax on a corporation earning $100,000 that pays out everything, as compared to one paying out nothing. Under the bill advocated by the Senate Finance Committee there is a difference of only 33 percent between the corporation that pays out everything and the corporation that is unable to pay out anything.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am afraid the Senator from Virginia is leading the Senate into the same difficulty into which I think the committee fell. The committee began looking at percentages of tax. It began stating the tax in the form of percentages instead of looking to see what the corporation was going to pay when it made out its check to the Treasury of the United States.

Corporations and individuals in this country do not care what the percentage of tax may be. What they are concerned with is the amount of money they have to pay into the Treasury. Under the Senator's proposition, which is the committee's bill, in the case of 100-percent retention, that is, not a dollar of dividends paid, there is imposed a tax of $23,219.20 and our proposal would levy a tax of $28,763, or a difference of some $5,000.

Furthermore, I should like to point out another thing which I had not intended to discuss at this point, but I think it is one of the important features of the pending bill. It is recognized that under the measure now pending before the Senate if a corporation is in the situation to which the Senator from Virginia makes reference, and desires to retain every dollar of its statutory net income for the purpose of meeting its debts, or for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of business, or of further expansion and development, it is in a position to do so without paying an additional penny of tax, if it will only pay out to its stockholders dividends which the Supreme Court in a recent decision has indicated are taxable in that form in the hands of the individual. So I think that all the talk about the difficulty confronting corporations under any one of these tax propositions is unjustified.

On what theory can anyone argue that a corporation that desires to retain 100 percent of its statutory net income should not give to the stockholders who own it, evidences of that statutory net income? Each and every one of them owns his proportionate share of the earnings according to the stock held in the corporation.

Mr. President, from much of the argument advanced concerning this question one would think that a corporation was a separate entity, floating in midair like Mohammed's coffin; that it was not connected with individuals, and that, too, despite the fact, that the Supreme Court of the United States has said that a corporation is a person and entitled to all the rights and privileges which extend to a person. A corporation is a device whereby a group of people come together to do something jointly which they feel they can do better through that instrumentality than they can by a partnership or by operating severally and not in cooperation with each other.

Corporation A, let us say, has $100,000 of statutory net income. Let us say it is in debt up to its eyebrows. If it wanted to retain that statutory net income it could under the House bill, the Senate committee bill and our amendment, retain every dollar of it, and not pay any additional tax in the form of an undistributed-profits tax. The corporation would just pay out to its stockholders evidences of the accumulation of such net earnings in a form which would be taxable under the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Of course, the individual stockholders would have to include the dividend in their income. But why should they not? Will some one tell me wherein there is any theoretical difference between the obligation and the liability of a dollar of profit made by a cooperative enterprise through a corporation to pay its just and fair share of the burdens of Government, including the cost of war and depression, and the similar obligation of a dollar of individual net income flowing into the hands of an individual citizen of the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I do not like to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to interrupt the Senator much more. I was calling attention to the discrimination as between a debtor corporation and a nondebtor corporation. The debtor corporation which makes $100,000 this year and applies the money to its debts would have to pay to the Government $28,763.26 under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Wisconsin. These are the Treasury statistics. I got them from Mr. Parker, I should say.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; they are the same ones that we have.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. But a nondebtor corporation making $100,000 this year and declaring it out in dividends would have to pay nothing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; not nothing. It would pay $14,400.

Mr. BAILEY. It would pay nothing except the normal tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would pay the normal tax.

Mr. BAILEY. However, it would pay nothing by way of supertax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. All right. Your supertax is 30 percent in the higher brackets. There is the penalty. Can the Senator square his argument with public policy in so arranging his tax proposal that the debtor corporation is penalized for paying its debts while the nondebtor corporation is free from tax, and on the same principle the corporation with no surplus would have to pay a tax in order to accumulate a surplus; and when its income was carried to surplus, and not paid out, it would have to pay a tax? But the corporation on the other side that has a surplus and can afford to pay out its profits pays nothing. In all seriousness I am going to say to the Senator that is not unjustified argument. That is a serious question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to withdraw any inference that the arguments of any Senator were unjustified. I credit every Senator with the same or with greater ability than I have. All I was referring to was the testimony by witnesses before the committee and to the arguments in the newspapers, which would seem to indicate that the country was on fire with the idea that the principle of taxing undistributed profits involved a terrific amount of difficulty for corporations that were in debt, and small corporations.

After listening to all the arguments, after reading all the propaganda, after listening to all the witnesses, and after making the best impartial study of which I am capable, I wish to say that the arguments did not make any impression upon my mind. I say that the apprehension is predicated upon an erroneous assumption. Each corporation in such a situation can pay out stock dividends which will be taxable. We will have taken a great stride forward when we make certain that the stockholders of corporations shall get either evidences of their additional share in corporation profits in the form of taxable stock dividends or cash dividends.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say to the Senator that I knew he meant no offense and none of us took offense. I was simply repeating his word.

I wish to tell the Senator further that the whole Senate is against him in one judgment he rendered just now, to the effect that he thought every Senator here was superior to himself. I am going to tell him that there is no Senator here who is superior to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate very much what the Senator says.

Mr. BAILEY. And I know that is the sentiment of the whole Senate.

Now, to come back to our point—and with this I am going to be satisfied—the Senator is really contending that a tax law which makes it difficult for a corporation to pay its debts does not really discriminate against such debtor corporation in favor of the nondebtor corporation, and is contending further that a tax law which makes it difficult for a corporation which has no surplus to acquire a surplus does not discriminate against that corporation in favor of one that has a surplus. There is where we divide; but I respect the Senator's judgment; and I think I have stated the case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree with the Senator. So long as a corporation is in a position where it can retain every dollar of its statutory net income by paying out a stock dividend in such a form that it will be taxable in the hands of individual stockholders it cannot be contended that it is in a difficult situation so far as its debts, so far as the exigencies of business, and so far as the expansion of the business are concerned. In my opinion, it is a great step forward.

In the second place, I may say, in answer to the Senator from North Carolina, that I have heard much about corporations that have accumulated huge surpluses. Of course they have accumulated them; they have accumulated them under a tax system such as we have today; and, if nothing is done to change that system, the same corporations will go on accumulating greater and greater surpluses until we will have a situation not such as we had in 1933 when 67 corporations had one-third of the total corporate income of the United States, but we will have a fewer number of corporations and we will find them with a very much larger slice of the corporate income every year.

While we cannot pass retroactive legislation, and go back to the point where we can tax the accumulations of the past, at least we can so provide as to the future that corporations shall not be permitted to continue to accumulate vast surpluses without paying their just share of the taxes, and to that extent we can make it easier for small corporations to compete with them. If this amendment is adopted, new enterprises will spring up in this country and compete with the older and larger institutions that have lined their coffers with fat surpluses without paying anything but a flat tax to the Government while they were doing it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to add a suggestion to what the Senator from Wisconsin has said in response to the Senator from North Carolina. If there is discrimination such as the Senator mentions, the identical discrimination exists in the Senate committee bill except in an exaggerated form as to small corporations, because the discrimination which he mentions applies to all corporations, while ours completely exempts every corporation making $15,000 profit. The figures also show that the corporation making practically up to $50,000 pays a smaller surplus tax under our amendment than under the committee amendment.

Furthermore, all this talk about the $100,000 corporations really refers to corporations with profits of $100,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. So that when we speak of corporations having profits of $100,000 we really have reference to million-dollar corporations. What I wanted to make clear was that, so far as discriminating against the small corporation is concerned, there is no such discrimination in our amendment, because by it the small corporations are expressly exempted up to $15,000 and also on an additional $20,000. They have to get up to where they make as much as $50,000 profit before the tax in our amendment, even in the higher brackets, equals the tax under the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator was referring to the small corporation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not start that discussion. It was started by the majority of the committee when we first saw the bill.

Mr. GERRY. I thought it was started by the Treasury. They talked about the small corporations. There is only one thing I want to say as to that, and that is that when they refer to the small corporation they refer to a corporation with a small income.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is clear.

Mr. GERRY. Of course, we have tremendously large corporations that for some time have had no income, although I know they do not constitute the majority of cases.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think I made any statement in which I have not made it plain that I referred to small corporations with small net incomes.

Of course, there may be large corporations with small net incomes.

Mr. GERRY. Yes; or losing money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; losing money, because the Congress and the Treasury Department have been so liberal in the deductions allowed for depreciation, bad debts, and other things, that there are some large corporations in this country which show a comparatively small statutory income. The fact remains however, as I think everyone will concede, that usually the very small corporation, with small earnings, is one which actually has a small capitalization.

Mr. GERRY. That is usually the case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; of course it is.

Mr. GERRY. But, if the Senator will permit me, he will remember that there appeared before the committee a witness who at one time I think was an officer of a corporation which had very large earnings and which paid out practically all its surplus with the result that that corporation is now in the hands of a receiver; the banks are really controlling it, because the only way they can keep the corporation going is by their ability to borrow, and to try now to accumulate a surplus in the hope of getting it on its feet.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just one statement in answer to that suggestion. There is no way in the world, Mr. President, to devise a tax system which will protect from bad management the investment of individuals who take stock in corporations. No tax system can be devised that will prevent some people who control huge corporate surpluses from using them for unsocial purposes. During the so-called boom one of the great sources of credit that helped to increase the forced draft under the boiling cauldron of the stock market and helped to carry that market up to the point where when it collapsed it shook the entire economic foundation of these United States, was the accumulation of corporate surpluses, which were loaned on call in New York, especially when call money could obtain 15, 18, or 20 percent. Corporate surpluses went into pools, which were sometimes organized in the very stock of the corporation from which the surplus came. Boards of directors and officers who were receiving huge salaries presumably for devoting their integrity, their intelligence, and their experience to the safe management of the collected funds of their stockholders, were using the corporate surpluses to organize pools in the stocks of their corporations and were manipulating the prices.

The insiders of these pools got in at the bottom price and sold out at the top, dumping fabulously inflated stock values into the hands of unsuspecting investors. Many able economists attribute some of the excesses of the boom and inflationary period to the accumulation of large corporate surpluses. More than $8,000,000,000 came into the stock market in 1929 from sources outside of the Federal Reserve System. One-half of the $16,000,000,000 used in that wild orgy of speculation came from corporate surpluses and from other sources.

All during that period we had a great deal of lip service from the management of the corporations which had these huge surpluses, to the effect that they believed wages should be increased so that the buying power of the public could keep step with our ever-increasing capacity to turn out manufactured products; but it was only lip service. To a large extent they did not put their theories into operation, for, as a matter of fact, real wages, measured in the terms of what a man or a woman could produce in a day's work at a machine, were falling from 1921 to 1929, with the exception of two industries, transportation and construction.

Let us not proceed on the theory that all corporate surpluses are beneficial either to the corporations themselves which accumulate them, or to the wage earners, or to the public in general.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I think it was clearly demonstrated before the committee by a Treasury witness that even during the depression the great proportion of the corporate surpluses were not used for the purposes for which it was claimed they were used. It was claimed they were used to provide employment and carry men upon pay rolls, but the figures given the committee tell a contrary story. I quote from Mr. Haas:

> During the 3 years, 1931–33, inclusive, the aggregate net losses after taxes of those nonfinancial corporations that reported no net income amounted to $12,100,000,000; but $9,500,000,000 of this aggregate deficit, or 78 percent, represented valuation deductions, primarily, rather than cash operating disbursements in excess of cash receipts. It should be borne in mind, moreover, that a corporation is included in the deficit group only in those years in which it reports no net income; so that the figures that I have just cited include the losses of all corporations during their worst years of the depression, and do not include their net income, if any, in other years of the depression.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be put in the position of saying I am opposed to the accumulation of reasonable corporate reserves. I am not. It would not be prohibited under our amendment. As a matter of fact, it would not even be prohibited under the bill as it passed the House. But if corporations desired to retain their profits under the terms of the bill as it passed the House to a more drastic extent, under our proposal to a much less extent, or even under the Finance Committee proposal to a small extent, they would have to pay a tax upon the dollars of net statutory income which they accumulated from year to year.

I again ask, Mr. President, why should a dollar in the form of net income made by a corporation be permitted to pay a very low flat tax when, if that dollar of corporate income were paid out in the form of dividends, it would have to pay a very high tax in the hands of the individual? Theoretically I can see no reason why dollars which are made in profits and which remain in the hands of corporations should not pay their fair proportionate share of the revenue which the Government requires, just as we ask every individual to pay upon every dollar of net taxable income which he receives.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I am in full sympathy with the objective sought by the Senator from Wisconsin, but I am still unable to understand his point with reference to adverse discriminations. I invite his attention to a manufacturing concern making $100,000 of net income. It is in debt. It applies $100,000 to its debt. Under the Senator's plan it would pay the Government $28,763.20 taxes. Against that is a similar corporation with $100,000 of net income, which has a surplus and therefore can pay out its net income in dividends, and its tax is only $17,440. There is a difference of $11,300 in favor of the nondebtor corporation and against the debtor corporation. Is not that discrimination and is not that a handicap?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I contend it is not, because the corporation which is in debt can retain every dollar of its net taxable income. It can pay out taxable stock dividends to its stockholders and retain every dollar of money that it has made that year. How can that be any discrimination? How can it be a hardship to anybody, either the corporation or the individual stockholder? Is it not just that the individual stockholders of the corporation should take up the earnings in their income taxes, or else that the corporation should pay something to the Government out of the money it makes each year?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Let us suppose the same corporation, which is making $100,000 net income, had a surplus and that it can borrow money on it and can follow the law and issue stock dividends. Is it not discrimination for the Senate Finance Committee to make that poor, struggling, debt-ridden corporation pay $17,440 as against $14,440, as would be required under our proposal? Is it not also a terrible thing for the Finance Committee to require such corporation to pay $19,000 as against $14,000 under our proposal?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Furthermore I emphasize again that we are talking about statutory net income and not about the capitalization of corporations, because, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama, when a corporation has $100,000 of statutory net income, with all the liberal deductions provided in our income-tax system, it is, generally speaking, a big corporation so far as its capitalization is concerned.

Let us take a corporation with $40,000 statutory net income and compare its treatment under the Finance Committee proposal and under our pending proposal. If the corporation distributed no dividends at all, under the Senate Finance Committee proposal it would pay $8,975.20 and under the proposal we have submitted it would pay $8,543.20. If it distributed all of its statutory net income, under the Finance Committee proposal it would pay $6,640 whereas under the proposal we have submitted it would pay only $5,440. So in the case of a corporation with $40,000 of net statutory income, or with less, our proposal would impose a smaller tax than would the Finance Committee's proposal.

In addition to that, we do not ask for a dollar of increased taxes from 90 percent of the corporations in the United States, because 90 percent of them make $15,000 or less statutory net income every year, and under our proposal they would be exempt from the undistributed-profits tax, while under the Finance Committee proposal they would not be exempt.

Under the Finance Committee's proposal, a tax of 7 percent would be levied upon the undistributed profits of struggling corporations that the majority of the committee keep talking about just as huge corporations would pay 7 percent upon their undistributed profits and yet the majority of the committee contend that they are trying to remedy the competitive situation which exists between huge aggregations of corporate capital and small, struggling enterprises.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the able Senator from Wisconsin make clear to me what he means by the expression "statutory net income" as distinguished from net income after paying the expenses of any business?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the distinction I was trying to make is that net income as it appears in the financial statement of a corporation may be something very different from the statutory net income which appears on its income-tax return, for the simple reason that very liberal deductions are allowed under our income-tax law before arriving at a corporation's statutory net income upon which the tax is predicated. It is allowed to take out very liberal and generous items for depreciation. It takes out its bad debts. It takes out interest on Government bonds which it owns. It takes out a myriad of exemptions and deductions before the Government determines that it has any net income to be taxed. So I emphasize and repeat that a corporation which has $100,000 of statutory net income in its coffers at the end of the year, generally speaking, is a pretty husky and lusty corporation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator at that point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In his discussion of the proposed amendment, has the Senator pointed out the fact that according to the reports compiled by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, in 1932, 392,000 corporations filed returns showing assets of about $280,000,000,000; and of those 392,000 corporations, 618 corporations controlled more than 53 percent of all the assets?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate those figures very much because they help to drive home the argument I am attempting to make.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thought they might.

Let me call the attention of the Senator also to the fact that the same source shows that in 1932, 73,291 corporations in the United States had net incomes. Of that number, 201, or less than one-half of 1 percent, reported more than half of all the income; and 9,099 corporations having assets of more than $500,000 had almost 90 percent of all the income of all the corporations in the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator's figures tell the story. They buttress the position taken by the President in his message when he asked the Congress to consider this principle of taxation.

Now, I desire to make reference to a statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in opening the debate upon this section of the bill.

The Senator from Georgia stated, as I understood him, that the only source of corporate expansion was either reserves in the hands of corporations or savings in the hands of individuals. Insofar as the future is concerned, there are adequate and ample resources upon which to draw for the legitimate expansion and development of industry.

In 1929 the total daily average member banks' reserve balance was $2,358,000,000. This was the basis upon which credit could be pyramided 10 times, as every Senator knows, under the Federal Reserve Act, so that there were potential credit resources of $23,580,000,000 in 1929; and that credit carried the transactions of the largest economic operations in the history of the country, with the possible exception of the war.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Pardon me just a moment. Let me finish, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Today, Mr. President, the total daily average member banks' reserve balance is $5,638,000,000, upon which could be pyramided, if it were needed, credit of $56,380,000,000. In other words, we have more idle, unemployed dollars and credit in the United States today than at any previous time in all the history of the Republic. So I have no fear that if the proposition we have suggested were accepted, and a genuine attempt were made to meet this problem of tax avoidance, there would not be ample credit resources available for the conduct and for the expansion of business.

Now I am glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator explain how the money is to be gotten out of the banks unless it can be paid back, and unless the prospective borrower can make a credit statement that the bank will regard as entitling him to credit. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the credit statement does not show savings or surplus, or at least the ability to accumulate it, I do not know of any bank in this country that would make a loan to a corporation for any purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My answer to the Senator is the same answer I have made to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], that under all these measures—under the House bill, under the Senate committee bill, and under this amendment—any corporation desiring to retain 100 percent of its statutory net income free from increased tax may do so by paying out to its stockholders a dividend which is taxable under the sixteenth amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, that brings up a matter which it seems to me the Senator ought to be able to see, namely, that then there would be created in this country a vast number of corporations with nothing in the world but watered stock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree with the Senator that it is water.

Mr. GEORGE. I should not expect the Senator to agree, but that is the logic of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree it is logical.

Mr. GEORGE. If a corporation is going to keep money that it needs to meet an indebtedness and yet issue a certificate of indebtedness in the form of stock, whatever kind of stock may be issued, it is obvious that it is nothing but water; and I think that suggestion cannot commend itself to any business mind anywhere.

In addition to that, let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that if A is the owner of a small block of stock in a corporation and it is all the property A has, and he is entitled to three or four thousand dollars of dividend, and in place of a dividend he receives a piece of paper, and he has to go to a bank and borrow the money to pay the tax upon the piece of paper he receives, the more dividends of that kind he receives the worse off he will be; and if the practice should be pursued, which is suggested by those who offer this substitute, of issuing a stock certificate for a dividend and letting the corporation keep whatever money or whatever property it has, certainly that policy would bring stocks into such a condition upon the open market as that they would become practically worthless.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree with the statements made by the Senator from Georgia.

In the first place, I do not agree that a stock dividend paid out to represent an adjusted net income represents water. In proportion, it represents the actual profits which the collective enterprise, operating through the corporate entity, has made on behalf of its stockholders.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but the purpose of issuing the dividend is to take the money out of the corporation and pay it out on a debt, so there is nothing left.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment. Let me answer the Senator's questions one at a time. I cannot answer them all at once.

Mr. GEORGE. If it is going to trouble him at all, I will withdraw it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does not trouble me a particle, but I desire a chance to answer one question before I am interrupted with another.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I shall not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not object to being interrupted, but I should like to have a chance to answer; that is all.

Mr. President, one of the great difficulties growing out of the economic crisis was the fact that so much of the corporation indebtedness was represented in the form of an excessive proportion of bonds as against stocks; and when the depression came on, stockholders in many instances were in a position where they could not get any dividends, but the bondholders were in a position to take the assets of the corporation under foreclosure or a receivership. If the enactment of this measure would result in reducing some of the excessive bonded indebtedness of our industrial corporations, and if in its stead there were in the hands of individuals stocks which represented claims upon the actual earnings of the corporation, our corporate structure would be much sounder than it is today. The sooner this happens, the better off we shall be. In another major economic crisis with the proportion of bonded indebtedness the corporations have today the liquid claims upon the actual physical properties of the mechanisms of production in this country will be so gigantic that if those claims are enforced it will paralyze our economic life.

Increase in the value of stocks, as they are held in the hands of individuals, is due largely to the earnings of corporations. If the corporation is not a profitable enterprise, of course the stock is bound to go down.

Mr. President, the issue involved in our amendment is very plain. It is a question of whether there is a desire to lay the additional tax burden upon those who have enjoyed the greatest increased income, namely, those who hold the claims upon corporation profits.

Senators must say by their votes whether they are willing to plug up the opportunity for tax avoidance which is presented under the existing law, and which is intensified and will be continued under the Senate committee proposal if it shall be enacted.

So far as I am concerned, there is only one side to this controversy which will serve the public interest.

Steps must be taken to remedy the acknowledged injustice and inequity in our present income-tax system. The loophole which is available to those in the higher income-tax brackets, who wish to avoid the payment of their fair share of taxes, must be closed.

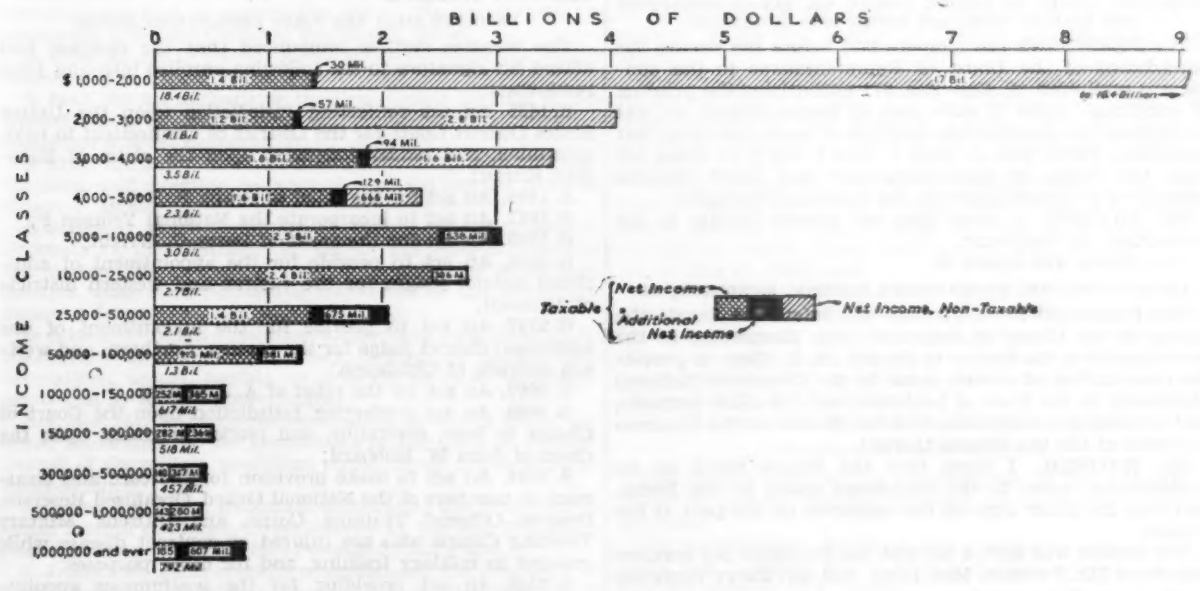
This proposal may not be enacted into law at this session, but when the people of the country come to understand the issue there will be no way in the world of preventing its being written into law in order that our tax system may once more be made equitable and just. The people will demand a system under which the taxes, whatever they may be, will be levied upon our citizens and upon our corporations in such a way that taxes will be levied and collected in accordance with ability to pay.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may incorporate in my remarks an illustration found on page 27 of the hearings of the Committee on Finance, indicating additions to taxable incomes of individuals, and another chart indicating distribution of individual net incomes.



There being no objection, the charts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment which has been under discussion for some time presents a large and material issue. I have been very much impressed with the statements and arguments which have been made in behalf of the amendment, and, as I think is pretty well known, I am in sympathy with the objects of the amendment. I think it more nearly conforms to the President's viewpoint than the provision reported by the Senate committee, and I am sure that the President looks upon it with favor.

In view of the conditions under which the amendment is being considered, the time approaching for the end of the session, the necessity for taking action on the bill, and the wisdom, as it seems to me, of arranging to get it into conference as speedily as practicable, I take the liberty of suggesting to the authors of the amendment that, if they can see their way to do so, they withdraw the amendment, leaving the Senate free to proceed to a speedy vote on the bill.

The latitude which will be allowed the conferees will be very broad in considering the provisions of the bill as it passed the House and those which are in the Senate committee amendments, and an opportunity will be presented to the conferees to work out a satisfactory adjustment. I believe it will have to be done in that way.

I make the suggestion for such consideration and action as the Senators who are the authors of the amendment may deem proper.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, this matter has been suggested to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and myself. So far as I am personally concerned, it is my intention to vote against the bill if it shall be passed without this amendment in it. However, with the situation as it has developed, with a large number of Senators going away, and with the desire on the part of the entire Senate, so far as I know, to dispose of all the business of the session as rapidly as possible; and in view of the further fact that if the bill shall pass and go to conference it must come back to this body for discussion of any agreement which may be reached, the Senator from Wisconsin and myself, after full consideration, have reached the conclusion that the best procedure for us to follow in order that we may obtain our objective is to accede to the suggestion which has been made.

Therefore, with the consent of my colleague, the Senator from Wisconsin, and on account of the reasons I have stated, we withdraw the amendment at this time. We do so with the hope that the full matter may go to conference, and with the statement, so far as I am personally concerned, that I am unalterably and irrevocably opposed to the pending bill in its present form, whether it may be so voted by the Senate or may be hereafter presented in this form.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I am a little disappointed in the apparent trend of the proposed legislation, but I can fully appreciate, I am sure, the temper and the feeling of the Senate and the feeling of the Senate leadership. I shall offer no objection to the apparent decision of the authors of the pending amendment; but we have arrived at a place where I feel it necessary to make clear at least my own position.

I have almost unhesitatingly, under the lash of the need of distressed people, voted for relief measures since I first became a Member of the Congress. I myself feel that it is cowardly to vote with regularity for relief measures and be at all reluctant to vote for tax measures. But if the pending amendment is withdrawn, and I am denied a chance to express my feelings as to the kind of tax bill I think should be written, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill, and I do not like to do that.

During the last session of the Congress, when proposals as to the tax bill then pending were made by the able Senator from Wisconsin, which went somewhat further than the majority of the Members of the Senate cared to go, I was very glad to vote for those proposals, because I share the views the Senator has so ably expressed this afternoon concerning the need for taxes in a time such as the present.

It so happens, Mr. President, that I come from an industrial State, sometimes referred to as a conservative State, understood generally to be a heavy taxpaying State. During the course of the discussion of the pending tax measure, both in the House and while it was under consideration by the Finance Committee of the Senate, like every other Member of this body, I received many communications from my State. Among them were some from the heads of large corporations urging me to vote against the tax bill. Now, because I am about to comply with that request, I feel it necessary to make clear for the RECORD the reason why I shall so vote. I am not going to vote against the bill because of that particular plea, or because it is necessarily a generally oppressive tax bill, but because it is an oppressive bill, in my humble opinion, for the reasons which have been pointed out by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Wisconsin. I am hopeful that the opinion expressed by the authors of the amendment will prevail in conference. It would be too late for me then to make my position clear if I should vote for the bill without the amendment.

I regret to consume any of the time of the Senate during the closing hours of its session, but I felt it necessary to make clear my position and to state my reason for voting against the tax bill after having, with almost complete regularity, voted for relief expenditures.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I consider that the amendment involves a policy of such fundamental importance to the Government at the present time in connection with the spending of public funds that Congress should act upon it. I listened with a great deal of interest and care to the statement of the Senators from Wisconsin and Alabama. From the standpoint of economics and Government finance, I consider this one of the most fundamentally important issues I have heard discussed since I came to the Senate.

We are here now dealing with a policy that was pursued until the depression. We are continuing that policy of concentrating the wealth of the country, the income of the country, in a few individuals and a few corporations, individuals and corporations which enjoy the privilege of charging monopolistic prices, taxing the people through high prices, gathering in the income of the people, concentrating the wealth of the country into fewer and fewer hands.

I think it is safe to say that, with the exception of the war, monopoly has never in the history of this country had its feet so deep in the trough as it has now. The basic industries which compose the few corporations in the very highest income backets are the ones that are still milking and continuing to milk the incomes of the country, not only those of the individuals but the taxpayers' money that is being spent on public works and for relief. In every avenue of Government expenditure these interests are collecting profits. The average man gets very little out of the Government's expenditures. The great industries, such as steel, cement, and others, which furnish the basic construction materials of this country, are monopolizing the Government expenditures, and they ought to pay back more than they have paid in the past. They are the ones who are really getting the benefit of Government expenditures. Take, for instance, the cement industry in connection with the expenditure of Government funds for development of roads and dam construction. In 1928 cement was sold in the Lehigh Valley for $1.28 a barrel. Now it is sold for $1.55. At the same time, productivity of labor in the industry is now 37 percent greater than it was in 1928. Labor produces 37 percent more than it did in 1928. The cement industry gets the benefit of that extra productivity of labor. It gets the benefit not only of that increased productivity but it gets the benefit of the increased price from $1.28 to $1.55 a barrel for cement. The industry charges the same price to Government work and to Government contractors whether they sell 1 barrel or 300,000 barrels.

In appearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission the steel industry as well as the cement industry admitted that 50 percent of their production was due to Government expenditures—the taxpayers' money; and when asked what would happen to production if Government expenditures should cease, they said, "Of course, that would be bad for all of us." But they object to paying taxes.

Under this monopolistic form of industry permitted, or, at least, not interfered with, by the Government, the people are, by reason of high prices, being robbed of their income. Whatever is paid out for relief and to feed the workers and to pay for the materials used to build relief structures is expended largely on commodities produced by monopolistic industry. Under this practice we have the same policy as was pursued by the sovereign of a country in former days when he issued letters of marque to pirates to go out upon the high seas and rob. So long as the pirate returned a part of what he stole to the sovereign he was protected by him whenever he returned to the land of the sovereign who gave him his letter of marque. Now we permit these monopolistic industries to go out and rob the people and we charge as a license fee something in the form of an income tax. But we get very little tax. We get very little in proportion to what they take; and we ought to have more, Mr. President, in order to sustain the relief rolls and the public-works program that is under way. Unless we get enough to keep that work going, the public expenditures are going to break the National Treasury. When you keep paying out you have got to take something in, and where shall you collect it except from those who are benefited by public expenditures—those who collect it from the Treasury, in the first place, and then from the pockets of the people? Unless something is done to get this money back into the Treasury, we are going to have the Treasury empty.

It does not do to assuage our conscience with the statement that we are going to take it away from these people after they are dead by an inheritance tax or an estate tax. We have got to take it away from them now. The policy which has been pursued of making vast public expenditures must necessarily be followed by a policy of heavy taxation. The time is coming when payment has got to be made, and the time to begin paying is now.

It is useless to attempt to fool ourselves that we can go on spending money without collecting it back in some way or another, and the sooner we begin collecting it the sooner we shall get rid of the illusion that we do not have to pay. If we are to continue the present program, we must take in enough to pay the bill.

It is poor consolation for the conscience to say that we will get it back in high income taxes. When we permit the basic industries and large corporations to charge the average man the prices they are charging now, we leave very little left of what is produced. I venture to say the average man has less, or at least not any more, now than he had in his pocket when the national income was being drained under the Coolidge and the Hoover administrations. The average man is not permitted to keep more of his income now than he did then, and we are going to have another explosion like that which occurred as a result of the policies which started credit inflation during the war under Wilson and then under Harding, under Coolidge, and under Hoover. If we continue along that line and do not take something from those who make exorbitant profits, and pay it back to the people who have been impoverished by high prices, we shall continue a policy under which the people are first impoverished to enrich a few monopolistic corporations, who pay in turn some money to the Government so that we can continue to give a dole. Under that system we put the cart before the horse; we have a system under which the Government supports the people instead of a Government supported by the people. And as that policy continues the time will come when the candidate for public office will get the most votes who will offer the biggest and the best dole. That kind of a system would destroy any kind of a government in the world. So I regret very much that the amendment has been withdrawn. I think the National Congress should have entered upon the plan 2 or 3 years ago of increasing income taxes as expenditures were increased in order to bring home to the American people the fact that, no matter how much money we spend, we have got to pay. If we postpone the day of payment, and if we continue the expansion of credit, we may see the time come when the dollar will go to 50, 30, or 25 cents in purchasing power.

So I say, in my opinion, there is a policy involved here of Government finances that is so fundamental that the Congress cannot afford to shut its eyes to its importance and to the necessity, at the earliest possible moment, of putting into effect higher and higher taxes in order to replenish the Treasury.

Mr. ADAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me so that I may ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The committee has a number of amendments. I understand the Senator from Colorado desires to offer an amendment. Will he allow us to dispose first of the committee amendments?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly; but it was my purpose to offer an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator's request.

Mr. KING. I asked the Senator from Colorado if he intended to offer an amendment, and he indicated his purpose to do so. I then suggested that the committee had a number of amendments to offer, and I asked that the committee amendments be first disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say a word on the amendment that is pending, as I understand.

Mr. KING. There is no amendment pending. The amendment that was pending has been withdrawn.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I should like to say a word on the amendment that has been withdrawn.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has stated that the committee has amendments it desires to offer, and I yielded in order that that might be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I recognize that; I am not contending with the Senator; but I understood that he was going to withhold his amendment in order that something else might be done. If that is so, I want to occupy the floor for a few moments. I will wait, however, until the Senator has concluded.

Mr. ADAMS. I offer an amendment and ask that its consideration may be deferred if that is the desire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 31, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words—

(a) and minus all portions of such adjusted net income expended or contracted to be expended during the taxable year for machinery, improvements, equipment, and buildings devoted or intended and designed to be devoted to the extension, development, or maintenance of the business of the corporation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I recall, the understanding at the outset was that the committee amendments were to be disposed of and then individual amendments should be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is to a committee amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. There is a pending committee amendment, however, on page 30, for which an amendment in the nature of a substitute was offered, but the author of the proposed substitute has expressed a desire or a willingness to withdraw it, and it has been formally withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. In the ordinary procedure on the bill the clerk will state the committee amendment, and then it will be in order to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. The Chair is informed that the Senate has not reached the committee amendment which the Senator from Colorado proposes to amend. The clerk will report the amendment of the committee now pending.

Upon normal-tax net incomes not in excess of $2,000, 15½ percent.

$310 upon normal-tax net incomes of $2,000; and upon normal-tax net incomes in excess of $2,000 and not in excess of $15,000, 16 percent in addition of such excess.

$2,390 upon normal-tax net incomes of $15,000; and upon normal-tax net incomes in excess of $15,000 and not in excess of $40,000, 17 percent in addition of such excess.

$6,640 upon normal-tax net incomes of $40,000; and upon normal-tax net incomes in excess of $40,000, 18 percent in addition of such excess.

(c) Exempt corporations: For corporations exempt from taxation under this title, see section 101.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, during the roll call I was called out of the Chamber. On my return I was informed that the pending amendment, proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] had been withdrawn. I did not hear the statements made or the reasons given why the amendment was withdrawn. I am disappointed and surprised. With still an open mind ready to listen to arguments that appealed to me, I nevertheless felt very much in favor of the amendment offered by these Senators.

So far as I have been able to study the question, I was very much impressed with the proposal when first made by President Roosevelt; the more I studied it and the more information I obtained concerning it, the more enthusiastic I became for the principle involved; and I understand the same principle is involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Wisconsin.

I do not want to be misunderstood or to have the record that is made upon the passage of the pending bill give a false impression. I have been told that the Senators referred to withdrew the amendment with the idea that it could be placed in in conference if the conferees wanted to put it in. That is not the way legislation is usually obtained in conference; it is just the reverse. When we have a proposition of legislation that we want to go to conference and let the conferees wrestle with it and settle it, we put it in the bill and do not leave it out of the bill. I am afraid the amendment will not be placed in the bill in conference.

It may be that the amendment could not prevail in the Senate, but I should have liked to have had a vote in order to show the temper of the Senate regarding it; and if, under the present parliamentary situation, it could go into the bill and go to conference, the conferees could have an idea as to how the Senate stood on the amendment.

It is not my purpose now, Mr. President, to argue the merits of the proposition. It seems, the amendment having been withdrawn, that it would only be a waste of time to undertake to do such a thing; but I do not think we ought to lose the opportunity to put on the statute books the principle involved in the taxation of undistributed earnings of corporations.

From the debate that has so far taken place it seems plain to me that this amendment would not only bring in large revenues, but, more important still, it is fundamentally right, as I see it, and carries out the principle of collecting our taxes from the individuals and the corporations that are most able to pay and that can pay with the least hardship.

I expect to vote for this bill, even with this amendment out, and I am hoping that the principle may yet go into the bill, as between the House bill and the Senate bill, but I think the Senators have made a mistake in withdrawing their proposition after all the argument that has taken place and after they have convinced, I believe, a great many Members of the Senate that the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the Senator almost entirely; I think the debate on the amendment has been very useful and very beneficial to the Senate; but I disagree with the Senator to this extent, that the Senators offering the amendment have made a mistake in withdrawing it. I think, in view of all the circumstances, that a better bill will be obtained out of the conference, because in respect to the amendment the conferees on the part of the Senate will not be handicapped by a yea-and-nay vote that might be regarded possibly as instructions on the part of the Senate, but the conferees will be left freer to go in the direction of the principle in which the Senator and I believe than if there had been a vote on the amendment and it had been defeated.

Mr. NORRIS. I have great regard for the Senator's opinion, but it seems to me the effect on the conferees will be just the reverse. The conferees will probably say, "Why, that question came before the Senate, and so little was thought of it that the movers of the motion withdrew it, and it was dropped." I rather think I would feel that way if I were one of the conferees.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, nobody could tell how many votes any amendment not voted on would get if it were voted on, but my observation was based on the fact that, having presented this proposition, if it were voted on and defeated by a large majority, the Senate conferees would feel as if they had received what might be considered to be in the nature of instructions by a yea-and-nay vote on an amendment that was defeated to stand by the bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee, than they would feel to go any particular distance in the direction of the House bill or the theory which is embodied in the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the conferees on the part of the Senate will probably be unfriendly to this amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know about that because I do not know who the conferees will be.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly the conferees, whoever they may be, would have a right to say, "The Senate did not think enough of the proposition or believe in it sufficiently even to have a vote on it."

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think they would take that attitude.

Mr. NORRIS. One of the reasons why I am expressing my views, and I hope I am expressing the sentiment of other Senators as well, is that, because of the withdrawal of the amendment, I do not believe our conferees ought to surrender the principle involved and give encouragement to the House conferees not to stand by the principle if it comes within the province of the conferees.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I always feel the conference committee ought to carry out the instructions of the Senate, but undoubtedly the matter is in conference because the bill as reported by the Finance Committee would impose a tax upon undistributed earnings of 7 percent while the bill that passed the House imposes a higher rate of 40 percent. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposes a rate between the two, so it is clearly a matter for consideration by the conferees.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is true that the parliamentary situation will take it to conference, or at least allow the conferees to consider it.

Mr. GEORGE. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska and to the Senate generally, with respect to abuses which have crept into our corporate income-tax system with reference to corporations, which abuses have been attacked so strongly and forcefully by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], that I doubt if there is any Member of the Senate in disagreement with them. If the abuses can be remedied without inflicting widespread injury upon other classes of taxpayers, I believe everyone is in sympathy with the general purpose of the Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his observation. I believe he has correctly stated the situation. Senators may disagree as to the method, but as to the abuses I think we are all agreed that they ought to be remedied if we can remedy them. It seems to me they are rather glaring. Men of enormous wealth have legally organized corporations—and I am not really complaining of them when they do it, because they do it under the law—and keep their earnings within the corporation. I believe it works out to the benefit of the very wealthy stockholders and to the injury of the small stockholder.

I do not want the impression to prevail with the House conferees or the Senate conferees that because the amendment has been withdrawn the principle involved in it is in any sense or in any way or in any degree abandoned.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. What is the pending amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary clerk has advised the Chair that the pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee which was pending. The question before the Senate now is the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GEORGE. My impression was the pending question is the language beginning on page 30, line 6, and extending over to page 33.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The Chair is advised that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] is an amendment to that part of the amendment of the committee appearing on page 31 of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I am willing to accept the view of the parliamentary clerk. It may be regarded as one amendment; and if so, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is in order, but beginning on page 30, in line 20, the subject matter relates to surtaxes on undistributed profits, though it is all part of one general subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it is all a part of one amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment of the Senator from Colorado reported?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, line 12, in the committee amendment it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following:

(a) and minus all portions of such adjusted net income expended or contracted to be expended during the taxable year for machinery, improvements, equipment, and buildings devoted or intended and designed to be devoted to the extension, development, or maintenance of the business of the corporation.

(b) and also minus all portions of such adjusted net income expended or contracted to be expended during the taxable year to replace or restore buildings, equipment, machinery, or other property lost, damaged, or destroyed by flood, fire, or other casualty or accident to the extent such loss shall not be compensated by insurance.

(c) and also all portions of such adjusted net income expended or applied during the taxable year for the liquidation, payment, or reduction of the principal of any bona-fide indebtedness outstanding at the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, as I understand the basis of the plan for a tax upon undivided surplus, it is that there has been an evasion, a very extensive evasion, of individual income taxes by those in control of corporations by not declaring dividends. I am entirely in accord with the principle involved and the amendment which I have offered is merely an attempt to limit the application of that principle to proper cases.

The first matter I have in mind, if I may illustrate, is a corporation which has started in business, has been prosperous, has earned and maintained a reputation for producing reliable goods, and whose earnings, perhaps, have been substantial. The business demands that there shall be an increase in its machinery, in its buildings, in its equipment. It seems to me what the country needs more than any other one thing is to provide employment for people in private industry. The President of the United States, in his tax message, said that private industry must begin to absorb unemployment.

As I read the bill as it now stands, it tends to prevent the expansion of private industry and consequently to impede reemployment of the unemployed. If we penalize a small corporation because of its earnings out of which it wishes to expand its business, to buy machinery, and erect buildings, we are going to impede the progress of recovery. It seems to me when we compute undistributed income which is to be penalized by a tax, we should give a credit for such part of the income as has been applied to the expansion of the earning facilities of the company. That is the purpose of the first part of my amendment to the committee amendment.

I call the second part of the amendment to the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], whose statement interested and greatly impressed me. I, too, have been in communities stricken by floods. This part of the amendment provides that if the plant and equipment of a corporation should be swept away by flood, by fire, or by other casualty the corporation may use its surplus earnings to restore its business without being subjected to a penalizing tax.

The third provision—and I am trying to cover the ground briefly—is that a corporation which has a legitimate, bona-fide debt as of the date of the enactment of the measure shall be permitted to utilize its surplus to pay its debts without being penalized for so doing. It seems to me we should not give the preference to the corporation with the big surplus, free from debt, and penalize the other corporation under the handicap of a debt. It seems to me the use of an earned surplus in the payment of debt is not an evasion of income taxes.

So all I am asking in this amendment is to provide that the tax on undistributed income shall be restricted to funds which are not needed and which are not used in the legitimate purposes of the business which will lead to increased business and increased employment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ADAMS. I do.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

I agree with the theory of the Senator's first provision. However, it does contain within it the possibility of evading the purpose of the tax, whether under the House bill or the committee bill or the compromise bill, because of the fact that it would provide for the use of these moneys for the purpose of evasion through the construction of buildings, the acquisition of new equipment, and so forth. It seems to me it is possible, however, completely to avoid that misuse of the provision by including in the Senator's amendment a provision such as was included in the Black amendment in reference to the declaration of stock dividends.

If a corporation uses its surplus created out of profits for the purpose of building or acquiring machinery, it increases the value of the corporation. It increases the capital assets of the corporation. If, in order to take advantage of that, the corporation must declare a stock dividend in accordance with the provisions of the last section of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Alabama, the possibility of misuse of the provision will be, in my opinion, completely avoided. I was wondering whether the Senator had considered or would consider that suggestion.

Mr. ADAMS. I have considered it, and I will answer the Senator from Washington in this way:

My view is that we are interested in promoting industry. We desire our business corporations, our manufacturing corporations, our commercial corporations, and all those who employ men, to prosper. We do not wish to put a single handicap in their way. If they desire to put in new machinery in order to employ other workmen, I do not think we should put upon them the burden of having to hire lawyers, hold stockholders' meetings, and go to the State corporation commission. I think they should have that right, and we should not impede it.

I will say to the Senator from Washington that the first element of a tax should be that it should be just. That is the first essential. The tax should raise revenue, of course; it should not discriminate; and it seems to me that if we attempt to penalize the legitimate use of money for the expansion of a business, we are thus, in an effort to prevent evasion, doing injustice to legitimate business; and I do not think injustice to legtimate business should be done, even though there may be some evasion. In other words, our principal purpose should be to accomplish the just ends of taxation if we can do so.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I entirely agree with the Senator, and I think this provision would not in any way penalize a corporation. I think one of the most potent elements in depressions in this country is overexpansion, due to the desire to use money for the purpose of building factories when they are unnecessary. I know of one instance of a concern which constructed for two and a half million dollars a building which it was later compelled to sell for $30,000; it was just completely wiped out; and the concern constructed that building during the war solely for the purpose of avoiding income-tax obligations. It would have been a very great benefit to the corporation to which I refer if something had been done to protect it.

All that would be required of a corporation, if the Senator should include this idea in his amendment, would be that it should declare a stock dividend to its stockholders, so that the value of the stockholders' equity in the corporation would be evidenced by certificates of stock. That would be a protection to the corporation against the desire of the corporate managers to expand improperly, and it would also prevent the use of this method for the purpose of evading the tax laws.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me the Senator from Washington approaches the matter from the wrong end. We agree in the elements which we apply, but in an inverse order.

I come from a part of the country where the corporations are small. I am interested in seeing the small corporations given a chance to grow. Out in our part of the country—largely undeveloped as yet—we desire our corporations to make use of their surplus.

For instance, take our mining corporations: If they happen to strike some rich ore this year, do we wish to penalize them, or do we wish to say to them, "You shall not be penalized if you build a mill to handle your ore, if you build further developments and further tunnels." That is, I think we should not penalize growing, small, new industries; and under this 7-percent tax we do not hurt the big corporation with its great accumulated surplus. It is a comparatively small penalty compared with some others; but, nevertheless, a 7-percent penalty starts a principle which I think is unsound, namely, of penalizing the very prosperity of small companies.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the bill as presented by the Senate committee, which places this very modest flat rate of 7 percent on undistributed adjusted net income of corporations, we have attempted to provide a definition which seemed to be as safe as the committee could devise with respect to what is an undistributed net income.

In subsection 2 we provide that—

> The term "undistributed net income" means the adjusted net income minus the sum of the dividends paid credit provided in section 27 and the credit provided in section 26 (c), relating to contracts not to pay dividends.

In other words, in assessing the 7-percent super tax, or tax on undistributed incomes, we have provided that a credit on the adjusted net income shall be given for all the dividends paid, which makes the difference between the total amount of the adjusted net income and the amount upon which the 7-percent tax applies. We have also provided that in cases where a corporation is under contract not to pay dividends, that also shall be taken into consideration, and the 7-percent tax shall not apply in such a case.

That simplifies the matter very much as compared to the House bill. One of the difficulties with the House bill in the committee and on the floor here, if it were gone into in detail, is the complication of attempting to compute the final amount upon which the tax will be paid, because of the complicated tables that are set out in the House bill.

In addition to giving credit for the dividends paid by a corporation before the 7 percent is applied, and in addition to taking into consideration any contracts which the corporation may have entered into with respect to the sale of stock, or any other fact by reason of which they are under contract not to pay dividends where they cannot help themselves, and therefore without that provision would be required to pay the 7 percent on the total adjusted net income without any deduction, the Senator from Colorado seeks to deduct from the adjustable net income "all portions of such adjusted net income expended or contracted to be expended during the taxable year for machinery, improvements, equipment, and buildings devoted or intended and designed to be devoted to the extension, development, or maintenance of the business of the corporation."

I realized, and the committee realized, the desirability of having corporations expand their facilities, give employment to more men, to increase their production, and thereby be able to compete with their competitors. But the very situation against which we are undertaking to legislate grows out of the fact that some corporations, instead of distributing their dividends, retain all of them, on one pretext or another, and, if the first part of this three-cornered amendment of the Senator from Colorado should be adopted, it would afford only another loophole through which corporations now undertaking to evade and succeeding in evading taxes, would be able to evade still further. Let us take the first and second parts of the Senator's amendment. Let us suppose that a corporation were entitled to a deduction of $10,000 because of a desire to build a new building or to put in new machinery; then let us suppose the same corporation has suffered under the conditions set out in the second part of the Senator's amendment; they will be allowed a deduction of $10,000 for machinery replaced because of a fire or flood or other catastrophe upon which there was no insurance. The corporation could deduct the same $10,000 under the first part of the Senator's amendment, and again under the second part of the Senator's amendment, and, although their installation of machinery or the new building contemplated both cost only $10,000, they could receive a deduction of $20,000, because both amendments might cover the same proposition.

In the third part of the Senator's amendment it is provided that not only shall they be entitled to a deduction of all the amounts contemplated in the building of the new buildings and the installation of the new machinery, and all amounts for machinery or buildings destroyed by flood, fire, or other catastrophe not fully covered by insurance, but they would also be entitled to a deduction of "all portions of such adjusted net income expended or applied during the taxable year for the liquidation, payment, or reduction of the principal of any bona-fide indebtedness outstanding at the date of the enactment of this act."

Mr. President, that brings to mind a very sharp distinction between the treatment of individual taxpayers and the treatment of corporate taxpayers. I am very sympathetic with the suggestion that a corporation ought to have a cushion not only for future expansion, but to take into consideration the question of indebtedness, and the bill as it passed the House does that in a way, and that matter will have to be adjusted in conference. However, the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is not a cushion, it is a feather bed. Three prongs of the amendment offer a loophole or a combination of loopholes through which any corporation might escape entirely from the payment of any of the tax levied upon undistributed net income.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. When the bill was before the committee was any study made of the large corporation surpluses now held by certain of the larger corporations? There were piled up in the lush years enormous surpluses, which form a tremendous pool to be drawn on, and those surpluses have been undistributed. Some run back several years.

Mr. BARKLEY. In reply to the Senator, I will say that the Senate Committee on Finance gave very earnest consideration to the question of existing surpluses, but inasmuch as it was not designed to interfere with the surpluses which have already been created, since the design was to levy a corporate income tax applicable from year to year, the committee did not see fit and did not think it wise to go back into the past and undertake to levy a tax on surpluses already created.

Mr. BONE. The argument was made here, and advanced very vigorously, that if the formula suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] were applied, it would injure the smaller corporations from now on, and that the only way to equalize the burden would be to levy a tax on the surpluses of a few corporations, the names of which I have in my desk.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the force of what the Senator has said, but if we entered into the field of attempting to adjust a tax bill to corporate surpluses already in existence, it would simply complicate still further an already complex situation, as I think all members of the Committee on Finance will agree.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky realizes, as does the Senator from Washington, that any levy on existing surpluses would be a capital levy and not an income tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly. The entire theory of the bill is that it provides for an income tax, a mere income tax, and therefore we have not seen fit to enter into the field of a capital tax upon existing surpluses.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky will yield, let me say, too, that the evidence is conclusive that during the past 13 years the net incomes of all corporations in the United States have amounted to only $40,000,000,000, and the dividends have been distributed to the extent of $51,000,000,000, leaving deficits in the case of many corporations.

Mr. BONE. I fully agree with that, and I do not know whether it was in contemplation of the situation suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], but it was deemed by the committee to be constitutionally impossible to levy a tax upon those reserves to which I have referred. But they are, however, enormous in many cases, and they constitute such pools of wealth that they are going to give certain corporations what amounts, by the process of their economic operation, to a virtual monopoly in their fields. There can be no competition with these big combinations, with their tentacles reaching out in all directions, and buttressed and backed up by these enormous pools. I do not know whether or not they can be reached constitutionally, but it has seemed to me that we can tax such wealth as well as we can tax homes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, without regard to the constitutional question, the committee thought that in order to reach the corporations to which the Senator refers it would be necessary to levy a tax upon the little surpluses which have been set aside by large numbers of small and medium-sized corporations throughout the country which are perfectly legitimate and sound—surpluses set aside in the interest of good administration and in the interest of employment and in the interest of tiding them over in adverse circumstances which might occur in any one year as compared with others.

Mr. BONE. Might not the object be achieved by graduating the tax so that it should not apply unjustly to the smaller corporations? Our purpose is to collect revenue to pay the extraordinary expenses incurred in the relief program, and there are these vast pools of money which, it seems to me, can very legitimately and properly be taxed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado does not involve that question, and I do not deem it necessary to discuss it. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado inadvertently has drawn our attention to the distinction between all three tax bills we have been considering. One of the most difficult problems the Committee on Finance had to consider was the very one this amendment raises. In other circumstances everyone on this floor ought to vote for the pending amendment and for other amendments of the same character, but if all of us did so, little of the income requested by the Treasury would be secured from these corporations. That is the difficulty we have met at every turn. Instead of writing a tax bill that was just to all, we have been thinking of the amount of money we must raise from corporations. So we had to frame a bill that was the least harmful to the very group to which the Senator refers. The Senate bill, at least, limits the tax upon undistributed income to 7 percent, while the Black bill and the House bill make it possible to tax as high as 35 percent and 42½ percent.

We have heard a great deal of talk on this floor today about large corporations and small corporations, rich corporations and poor corporations. Let me tell the Senate about some of the corporations which are not in either of these classes, which are in the communities where we live, and which employ small numbers of human beings and give employment to citizens in this country.

Let us see what some of these other corporations are. If the corporations with big surpluses and escaping some taxes were the only kind of corporations in the country, the rates in the bill as it passed the House ought to be tripled, if that were possible. What they are doing here is trying to destroy the rats, but in doing this they would burn the house, and at the same time destroy the sound and prudent business policy of the country.

Let us consider what kind of corporations we ought to be thinking of; not rich, powerful corporations which have been tax dodging, and for which no one here has any sympathy. What about the struggling corporation in the small community, employing a few hundred hands, which has a deficit? Have they rights to be considered in passing a tax bill? Do we want a tax bill that will finally put them out of business? Do we want a tax bill that is going to prevent the corporation paying its debts? That may happen under some of these tax proposals.

Then, there are the corporations with contracts which would prevent the payment of dividends.

Next there are the corporations with contracts obligating the corporations to the expenditure of money for the construction of plant machinery and equipment in order to increase employment.

There is nothing in the bill to permit a deduction in income to be made for contracts made by a corporation for the purpose of enlarging its machinery and increasing its plant so as to give more employment to the American people.

Then there are corporations that within the taxable year make expenditures to increase their plants in order to increase employment, and they should not be penalized like the rich, gigantic corporations which have been tax dodging by not distributing their earnings.

There are also corporations that today have large reserves to their advantage, but there are also corporations without any reserves. Are these latter corporations to be penalized in the future when they want to set up a surplus?

Also, there are corporations with all their net income being actual realized income, while others have only paper profits, an increase merely in their inventories. Such corporations are to be penalized unless they borrow the cash—40 percent of their inventory profits, in some cases—to pay their taxes.

Are there no corporations in the country that need to build up substantial surpluses to give their investors protection and their employees wages in periods of depression? How can we defend a policy of penalizing such by excessive taxation?

Again, the laws of 36 States prohibit corporations chartered by them from making a dividend distribution if their capital is impaired. Under the proposed undistributed-profits tax, corporations affected by these provisions would be heavily penalized by the Federal tax for keeping within the law. The House bill taxes these corporations a flat rate on their net income of 22½ percent, regardless of their dividend policy.

I went into the committee room, as every other member of the committee did, thoroughly, sincerely, heartily in favor of the objectives announced by the President. In fact, I went nearly so far as to make a favorable public statement—which now I am very thankful I did not make—but as I sat there 30 days, as all of us did, I decided that the bill as it passed the House was impossible, that it was impracticable, that it was not workable, that it would bring ruin in many instances to many of these corporations. So we got down to the question of the difference between the two bills before us.

The distinguished Senator from Michigan brought out the astounding fact that 98 percent of all the corporations in this country employ less than 250 persons each. What about those 98 percent? There are 8 or 10 of them in my town, and one year they lose money and another year they make money. They are to be found in every State in the Union.

Are we going to punish them in the year they make money by putting a penalty tax upon them, or are we going to say to them, "Put that away for that rainy day, for that flood or fire or other disaster that may come, for that injury that may happen to you, so that you can be in a position when such disaster comes to pay dividends to people who need dividends at that time, and also to give employment to the working people"?

Think of this situation, Mr. President. Ninety-eight percent of all the corporations in this country employ less than 250 people each. Are they big corporations? Are they wealthy? Or are they struggling and working and striving to develop business in this country? Are they honest men? Are they men who are contributing to the wealth of our Nation?

I repeat that the trouble with the problem we have had before us is that no distinction whatever has been made between the group or class of corporations just spoken of and those who are described as "rats." I for one and my colleagues on the Finance Committee decided that we would not burn the house in order to destroy the rats.

As we sat there in committee for 30 long days we gradually became convinced, almost to a man, that the House bill was indefensible and impossible. No Senator raised his voice to defend it—not one. What is objectionable about the House bill is the inequitable principle that it applies to all kinds of corporations, namely, the graduated tax on undistributed earnings. In our efforts to raise the necessary money that the Government needs, and in our determination not to apply this most unsound principle unless safeguarded by impossible exceptions, we voted for a compromise bill, namely, the committee bill. We realized once the graduated tax on undistributed earnings was adopted, it would lead to increases and increases on undistributed earnings, so that ultimately the very fabric and structure of the corporate business life of our country would be destroyed. Hence, the committee resorted to this so-called Finance Committee compromise, which leaves the subject of taxes on undistributed earnings the same as the flat tax on all incomes of corporations, namely at 7 percent.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia and many others thought that the soundest way would be to apply a normal tax of 4 percent, but that would not give us the necessary money; and if we put these cushions in and lifted the companies out that should in justice be protected, we could not raise the $600,000,000 requested.

Let me add this. I said all these debt and obligated corporations ought to be given consideration and ought to be removed from the net-income provisions of this bill and allowed to deduct their debts. However, if we did that, there would be no money coming in. The $660,000,000 would disappear. In fact, the experts to whom I submitted the very amendment of the Senator from Colorado and five other amendments affecting the corporations I named earlier and which ought to be in this bill, said the revenue to the Treasury would so rapidly disappear that there would not be any left. I said how much would be left? Give me an estimate. The best guess I received was that there would be about $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 out of the $660,000,000 which would come from the tax dodgers and the rats. The other $600,000,000 would come from the struggling corporations or corporations of the type and character I have asked the Senate to protect.

I do not want to take up the time of the Senate any more. I could not let the occasion go by, when the Senator proposed this amendment, to point out the thoughts I have had in mind, the thought of the financially weak corporations, the thought of continuing employment, the thought of encouraging corporations which want to build, equip, and develop their business. The whole history of America shows that all corporations, bad and good, have been developed by the surpluses made by men and women who invested a few dollars in the beginning in a business, and increased and developed their plants and have given employment and prosperity to this country.

It was because we were thinking about the injustices and inequities to such corporations, it was because we were thinking of justice, of trying to establish a just system of taxation rather than getting money for the Public Treasury, that the committee favored the lesser injury its bill presents.

I do not mind saying I am not satisfied with the Senate bill. I do not want to apologize for the bill that the committee drafted. It is the best of the propositions which have been presented that will raise the revenue demanded. I have no quarrel with the viewpoint of the Senators from Alabama and Wisconsin. They have ably presented their views, with which I am in accord 100 percent were it possible to apply the graduated-tax principle only to the corporations that are not distributing or paying out in dividends their undistributed profits. Day after day in the committee, and again today, I asked the experts—and I now ask any Member of this body to show how it is possible to draft a bill that will give the Treasury the necessary money and at the same time apply the penalty only to this tax-dodging group of corporations? The evidence before the committee was—and I call the attention of the Senators from Georgia and Utah to the fact—that it was believed that there were corporations that were distributing all their earnings, but the overwhelming evidence is that such corporations were comparatively few in number. These corporations have a lot of money they have not distributed, but their number is few. So I repeat, let us in passing this tax bill think of the 98 percent of factories and business houses, the lumber yard, the chair factory, and shoe and tanning factory, the tool and candy shop, the harness factory, the canning factory, the hundred and one other shops and factories—visualize them, see them in your own town.

I have observed, as have you, what has been transpiring in recent years. I know they have had their hard years and their good years. I for one do not want to put them in the position that when they have had a good year they cannot put aside some of their surplus.

On my desk are hundreds of protesting letters from industrialists in my State and from all over the country. I have never known businessmen to be so open and frank in the discussion of their businesses as at this time. They are really frightened. In the opinion of many their alarm is justified. These letters of businessmen show the money they had in 1926, 1927, and 1928, and then showing the deficits—my God, what deficits—which came upon them in 1931, 1932, and 1933. God only knows what would have happened to this country if it were not for the surpluses which were accumulated in 1926, 1927, and 1928. These letters show the facts of how they fought unemployment. In letter after letter they have said they did not lay off their employees, that they complied, so far as they possibly could, with the N. R. A. for limitation of hours of labor, telling the story and giving the figures showing that in many cases their surplus went down and down until it was completly wiped out.

Mr. President, we demand by law and encourage always the building up of surpluses by the banks in order to protect their investors. Now we are urging every other business institution not to create surpluses. How paradoxical.

Mr. President, I would not have spoken but for the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, against which I shall regret to vote, and which ought to be in some form in any tax bill.

I remind the Senate again that I honestly believe four-fifths of the tax on undistributed earnings will come out of the struggling small corporations of the country that are the backbone of our business life. My answer is that the experts say if we put these exceptions in the bill, that in justice we should, the revenue disappears. In a word, the trouble with these measures is that in our efforts to penalize, as we should, the guilty corporations we are penalizing the innocent business concerns, and they far outnumber the guilty.

Mr. President, I ask that some of many letters which I have received and statements I have prepared in relation to the matter may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters and statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS OF THOSE OPPOSED TO HOUSE BILL

1. That the proposed bill is detrimental to the best interests of the country in several important respects, to wit:

a. It will make it difficult for businesses to build themselves up.

b. In many instances it will make it difficult to repay existing debt.

c. In many instances it will curtail the granting of credit.

d. It will tend to prevent continuity and stability of employment.

e. It will favor those corporations which now have surpluses and no debt as against the others.

f. It will keep weak corporations weak.

g. It will compel many corporations to borrow money to pay their taxes because their undistributed profits are largely inventory earnings.

h. It will prevent a regular flow of dividends.

i. It will penalize corporate savings against hard times.

TABLOID ARGUMENTS

1. In general, large corporations with adequate surplus reserves are now distributing the major portion of their earnings, and under this new tax bill could distribute their entire earnings without impairing their position, but the consequent result would be a very large loss of revenue to the Federal Government.

2. Conversely, small corporations which are growing, and which need a substantial portion of their earnings to further their growth, would immediately be stifled.

3. Small corporations would not have the possibilities of securing outside capital as in many cases their status has not yet been proven.

4. New corporations would be extremely limited unless the sponsors thereof were very wealthy men in their own right.

5. It would be a direct preventive of the accumulation of surpluses to cushion any disaster such as depression, strikes, floods, and so forth, resulting in the immediate necessity of dismissal of every employee in the case of such a disaster.

6. An analysis of the tax returns of corporations during the past depression indicated losses in excess of $5,000,000,000, these losses only being able to be absorbed in view of prior surpluses which had been created.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST HOUSE TAX BILL

1. It is an effort to substitute Government judgment for directors' judgment as to how much of a company's earnings might be kept in reserves.

2. It uses the taxing power to encourage directors to pay out more as dividends than can safely be paid out if the company is to keep solvent.

3. It discourages the reinvestment of corporate earnings in industry; yet the great development of industry has come about largely because of such plowing back of earnings. For example, 80 percent of the capital in the automobile industry consists of reinvested profits.

4. Authors of the House bill assume that all surplus consists of cash. Actually, of course, most surplus represents investment in inventories, equipment, buildings, etc.

5. Authors of the bill assume that all earnings made by a company in a year are in cash which can be paid out as dividends. Actually, of course, this is not so; for example, a good part, or all, of the earnings may represent paper profits on inventories and not be cash at all.

6. The bill seems to favor strong companies which make money every year and do not need any more reserves; it would discriminate against (a) companies which need to set aside substantial reserves in good years to offset losses in bad years; (b) companies which need to set aside substantial reserves to keep up working capital; (c) companies which need to set aside substantial reserves to enlarge their operations; (d) companies which are trying to get established.

7. Actually, however, the bill does not really favor large companies, because if it results in promoting monopolies, as most economists think it would, it will result in more Government regulation of industry.

9. If the bill is enacted, it will mean that the Government will be establishing standards of corporation practice based on averages—even though one corporation really needs to keep 80 percent of its earnings and another only 20 percent, and that the Government will be inviting, even encouraging, corporation directors to take risks with money by depleting the working capital of the company.

WILLIAMS COLLEGE,
Williamstown, Mass., April 30, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the new tax bill which was adopted yesterday by the House by an overwhelming majority, I urge that you use every means at your disposal to secure a thorough revamping of the measure in the Senate.

In its present form the bill, almost throughout, violates the very fundamentals of sound economics. It is impossible in a communication of this kind to enter into any adequate discussion of all of its vicious provisions. Two of them, however, are so glaringly unsound and unjust that they should be entirely eliminated. I refer to the basic idea of the whole measure, namely: The proposed tax on corporation surplus reserves, and the proposed tax of over 40 percent on the net income of all corporations occupying the position of intermediate members in holding companies.

Supporters of the bill seek to justify the first of these on the ground that it will close a loophole for the evasion of personal-income taxes by large stockholders. It is possible that in some few cases evasions have been effected by holders of large blocks of stock in a few corporations. But there is not one particle of evidence that such has been a general practice. I ask you candidly to consider whether it is wise or just to its inmates to burn down the house to get rid of the rats.

To one who has followed the economic theories of the present administration, this feature of the bill appears as the culmination and most unblushing exposition of a determined policy to penalize thrift and sound economic practice. As a New Englander, brought up in the tradition of thrift and business foresight, one would think that this provision of the bill would make your gorge rise.

The other provision of the bill referred to contains a threat to the support of all who may be so unfortunate as to hold stock in any company which is a subsidiary in a holding set-up. These small holdings in the majority of cases represent the savings of hard-working and thrifty individuals who have laid by for their old age. This bill, at least this provision of it, would penalize their individual thrift and foresight. It is the people of this class who are really the forgotten men and women.

Would God we had more men in Washington who had the courage to place the welfare of the country ahead of the furthering of their own political ambitions and fortunes.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM HOWARD DOUGHTY, Jr.,
Professor of Political Science.

NEW ENGLAND COUNCIL,
ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND RESEARCH,
Boston, Mass., May 20, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: We urge you to give the fullest consideration possible to the following points regarding the revenue bill of 1936, as passed by the House of Representatives.

(1) The revenue bill of 1936, as passed by the House of Representatives, does not simplify the system of Federal taxation, but, on the contrary, it adds many new complications to our already over-complicated tax laws.

(2) The bill would make considerations as to the tax effect of paying or not paying dividends of undue importance in the operation and management of corporations.

(3) It would tend to prevent accumulation of surplus in good times to help to tide corporations over bad times, without the necessity for (a) suspending entirely the payment of dividends, or (b) drastically reducing employment.

(4) It would make it difficult for new businesses, operating as corporations, to retain funds out of earnings for healthy expansion, by placing prohibitive taxes upon earnings so retained.

(5) It would give an unfair advantage to old-established businesses with large surpluses and consequent ability to pay dividends and avoid taxes on undistributed earnings.

(6) It would produce grave inequalities in the taxation of corporations in the same line of business but of varying capacity to pay dividends because having more or less liquid assets available.

(7) It would work unequally as to corporations with similar earning power but in different lines of business, in which liquidity of assets varies according to the nature of the business, with consequent variation in assets available for distribution in dividends.

(8) It would make hardship for businesses which by their nature have years of substantial earnings followed by lean years.

(9) It would bear unevenly upon two corporations with like earning power, one of which happens to have surplus from which dividends can be paid and the other of which has a deficit so that its earnings, if distributed, are not taxable and do not reduce undistributed income subject to tax under the proposed law.

(10) It makes no adequate provision for equitable treatment of corporations sustaining heavy capital losses which reduce funds available for dividends but do not correspondingly reduce taxable income because of the $2,000 limitation in section 117 on deduction of such losses.

(11) It would impose unreasonable burdens on corporations which have substantial sinking-fund requirements in preferred-stock agreements or bond indentures, or have large indebtedness which must be reduced even if there are no sinking-fund provisions. Such corporations are not in a position to avoid the tax on undistributed earnings by paying them out in dividends.

(12) It would force new financing by bond or stock issues to raise funds not retained from earnings, and such procedure is always expensive and often, in times of depression, practically impossible.

(13) Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau says the bill is intended "to put all taxes on business profits essentially on the same equitable basis; to give no advantages and to impose no penalties upon corporation stockholders that are not given to and imposed upon the individual taxpayer who alone or as a partner derives his income from business profits." In practice the bill cannot produce this result, because it depends, for raising the required revenue, upon a substantial part of the taxes being collected from the corporations themselves at rates which bear no relation to the ability of the stockholders to pay taxes.

(14) The revenue-producing capacity of the bill is so uncertain that the very great change in the scheme of Federal taxation which it proposes is not justified by the possible revenue it may bring in.

(15) The provisions of the bill imposing the maximum tax on intermediate holding companies is not a revenue measure, but is indirect legislation for the purpose of eliminating from the business structure of the country companies of this class, whether or not in utility systems and for whatever purpose existing.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD W. SULLOWAY,

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The proposed corporate-tax law that is coming before the Senate is a matter of very serious consequence to the leather industry. We are compelled to buy raw material in advance of our wants, partly because of the seasons when it is available, and partly because of the distance that it has to come.

The process of manufacture is long, and it is not always possible to sell merchandise when manufactured, all of which means carrying very large inventories. Competition is so keen that it is very difficult to get a proper advance to cover rising costs of raw material, while buyers are able to insist upon reductions because of lower prices in the raw-material market.

Actual experience in the past 15 years under the conditions that have prevailed shows immense capital losses in the leather industry; and if, as proposed under this bill, any profits that do accrue are to be heavily taxed, the position of the American leather industry will be very serious.

We urge that you give these facts very serious consideration. Our industry cannot stand any more burdens than continue to exist.

Very truly yours,

AVERY LOWRY.
MAXWELL J. LOWRY.

BOSTON, May 18, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Member of Senate Finance Committee,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The Standard Crayon Manufacturing Co., of Danvers, Mass., is much disturbed by the tax bill passed by the House of Representatives and now before your committee, and by the suggestions contained in the New York Times of May 13, and the papers of May 17.

In the first case, if we could make $1,000 a year net income and did not distribute it, we would be subject to practically 100-percent tax.

In the second case we would be subject to a tax of $450.

Our annual gross business is about $165,000, so we are not a large company. In 1934 we lost $8,000 and in 1935 we lost $4,000. There is only $700 left in our surplus, thus, $12,000 out of our savings accumulated in past years for the privilege of staying in business and keeping our help employed. The stockholders have had nothing.

This company and its predecessors have been in business for nearly 40 years.

In Sunday's paper reference is made to the possibility of a flat 18-percent and a flat 7-percent tax, making a total of approximately 25 percent. Applying this percentage to a net income of $1,000, this little company would still be paying a terrific tax, the result of which would be to deprive it of accruing an adequate surplus to enable it to pay off its debt and to maintain its credit.

In other words, such taxes benefit the big fellow, who will gain by forced liquidation of this and other small companies.

In addition, we must pay this year about $600 under the social security law, increasing to at least $3,600 a year by 1942.

To establish proper credit, we should be allowed to build up a surplus of at least 10 percent of our sales before being taxed as proposed.

In the event of the passage of any such tax measure persecuting our company for accumulating a reasonable surplus, this company will have to liquidate and 40 to 100 employees will have to be discharged.

More information will be furnished if you wish it.

May I hear from you?

Yours very truly,

A. B. TENNEY,
ALBERT B. TENNEY, President.

ARNOLD PRINT WORKS,
NORTH ADAMS, MASS., April 30, 1936.

The Honorable DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WALSH: We believe that the following explanation of the effect upon our company of the new tax bill about to be considered by the Senate Finance Committee will be of interest to you and will indicate the necessity for a relief provision, in addition to those already incorporated in the bill as drafted by the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Arnold Print Works owns and operates a business established in 1862 in the city of North Adams and town of Adams, Mass., consisting of two manufacturing plants, completely equipped for the printing of approximately 160,000,000 yards of textile goods annually and employing approximately 2,000 people at the present time. Prior to 1932 its business consisted primarily of commission printing, so-called, whereby grey goods owned by others were finished for a fixed fee or charge per yard, and the gross income from the business amounted approximately to $4,500,000 annually. Beginning in 1933 it became necessary to engage in corporation printing, so-called, whereby it purchased grey goods and sold the finished merchandise as its product, and the gross income from the business increased from approximately $4,500,000 in 1932 to approximately $15,000,000 in 1934 and in 1935. The company did not have adequate working capital to finance its constantly increasing corporation printing, and unable to obtain such working capital was forced, on September 3, 1935, to institute proceedings for its reorganization under section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Operations of the business since September 3, 1935, authorized by said court, have been on a substantially profitable basis.

After prolonged negotiations with our larger creditors and stockholders, we have formulated a plan of reorganization which substantially preserves the existing relationship between the various classes of creditors and stockholders and provides for the borrowing of $1,200,000, the additional working capital required in the continued operation of the business.

It is not possible under present conditions to obtain the $1,200,000 additional working capital through the issue of stocks, notes, or bonds, and we believe the only source from which such working capital can be obtained is Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We have therefore filed an application for a loan in the amount of $1,200,000 from Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to be repaid out of earnings prior to January 31, 1945, because of the fact that Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not authorized to make loans maturing later than January 1, 1945.

There are approximately $430,000 of unsecured trade creditors of the company who, under the proposed plan of reorganization, will receive 10 percent of their claims in cash and 90 percent of their claims in 10-year deferred notes, which notes will be paid out of earnings of the company. Therefore, under the proposed plan of reorganization, approximately $250,000 of the net earnings in each year will necessarily be applied to the repayment of the loan from Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the repayment of the deferred notes issued to unsecured trade creditors, and cannot be distributed to stockholders. Also, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, we understand, invariably requires borrowers to agree that no dividend will be paid on any class of stock while its loan is outstanding without its written consent.

On an estimated net income for the year 1936–37 of approximately $300,000, the tax assessed under section 13 of House bill 12395, by reason of our failure to distribute income applied to the repayment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan and the deferred notes, would amount to approximately $103,500. Such a tax might seriously jeopardize our ability to obtain the $1,200,000 loan (without which it is doubtful if our business can be continued) and even if we are successful in obtaining such loan, may impose such a burden upon the business that its continued operation would be impossible.

It seems to us, therefore, that relief should be provided for corporations in our circumstances, which are forced to apply earnings to the repayment of obligations incurred in order to carry out a reorganization, without which the business must necessarily be liquidated. It also seems to us that the Government would be adequately protected against collusive arrangements if the relief were afforded only to corporations reorganizing under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

In connection with the foregoing we would also like to suggest that the rate of 22½ percent, the rate which the Ways and Means bill recommends for imposition in the case of all its relief provisions, is too high, and amounts to a penalty in cases which are not proper cases for penalty. To impose upon a corporation in financial distress, as a condition for obtaining new money or concessions from owners of preferred securities outstanding, vital to its continued existence, the obligation to pay a tax of 22½ percent on that part of its income withheld from distribution to stockholders under these circumstances, might in many cases close to the line have the effect of effectually preventing the reorganization and salvaging of the business. We believe an imposition of the 15-percent rate now in effect and recommended, under the Ways and Means draft, for imposition on banks, insurance companies, and other corporations not brought within the framework of the general measure is high enough, particularly when it is borne in mind that when the income involved is eventually distributed it will be taxed in full to the recipient stockholders, being subject in their hands at that time to both normal and surtax. This suggestion, that the rate in such cases should not be higher than 15 percent, applies to the relief provisions already in the bill, covering income accumulated to make up deficits, income accumulated pursuant to contracts executed prior to March 3, 1936, and income accumulated to amortize excessive indebtedness incurred prior to March 3, 1936, although the hardship involved in so high a rate is perhaps more obvious in the case of corporations insolvent or in serious financial distress.

While we are, of course, primarily interested in our own problem, we believe that it is illustrative of the effect of the proposed tax bill on corporations which now are or hereafter may be faced with the necessity for a reorganization. We sincerely hope that this letter may be of assistance to you and will be only too glad to furnish you with additional detailed information with respect to our present situation, should you desire us to do so.

Very truly yours,

S. M. JONES, President.

CRAPO, CLIFFORD, PRESCOTT & BULLARD,
New Bedford, Mass., May 13, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: One of the very few bright spots in the New Bedford industries since the start of the depression has been the Gosnold Mills, which has earned a small amount of money most of the time throughout the depression. There is, I believe, only one other mill which has been able to earn money, and it had no debts.

The Gosnold in 1928 owed $980,000 to sundry banks. As you know, the depression hit the cotton business about 1925, and by 1928 the affairs of the Gosnold had become so bad that the banks demanded a reorganization and that their loans be paid down. The stockholders raised $330,000 by the issue of 7-year debentures junior to the bank loans, and the bank loans were paid down. These debentures required that a certain proportion of the earnings each year be set aside to retire them, but the earnings have never been great enough to completely retire them and approximately $170,000 of them will come due this fall.

In the meantime, during the worst days of the depression, the banks demanded still further payments on their loans, and they were paid down substantially so that in the 7 years since 1928 very nearly half a million dollars have been paid off this big debt out of earnings.

The Gosnold has run extremely actively during all this period, and its pay roll has, I think, been the biggest in New Bedford or certainly nearly the biggest. Had the law which is now contemplated, taxing earnings which are used to pay off obligations, been in effect the Gosnold would have gone out of the picture long ago, and the brighest spot in New Bedford industries would have vanished.

The Gosnold had a comparatively good year last year when the situation of the cotton industry is considered, but it must pay off its notes this fall. Its earnings are going to be a great help in making it possible for it to be able to do this. Before long, if left alone, it should be able to begin to return something to its stockholders.

I want to call this situation to your attention because I feel that any bill penalizing a corporation which tries to pay off its debts, particularly debts that come due as do the Gosnold notes this year, can bring nothing but ruination on many of the smaller industries of the country, which are just the ones which apparently the Government thinks it would like to protect.

I am a director of the Gosnold, but my interest in it is that of a stockholder as I own none of the notes. I should like very much to have a dividend, but I realize that any law which forced dividends during the depression would have destroyed the corporation. I hope the Senate will not allow a bill with this feature to pass.

Very truly yours,

JOHN M. BULLARD.

SALEM OIL & GREASE CO.,
Salem, Mass, May 11, 1936.

Hon. D. I. WALSH:

Ninety percent of that awful thing called industry is composed of outfits like this which you fellows feel should be put in their places, and how. This concern was started with a $1,000 loan, 27 years ago; never was a cent put in but out of profit (that terrible thing). Today it is valued at about $250,000, all from earned surplus. Employs 30 people, paying 1929 rates of pay. Never cut anyone's pay, fired one man in all those years. Employees get full-time pay during sickness or injury, 2 weeks' vacation with pay, and never laid a man off. In fact, employing more now than during 1929. All this was because the owners took small salaries and put surplus back in the business. Our present oversurplus is to be used for pension purposes.

Personally it doesn't make any difference to me, if surplus is distributed by force. I'll get mine, but the poor fellows that work here will not, and when tough times come, out they go. When they get old, out they go; when they are sick, ditto. When we need new machines or more buildings, use the old, no surplus.

The worst of it is that you are preventing young concerns today from ever amounting to much. The old ones can get along, but it's a hell of penalty on youth and vigor and only making the outlook for youth more gloomy than it is, and God knows its terrible.

Raise the income-tax rates if you must, but for God's sake don't penalize thrift.

Sincerely,

H. T. N. SMITH, President.

HUDSON, MASS., May 13, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I ask you to use your influence in the Senate against the bill to take away surplus of corporations, now before the Senate committee.

As a concrete example, if we had not held back some of our earnings and put them into surplus we would have been in a very serious position this year on account of the flood we had last March, as we had damages of about $30,000 to our stock and machinery. This of course was an entirely unseen emergency, and if we had no surplus it might have seriously crippled our business.

We do not think that after it has been taxed once it should be taxed a second time and we trust you will vote against this most unjust legislation.

I remain,

Very truly yours,

WEST SPRINGFIELD, MASS., May 8, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: From the study I have been able to make of the proposed Federal tax bill of 1936, it seems to me that this method of taxation is entirely unsound and undesirable.

If I interpret it correctly, I believe that in the future it would be practically impossible to build up a company like the Strathmore Paper Co., which was started over 40 years ago, on a very small amount of capital and which has grown to a company capitalized at $12,000,000 almost solely through "plowing back" of earnings.

Frankly, I do not see how the small company and the one of medium size can be in a position to withstand a long period of depression if a heavy penalty is imposed for building up in good times, reserves to take care of the proverbial "rainy day."

All of these contentions you have undoubtedly heard many times before, but from close contact with the vicissitudes in building up a company for over 40 years, I feel that I may be in position to judge in such matters better than individuals who have never been obliged to meet a pay roll regularly or provide means for keeping employees at work during times of slack business when very definitely there was very little for them to do.

It is very easy to consider some of our very large corporations with their big incomes and the heavy reserves they are able to build up and try to force a distribution of such reserves, but it is an entirely different matter to apply similar measures to small and medium-sized concerns without wrecking them or making it impossible for them to grow and prosper.

As the great majority of Massachusetts corporations are of the latter class, may I urge that you give this matter very serious consideration before deciding to vote for the proposed bill?

Very truly yours,

STRATHMORE PAPER CO.,
H. A. MOSES, President.

P. S.—In the past 25 years Strathmore Paper Co. alone has paid out $20,947,000 in wages and salaries, on a yearly average of $837,844. Is it worth while to have small companies start business and grow?

In our particular case, which is fairly representative of thousands of such companies, the growth has been dependent upon earnings plowed back into the business. Under no consideration could I have raised the necessary capital outside the business.

B. F. STURTEVANT CO.,
Hyde Park, Boston, Mass., May 15, 1936.

Subject: Federal revenue bill for 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Committee on Finance, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I desire, on behalf of this company, to register an emphatic protest against the tax provisions of the Federal revenue bill of 1936, which has recently passed the House and is now before the Senate Committee on Finance. This bill, as now drawn, will have an absolutely ruinous effect on this concern and will impose an unreasonable and unjust penalty on its stockholders.

This concern, the B. F. Sturtevant Co. was founded almost 80 years ago; it is now the representative concern in the industry of ventilation, air-conditioning, etc. It employs about 1,500 people, does a business, in normal times, of about $7,500,000, and makes about $400,000 profit, if all goes well. It has a capital of about $5,000,000, every cent of which has been supplied out of its own earnings, which have been plowed back into the business, year by year. No outside capital has ever been put into the business, no stock or bond issue has been put out, nor has the concern gone into Wall Street for money. It is a private concern, which has been built up in the traditional New England manner.

We are a heavy-goods industry, and, like all concerns in this line, have suffered tremendous losses during the past 5 years of depression. Over half of our cash working capital has been lost, but we have operated continuously and kept the bulk of our force employed.

To replenish the lost working capital, recourse has been had to the banks and an agreement made with the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, and others, whereby sufficient money has been furnished, on the stipulation that it will be repaid quarterly during the next 4 years out of profits, and that no dividends shall be declared to the stockholders meanwhile. Dividends, by the way, have not been paid since 1931.

It is evident that we must make money during the next few years, in order to pay our debt to the Federal Reserve bank. It is also evident that we must replenish the working capital, lost during the depression. It is necessary also to build up additional working capital funds to meet the natural expansion in this industry.

The capital market is not open to a private concern of this character. We are unlisted and the Federal Securities Act has, to all intents and purposes, closed the door; under existing conditions, we cannot put out an issue to obtain necessary capital. It must be acquired by savings, out of profits to come.

The proposed tax bill knocks the props right out from under us. It subjects the company and its stockholders to an unjust and unreasonable penalty if it continues to do what is required by its agreement with the Federal Reserve Bank (an agent of the Government), or if it attempts to replenish its losses in the only manner open to it, under existing conditions.

This proposed tax will have an absolutely inimical effect on New England industry, most of which is private, unlisted and built up by savings out of earnings. If ever a law was designed to "kill the goose", this law is the one. The very reserves, which saved us during the depression and enabled our New England concerns to keep a large part of their employees off the relief rolls are now to be taxed out of existence and we are to be prohibited from building up new reserves to meet another depression.

Very truly yours,

BENJ. S. FOSS, Treasurer.

THE F. A. BASSETTE CO.,
Springfield, Mass., May 5, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We wish to point out briefly with reference to the now pending tax bill (H. R. 12395) some points which it seems to us would work injustice to companies like our own.

The F. A. Bassette Co. was organized in 1901 as a Massachusetts corporation with a paid-in capital of $17,000 and no additional capital has ever been paid into the company.

As of December 31, 1935 the company had capital and surplus of $285,421.84 represented by 4,200 shares of preferred stock ($65 par value) and 4,200 shares of common stock. This stock was held by 12 individuals each daily engaged in conducting the business of the company, each holding common shares equal in number to their preferred stockholdings.

The company has been conducted largely as a cooperative enterprise. The articles of incorporation provide that only employees may be shareholders, and that upon the death or withdrawal of any individual his stock is to be purchased by the company at its then book value and may be resold to other employees on an extended-credit plan.

All of the principal employees are stockholders. All employees participate in an annual distribution of 15 percent of the company's net profits. For the average of the 10 most profitable years, dividends averaging approximately 38 percent of net profits after profit sharing and taxes, have been distributed to stockholders, the balance of net profits being used for increasing the company's plant and other corporate needs.

Under the company's plan of stock retirement and employee ownership it is necessary to carry either cash reserves or life-insurance policies in an amount sufficient to meet its contractual obligation to purchase stock. At December 31, 1935, it had reserved cash and United States bonds in the amount of $50,919.05 as partial provision for stockholders whose lives were not insurable. It had insurance policies in the total amount of $290,500 in force on the lives of nine other stockholders.

The annual addition to the cash reserve funds required by corporate action is $6,500 (plus income of the invested funds). The annual premiums on life-insurance policies total $12,951.30. Thus a total of approximately $20,000 per year is withdrawn from the corporation's income or distributable surplus and reserved to provide for the dependents of a deceased stockholder employee.

Incidentally, all of the stockholders are individuals of modest means and income, and had all of the company's prior earnings been distributed the effective rate of tax on the individuals would have averaged much less than the rate paid by the corporation.

Under the provisions of the proposed new bill the company will not be allowed to deduct the annual payments required as above set forth either in determining its "adjusted net income" or its "undistributed net income." Assuming that its annual net income might average $30,000, before deduction of these items, not more than $10,000 could possibly be available for dividends and tax. However, approximately $11,230 would be required as the tax on "adjusted net income", and the company not only would be unable to make any dividend distribution, but would have insufficient cash to pay its tax.

Take the case of those small corporations which have weathered the depression only by grace of their bankers, whose loans, although capital in nature, mature, and are renewed every 3 or 4 months. If current earnings are applied to reduction of bank loans, as the banks will properly insist, the corporations cannot escape tax at the maximum rates.

Larger corporations may be able to entirely avoid the tax by distributing all of their income and acquiring needed capital by security issues—a plan which is not available to small companies like our own.

We believe the inevitable result to our company would be that the company would not only not be able to provide for the gradual but continued expansion which it enjoyed for over 30 years—but that it would be seriously handicapped in—if not forced to abandon—its plan of cooperative ownership.

We realize it is necessary to raise taxes. Why not tax the profits of corporations heavily if necessary, but leave with them the means to continue to expand their business in a reasonable way?

Respectfully yours,

W. H. MITCHELL, President.

THE VULCANIZED RUBBER CO.,
New York, May 6, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Monopolies would be fostered, in our opinion, if the proposed tax on undivided surplus should be adopted. Take, for illustration, the position of this company, which is a relatively small factor in our industry. We have as one of our competitors the B. F. Goodrich Co., whose total assets are about $124,000,000, including over eight millions in cash, as against our own total assets of $928,000, including $37,000 cash. Our most active competitor, the American Hard Rubber Co., while nowhere nearly so large as Goodrich, is yet a giant as compared to us, with total assets of over seven millions, including cash of $460,000.

During 1930, 1931, and 1932, we lost $281,000. A large part of this loss was due to an effort to keep at work as many as possible of our 400 employees. If we had not built up a surplus before 1930, we would simply have been wiped out. Unless we are permitted to rebuild this surplus, we cannot successfully compete with our huge competitors nor can we survive another big depression. In the last 3 years we have recovered a little more than a third of these losses, and we still have a long way to go to be where we were in 1929.

Therefore, we should much prefer an increased tax rate on profits to a penalty tax on undistributed earnings. Many of our 400 employees have been with us for 30, 40, and even 50 years, and we think we and they have a right to the protection that only cash and security reserves can give. The bees and the squirrels have the right idea.

Respectfully yours,

S. H. RENTON, President.

STATEMENT MADE UP BY A MR. WESTON IN REFERENCE TO THE NEW TAX BILL

MAY 12, 1936.

If Raymond H. Whitcomb, Inc., has income of $200,000, it would have to set aside for its borrowed preferred stock a sinking fund of $54,000.

If it then paid $98,000 dividends, its tax would be $36,000 under the proposed 1936 Revenue Act, assuming no benefit from sections 14, 15, or 16.

Adding up $54,000 sinking fund, $98,000 dividends, and $36,000 tax makes $188,000, which would leave the company only $12,000 to add to its working capital out of the year's income.

If, however, the company got the benefit of section 15, with respect to $54,000 set aside for the sinking fund, its tax would be not $36,000 but $27,000, and it would have approximately $9,000 more to add to the working capital.

If the company were to pay out not $98,000 but $72,000 (endeavoring to add in this way to its working capital), its tax would be $49,000, if it received no benefit from sections 14, 15, or 16. It would then be paying out $54,000 sinking fund, $72,000 dividends, and $49,000 tax, making a total of $175,000, and so still have only $25,000 left to add to its working capital.

It will be noted that the difference between $98,000 dividends and $72,000 dividends is $26,000. Of this $26,000 under the foregoing computation, the taxpayer is allowed to keep half (difference between $12,000 and $25,000 added to the working capital, equals $13,000) and the Government tax (difference between $36,000 tax and $49,000 tax equals $13,000).

Assuming $72,000 paid in dividends and assuming that the company nets the benefit of section 15 with respect to the $54,000 sinking fund, the tax would be approximately $38,000 instead of $49,000, giving the company approximately $11,000 more to add to working capital.

If the company pays no dividends, its tax is $85,000 without the benefit of section 15 and about $71,000 if section 15 is made to apply. Paying out this tax and also paying out the $54,000, the sinking fund still left only about one-third of the company's income to add to the capital.

MILLERS FALLS CO.,
Greenfield, Mass., May 11, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wired you on May 9, as follows:

"Tax bill passed by House will greatly retard industry and be ruinous to small companies with limited capital. Hope you may favor a more reasonable tax."

We would like to be a little more explicit than is possible in a telegram. Our reference to "small companies" should not be taken to mean companies having a net income of $10,000 or less. It rather refers to the typical business which has been the backbone of industrial New England for a great many years, having annual sales ranging anywhere from $500,000 to $3,000,000.

The vicious part of the proposed law is that it places a tremendous handicap on industries of this size and type which have inadequate working capital. A great many such concerns have managed to emerge from the depression, but in a weakened financial condition, with run-down plants and equipment, and reduced markets. What they need badly at the present time is the restoration of their plant equipment and markets, which can only be accomplished by the expenditure of large sums of money.

To be more specific, let us take the case of a firm whose annual sales are $2,000,000, and who in 1936 might earn $125,000 net profit. This concern during the depression had depleted its entire working capital and borrowed heavily in order to exist. This concern has also refrained from paying dividends for a number of years in order to conserve its resources and to keep its business as active as possible and employ as many of its people as possible. Under the proposed tax it would in the future be forced to pay its dividend on its preferred stock, which would take approximately 50 percent of its net income. Then, deducting the Federal tax from the remainder, it would leave only approximately $16,000 out of the $125,000 net profit at the disposal of the company. This would be before taking the Massachusetts income tax, which, when deducted, would leave only approximately $13,000.

This concern would like to put back into its equipment, in the way of repairs and replacements, approximately $50,000 a year. If allowed to expand its business along a normal course, it would need to add at least $50,000 a year to its working capital. This addition to its plant equipment would mean buying from the heavy industry and thereby increasing employment therein; the addition to its own working capital would employ additional men to produce the additional goods which it would sell.

In addition to the disbursements mentioned above, the company would still be obliged to pay off the balance of its loan, borrowed during the depression, of approximately $100,000. It is obvious that the condition which the Federal tax law imposes, leaving the company with a balance of approximately $16,000 out of its earnings of $125,000, is such that the carrying out of its program will be impossible and its own business will be retarded, and it furthermore will not be able to contribute to the business of other industries. Surely no bank, individual, or even the Government itself, would make a loan to such a company without the prospects of repayment.

Respectfully yours,

EARL D. HULTBY.

ALVEY CONVEYOR MANUFACTURING CO.,
St. Louis, May 8, 1936.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Re proposed tax bill—corporation surplus tax.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Permit us to protest against the wisdom of indiscriminately taxing undistributed corporate profits. This might be quite all right for the relatively few tremendous and well-financed corporations that already have immense surpluses, but it would work a very definite hardship on the multitude of small companies throughout the country.

You realize, of course, that such a proposed tax would "freeze" the corporate structures of all those companies and, sadly indeed, "freeze" them at the present existing near-depression levels. How in the world will the smaller companies ever be able to make progress and achieve growth under such a taxation program? To "freeze" the corporate structures of the smaller businesses would, I believe, indeed be a calamity. Surely it cannot be the intention of a deliberative Senate to inflict any such terrible hardship on business, sentencing business structure to their condition at time of passage of such a law and making it practically impossible for them to grow or prosper through the necessary process of "plowing back" into their own small business, a proper proportion of profits if, as, and when made.

I hope you realize what a serious problem the proposed taxation of undivided profits creates for small businesses and small industries in our country.

Legislation as is proposed requires, I believe, long study and deliberation after the most complete public hearings and investigations.

Would it not be better to set up temporary taxes, such as reasonable graduated increase until a better planned bill can be more thoroughly worked out?

Again, please consider that capital improvements, such as new machinery, equipment, buildings, etc., are almost always financed out of profits. Under the proposed tax bill this would mean that the sales of all new machinery, equipment, etc., would be further handicapped by the new tax on undistributed profits which would apply in such cases.

And, Senator, I believe you will agree that the capital- or durable-goods industry in this country, and particularly the smaller companies, have already endured sufficiently hard siedding. Those that had acquired sufficient surplus, have managed to come through the depression times, but this is solely because of the surpluses they were able to build up in predepression times.

Your consideration of these points in connection with the proposed tax on undivided profits is respectfully urged.

Very truly yours,

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Federal revenue bill for 1936, featuring taxes on undistributed earnings of domestic corporations is now before the Senate's Committee on Finance. Undoubtedly you have received from intelligent corporation executives throughout the country, many letters pointing out the unsoundness of the provision referred to above.

Possibly, however, specific instances of the injustice and paralyzing influence such a provision would have had on the country in the past and will have in the future if enacted, may not have been brought to your attention. You may have heard of the corporation on whose letterhead I am writing. Ours is a typical example of the development of a business from small beginnings by reinvested earnings. Founded in 1880, the earnings of the corporation were plowed back into surplus for approximately 20 years. The capital stock was never enlarged from its original figure of $10,000, while the surplus went into the hundreds of thousands, all necessary capital required by the growth of the business. At no little sacrifice to the founders of the business, the corporation was thus enabled to expand, make its product nationally known, and to give employment to hundreds of employees and furnish working capital for scores of merchants throughout the length and breadth of the land. In no other way could this have been accomplished. It was an example of growth through savings, and the principal beneficiaries were the employees of the corporation.

With this experience before me, it would seem superfluous to say that I am heartily opposed to the proposed tax on undistributed corporate surplus, and I hope your influence will be cast against any such destructive menace to American business.

Very respectfully yours,

CLARENCE H. POND, President.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In the interest of candor, the pending revenue measure, if adopted, should be entitled: "A bill to sustain and promote monopoly."

As passed by the House, this measure strikes at the very vitals of our most cherished tradition—equality of opportunity.

When I recently appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee, I pointed out that it was significant that no representative of any real big corporation appeared in opposition to the bill. The reason is obvious, for the pending measure gives big business the nearest thing possible to a Government guaranty against future competition.

The Axton-Fisher Tobacco Co., which I represent, is one of the smaller units in the cigarette-manufacturing industry. Its working capital is provided by bank credits. The business has possibilities of substantial growth, if it is free to apply its excess earnings to pay off its indebtedness and to provide for expansion facilities.

Its large competitors, on the other hand, have many millions of dollars in accumulated surplus, and are practically free from bank indebtedness. Although they started from modest beginnings, they reached their present size by reinvesting each year a substantial part of their earnings in their business. Today, practically all of their earnings are paid out annually in dividends, for they have no need of added surplus.

If the proposed revenue measure becomes law, strong competitors would become stronger because in distributing their earnings, as they now do, they would not be required to pay any taxes at all; whereas, companies situated like our own would become weaker because they would, in effect, be penalized in applying their earnings to the liquidation of debts, or in using them to expand production facilities. In such a situation, real competition would soon cease because the source of competition, which lies in the opportunity to grow and expand, would be cut off at the source.

The proposed revenue measure, if passed, would not only "freeze" the present status of industry, but would inevitably tend to make the strong units stronger, and the weak ones weaker. In this lies the greatest threat to the American tradition—equality of opportunity.

I beg to enclose herewith a pamphlet which summarizes the arguments which I made before the House Ways and Means Committee. I should welcome the opportunity to appear before the Senate Finance Committee to present these views in detail.

Respectfully yours,

DEAN ALFANGE,
General Counsel.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since the final outcome of taxing undistributed surplus of corporations is of extreme interest to our stockholders, may I take a little of your time to represent them?

From 1930 to 1935, inclusive, our business volume made profitable operations impossible. During that period we dug into our reserves nearly $200,000—or $228.10 per employee per year. That, plus wages and salaries paid, was the price this one small company paid to keep its employees off relief rolls. In other words, it was recognized that a surplus was for the definite purpose of tiding over lean periods.

Is it not pertinent to inquire what would have happened had a surplus not been available? Had such a bill as is now pending been in force, making full distribution of earnings in effect mandatory, there would now be no jobs for these same employees—and no corporation to tax. Not unlike a farm, business fields must be fertilized or the field has a habit of running out.

Please do not misunderstand me. What has happened in this country during the past 3 years has got to be paid for, somehow, sometime, and by all of us. If taxing business out of existence were the only outcome, it might be justified in an emergency, but will not the effect be more far reaching? Does it not strike at our cherished form of Government and at society itself?

And it is about this rather than its immediate business influence that should be the chief concern of all, particularly of our legislators.

Yours very truly,

H. M. PARKS, President.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Re embryo corporations tax bill—

Permit me as one for a lifetime largely involved in two family textile corporations in Massachusetts, much of the time a desperate struggle, to urge you to support or to have inserted these two provisions:

(1) That corporation taxes or dividend pressure, should be distributed over a 3- or 5-year average of profits or losses—not based arbitrarily on the result of one hard and fast year.

(2) That extraordinary losses, at least of the "act-of-God" class, likewise be distributed through surplus over a series of years.

The fairness of such distribution toward giving, particularly to a small corporation, a "break", seems to me so obvious that it is axiomatic.

On the contrary, the unfairness and the possible strangulation of a concern can be imagined from this illustration, in which it is assumed there is no such protection.

It makes $20,000 in 1 calendar year, and is forced to pay tax or dividends therefrom. In the succeeding year it loses $20,000, but all in January. At the end of the 2 years it has only broken even, but has paid a large tax or has been forced to disgorge dividends. If its years had run from February 1, instead of January 1, its taxation or its cash depletion would have been nil, and would have corresponded to the actual facts. A 3-year average would have helped much in this case; and a 5-year, more.

As for (2), one of my concerns (Comins & Co. Inc., Rochdale), is struggling yet with flood repairs of some $30,000. We will be lucky if this year's profit is not absorbed by only one-third of this amount. If the Government wishes us to continue to operate, employ workers, and contribute taxes, the least it can do is to help us withstand a stroke which has almost staggered our small community concern.

On general principles, if the employee is to be allowed to average his remunerative years over the old-age ones of loss, why should not his employer who makes such possible, be allowed to average to some extent, the health and sickness of his business—which is the boat in which they all ride?

With best regards,

Yours very truly,

ARTHUR C. COMINS.

BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

[Telegram sent to Massachusetts Congressmen, Washington, D. C., Apr. 27, 1936]

Pending revenue act, although damaging to all types of corporate business, would be exceptionally severe upon New England business. We urge that you oppose it. A characteristic of New England business has always been its successful efforts to maintain stability and pursue prudent financial policies. The pending act directly penalizes attainment of these efforts. It means the compulsory injection of unsound practices in business management which, uniformly applied, will react unevenly and with undue unfairness on many firms. We believe the results will be discouragement of legitimate expansion, further loss of confidence so necessary to economic revival, and sustained or increased unemployment, and in general will tend toward social insecurity.

Acting Chairman, Committee on Federal Taxation and Expenditures.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington D. C.

DEAR DAVE: Regarding this proposed new tax, in 1922 and 1932, such a tax would have wiped our company out of business. If we had had such a tax the depression would have been very much more severe. In our plants we lost $1,000 a day, and our surplus had to be put into pay rolls to hold our organization together. There was no way of selling securities in these periods, and the banks would not make us increased loans, so that we had to use our past savings.

We have run along more or less consistently with our help for 30 years, discharging very few, but with a tax such as this new one, we would have to let go practically all of our people during a depression and then organize again when business was better. This may be the best for the country, but I am quite sure that I would have no interest in business, neither would the other leaders in our firm. The serious penalty is on conservatively managed business. At the present time the Government are not handling their business conservatively with their immense expenses.

I sincerely hope you will see your way clear to oppose this corporation tax.

Sincerely yours,

GIFFORD K. SIMONDS.

THE E. L. PATCH CO.,
Boston, Mass., April 27, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I was pleased to read in press reports that you are not as enthusiastic about increasing taxation as you are about cutting down expenditures. I would assume that one brought up in New England would not be too enthusiastic about dissipation of assets in times of good business. The proposed new tax bill might well be labeled "an act to dissipate assets."

Our company is like many New England companies who have operated for many years on a conservative policy, on a small capitalization. For many years we had no profits to tax. Then came a few prosperous years. Most all of the profits of these few prosperous years were conserved, first by paying debts, then by investing in bricks, mortar, machinery, and research.

This investment proved to be a wise one for The E. L. Patch Co., for our employees, and for the town of Stoneham. During the last 5 years when employment and wages have been so essential, we have kept up the number of employees and the wages far above the level that would have been our maximum if we had not invested more than 80 percent of our earnings for a few years. To do this we had to draw heavily on the reserves we had established.

If the proposed new tax law had been in effect during 1926, 1927, and 1928 the story would be an entirely different one for all concerned, including our good Uncle Sam. We would have paid larger dividends to avoid excessive taxation. The investment in building and other facilities never would have been made.

Debts would have remained. There is a strong possibility that by the year 1932 we would have been entirely out of business. At best we would have had many less employees, on smaller wages and salaries, with less than half the tax payments to the town of Stoneham, very little in tax payments to the State of Massachusets, and little, if anything, to the Federal Government.

Ask any citizen who knows the facts, what it has meant to the town of Stoneham to have the E. L. Patch Co. continue during these tough years, with wages, salaries, and dividends. I will tell you frankly it could not have been, if the proposed law had been in effect.

Without doubt many substantial, desirable corporations are right now in the position we were in, previous to 1926. A few years of good earnings might enable them to solidify so as to be real factors in the future prosperity of their communities. Some of these might be able to carry a big load when the next business slump comes. Why slowly strangle so many of these geese that might later lay the golden eggs that would prevent so much hardship and suffering?

If one follows through only from the point of view of final tax income to Uncle Sam, it seems to me very short-sighted policy to choke thousands of potential sources of taxes to punish a small number of businesses that carry on contrary to the ideas of some of our theorists, who never had the responsibility of providing a payroll 52 weeks in the year.

We know we must pay heavy taxes for a long time to liquidate our present debt. All my business experience tells me this new theory of taxation will prove to be a demonstration of the theory of diminishing returns.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH R. PATCH.

MEADVILLE, PA., April 7, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator,
Washington, District of Columbia.

DEAR SIR: As a prominent member of the Senate Finance Committee you will no doubt have much to do with the proposed plan of taxing corporation surpluses. Permit me as the president of a small corporation to write you my views on this subject.

I am strongly opposed to the proposed tax, not only as a general policy, but also because of its very serious effect on small companies. The present administration has definitely adopted a business and social policy which is unfavorable to bigness in industry and favorable to the smaller enterprises. This proposed tax plan works exactly contrary to this philosophy of business. It will help the big company and sound the death knell of thousands of small businesses.

The McCrosky Tool Corporation is not a large company, as previously stated. Our total invested capital is approximately $350,000. We entered the depression with no liabilities of any kind and with cash, Government bonds, and accounts receivable of approximately $85,000. We adopted the policy of maintaining our organization and keeping employees on the pay roll just as long as possible during the depression years. If it had not been for the comfortable little surplus of cash and Government bonds which we had gradually accumulated, we would have gone out of existence during the depression. In other words, if we had been operating under a tax policy that compelled us to pay out the greater part of our earnings in the form of dividends, we would have had no surplus and our company would have been unable to weather the depression storm. Surely it is not only the height of folly but it is a crime against American wage earners to jeopardize the existence of conservatively managed small businesses which are the backbone of American enterprise, by making it impossible for them to provide for a "rainy day."

Before the depression was over our cash and bonds had been largely exhausted and it became necessary for us to borrow approximately $25,000 from local banks to keep the business operating. It is unthinkable that our Government would adopt a tax program that will practically make it impossible for us to take our earnings to pay off these bank loans. If we were compelled to pay out the greater part of our earnings in dividends, it would take us many years to liquidate these bank loans and begin the accumulation of another little surplus against the inevitable "rainy day." This is not in the interests of either good business or good banking.

During the depression years it was practically impossible for a little concern like ours to purchase new equipment in order to offset the inroads of depression and obsolescence. Remarkable improvements have been made in mechanical equipment during the last 5 years and no concern can successfully compete that does not replace obsolete equipment with more modern and more efficient equipment. The tax program that is proposed would make it impossible for us to modernize our plant and thereby maintain our position against legitimate competition. Surely our Government must appreciate the importance of the so-called heavy industries and durable-goods industries in our industrial structure. Now a tax program is proposed that will make it very difficult for companies like ours to buy new machinery and therefore do our share in assisting the durable-goods industries, to say nothing of operating our own business on a successful and efficient basis.

Of course, academically, it might be said that if our earnings were paid out in the form of dividends, we can expand our business and increase our working capital and modernize our plant and build up cash reserves by the simple expedient of increasing our capitalization and selling more stock. This argument is purely academic. It might be possible that a large company whose stock is listed on the exchanges and is in constant demand by the investing public could accomplish these things by selling additional stock. The small company, like ours has no access whatever to the capital markets and no one would be interested in our capital stock except a few members of our own organization and it might well be that none of them would have the money nor the disposition to purchase additional stock. In other words, this plan of selling stock to raise capital is absolutely not feasible for the small company. Its only result would be to increase the size of bigness in business and to kill off the small companies within a very few years.

If the administration is sincere in this philosophy of helping the "little fellow" and discouraging bigness, then why not exonerate the smaller companies entirely from this new tax on earnings until the "little company" has grown to a certain size? Surely no company can be considered dangerously big with earnings of say $100,000 a year and with an invested capital of $500,000. In fact, it is difficult for most concerns to be efficient either from the standpoint of production or distribution if they are much smaller than that. Why not allow the present income-tax rates to apply against small businesses and then work out some kind of tax that would discourage great corporations from piling up surpluses that are obviously larger than necessary and which might be interpreted as dangerous to the best interests of society through the concentration of wealth and power.

You will pardon me for expressing myself at such length. You will admit, however, that I have merely taken time to touch a few basic principles, each one of which might be developed at great length. I plead with you, as an executive of one of America's small manufacturing enterprises which has had a fine successful, conservative record for 30 years, to consider the validity and truth of the points I have raised. It is difficult to conceive a greater tragedy in the history and progress of the American people than to put into effect a program that must obviously end in the results I have tried briefly to mention. Our little company has grown during the last 30 years almost entirely from "plowing in" its profits, the original investment amounting to only $40,000. We have also paid satisfactory dividends in good years. Our whole organization is filled with the spirit of growth and progress and we hope to continue growing by "plowing into" this business a goodly share of our earnings. There are only about 30 stockholders, most of whom are more interested to see the business grow and prosper than they are in a little return from their comparatively small stock holdings. We employ approximately 100 people, most of whom are home owners and a fine class of skilled workmen, sales engineers, office employees, mechanical engineers, etc. If America expects to expand industrially and to provide economic security for its people and to absorb some of the millions who are out of employment, it must be done by the growth and success of American business and not by killing off of thousands of small, progressive, growing concerns which can only prosper and grow by "plowing in" much of their profits, and which must pay off their debts and accumulate a reasonable surplus out of their income to insure their corporate existence. To do otherwise, to be compelled to distribute earnings before these things are accomplished would jeopardize the economic security of millions of America's employees and thousands of America's business enterprises. We have cited our own case as merely typical of the great majority of business concerns.

Respectfully submitted,

MCCROSKY TOOL CORPORATION,
F. P. MILLER, President.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,

[The Federal tax bill of 1936]

DEAR MR. WALSH: This bill is now being considered by the Senate, and thinking we are more or less typical of many Massachusetts corporations, we submit the following:

For many years, from 1917 on, this company was losing money fast so that 10 years ago we owed several hundred thousands of dollars to five interests. These five interests made us a low interest rate and carried us along with, for a good many years, no payments. However, during the last 10 years we have been doing better so have paid off about 40 percent of this amount.

If this bill should go through as proposed, we understand that along toward half of the profit we have paid on these old debts would have been appropriated by the Government. We still owe nearly $200,000 which we are most anxious to get paid, but what show will we have if the Government appropriates such a percentage?

Maybe there are conditions we do not understand, but submit above for what you find it worth.

Yours very truly,

ERVING PAPER MILLS,
S. C. WAITE, Treasurer.

EAST CAMBRIDGE, MASS., May 14, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator from Massachusetts,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In regard to the new corporation tax bill in Congress, we wish to give you an idea as to the effect on any comeback of small corporations which have been in red during the years of depression.

Our own company started in 1923 with $75,000 cash paid in capital; paid its preferred dividends up to 1931 and since then has shrunk its capital $40,000, while keeping its crew of about 10 men who otherwise would, in many cases, had to go on the welfare. We cannot, of course, pay any dividends while capital is impaired and any earnings would go to repair lost capital.

If, in the future, we are taxed too heavily on any earnings our stockholders may decide the game is not worth while and decide to liquidate, which would be too bad for our employees and the taxpayers.

Corporations need more than any dividends earned to provide for increased employment, expansion, and reserve for poor times.

We believe the better way for revenue is to broaden the base of individual income taxes, say around $5,000.

Respectfully yours,

RESISTO PIPE & VALVE CO.,
GEO. A. NASH, President.

ATTLEBORO, MASS., May 14, 1936.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
U. S. Senator from Massachusetts, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the Federal revenue bill for 1936, I am very apprehensive that if this bill goes through as it is now drawn that it will possibly force many of the small- and medium-sized concerns out of business.

Our corporation is fairly representative of many that I could mention. We have been operating for 17 years and have made some progress. We have been able most years to pay a dividend and also have been able to pay a reasonable amount of Government taxes during this time. We have created a small surplus and have continued to improve our equipment by purchasing new machinery moderately.

We have also had in mind the possibility of building a new plant to replace the inadequate quarters that we are now leasing. If this bill goes through it would probably preclude our company's doing any of these things planned, the result of which would be that in a short while our plant equipment would be obsolete and inadequate for our requirements. Whereas, if the surplus we have could be left for the purpose for which it is intended, we would be able to go through the depression and come out with a view to expanding and increasing our facilities.

We have built up a substantial foreign market for some of our products in the last few years, but in order to sell our products in foreign markets it is very necessary for us to be able to produce same to the very best advantage. Unless we can add improved equipment to our machinery, it is doubtful if we can continue to hold this market.

The same also applies to the domestic market to a lesser extent.

With the proposed new taxation, it will be impossible for us to carry on in the way we planned, and the result would be that eventually we would probably have to go out of business to the detriment and loss of our stockholders.

We might say that there are a number of manufacturers in this town who would be in a like situation, and it will be a great blow to the city of Attleboro and its industries if a modification cannot be made to change the plan.

We hope that you will give this plea your most earnest and sincere consideration.

Yours very truly,

MOSSBERG PRESSED STEEL CORPORATION,
FRANK MOSSBERG,
President and General Manager.

BUFFALO, N. Y., April 25, 1936.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The proposed new basis for taxing corporations will undoubtedly act to stunt the economic growth of small corporations and will rob large corporations of necessary reserves with which to reduce the ill effects of future depressions on labor and tend to increase unemployment.

These effects will be brought about without in any way benefiting the large number of stockholders by adding to the dividends received by them.

This business organization started over 30 years ago with a small capital as a sole proprietorship, with few employees, and has by thrift and frugality progressively invested annual earnings in the building up of a capital structure that has enabled it to continuously, all through the depression, employ 150 persons. Not only have no employees been discharged or laid off or wages reduced, but, on the contrary, working hours were reduced from 50 to 40 hours per week; and while under the N. R. A. minimum wages for men and women were 35 cents per hour, men have never been paid less than a minimum of 50 cents per hour, and women were increased under the code from 25 to 35 cents per hour minimum. These schedules are still in effect.

Had a large percentage of earnings in the past been dissipated in dividends and taxes, this sound economic growth in which our workers have shared so advantageously would have been impossible.

This letter attempts only to convey to you in a simple way the harmful effects of the proposed new taxation as it would apply to this simple, economic, but beneficial unit.

In considering corporation taxes we sincerely trust that due thought will be given the position of small corporations, for we believe a great majority of corporations are no larger than ours and exert about the same beneficial influence upon the economic lives of the people.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I desire to protest against the proposed corporation tax bill—

1. Because as a practical matter it places small corporations at a disadvantage as compared with large ones.
2. Because it places one more serious obstacle in the way of small corporations in their effort to meet their debts and survive the depression.
3. Because the dividend policy of very few corporations is dictated by any consideration of tax dodging and it seems unfair to penalize the many in an effort to punish a few offenders.
4. Because it will create more injustices than it will correct.
5. Because it is likely to prolong the depression and to cost the United States Government more money than it will raise.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,

HONORABLE DEAR SIR: We as an old Massachusetts establishment doing business in this Commonwealth for the past 73 years make this appeal to you, one of our honorable Senators.

If the Federal tax bill of 1936 being considered by the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate should become a law, it would work a frightful hardship upon us.

By careful management we have come through the past 4 years of depression, maintaining a working force of some 40 men and women who would have otherwise been dependent upon welfare or other forms of charitable assistance for means of support.

During the past year it has been necessary for us to borrow funds to carry on our business. The repayment of this indebtedness we propose paying over a period of the next 3 years. However, we will be seriously handicapped in making payments by the taxes inflicted by this new tax bill.

The banks, anticipating the situation, are already making demands of us for payments in advance of the time due, which they would otherwise allow to remain if it were not for the fact that this bill is pending.

We therefore strongly urge you to use your influence to bring about the defeat of this bill, which will lay a frightful burden not only upon us but do irreparable harm to our employees, no doubt forcing thousands of small companies to close their doors, adding many more to the already vast army of unemployed.

SENATOR DAVID I. WALSH,

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Enclosed is a pamphlet, which is self-explanatory. The writer has gone to this effort and expense in order to present to Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives the effect of the contemplated legislation upon this business.

The Federal Government in Washington cannot judge when this business should pay dividends, and this proposed bill is an automatic invasion of the rights of the employees and stockholders of this business.

This criticism is nonpartisan. The record will show that the writer contributed $1,000 to the National Democratic Committee, which certainly was an endorsement of President Roosevelt's 1932 platform and his actions during the early days of his administration. However, he has lost many supporters amongst our employees, officers, and stockholders, by reason of the fact that such a burden of taxation and extravagant governmental operation are indicative of gross incompetence.

It would seem that the executive and administrative branch of our Government completely dominates the legislative, of which you are a member. The Chief Executive seems to act on advice of a group of theorists and impractical college professors whom we did not elect to public office and hence should have no status.

It is not too late for the administration to change its tactics and again perform according to the campaign pledges set forth in the last Presidential election. We sincerely hope that such will be the case.

Surplus	[1] 1,298.50

[1] Deficit.

During the depression the company's surplus account was entirely wiped out, and on March 20, 1933, a creditors' committee was formed in an attempt to save the business from failure. The president, George B. Storer, and his mother advanced additional funds to liquidate all small creditors' claims, and the larger creditors' accepted notes. The president had been serving without salary since 1930 and was not paid any salary until February of 1936. He now receives $500 per month.

By the most careful economy and judicious management it was possible to pay off the creditors and dissolve the creditors' committee on June 20, 1935.

During the depression the National Tube Co., a unit of the United States Steel Corporation, was able to take a large volume of business away from its small competitor, the Standard Tube Co.

The latter company was unable to meet this competition by purchasing new, modern equipment, being hampered by lack of working capital. By reason of the special price schedule put into operation by its large competitors under the N. R. A., the Standard Tube Co. suffered additional encroachments of its business.

The Standard Tube Co., in order to place itself in a position to compete with the large manufacturers of tubing and pipe, purchased, in January of 1936, a new tube mill at a total installed cost of $300,000. Funds to pay for this mill were raised by the sale of stock to company officers, employees, and stockholders, together with a small public offering. These funds, plus the earnings of the company, will, it is hoped, cover the cost of the new mill and provide the necessary additional working capital required. Substantially all of the earnings of the Standard Tube Co. will be required for some time to come to help defray the cost of this new mill and provide additional working capital. A small amount, representing normal interest rate on the investment, should be paid to stockholders. Without the installation of this mill the Standard Tube Co. would eventually be put out of business by its large competitors.

Furthermore, it is self-evident that the surplus, which was wiped out during the late depression, must be replaced in order to protect primarily the employees, and secondarily, to protect the investment, in future business recessions.

In view of the above facts the employees, officers, directors, and stockholders implore that the proposed tax bill, H. R. 12395, be modified to give relief to firms such as the Standard Tube Co., of which there are many thousands in the United States. These small concerns give employment to the major portion of the industrial workers of the United States.

SENATOR DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit us to express to you the decided objection of the undersigned as officers of this company to the Revenue Act of 1936 now before the Senate Finance Committee of Congress.

In our best judgment, if the provisions contained in the proposed act had been in force during the past 10 years, American Stove Co. would not have been able to continue in business since 1929, as it has, nor to pay out millions for material, supplies, and wages, as it has. Our dividends ceased in the fall of 1929, not to be resumed until a moderate profit returned in 1935, but our surplus set aside from previous earnings from years of fair profit in the form of cash in bank, Government and other sound bonds, enabled us to keep our factories open, our sales forces active, our pension system for employees in force, and our factories and machinery in repair, and our taxes on real and personal property paid promptly when due.

For the Government by such legislation to render it difficult, if not impossible, for corporate officers and directors to pursue a prudent and sound policy during years of profit is to invite disaster both to the businesses under their change and to the Nation as well.

For the Government to discard a tax system which has evolved gradually and has been clarified and interpreted by litigation and court decisions and substitute a new system entirely theoretical in its effects and application to the needs of the Government for revenue and to the taxpaying corporation for some degree of certainty in anticipating tax burdens, is not wise nor intelligent.

We, therefore, earnestly urge your action to defeat this bill with its radical and unwise changes in our taxing system.

Respectfully yours,

L. STOCKSTROM,
President, American Stove Co.
GEORGE F. FISKE,
Treasurer, American Stove Co.

ST. LOUIS, May 13, 1936.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As a practical businessman, having been in active business for more than 50 years, permit me to call to your attention the dangers which lie ahead if the new tax bill as now proposed is adopted.

The profits of young and growing business ventures are mostly not in cash, but are absorbed in the business through increased accounts receivable, merchandise, machinery, etc. For such businesses to be compelled to borrow each year sufficient to pay out their earnings in cash, or to be compelled to pay very heavy taxes on that part of their earnings not paid out in cash, would be suicidal.

Had such a law been in effect when Henry Ford started in business, it is evident that today there would be no Ford Motor Co., and what applies to Henry Ford applies equally as well to all new and growing ventures.

Large businesses with ample capital and sufficient surplus can well afford to pay out their earnings in cash, but others cannot do so, except at great hazard to their business.

The new tax bill as proposed will be a complete check on the development of a vast number of American industries. To my mind, an increase in the tax on corporate income to 20 percent, or even to 22½ percent, would be far more advisable and would do less harm to the business interests of our country than the present proposed tax.

Yours truly,

AARON WALDHEIM.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., May 1, 1936.

The Honorable DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

SIR: As our representative in the United States Senate, we earnestly ask your help in our behalf. The proposal to place a prohibitive Federal tax on undistributed corporation earnings will, we fear, have a far-reaching harmful effect on the continuation of our business, which has been established here in Springfield since 1931.

Webster's New International Dictionary, second edition, copyright 1934, represents an expenditure for editorial work and plates of $1,300,000. For a publishing house this amount of money is a large investment, and was built from earnings of the business for the past 15 years. By no stretch of the imagination could a small company like ours borrow money to this amount, nor would any but the owners wait a long term of years for their recompense.

If the proposed bill becomes law and we are prohibited from accumulating savings from our business for future revisions of the Merriam-Webster dictionaries, is it not fair to conceive that the possibility for future revisions will cease, with dire results not only to this company but to American education?

Respectfully yours,

BIRD & SON,
East Walpole, Mass., May 12, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I have given considerable thought and study to the Federal revenue bill for 1936 which has been passed by the House and is now before the Senate's Committee on Finance, of which I understand you are a member.

If the bill is enacted in substantially its present form, it is bound to result in reduction of surpluses, so that the next depression could be even worse than the present one. From reliable data, I have learned that in the 6 years from 1930 to 1935, corporations as a whole disbursed nearly $28,000,000,000 in excess of their earnings to cover operating losses and to continue dividend payments. It staggers the imagination to think what would have happened had these corporations not been prepared with adequate surpluses to carry them this far through the depression.

It is only through the ploughing back into the business of surplus earnings that we have been able to weather the storm, and it seems to me that any medium of taxation as uneconomic as the proposed bill appears to be will legislate many of our corporations out of business.

I am sure you will give this matter your serious consideration and have in mind the consequences that may result if the bill as passed by the House is enacted into law. I rely on your good judgment to do all in your power to protect, through the corporations, the pay envelopes of the working men, to say nothing of the dividends for the stockholders.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

A. H. ANDERSON, Treasurer.

HUDSON, MASS, May 12, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is not very often that we write our Senators and Representatives regarding bills before Congress, but we are very much interested in some of the legislation now before Congress, particularly the bill featuring taxes and undistributed earnings. We are very much opposed to this measure.

The past few years we have built up a nice foreign business, and we are very much afraid that the increasing cost of manufacturing caused by legislation will make it impossible for us to hold our foreign markets.

We have always considered it a wise policy to put a small part of earnings into a reserve or surplus to help to weather unprofitable years; we look on this in the same light as the opportunity of laboring classes depositing money in savings banks for their reserves. If we destroy these reserves we destroy one of the greatest fundamentals which has helped to build up this country.

Very truly yours,

SHARON, MASS., May 14, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I would unquestionably be characterized as a very small stockholder. The few shares of stock that I own are in the so-called widows' and orphans' group. My purpose in having these stocks is to get a small amount of regular income to help pay heavy bills that accumulate each year in the form of insurance premiums, etc.

The tax bill which the House of Representatives has passed and which is presently under Senate consideration does not impress me as being sound from my standpoint. I would certainly much rather have smaller dividends steadily than larger ones in times of prosperity and none in times of depression when I need them most. This bill seems to ignore this situation, and I certainly would urge that you oppose it for the great number of your constituents that I feel sure must be in exactly the same position.

Very truly yours,

H. T. MARSHALL.

MASSACHUSETTS LEATHER MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Peabody, Mass., May 5, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing a copy of a statement which sets forth briefly the hazardous position that the members of our industry will be placed in if the proposed corporate tax law becomes effective.

Commodity processing industries with large running inventories, slow turnover, cause unrealizeable inventory profits to be mingled with real income.

Please note that profits and losses in the tanning industry are largely determined by price changes of raw stock and that inventory valuations are subject to very abrupt changes.

In behalf of this association, representing 37 tanneries, I urge you to read this enclosed statement which demonstrates the harmful effects of the proposed legislation on our members.

Very sincerely,

R. S. ROBERTS, Secretary.

PROPOSED CORPORATE TAX LAW A SERIOUS THREAT TO BUSINESS EXISTENCE OF MANY CORPORATIONS IN COMMODITY-PROCESSING INDUSTRIES

The following eight points summarize the reasons why many corporations may be practically forced out of business under the proposed tax law. Any period of rising prices will make it necessary for unrealized inventory profits to be either distributed or paid out in taxes. Neither of these can be done without increased borrowing, seriously impairing working capital, or business liquidation.

1. Inventories major part of assets in tanning and other industries; turnover may require 12 months or more.

Those industries which would be most seriously affected by the law are, typically, commodity processing industries. In such industries large inventories of raw material as well as material in process must always be maintained and cannot be liquidated, since they are essential to a continuation of business. Consequently, a great part of a company's assets will be represented by inventories. In the tanning industry, for example, inventories are normally more than 50 percent of total assets. This is necessary by virtue of the long period which elapses between the purchase of raw material and the sale of finished leather. In the tanning of heavy leathers, such as sole, belting, and harness, 10 months or a year may be required to effect a complete turnover. The tanning of kid leather may require a period of 12 to 15 months between the commitment for raw material and payment for finished leather. Almost 100 percent of the kidskins used by tanners, and large percentages of other raw materials must be imported. To the already long process period of tanning, which in heavy leather extends to 4 months, must be added, therefore, the months intervening between the purchase of raw material and its arrival from abroad.

2. Value of inventory subject to sharp change.

Forced to carry large inventories by the nature of its business, the tanning industry must bear an exceptional risk. Raw material price levels fluctuate sharply. The data in example 1 show the extent to which this has been the case in the past 10 years, when price changes of from 50 to 100 percent were not unusual. Such price changes directly affect the value of the industry's inventories. Huge inventories, in conjunction with sharp price fluctuations, have an extremely pertinent bearing upon the question of profits and taxes.

3. Profits and losses in tanning industry are determined to a great extent by price changes in raw materials.

Under present required methods of valuing inventories, namely, "cost" or "cost of market, whichever is lower", changes in the value of inventory must be reflected in income. On a rising market as low-priced material is sold, it must be replaced by higher-priced goods. Profits made on the sale of low-cost goods are completely absorbed in inventory, since physical inventories in the tanning industry must remain more or less constant. The value of this inventory may be higher, but this increase in value cannot be realized as cash profit short of complete or partial business liquidation. On any downswing in prices such paper profits will be eliminated.

4. True income cannot be shown by annual statements in industries with large inventories and slow turnover.

In the tanning industry real operating income cannot be shown for a 12-month period. In this industry, and in other commodity-processing industries, the annual statement of income does not measure true income any more accurately than monthly statements would. With any rising trend in prices, inventory profits which are nonrealizable and speculative must be included in net income. For example, a corporation might buy and sell during a year of rising prices an identical quantity at an identical price. It could not, therefore, have earned any real profits. Yet its income statement for the year would show profits. The extent to which this is possible is illustrated by the raw material price changes given in example I and the illustration developed in example II which indicate that corporations face impairment of working capital, if not bankruptcy, under the contemplated law.

In view of the circumstances emphasized above it is obvious that taxes upon annual income must work a hardship for many corporations unles inventory losses may be offset against inventory profits.

5. Unrealizable inventory profits are taxed under existing law. Proposed corporate tax law would aggravate this inequality and create a disastrous situation.

Unrealizable inventory profits must automatically be included in income according to present tax regulations. They are, therefore, taxable under the present law, but under the proposed law this condition would be aggravated to a degree which might force many corporations out of business. Since inventory profits are not realizable, since they are tied up in physical material which may decline in value just as quickly as it has risen, they obviously cannot be distributed as dividends. Such profits, therefore, cannot be taxed at the contemplated rates without seriously injuring the working capital of many corporations.

6. Since unrealizable profits cannot be distributed, proposed taxes could be met by many corporations only through borrowing, impairment of working capital, or liquidation of business.

On the attached chart, example III, "Price Changes and Income in Tanning Industry", the profits and losses of four typical tanning companies are contrasted with the course of raw-material prices. Obviously, changing prices appear to be the most important factor in the rate of profit or loss. During a period of sharply advancing prices it is not unusual in the tanning industry for unrealized inventory profits to constitute the major part of total income. Reversely, a decline in the price cycle will create inventory losses more than offsetting any previous gains. This is plainly the case in the fluctuating income of the four companies shown in example III. If the proposed tax rates were applied to the profits indicated in example III, with no redress for periods of inventory losses, the question may well be asked, "How could such taxes be paid, when profits are largely nonrealizable?"

Example II on the attached is an extremely possible illustration of the difficulty which may develop for tanning companies under the proposed law. In this example, a company with capital value of $800,000 has an apparent income of $100,000. It has actually earned only $36,000, but as the result of a rising price trend, its inventory is worth $64,000 more at the end of the year than at the beginning. In other words, $36,000 is earned, realized income, and $64,000 is unrealized paper profit. Dividends and taxes can be paid only with the true income of $36,000. Under the existing law this company would pay $16,760 in taxes and would still have available cash profits for dividend distribution. Under the proposed law the maximum this company could retain would be $57,500. Neglecting capital-stock and excess-profit taxes, it would have to pay $42,500. Since actual cash earnings were but $36,000, it would be necessary to borrow from the banks, liquidate inventory, or impair working capital merely to pay the tax. Any dividends would be out of the question unless at the cost of still further borrowing or impairment of assets. Would any bank loan money on inventory profits which might disappear completely the following year with a decline in raw material prices?

7. Small corporations or corporations with limited resources most adversely affected.

An additional consideration which cannot be ignored is the effect of the proposed law upon small corporations, or corporations with limited resources. Their competitive position would be severely handicapped in contrast with corporations possessing more ample resources. This would definitely seem to favor monopolistic trends in industry.

8. Commodity-processing industries such as tanning require modification of law to avoid drastic and dangerous consequences.

The anomalous situation which must arise from the passage of the proposed law may be relieved principally by permitting profits and losses to be offset for a specified number of years. It has been emphasized above that the true income of commodity-processing industries such as tanning cannot be reflected in annual income, because of the large inventories and slow turn-over in such industries. While the existing law is unjust in this respect, the proposed law would aggravate the situation to a dangerous extent. If losses might be offset against profits, the inequitable consequences of the law might tend to be relieved. Such provision was formerly embodied in the law and is the case in England and France where periods of 6 and 3 years, respectively, are allowed.

Relief from the inequity of the proposed law may also be extended to commodity-processing industries through recognition of their need for certain accounting methods. Such methods of valuing inventories as "normal stock" or "last in, first out" tend to distinguish between true earned income and inventory profit. If the use of such methods were permitted to commodity-processing corporations, by law or tax regulation, it would be possible for them to pay corporate taxes upon actual realized income alone.

EXAMPLE II

Company in business January 1, 1936, capital value, $800,000. Raw material market price: January 1, $1 per unit; December 31, $2.06 per unit. Average purchases, $1.53.

Company has opening inventory January 1, 1936, of 200,000 units valued at $200,000; during year 300,000 units are purchased for $459,000, and 300,000 units are sold for $495,000, leaving an obvious merchandising cash profit of $36,000.

But the "average cost or market" method of valuing inventories and arriving at profit or loss for the year must yield the following results:

200,000 units (opening inventory)	$200,000.00
300,000 units (purchases)	459,000.00
500,000 units	659,000.00
Giving an "average cost" per unit of	1.32

Since 300,000 units were sold, the closing inventory would remain at 200,000 units, valued at the average cost ($1.32 per unit) or $264,000.

Cost of sales is the difference between $659,000 and closing inventory of $264,000, or $395,000.

Since sales of 300,000 units were made for $495,000, the profit under this most conservative of allowable inventory methods would be $100,000.

It will be seen that this total consists of inventory profit of $64,000 and realized income of $36,000.

To what extent would the income shown above be taxable under the existing corporate tax law and the proposed law?

Present law (total tax, including capital-stock and excess-profit taxes): Total income, $100,000; tax $16,760; possible dividends, $19,240.

It is assumed here that there is available for taxes and dividends $36,000 of the total income of $100,000. Since $64,000 included in the total income is an inventory profit it cannot be distributed in dividends.

Proposed law (neglecting capital-stock and excess-profits taxes): Total income, $100,000; retained, maximum which can be retained, $57,500; tax, $42,500. This is more than the $36,000 which is available for taxes and dividends; $6,500 must be borrowed merely to pay the tax.

In this instance not only would no dividend distribution be possible but $6,500 would need to be borrowed or otherwise raised merely to pay the tax. If the tax were to be the same as under the present law the following situation would arise: Income, $100,000; tax,[1] $16,700; dividends, $51,480; total tax and dividends, $68,240; available for taxes and dividends, $36,000; to be borrowed or raised, $32,240.

The tax in this case is exactly the same as would be paid under the 1935 law. In order that this may be done, however, dividends of $51,480 must be paid. The total of dividends and taxes is in excess of the actual earned income by $32,240. That sum would need to be borrowed or inventory and other assets would have to be liquidated.

Mr. MALONEY obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I merely wish to ask my colleagues to remain in the Chamber until we get through with the bill. It is our desire to conclude its consideration early this evening, and I hope Senators will make their arrangements to remain until we dispose of it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, is the Senator from Connecticut going to discuss the pending amendment?

Mr. MALONEY. I am for just a moment or two.

Mr. COUZENS. Very well.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, Senators have the frailty of other human beings, and they have a desire to get away from Washington. It is my wish to encourage that desire by not talking long at this time. I have risen particularly to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] if he will not permit a division of the three paragraphs of his amendment, so they may be voted upon separately?

I have a very high regard for the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who has just spoken so ably. After his long study, he has stated the paradoxical position in which he and other members of the committee find themselves. None of us has had a chance to study the triplicate proposal of the Senator from Colorado. It is my impression, as I look at it very hurriedly, that the third paragraph of his proposal is too much of a catch-all to be passed upon quickly, and that it would permit the payment of a huge part of the indebtedness of corporations which did not require such assistance.

It seems to me the first paragraph of the amendment might properly and wisely prevail. The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] said in a colloquy with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] that during the wartime many large structures were built and much machinery purchased to avoid the payment of taxes. Conditions are very different now from what they were during the war. Corporations then secured business on a 10-percent-plus-profit basis from the Government.

[1] Under the schedule for adjusted net incomes of more than $10,000, in order to pay a tax of $16,760 on the total adjusted net income of $100,000, it would be necessary to pay dividends of $51,480 and retain $31,760.

But now, particularly in my section of the country, we see many large factory buildings being torn down to avoid the payment of municipal taxes. It seems to me if we do not permit corporations to have the benefit provided for in the first paragraph of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado, we will be actually putting a tax upon industrial progress. We can properly and wisely adopt the first paragraph, which would encourage building and afford men work, and return to stricken municipalities some small part of the taxes which they have lost. If we can return that tax, and at the same time secure employment for some portion of the people of those communities who are now denied work, by the adoption of this amendment we can lighten the local tax burden and perhaps withdraw the necessity of so much relief from the Federal Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would make it impossible, as we are informed by the experts from the Treasury Department, to obtain any revenue from the bill at all. It would merely provide loopholes, and I hope for that reason the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] has asked to have the three paragraphs of the amendment voted on separately. I submit that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks that the three paragraphs of the amendment be voted on separately. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the first branch of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the second branch of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the third branch of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has several amendments which he desires to offer.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, representing the Finance Committee I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. There are several other amendments, but this is the only one which needs to be applied to a committee amendment. It would merely amplify and make more accurate the definition of mutual investment companies which is found in the committee amendment now pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the committee amendment which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 30, after line 2, it is proposed to insert a new subsection, to read as follows:

(3) Dividends paid: In the case of mutual investment companies the credit provided in section 27.

On page 53, line 12, insert at the end thereof the following:

The credit allowed by this subsection shall not be allowed to mutual investment companies. (For definition of mutual investment company, see section 1001.)

On page 292, after line 15, insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

(15) The term "mutual investment company" means any corporation (whether created by agreement, declaration of trust, statute, or otherwise), other than a common trust fund as defined in section 169, organized for the purpose and engaged exclusively in holding, investing, or reinvesting in stocks or securities, 90 percent of whose gross income is derived from dividends, interest, or gains from sales or other disposition of stocks or securities, and whose members or stockholders are, upon reasonable notice and under reasonable conditions, entitled to withdraw their respective interests in the company's properties, or the cash equivalent thereof: Provided, That at no time during the taxable year subsequent to a date 30 days after the date of the enactment of this act (1) more than 10 percent of the gross assets of the company taken at market value was invested in stock or securities or both of a single corporation or of any group of corporations (and for this purpose "group of corporations" means one or more chains of corporations connected through stock ownership with a common parent corporation if at least 25 percent of the voting stock of each corporation (except the common parent corporation) is owned by one or more of the other corporations, and the common parent corporation owns at least 25 percent of the voting stock of at least one of the other corporations), and (2) at no time during the taxable year the company owned, directly or indirectly, more than 5 percent of the outstanding stock or securities or both of any corporation, and (3) at no time during the taxable year more than 10 percent of the company's outstanding stock or securities or both (except coupon bonds, the amount of which shall not at any time during the taxable year exceed 25 percent of the total assets of the company taken at market value) was owned directly or indirectly by or for any one individual (and for this purpose stock or security owned, directly or indirectly, by a corporation, partnership, estate, or trust shall be considered as being owned proportionately by its shareholders, partners, or beneficiaries, and an individual shall be considered as owning, to the exclusion of any other individual, the stock or securities owned, directly or indirectly, by his family, the family of an individual for this purpose including only his brothers and sisters (whether by the whole or half blood), spouse, ancestors, and lineal descendants), and (4) the company at all times during the taxable year maintained records showing the names and addresses of all actual owners of its outstanding stock and securities, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner and approved by the Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this one amendment illustrates the tremendous difficulty the committee has had in drafting the bill. It took so much of the time of the experts that we were unable to present the amendment when the bill was originally presented. It expresses the united views of the committee on this very important question, and sets up strict limitations and restrictions upon mutual investment companies before they may take advantage of the benefits prescribed. The amendment is acceptable to the Senator from Georgia, I know.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this is the amendment which was passed on by the subcommittee?

Mr. WALSH. It is offered at this time because it relates to the subject matter of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. It was considered and passed upon by the subcommittee?

Mr. WALSH. It was, and unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, while it is true that this amendment was submitted to a subcommittee for consideration, I do not think the full committee had an opportunity of considering the subcommittee's recommendations. I merely wish to make this observation because, while I am not going to oppose the amendment, I think it is full of many possible loopholes; and I hope it will be watched very carefully to see that no person not entitled to the exemption takes advantage of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the matter in lines 1 and 2, on page 30, was agreed to be reconsidered, and that the same action be taken with respect to other sections affected by this amendment, if other committee amendments have heretofore been agreed to, so that the amendment may be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the section as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the words "bank or trust company", and insert "bank, or a banking institution engaged only in a business similar to that transacted by Morris Plan banks, or a trust company", followed by a comma.

Mr. GEORGE. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Ohio, and with the consent of the acting chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I shall be glad to accept the amendment for conference consideration.

Mr. KING. It may go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. The question now is on the amendment on pages 30 and 31, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there is an amendment on page 53, subsection (c), which was passed over. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] desires to offer an amendment to the committee amendment at that point.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the committee amendment on page 53, beginning at line 13. It provides for rewriting section (c), and dividing it into two sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 53, it is proposed to strike out lines 13 to 23, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert:

(c) CONTRACTS RESTRICTING PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS.—

(1) PROHIBITION ON PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS.—An amount equal to the excess of the adjusted net income over the aggregate of the amounts which can be distributed within the taxable year as dividends without violating a provision of a written contract executed by the corporation prior to May 1, 1936, which provision expressly deals with the payment of dividends. If a corporation would be entitled to a credit under this paragraph because of a contract provision and also to one or more credits because of other contract provisions, only the largest of such credits shall be allowed, and for such purpose if two or more credits are equal in amount only one shall be taken into account.

(2) DISPOSITION OF PROFITS OF TAXABLE YEAR.—An amount equal to the portion of the earnings and profits of the taxable year which is required (by a provision of a written contract executed by the corporation prior to May 1, 1936, which provision expressly deals with the disposition of earnings and profits of the taxable year) to be paid within the taxable year in discharge of a debt, or to be irrevocably set aside within the taxable year for the discharge of a debt; to the extent that such amount has been so paid or set aside. For the purposes of this paragraph, a requirement to pay or set aside an amount equal to a percentage of earnings and profits shall be considered a requirement to pay or set aside such percentage of earnings and profits. As used in this paragraph, the word "debt" does not include a debt incurred after April 30, 1936.

(3) DOUBLE CREDIT NOT ALLOWED.—If both paragraph (1) and paragraph (2) apply, the one of such paragraphs which allows the greater credit shall be applied; and, if the credit allowable under each paragraph is the same, only one of such paragraphs shall be applied.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, this amendment was generally discussed in the committee; and in view of the language in the bill there were left out, in the judgment of the committee, other forms of debt than those dealing with the payment of dividends. The last words on line 22, page 53, seem to exclude obligations of the corporation to pay debts or withhold earnings for specific purposes under contract.

In this amendment we extended the period from March 3, 1936, to May 1, 1936. I have consulted those on the committee, and, so far as the committee is concerned, there seems to be no reason for not adopting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 270, where it is proposed to insert, after line 10, the following:

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 801. DEDUCTION FOR ESTATE TAX INSURANCE.

(a) Section 401 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For the purposes of this section the value of the net estate shall be determined as provided in title III of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended, except that (1), in lieu of the exemption of $100,000 provided in section 303 (a) (4) of such act, the exemption shall be $40,000; and (2) there shall be deducted from the value of the net estate as thus determined the proceeds (to the extent included in gross estate) of life-insurance policies payable to (and received by) the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the payment of estate, inheritance, succession, legacy, or other death duties levied by the United States against or with respect to the estate of the decedent, exclusive of any excess over the amount of such taxes which excess shall be accounted for (without interest) to the executor or administrator of the decedent for the benefit of the persons entitled thereto: Provided, however, That the proceeds of policies on which the premium-paying period provided in the policy is less than 10 years, or on which the premiums are not substantially equal in amount for each of the first 10 years of the life of the policy, or on which more than 1 year's premium has been paid in advance, shall not be deductible: Provided further, That the amount deductible as aforesaid shall not include premiums paid in advance, and shall not exceed $1,000,000."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall be effective only with respect to transfers of estates of decedents dying after the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the amendment on page 270 ends on line 16, page 271. There has been a considerable campaign to permit small industries to insure their principals for the purpose of paying their estate tax without being compelled to disintegrate the corporation.

The committee discussed the matter at considerable length, and agreed upon the language, I think, that is in the bill; but in order to have no misunderstanding I propose an amendment on line 13, cutting out "$1,000,000" and inserting "$250,000."

This means that a premium of $250,000, which is substantially the amount of a premium on a million dollars, would be deducted from the principal of the estate. I believe that is generally agreed upon by the committee and others who favor some relief from the estate tax on small industries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 271, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$250,000."

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, as the author of the amendment appearing in the bill, I accept the amendment presented by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEIWER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STEIWER. Is the amendment which I sent to the desk a few minutes ago now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let the amendment presented by the Senator from Oregon be stated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are a number of other committee amendments. Will not the Senator from Oregon withhold his amendment until they can be acted on?

Mr. GEORGE. Will not the Senator permit the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to be stated so that it may be seen whether it is an amendment to the committee amendment or an amendment to the original text?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Oregon whether the amendment he presents is an amendment to a committee amendment or to the original language.

Mr. STEIWER. I do not think it is an amendment to a committee amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I make the same suggestion as that made by the Senator from Utah. May I inquire of the clerk whether any others of the committee amendments in the bill have been passed over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there are not any others which have been passed over.

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have a number of committee amendments to offer which are largely to administrative features of the bill, which have been worked out since the bill was reported to the Senate from the committee. One of them involves striking out the language of an amendment which probably has already been agreed to. In that case I shall have to ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered. But I do not wish now to complicate the situation by offering the amendments prior to the completion of the amendments which the Senator from Massachusetts desires to offer, which may involve the same procedure.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia has finished with the committee amendments he had to offer, I will offer some amendments on behalf of the committee, in addition.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Kentucky, as chairman of subcommittees, were authorized to submit certain amendments on behalf of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I desire to offer several amendments, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the first amendment presented by the Senator from Massachusetts on behalf of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 67, line 6, after the word "title", it is proposed to insert "and such other information for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may by regulations prescribe."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the amendment merely gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue authority to make regulations asking for further information necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 68, line 10, after "title", it is proposed to insert "and such other information for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may by regulations prescribe."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this amendment is similar to the one just agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment presented by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 150, line 5, after "title", it is proposed to insert "and such other information for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may by regulations prescribe."

Mr. WALSH. This is an amendment similar to those which have just been acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 162, lines 23 and 24, it is proposed to strike out the words "subject to the tax imposed by this title."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 174, line 13, after "title", it is proposed to insert "and such other information for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may by regulations prescribe."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing ot the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment which I offer for the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 804. SUITS TO ENFORCE LIENS FOR TAXES.

(a) Section 3207 (a) of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3207. (a) In any case where there has been a refusal or neglect to pay any tax, and it has become necessary to seize and sell property and rights to property, whether real or personal, to satisfy the same, whether distraint proceedings have been commenced or not, the Attorney General at the request of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may direct a bill in chancery to be filed, in a district court of the United States, to enforce the lien of the United States for tax upon any property and rights to property, whether real or personal, or to subject any such property and rights to property owned by the delinquent, or in which he has any right, title, or interest, to the payment of such tax. All persons having liens upon or claiming any interest in the property or rights to property sought to be subject as aforesaid shall be made parties to such proceedings and be brought into court as provided in other suits in chancery therein. And the said court shall, at the term next after the parties have been duly notified of the proceedings, unless otherwise ordered by the court, proceed to adjudicate all matters involved therein and finally determine the merits of all claims to and liens upon the property and rights to property in question, and, in all cases where a claim or interest of the United States therein is established, may decree a sale of such property and rights to property, by the proper officer of the court, and a distribution of the proceeds of such sale according to the findings of the court in respect to the interests of the parties and of the United States. In any such proceeding, at the instance of the United States, the court may appoint a receiver to enforce the lien, or, upon certification by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue during the pendency of such proceedings that it is in the public interest, may appoint a receiver with all the powers of a receiver in equity."

(b) No suit brought by the United States to enforce any lien for tax on any property, or rights to property, whether real or personal, which is pending in any court of the United States on the date of the enactment of this act, shall abate, but any such suit shall be continued in accordance with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this amendment would permit the collector of internal revenue to apply to the United States courts, to file a petition in equity to enforce a lien for taxes where he has reason to believe the taxpayer will not be able to meet his obligations, and where public interest will be prejudiced by resorting to the provisions in the present law, for distraint on the taxpayer's assets. In other words, it is an amendment more favorable to the taxpayer than are the provisions of the present law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 805. INTEREST ON ERRONEOUS REFUNDS.

(a) Section 610 of the Revenue Act of 1928, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(d) Erroneous refunds recoverable by suit under this section shall bear interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date of the payment of the refund."

SEC. 806. INTEREST ON OVERPAYMENTS.

Section 614 (a) (2) of the Revenue Act of 1928 is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ", whether or not such refund check is accepted by the taxpayer after tender of such check to the taxpayer. The acceptance of such check shall be without prejudice to any right of the taxpayer to claim any additional overpayment and interest thereon."

Mr. WALSH. The amendment incorporating section 805 is to make it clear that interest on erroneous refunds runs from the date of payment of such refunds and not from the date when application is made for the refunds.

The purpose of section 806, Interest on Overpayment, is to save unnecessary interest charges to the Government by enabling the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to pay to a claimant such portion of his claim as the Commissioner may find to be meritorious without prejudice to the rights of the claimant to sue for the recovery of the balance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 807. ESTATE TAXES—REVOCABLE TRANSFERS.

(a) Section 302 (d) (1) of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) (1) To the extent of any interest therein of which the decedent has at any time made a transfer (except in case of a bona-fide sale for an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth), by trust or otherwise, where the enjoyment thereof was subject at the date of his death to any change through the exercise of a power (whether created at the time of such transfer or thereafter arising from any source, and whether exercisable in an individual or representative capacity) by the decedent alone or by the decedent or in conjunction with any other person, to alter, amend, revoke, or terminate, or where any such power is relinquished in contemplation of decedent's death."

(b) The amendment by subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to decedents dying prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to clarify the revocable-trust provisions of the present law, which threaten a large loss of revenue to the Government. It is estimated that this amendment would save the Government as much as $20,000,000 a year.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the amendment apply ex post facto?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. TYDINGS. Just from now on?

Mr. WALSH. From now on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 808. REGISTRATION UNDER THE NARCOTIC LAWS.

(a) The fourth paragraph of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes", approved December 17, 1914, as amended (38 Stat. 785), is amended to read as follows:

"Importers, manufacturers, producers, or compounders, lawfully entitled to import, manufacture, produce, or compound any of the aforesaid drugs, $24 per annum; wholesale dealers, lawfully entitled to sell and deal in any of the aforesaid drugs, $12 per annum; retail dealers, lawfully entitled to sell and deal in any of the aforesaid drugs, $3 per annum; physicians, dentists, veterinary surgeons, and other practitioners, lawfully entitled to distribute, dispense, give away, or administer any of the aforesaid drugs to patients upon whom they in the course of their professional practice are in attendance, $1 per annum or fraction thereof during which they engage in any of such activities; persons not registered as an importer, manufacturer, producer, or compounder and lawfully entitled to obtain and use in a laboratory any of the aforesaid drugs for the purpose of research, instruction, or analysis shall pay $1 per annum, but such persons shall keep such special records relating to receipt, disposal, and stocks on hand of the aforesaid drugs as the Commissioner of Narcotics, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require. Such special records shall be open at all times to the inspection of any duly authorized officer, employee, or agent of the Treasury Department."

(b) The second proviso of section 6 of the said act of December 17, 1914, as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "mentioned in this section" the following: "lawfully entitled to manufacture, produce, compound, or vend such preparations and remedies,".

(c) This section shall take effect on July 1, 1936.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, since the passage of the Harrison narcotic law approximately 32 States have passed narcotic laws. This amendment requires compliance with the State laws as a condition of Federal regulation under the Harrison narcotic law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 809. RECONSIDERATION OF REFUND CLAIMS.

Section 3226, of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Any consideration, reconsideration, or any action by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with respect to such claim following the mailing of a notice by registered mail of disallowance shall not operate to extend the period within which suit may be begun."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall not operate (1) to bar a suit or proceeding which was not barred on the date of the enactment of this act, or (2) to prevent the suspension of the statute of limitations for filing suit under section 608 (b) (2) as amended, of the Revenue Act of 1928.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, after once rejecting a claim for refund, to reconsider such claim on the merits without increasing the statutory period for bringing suit.

(b) Makes it clear that no rights already accrued shall be shut off.

608 (b) (2) gives the Commissioner power to enter into an agreement to prevent statute of limitations operating pending a test suit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I present another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 810. INTEREST ON JUDGMENTS.

Section 177 (b) of the Judicial Code, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) In any judgment of any court rendered (whether against the United States, a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, a former collector or deputy collector, or the personal representative in case of death) for any overpayment in respect of any internal-revenue tax, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 6 percent per annum upon the amount of the overpayment, from the date of the payment or collection thereof to a date preceding the date of the refund check by not more than 30 days, such date to be determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The Commissioner is hereby authorized to tender by check payment of any such judgment, with interest as herein provided, at any time after such judgment becomes final, whether or not a claim for such payment has been duly filed, and such tender shall stop the running of interest, whether or not such refund check is accepted by the judgment creditor."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the practice has grown up in cases where a refund is granted of allowing the money to remain in the Treasury and obtain the 6 percent that is allowed by law. It is a very fine investment and is much better than a savings bank or a trust company account.

This amendment stops the payment of interest and gives the Commissioner the right to pay the refund at once and not wait for the taxpayer who is entitled to the refund to allow it to remain in the Treasury and get 6 percent. The amendment would provide a saving to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, one further amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 82, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

(18) Religious or apostolic associations or corporations having a common treasury or community treasury, even if such associations or corporations engage in business for the common benefit of the members, but only if the members thereof include (at the time of filing their returns) in their gross income their entire pro-rata shares, whether distributed or not, of the net income of the association or corporation for such year. Any amount so included in the gross income of a member shall be treated as a dividend received.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, under existing law religious, educational, and charitable corporations are exempt from taxation under the income-tax title.

This amendment adds a new paragraph to section 101 of the revenue act, which exempts certain corporations from taxation under the income-tax title.

It has been brought to the attention of the committee that certain religious and apostolic associations and corporations, such as the House of David and the Shakers, have been taxed as corporations, and that since their rules prevent their members from being holders of property in an individual capacity the corporations would be subject to the undistributed-profits tax. These organizations have a small agricultural or other business. The effect of the proposed amendment is to exempt these corporations from the normal corporation tax and the undistributed-profits tax, if their members take up their shares of the corporations' income on their own individual returns. It is believed that this provision will give them relief, and their members will be subject to a fair tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I have two amendments which I will read. On page 76, line 6, after the word "Title", I move to insert the words "and title I (a)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I have one more amendment. On page 152, line 10, after the word "individual" and before the comma, insert "except that in the case of the resident of a contiguous country the rate shall be 5 percent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Those are all the committee amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 260, line 20, it is proposed to strike out the period following the figures "1936" and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following:

Provided, however, That in the case of articles other than direct-consumption sugar processed wholly or partly from sugar with respect to which a processing tax was paid, which are exported or delivered for charitable distribution or use, the exportation or the delivery for charitable distribution or use may take place at any time prior to September 1, 1936.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the bill as reported and as it passed the House provided for the refund of certain floor-stock taxes as of January 6, 1936. This amendment simply allows certain concerns that had on hand a large amount of canned goods in which sugar had been used to dispose of their goods at any time prior to September 1.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I have been appealed to by a good many manufacturers from my State who urge an amendment with the option of accepting refund of floor tax paid in 1933 as full settlement of all tax adjustments made, and so forth. I understand that the Senator from Kentucky has had charge of this particular matter. Was he able to find any relief for these persons?

Mr. BARKLEY. In reply to the Senator I will say that the subcommittee on refunds, of which I happened to be the chairman, considered that subject very carefully and very earnestly, not only among its members but with the Treasury Department, and it was found impossible to bring about such an amendment, because many of those who paid the floor tax when it was levied in 1933 passed it on to the consumer. So to provide an amendment of that sort would simply allow them to collect the amount back from the Government, regardless of how much of it they had passed on, and even though they had passed all of it on. We considered the question of providing an option where concerns are still in business, and were going concerns, and were in business in August or October 1933, and were in business on January 5, 1936, but it was found utterly impossible to work out an amendment that would do that without leaving a loophole through which many concerns would be refunded the amount of money which they paid, although they had passed it on to the consumer.

After giving that matter very earnest consideration, the committee did not feel justified in providing such an amendment. I will say that the full committee approved the action of the subcommittee on that subject.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that a telegram which I have received in connection with this subject be inserted in the RECORD as typical of many I have received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

UTICA, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building:

Urge amendment with option of accepting refund of floor tax paid in 1933 as full settlement of all tax-adjustment claim based on inventory of January 6, 1936, avoiding heavy accounting expenses and effecting equitable settlement to all who cooperated in 1933. In view of the large amount paid by New York State manufacturers, hope you can assist us to obtain this simplified, inexpensive method of settlement.

UTICA DUXBAK CORPORATION.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume from what the Senator said that the problem was given study and an effort made to have an equitable disposition of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. COPELAND. But it was found impossible to formulate language that would be fair?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. That was the position of the committee, and that position was taken after very careful consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the fact is that there is a difference in competitive situations that cannot be remedied by law.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. I dare say that businessmen are so accustomed to paying taxes that they will swallow another one and take it as pleasantly as possible.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to say that as a member of the committee I have very great sympathy for the position taken by the Senator from New York. The question was discussed at considerable length in the committee. Just as soon, however, as the question was raised there was a definite and vigorous opposition on the part of the Treasury. I do not agree with their opposition, but I recognize that if they start out to defeat a proposal it is almost impossible to overcome them. I do not charge the subcommittee, of which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is the chairman, with not making an effort; but I want to say now, as a matter of record, that unless there is some way found to protect the hundreds of thousands of small retail merchants who are unable to compute the amount of processing tax that was in their goods on January 6, 1936, they are just out of the picture, and it is just too bad. When they paid the tax in August 1933 they knew exactly what they paid on. The Government accepted the tax. And they knew the amount of taxable goods that were on hand and subject to the processing tax.

When suddenly the Court decided that the tax was unconstitutional, there were hundreds of thousands of retailers who had no opportunity immediately to determine the amount of processing tax on the goods they had on hand. Even if they could have done so, it would have taken hundreds of thousands of Government employees to go around to all the retailers and try to verify their claims. I regret that, due to the attitude of the Treasury Department, it was necessary to make the decision which was made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it is not quite accurate to say the Treasury was bitterly opposed to the suggestion. In the first place, I think the committee had to take one of two alternatives. We had to pay back to the taxpayer of 1933 the entire amount which he paid in the way of a processing tax, or we had to take January 6, at which time the Supreme Court rendered its decision, and subsequent to which time merchants were supposed to have reduced the price of their floor stocks by reason of the nullification of the tax.

There were many concerns in business on January 6 that were not in business in the fall of 1933. If we should provide that all the taxes paid in 1933 should be the standard by which a refund should be made, then, no matter how much any merchant who was not in business at that time but who was in business subsequently and was in business on January 6 was required to reduce his price, because of the Supreme Court decision, he could not get a refund. If we make the payment of taxes in 1933 the standard of refund, as I said, although the merchant passed the entire tax onto the public, he would get back what he paid to the Government. The difficulty is, and has been, to work out a provision that would give an option between the two dates without doing somebody a very grave injustice.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My impression of the attitude of the Treasury representatives was not that they were in bitter opposition to the proposal, but that they presented the difficulties to the committee and presented the inequities which were bound to result whichever course the committee took. It was only after the committee had been over it that we finally came to the conclusion there would be less inequities and less injustice if we adopted the proposal recommended than if we went back to the other date.

To show the situation let me point out that in one memorandum which the committee got from a trade association, the secretary of the association, in order to present the conflicting conditions among his members, in one part of his memorandum suggested one alternative and in the other part of the same memorandum suggested another alternative. I assume that was done so he could send to the particular member whichever part of it he thought would suit him along with a statement showing he had advocated what would be to his best interests.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, did he take his position by following the example of some Members of the Senate? [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky if I understood him correctly? I understood that every case would have to be considered on its merits and in consequence the Treasury objected because it would be such a tremendous undertaking. Is that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me say to the Senator from New York the Treasury did not object. It was not a matter in which the Treasury was interested, except as a matter of administration. The difficulties of administering such a provision were so insurmountable that the committee thought the Treasury's mere representation of the situation was worthy of consideration, and the committee gave it consideration.

Mr. COPELAND. It was insurmountable because of lack of clerical help?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; not that; but the ability to figure out, in the first place, any alternative between the two dates that would be equitable, and also the injustice of allowing everybody who paid the tax in 1933 to collect it back, although every cent of it was passed on to the public.

Mr. COPELAND. If I have a dispute with the Senator as to whether I owe him money or he owes me money, there are legal means of settling the matter. Cannot the equities be discovered? If each individual case is determined on its merits, will it not be possible to figure out how much the individual merchant should receive?

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be very difficult and almost impossible, because certainly the Senator from New York would not advocate a proposal which would allow to every man who paid a tax a refund of the entire tax, although he passed it on to the public or although he passed only a part of it on to the public. That would involve a determination of how much he actually passed on to the public. It would involve a minute system of bookkeeping, and representations on the part of the merchant or the dealer as to what portion of the tax he passed on and what portion he did not pass on. It would involve endless testimony as to how much he kept back and did not pass on. I do not see how it could be ascertained.

Mr. COPELAND. I have in my hand an Associated Press article telling about the Treasury taking on 800 white-collar workers, and as the result of it they have turned back $794,000 in collections. Would it not be possible to have some of these W. P. A. workers engage in some legitimate enterprise, such as working out justice to citizens who are being imposed upon? Then there would not be the charge of boondoggling.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure the Senator is not only attempting to be but succeeding in being facetious. I do not think that would contribute to any better administration of the law than is now possible in the Treasury Department.

Mr. COPELAND. I may seem facetious to the Senator from Kentucky, but every citizen who is affected by this decision is not going to feel that the thing is a joke. He is going to say, "There is nothing facetious about it so far as I am concerned."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to have the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] absolve me from being influenced by any Washington lobbyist who may have made contradictory suggestions to different parts of his membership.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. O Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan certainly knows that I have no such idea in mind. I simply cited that as an instance to show that in the same group of competitors were some who found themselves in one situation where they would be advantaged by one decision of the courts, and another group in the same line of enterprise who found that they would be advantaged by an alternative decision. I simply cited that instance to fortify the statement I made that this was a question of particular competitive conditions which the Congress could not decide without creating some inequities in the situation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was called out of the Chamber for the moment. May I ask what amendment is pending?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the amendment on page 260, which allows the holders of certain floor stocks until the first of next September in which to dispose of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have received the following telegram relating to that amendment:

TAMPA, FLA., June 5, 1936.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Members of this association, representing approximately 90 percent of the canned citrus production in Florida, earnestly request your support in securing a change in present bill—H. R. 12365, section 602, page 262, line 22—which now reads January 6, to read September 1, 1936. If this change is not accomplished, it will mean considerable loss to our industry by reason of goods already packed with processing tax thereon that will move between the date of January 6 and September 1, 1936.

FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT CANNERS ASSOCIATION,
Tampa, Fla.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment takes care of that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Kentucky, because both the Senator from New York and I raised the question of the small retailer.

In connection with that matter, I desire to point out that the committee did something for the small retailer, because it would appear on page 263 that we provided that where the small merchant makes an affidavit of the amount of tax he has been unable to pass on, and which he has really paid, the Commissioner is justified in accepting the affidavit and paying whatever refund he certifies. To that extent, relief has been given to the small merchant.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad the Senator from Michigan called attention to that provision. The committee tried to simplify the process by which the merchants will get their refunds. In addition to that we eliminated the minimum of $10, so that the merchant may collect any amount from 1 cent up to whatever the amount may be. So under this amendment the claimant will file his own affidavit setting out the amount of the tax, or how much he reduced his price by reason of the decision of the Court; and unless, on the face of the matter, there is ground for suspicion, the Commissioner will accept the affidavit, and pay the refund directly without further process.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am glad something has been done for these people; but I call attention to the fact that 800,000 of these small concerns are involved.

This is not a matter of interest merely to one or two or three or a few persons. There are nearly a million of them; so what we do here today is going to be reflected in 800,000 business concerns throughout the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "January 1, 1937" and in lieu thereof to insert "July 1, 1937."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 274, line 10, in the committee amendment, after the word "oath" and the period, it is proposed to strike out "The number of claims filed by any person shall be subject to such regulations as the Commissioner may prescribe with the approval of the Secretary" and in lieu thereof to insert:

The Commissioner is authorized to prescribe by regulations, with the approval of the Secretary, the number of claims which may be filed by any person with respect to the total amount paid or collected from such person as tax under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and such regulations may require that claims for refund of processing taxes with respect to any commodity or group of commodities shall cover the entire period during which such person paid such processing taxes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is an amendment which clarifies the authority of the Commissioner. Many taxpayers paid taxes on 30 different occasions. The amendment authorizes them to file one claim for the entire amount, covering the entire period, so that the Commissioner may consider the subject as a whole, without having to consider the separate claims piecemeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I send to the desk another amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, which was to strike out the committee amendment beginning on page 275, line 20, and continuing to page 280, line 17 (sections 906 (a), (b), (c), and (d)), and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no suit or proceeding, whether brought before or after the date of the enactment of this act, shall be brought or maintained in any court for the refund of any amount paid or collected as processing tax, as defined herein, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, except as provided in this section. The Commissioner shall allow or disallow, in whole or in part, any claim for refund of any such amount within 3 years after such claim was filed, unless such time has been extended by written consent of the claimant.

(b) There is hereby established in the Treasury Department a Board of Review (hereinafter referred to as "the Board"). The Board shall be composed of nine members, who shall be officers or employees of the Treasury Department designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. One of such members shall be designated by the Secretary to act as chairman of the Board. The chairman may from time to time divide the Board into divisions of one or more members, assign the members of the Board thereto, and in case of a division of more than one member, designate the chief thereof. A majority of the members of the Board or of any division thereof shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of the business of the Board or of the division, respectively. A vacancy in the Board or in any division thereof shall not impair the powers nor affect the duties of the Board or division nor of the remaining members of the Board or division, respectively. The Secretary of the Treasury shall assign to the Board such personnel in the Treasury Department as may be necessary to perform its functions. The Board shall have jurisdiction in proceedings under this section to review the allowance or disallowance of the Commissioner of a claim for refund, and to determine the amount of refund due any claimant with respect to such claim. The Commissioner shall make refund of any such amount determined by a decision of the Board which has become final. The proceedings of the Board and its division shall be conducted in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Board may prescribe, with the approval of the Secretary.

(c) The allowance or disallowance of the Commissioner of a claim for refund under this section shall be final, unless within 3 months after the date of mailing by registered mail by the Commissioner of notice that a claim for refund of any such amount has been disallowed, in whole or in part, the claimant files a petition with the Board requesting a hearing on the merits of his claim, in whole or in part. Upon the filing of any such petition the claimant shall be entitled to a hearing as provided herein, and within 3 months after the date of such filing the Board shall set a date for such hearing, which shall be not more than 2 years from the date of filing of the petition. Such hearing shall be held in Washington, D. C., or in the collection district in which is located the principal place of business of the claimant, as the claimant may designate in his petition, or in any place which may be designated by the Commissioner and the claimant by stipulation in writing, and may be continued from day to day. The Board shall notify the claimant and the Commissioner of the time and place set for such hearing by registered mail.

(d) Each such hearing shall be conducted by a presiding officer, who shall be a member of the Board or an officer or employee of the Treasury Department designated a presiding officer by the Secretary of the Treasury and assigned by the Board to preside at such hearing, and shall be open to the public. The proceedings in such hearings shall be conducted in accordance with such rules of practice and procedure (other than rules of evidence) as the Board may prescribe, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in courts of equity of the District of Columbia. The claimant and the Commissioner shall be entitled to be represented by counsel, to have witnesses subpenaed, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. The presiding officer shall have authority to administer oaths, examine witnesses, rule on questions of procedure and the admissibility of evidence, and to require by subpena, signed by any member of the Board, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all necessary returns, books, papers, records, correspondence, memoranda, and other evidence, from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing, and to require the taking of a deposition by any designated individual competent to administer oaths. Any witness summoned or whose deposition is taken pursuant to this section shall receive the same fees and mileage as witnesses in the courts of the United States.

(e) The presiding officers shall recommend findings of fact and a decision to the Board or the proper division thereof within 6 months after the conclusion of the hearing. Briefs with respect to such recommendations may be submitted to the Board or such division on behalf of the Commissioner and the claimant within 30 days after such recommendations have been made, unless such time is extended by the Board or such division. Except upon specific order of the chairman of the Board, no oral argument may be presented to the Board or such division after the conclusion of the hearing. The Board or a division shall make its findings of fact and decision in writing as quickly as practicable. The findings of fact and the decision of a division shall become the findings of fact and decision of the Board within 30 days after they have been made by the division unless within such period the chairman has directed that such findings and decision shall be reviewed by the Board. The findings and decision of a division shall not be a part of the record in any case in which the chairman directs that such findings and decision shall be reviewed by the Board. Copies of the findings of fact and decision of the Board shall be mailed to the claimant and the Commissioner by registered mail.

(f) The Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to draw up a table of costs and fees relating to such hearings, and the preparation of transcripts of record thereof, not to exceed with respect to any one item those charged in the Supreme Court of the United States. Such costs and fees shall be paid by the claimant and be collected in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Board with the approval of the Secretary. If the hearing provided herein results in a modification of the allowance or disallowance of the Commissioner, such costs shall be returned to the claimant.

(g) A review of the decision of the Board, made after the hearing provided in this section, may be obtained by the claimant or Commissioner by filing a petition for review in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States within any circuit wherein such claimant resides, or has his principal place of business, or, if none, in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, or any such court which may be designated by the Commissioner and the claimant by stipulation in writing, within 3 months after the date of the mailing to the claimant and the Commissioner of the copy of the findings and decision of the Board. A copy of such petition shall forthwith be served upon the Commissioner or upon any officer designated by him for that purpose, or upon the claimant, according to which party files such petition, and upon the Board. Thereupon the Board shall certify and file in the court, in which such petition has been filed, a transcript of the record upon which the findings and decision complained of were based. Upon the filing of such transcript such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm the decision of the Board, or to modify or reverse such decision, if it is not in accordance with law, with or without remanding the cause for a rehearing, as justice may require. No objection shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Board or division and the presiding officer, or unless there were reasonable grounds for failure so to do. If the claimant or the Commissioner shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material, and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the presiding officer, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before such officer, and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Board may modify its findings of fact and decision by reason of the additional evidence so taken and it shall file with the court such modified or new findings and decision. The judgment of the court shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon certification or certiorari as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended. Such courts are authorized to adopt rules for the filing of petitions for review, the preparation of the record for review, and the conduct of the proceedings on review. If the decision of the Board is affirmed, costs shall be awarded against the claimant, and if such decision is reversed, the judgment shall provide for a refund of any costs paid by the claimant. In case of modification of such decision costs shall be awarded or refused as justice may require. The decision of the Board made after the hearing provided herein shall become final in the same manner that decisions of the Board of Tax Appeals become final under section 1005 of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended

In the committee amendment, on page 275, line 1, it is proposed to insert after the comma following the word "court", the following: "or the board of review in cases provided for under section 6."

During the reading——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the amendment is somewhat lengthy; but the substance of it is to provide for the creation of a board of review in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Under the bill as reported, the Senator from Michigan and others will recall that the Commissioner was to pass on these questions, and his verdict was to be final. The amendment sets up a board of review which may consider these matters in addition to the determination of the Commissioner, and it seems to me it is in the interest of fairness to the taxpayer.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I did not hear the amendment read. I desire to ask of whom the board of review is to be made up.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is to be made up of persons in the Treasury Department.

Mr. COUZENS. No new offices are to be created?

Mr. BARKLEY. No new offices are to be created.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the reading of the remainder of the amendment will be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer the further amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, which was to strike out the committee amendment beginning on page 280, line 19, and continuing to page 284, line 24 (sec. 907 (a) to (e), inclusive), and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(a) Where the refund claimed is for an amount paid or collected as processing tax, as defined herein, it shall be prima-facie evidence that the burden of such amount was borne by the claimant to the extent (not to exceed the amount of the tax) that the average margin per unit of the commodity processed was lower during the tax period than the average margin was during the period before and after the tax. If the average margin during the tax period was not lower, it shall be prima-facie evidence that none of the burden of such amount was borne by the claimant but that it was shifted to others.

(b) The average margin for the tax period and the average margin for the period before and after the tax shall be determined as follows:

(1) Tax period: The average margin for the tax period shall be the average of the margins for all months (or portions of months) within the tax period. The margin for each such month shall be computed as follows: From the gross sales value of all articles processed by the claimant from the commodity during such month, deduct the cost of the commodity processed during the month and deduct the processing tax paid with respect thereto. The sum so ascertained shall be divided by the total number of units of the commodity processed during such month, and the resulting figure shall be the margin for the month.

(2) Period before and after the tax: The average margin for the period before and after the tax shall be the average of the margins for all months (or portions of months) within the period before and after the tax. The margin for each such month shall be computed as follows: From the gross sales value of all articles processed by the claimant from the commodity during such month, deduct the cost of the commodity processed during the month. The sum so ascertained shall be divided by the number of units of the commodity processed during such month, and the resulting figure shall be the margin for the month.

(3) Average margin: The average margin for each period shall be ascertained in the same manner as monthly margins under subdivisions (1) and (2), using total gross sales value, total cost of commodity processed, total processing tax paid, and total units of commodity processed during such period.

(4) Combination of commodities: Where, as, for example, in the case of certain types of tobacco, the articles produced and sold by the claimant are the product of several commodities combined by him during processing, the average margins shall be established with respect to such commodities as a group, and not individually, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

(5) Cost of commodity: The cost of commodity processed during each month shall be (a) the actual cost of the commodity processed if the accounting procedure of the claimant is based thereon, or (b) the product computed by multiplying the quantity of the commodity processed by the current prices at the time of processing for commodities of like quality and grade in the markets where the claimant customarily makes his purchases.

(6) Gross sales value of articles: The gross sales value of articles shall mean (a) the total of the quantity of each article derived from the commodity processed by the claimant during each month multiplied by (b) the claimant's sale prices at the time of processing for articles of similar grade and quality.

(7) The quantity of each article derived from the commodity processed may be either (a) the actual quantity obtained, as shown by the records of the claimant, or (b) an estimated quantity computed by multiplying the quantity of commodity processed by appropriate conversion factors giving the quantity of articles customarily obtained from the processing of each unit of the commodity.

(c) The "tax period" shall mean the period with respect to which the claimant actually paid the processing tax to a collector of internal revenue and shall end on the date with respect to which the last payment was made. The "period before and after the tax" shall mean the 24 months (except that in the case of tobacco it shall be the 12 months) immediately preceding the effective date of the processing tax, and the 6 months, February to July 1936, inclusive. If during any part of such period the claimant was not in business, or if his records for any part of such period are so inadequate as not to provide satisfactory data on prices paid for commodities purchased or prices received for articles sold, the average prices paid or received by representative concerns engaged in a similar business and similarly circumstanced may, with the approval of the Commissioner, where necessary for a fair comparison, be substituted in making the necessary computations. If the claimant was not in business during the entire period before and after the tax, the average margin, during such period, of representative concerns engaged in a similar business and similarly circumstanced, as determined by the Commissioner, shall be used as his average margin for such period.

(d) If the claimant made any purchase or sale otherwise than through an arm's-length transaction, and at a price other than the fair market price, the Commissioner may determine the purchase or sale price to be that for which such purchases or sales were at that time made in the ordinary course of trade.

(e) Either the claimant or the Commissioner may rebut the presumption established by subsection (a) of this section by proof of the actual extent to which the claimant shifted to others the burden of the processing tax. Such proof may include but shall not be limited to—

(1) Proof that the difference or lack of difference between the average margin for the tax period and the average margin for the period before and after the tax was due to changes in factors other than the tax. Such factors shall include any clearly shown change (A) in the type or grade of article or commodity, or (B) in costs of production. If the claimant asserts that the burden of the tax was borne by him and the burden of any other increased costs was shifted to others, the Commissioner shall determine, from the effective dates of the imposition or termination of the tax and the effective date of other changes in costs as compared with the date of the changes in margin (when margins are computed for weeks, months, or other intervals between July 1, 1931, and August 1936 in the manner specified in subsection (b)), and from the general experience of the industry, whether the tax or the increase in other costs was shifted to others. If the Commissioner determines that the difference in average margin was due in part to the tax and in part to the increase in other costs, he shall apportion the change in margin between them.

(2) Proof that the claimant modified existing contracts of sale, or adopted a new form of contract of sale, to reflect the initiation, termination, or change in amount of the processing tax, or at any such time changed the sale price of the article (including the effect of a change in size, package, discount terms, or any other merchandising practice) by substantially the amount of the tax or change therein, or at any time billed the tax as a separate item to any vendee, or indicated by any writing that the sale price included the amount of the tax, or contracted to refund any part of the sale price in the event of recovery of the tax or decision of its invalidity; but the claimant may establish that such acts were caused by factors other than the processing tax, or that they do not represent his practice at other times. If the claimant processed any product in addition to the commodity with respect to the processing of which there was paid or collected an amount as tax for which he claims a refund, and if the Commissioner has reason to believe that the burden of such amount was shifted in whole or in part by means of the transactions relating to such product, the average margin with respect to such product, and articles processed therefrom, shall also be considered, and shall be determined for the tax period applicable to the commodity and for the period before and after the tax in the manner prescribed in subsection (b) of this section. To the extent the Commissioner determines that the average margin with respect to such product was higher during the tax period than it was during the period before and after the tax, it shall be prima-facie evidence that such amount was not borne by the claimant, but that it was shifted to others.

During the reading—

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the interest of time I will explain the amendment briefly.

The amendment has been worked out by the Departments of Agriculture, Justice, and the Treasury, in order that there may be a simplification and at the same time a spelling out of provisions with reference to certain margins. I think the amendment is proper, and I do not wish to take any further time in explaining it or having it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the further reading of the amendment will be dispensed with.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, these amendments are committee amendments, and I am not going to resist this particular one. I wish, however, to call attention to the fact that the formula, or the period covered by the computation in this tax bill, has been insisted upon by the Department of Agriculture; and so far as the refunds are concerned, the formula calls for taking a period of 2 years prior to the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, plus 6 months thereafter.

This period of 2 years, of course, as everybody knows, was when the country was at the very bottom of the depression. Necessarily the formula would work out against all claimants for refunds. Since the matter will be in conference I am merely giving notice now that I shall insist that a fair period of time be actually taken for balancing these equations and determining the proper margin.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the committee amendment to which this provision is intended to be an amendment has been agreed to or is still open?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. In order that this amendment to it may be offered, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to, and the amendment as amended will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I offer the further amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 286, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out lines 12 to 16, inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Any suit or proceeding with respect to any amount paid or collected as taxes under the Agricultural Adjustment Act which is barred on the date of enactment of this act shall remain barred.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer the further amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 287, line 23, in section 914, it is proposed to insert, after the word "employee", the words "of the Treasury Department and."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the committee amendment has been agreed to, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote. I am not certain whether it has been agreed to or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. BARKLEY. This is a clerical amendment, and does not require any discussion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very sorry, but I was called out of the Chamber, and I notice there has been a redraft of sections 906 and 907, which have already been agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator whether the amendment changed in any essential respect the policy which the committee adopted?

Mr. BARKLEY. The only substantial change is to provide the board of review, which I mentioned a while ago, to pass on these claims, in lieu of the final determination of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But there is to be no change in the manner of arriving at the determination as to whether the tax is absorbed or passed on?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No change in the period of years that are to be considered, or anything of that kind?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I send another amendment to the desk, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 289 it is proposed to strike out the first sentence in section 915 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Funds made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for salaries and administrative expenses by the appropriation "Payments for Agricultural Adjustment" under title I of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936, and by the appropriation in section (e) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, shall be available until June 30, 1937, for transfer to the Treasury Department for salaries and administrative expenses in carrying out the provisions of this title and of title IV, including necessary investigative work, and for refunds and payments under title IV.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this amendment merely provides an appropriation to pay the refunds which both the bill as it passed the House and the Senate committee bill overlooked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. I request that the vote be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I suggest another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 217, page 290, line 10, it is proposed to insert "(a)" before the beginning of the section, and on page 290, after line 17, to insert the following new subsection:

(b) Officers and employees of the other executive departments and establishments of the Government may, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the approval of the head of any such department or establishment, be detailed to the Treasury Department from time to time for such temporary duties as may be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this title. The proper appropriation of such executive department or establishment from which such officers or employees are so detailed shall be reimbursed by the Treasury Department to the extent of salaries and other compensation paid to such officers and employees during the time they shall be so detailed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this amendment authorizes the detail of other officers of the Government to the Treasury for the purpose of assisting in performing the work with reference to the refunds provided for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is this an amendment to a committee amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky for further explanation. Does he state that we will have to have further authority for the Treasury officials to work on these matters?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. The amendment authorizes the transfer of employees from other places. The working out of these refunds is going to involve a great deal of extra work. This simply authorizes the transfer of other Government employees to assist in the details of working up the claims and passing on them.

Mr. COUZENS. As an example, clerks will be detailed from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will not the Senator permit me to suggest an amendment about which I think there will be no controversy at all? My colleague and I desire to change the effective date, in line 9, page 270, from the thirtieth to the sixtieth day following the enactment of the bill. I understand there is no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment appearing on page 270, line 7, be reconsidered for the purpose of enabling the Senator from California to offer the amendment to which he has just directed attention.

Mr. JOHNSON. On page 270 the effective date is fixed as the thirtieth following the date of the enactment of the act, and we desire to strike out "thirtieth" and insert in lieu thereof "sixtieth."

Mr. GEORGE. I may say that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], who has been much interested in this particular matter, has no objection to the amendment, and the committee has no objection to striking out the word "thirtieth" and the insertion of the word "sixtieth" on line 9, page 270.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] has another amendment in the same title he desires to present; and I ask that the vote by which the amendment, on page 267, line 12, was agreed to, be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in the committee amendment, on page 270, line 24, after the word "foregoing", to insert the words "or from linseed oil."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it has been agreed upon the part of the committee, although this matter has been before the Senate, to accept this amendment for the purpose of taking it to conference.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is this a reopening of the oil section?

Mr. GEORGE. A reopening for these two particular purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the committee accept the amendments?

Mr. GEORGE. It accepted one amendment which extended the effective date from the thirtieth to the sixtieth day.

Mr. COPELAND. How about linseed oil?

Mr. GEORGE. It included fatty acids.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the committee in a more yielding mood, so that it will accept my amendment about whale oil?

Mr. GEORGE. I am sorry; I cannot do that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the change in date is satisfactory to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GEORGE. I was so advised.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the purpose of postponing the date to 60 days instead of 30 days after the enactment of the act?

Mr. GEORGE. This is the statement furnished to me:

Numerous crushers on the Pacific coast, principally California, have heavy commitments of oil seeds and oils under contracts made previously to May 1. This extra 30 days' grace is essential to prevent serious financial losses in the case of smaller companies, financial ruin to American industries. This extension will not mean appreciable increase in imports due to the fact that the old crop is well cleared up and the new crop will not be available before December next.

Both the Senators from California have been interested in the matter, and the Senator from North Carolina indicated that he had no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall not object.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk state the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 269, between lines 15 and 16, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 701½. TAX ON JUTE.

Section 601 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by adding at the end thereof a paragraph as follows:

"(9) Unmanufactured jute and jute butts, jute waste bagging, and waste sugar sack cloth, 1.5 cents per pound net weight; jute yarn, cordage, twine and twist of two or more yarns twisted together, 1.6 cents per pound net weight; burlaps and other woven fabrics and bags or sacks wholly or in chief value of jute (excluding bagging for cotton, gunny cloth of single yarns not bleached, colored, or printed, not exceeding 16 threads in warp and filling to the square inch), 2.7 cents per pound net weight; and other manufactured articles wholly or in chief value of jute, 2.8 cents per pound net weight. As used in this paragraph, the term 'net weight' includes the weight of the fiber, fabric, size or sizing, filling, coating, or other ingredients or substances which may be normally included in the marketing of fiber or fabric, but does not include the weight of any wrappers or casings. The tax on articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles on and after the thirtieth day following the date of enactment of the Revenue Act of 1936, and such taxes shall be in addition to and not in substitution of, any taxes now imposed by existing law.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I deeply regret that my amendment has been reached for consideration under such adverse circumstances. I recognize that the hour is late, and that the Members of the Senate are tired. I am fully conscious of the pressure for action on the pending tax bill so that it may be sent to conference.

The amendment is of such tremendous and vital importance to the cotton farmers of this Nation, the most numerous of all classes of farmers, that I feel duty bound to make a statement in behalf of the amendment. I believe the facts of the case are sufficient to demonstrate that fairness and justice dictate its adoption.

A few days ago, when the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] imposing taxes on various oils was under discussion, Members on this side of the aisle who favored the amendment were accused of abandoning the traditional policy of the Democratic Party in regard to tax and tariff matters, and an effort was made to create the impression that by imposing various taxes to protect the American farmer in his home market we were in effect going beyond the bounds of even the Smoot-Hawley tariff and embracing the doctrine of protection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There was so much confusion in the Senate Chamber that I did not understand what the amendment was. Is the amendment offered by the Senator an amendment in regard to jute?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is. If the Senator from Idaho has in his hand the amendment presented by the junior Senator from Georgia it is the amendment concerning which I am now speaking, as this is the only amendment I have offered to the bill.

The charge was made that if Democratic Senators voted for the items presented by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina we were confessing that the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was sound and that we were out-Heroding Herod. I agree with the view that the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act did more to demoralize the commerce of the world than any other single act which has ever been passed by the Congress of the United States and signed by the President of the United States. It not only dried up our foreign market for agricultural commodities but it eventually paralyzed industrial production in this country. By reason of its passage there grew up all over the world a complicated system of quotas, embargoes, trade agreements, and restrictions which obstructed all of the normal channels of commerce, and largely caused the deplorable plight in which the American farmer found himself in 1933, and from which he is suffering today. This act caused the conditions which confront the Congress today in the consideration of measures for the protection of American agriculture, which are wholly different from those which existed at the time of the passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

I think that they were all caused largely by the prohibitive duties levied in that act. We cannot, however, restore our world trade today merely by repealing the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. Under the system of embargoes and quotas to which I have referred it would be impossible to secure any great increase in our foreign trade and such action would merely serve to make this Nation the dumping ground for the products of the underpaid labor of all the foreign nations of the world. We are pursuing the only course which is open to us to restore world trade, and that is by seeking through reciprocal tariff agreements to remove the many obstructions to trade and commerce which have caused such a great shrinkage in our foreign trade.

During the course of these negotiations, it is necessary to protect not only American agriculture but American industry from dumping from abroad. The press today carries the news that under the countervailing duty provisions of the 1930 Tariff Act, additional rates ranging from 22½ to 56 percent have been imposed on a number of manufactured articles imported from Germany.

Many products from the same nation have already been assessed higher duties under the nondumping provisions of that act. No action of the Congress in reducing the duties which have increased the prices of plow points, tools, shoes, and hats, and practically everything else which the farmer is compelled to buy is proposed. I doubt if it would be very effective were such action taken. Therefore, during this period of adjustment of tariff matters, I favor the fullest measure of protection for the farmers of this country in the retention of the great market afforded him domestically by the 130,000,000 people of the United States.

The cotton farmer cannot be afforded any measure of protection without the imposition of a tax on his greatest and most dangerous competitor. This amendment proposes to impose that tax on jute. Jute is a vegetable fiber, even as cotton is a vegetable fiber. Jute is a somewhat coarser fiber than cotton, but recent developments in methods of processing and manufacturing have placed it in direct competition with cotton produced by the American farmer in practically every form or use to which either can be put.

The fact that jute is in direct competition with cotton was recognized by the United States Department of Agriculture. Under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, providing for the levy of a compensatory tax on jute, such tax in the sum of more than 2 cents per pound was levied. This was done when it became apparent that the increased price of cotton resulting from the processing taxes was causing a shift in consumption to jute. As a matter of fact, I do not know of any commodity produced from jute today in this country which is not directly in competition with a commodity manufactured from cotton, designed for the same purpose. Jute in its raw form enters this country tax free, despite the fact that it is in direct competition with cotton, and articles manufactured from the two are almost interchangeable.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. POPE. The Senator has just stated that the Department of Agriculture levied a compensatory tax upon jute, and he recites that as proof to show competition.

Mr. RUSSELL. Surely.

Mr. POPE. May I ask him also if he does not know that the Department of Agriculture recommended the repeal of the law, and it was repealed by Congress some 2 years ago?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is wholly mistaken in his facts. The tax on jute was repealed as to a specific type of bag, which was largely used by the potato growers of this country, and when the compensatory tax on jute was removed to show that the competition did exist, the Department of Agriculture relieved cotton bags of the same type, manufactured for the same purposes, from the processing tax on cotton, so both could compete on the same basis. That tax was removed solely, almost completely, I will say, at the demands of the potato producers of this country, and it did not establish the fact that jute and cotton were not in competition. Quite the contrary. It established the fact that they were in competition, because the tax on the cotton bags of the same type was removed at the same time that the Department of Agriculture removed the tax imposed on jute bags.

Mr. POPE. The Senator has referred to the fact that burlap bags are used for potatoes. Does not the Senator also know that they are used for wheat, and that as a matter of fact there is no competition between cotton bags and burlap bags, either as to potatoes or wheat or many other products produced in the West?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, that argument has been raised by those opposed to a compensatory tax on this product of slave labor in India every time an effort is made to secure justice for the cotton farmer in this matter. I contend that every fact that can possibly be gathered shows that these two commodities are in direct competition, and that cotton can be used to supplant jute in the manufacture of any package material for any commodity. This tax must be imposed if the cotton farmer is not to be forced down further in the direction he has been gradually driven in the past few years toward the same standard of living as those who work in India in the production of jute.

I have in my hand a report of the Bengal Jute Inquiry Committee, a committee established by the Province of Bengal in India to determine the solution of problems concerning jute. This report shows that the producers of jute consider cotton a great competitor, and it shows the trend away from jute and to cotton in the manufacture of bags for the use of potatoes and for the packing of wheat when cotton was 5 and 6 cents per pound. This report is a sad commentary on the failure of the Congress of the United States to afford the cotton farmer protection. It shows the dire results visited on him by forcing him into competition with the lowest-paid classes of coolie labor of the earth, and all the while he was forced to endure this unfair competition, every article which he is compelled to purchase is afforded some measure of protection. Do not talk to me about defeating this amendment on the ground that jute and cotton are not competitive commodities.

The Senate has already voted into this bill a tax on whale oil to protect dairy farmers in the sale of products of cows. Senators voted for that item, protecting the products of cows from the products of whales and then have said that this amendment should be defeated because jute and cotton are not in competition. There is much more kinship between these two vegetable fibers, jute and cotton, than there can possibly be between whales and cows, and the same thing is true of many other articles which were taxed the other day, in part by my vote, to protect the American farmer from the importation of oils which are substituted one for the other.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I would not attempt to take issue with the Senator from Georgia on the many uses to which cotton is given over; but I merely wish to say to my friend from Georgia that during the years I have lived in the Pacific Northwest, and have had some familiarity with the movement of commodities, I have never seen cotton bags used to handle potatoes or wheat or other heavy field products, but have always seen burlap bags used. I am not prepared to say that there could not be made a cotton bag heavy enough for such use, but I will say to my friend that I have never seen such a bag used for that purpose.

I do not think it is possible to reconcile the differences that are in the minds of the farmers of this country. The farmers wish to keep their own local markets, but at the same time farmers wish to buy burlap bags. If anyone succeeds in reconciling the differences that have arisen in the minds of the American farmers in connection with the tariff, he will have accomplished a very tough job.

Mr. RUSSELL. No doubt the Senator from Washington has seen more bags made from burlap, which is processed jute. The reason for that lies in the difference in the cost of production of cotton bags on account of the difference in the standards of living between the cotton farmer and the coolies producing jute. This merely emphasized the necessity for affording some protection to the American cotton farmer in the American market, if he is not to be driven to the standard of living of those producing jute in the Orient.

I have in my hand a statement furnished by the Department of Agriculture showing the wages paid to the jute farmers; the female wage ranges from 7.9 cents to 9.1 cents a day, and the male wage ranges from 12.1 cents to 15.2 cents a day. That product, produced by that low-paid labor, comes into this country duty free. Is it any wonder that you see burlap and jute bags instead of cotton bags, when you take this domestic market of the cotton farmer away from him and give it to the product of slave labor of India? Afford him the protection everyone else has, and the situation will be reversed. The cotton farmer will have a market here for one and one-half million additional bales of cotton.

I have here reports from the United States Tariff Commission showing the increase in the importation of this commodity. They show that it has been steadily climbing since 1933, as we have made efforts to increase the price of cotton. As cotton goes up slightly in this country, importation of this low-wage product also increases. For the year 1933, there was imported into this country 517,793,555 pounds of jute, every pound of it in direct competition with the cotton farmer. In 1934, there was a slight reduction to 487,792,815 pounds. When we come to the year 1935, we find that it has climbed to 716,520,742 pounds. Is there any wonder that the cotton farmer is further from parity than any other producer in the country?

The other day I heard a Senator representing a great farm State in the Northwest, when speaking on the commodity-exchange bill, say he wanted to vote for an amendment which would benefit the southern cotton farmer, because he had been through that section of the country and observed the living conditions, and also how the cotton farmer was housed, and that of all the farmers in the country, the cotton farmer was in more dire need of Government aid than any other producer. Not a Senator from the cotton States would deny the charge. We all knew it was absolutely true, and lack of protection against jute is largely the reason for this condition.

The cotton farmer gets less income than any other producer in the country and has contributed more to the wealth of the Nation than any other single line of endeavor. For over 100 years he has been exporting 50 percent of his crop. Subtract the total exports of cotton from the total exports of the United States and see where the United States would have been in the matter of favorable trade balances had it not been for the wealth accumulated for others out of the toil of the cotton farmers.

During all of this time the cotton farmer has borne more of the burden of the tariff than any other class of our citizens. Out of his toil and sweat has been builded the favorable balance of trade which through all the years has caused our country to prosper and has made it the greatest commercial nation of the earth. Despite this contribution to the building of America and the prosperity of all sections, he today is penalized by exorbitant tariffs on commodities he buys and is denied any protection on that which he produces.

The fact that the income of the cotton farmer is lower than that of any other farmer of the Nation is no reproach to him. No one toils harder. I have seen the workers in the cotton fields toiling from break of day to long after sunset.

They work almost unbelievably long hours. The entire family—man, woman, and children; those just out of the cradle, as well as the aged tottering on the brink of the grave—ply themselves at the back-breaking labor necessary to produce this great commodity so absolutely essential to the human family. The farmer's crops are subject to all of the whims of Nature. Even when fortunate, and producing a good crop, the result is discouraging. Often after he has marketed his crop and paid his debts, he faces the winter with his pockets emptied, with himself and children clad in rags, and with scant supplies in his smokehouse.

No, this is no reproach to the farmers. I have lived among them, and, as in other lines of endeavor, the great majority do their best with the means at their command. But this condition is a reflection on the Congress of the United States, which has within its hands the power of some relief.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator is discussing one of the most confusing problems that confront the American Congress. I walked into a store the other day to buy a little hand brush. A clerk showed me half a dozen brushes, and they were all marked "Made in Japan." I refused to buy one, and they had a difficult time locating one made in America. I do not know what the attitude of the Senator would be toward a matter of that kind, because Japan is one of the largest, if not the largest, purchaser of American cotton. Would the Senator from Georgia have me and all other Americans refuse to buy anything made in Japan, and have Japan refuse to buy American cotton any longer? I know all our farmers in the West wish to have us keep the oil and fat substitutes of foreign nations out of the country.

Mr. RUSSELL. I voted with the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. BONE. The farmers want the burlap bags as cheaply as they can get them.

Mr. RUSSELL. The tax on the oils is not of as great benefit to the cotton farmer as it is to the farmers of the Senator's State. It will be helpful in the prices of cottonseed oil and peanut oils produced in the Southeast. Many of the taxes, however, will increase the cost of the articles which the cotton farmer is compelled to buy. Such things as soap and other household necessities would be much cheaper without the imposition of the taxes on oils already included in this bill.

I have always believed in protection for the American farmer in his domestic market. I have supported every tax that has been offered to protect the American farmer in his domestic market. The importation of jute means that 1,500,000 bales of cotton each year are being displaced in the domestic market through use of this substitute. The cotton farmer is forced to sell in the world market and cotton itself competes with the lowest-paid foreign labor in the world.

This is the only cotton-producing country on earth that stands by and sees its cotton farmers thus penalized.

We often hear references to the condition of the poor peons in Mexico. However, the Mexican Government does not force the peon to compete with this product of the coolies of the Orient, but levies a tariff on all of the raw jute which enters Mexico in competition with their cotton. Cotton is produced in Brazil by underpaid peons, with a low standard of living, but Brazil levies a tax on all of the raw jute imported into that country. The United States is forcing our cotton farmers to compete with the laborer who is paid 8 and 10 cents per day in India, without affording him the slightest protection. In Colombia and Peru, where only a small amount of cotton is produced, the cotton-producing industry is protected by the imposition of a tax upon importations of raw jute. When this is suggested here, the powerful combine dominating this industry inspires a flood of telegrams in opposition almost before the amendment is proposed. Soviet Russia is roundly condemned from many sources for the condition of its labor. We hear a great deal about the hardships imposed upon those who toil in that nation, noted for its exploitation of labor. Soviet Russia, however, does not compel her producers of cotton to enter into competition with jute without any protection. A duty of 40 percent ad valorem is levied on jute to protect the cotton producers there.

Various parts of the British Empire producing cotton levy substantial duties on importations of jute and jute products from India, another part of the British Empire.

When it is proposed to protect the cotton farmer in his domestic market, I am amazed to find those who fear that the price of sacks used in their States will be increased a few cents, or who have constituents who have waxed wealthy from dealing in this product of slave labor, should seek to deny the petition of the struggling cotton farmer and say, "No; I will resist affording the cotton farmer one iota of protection of any kind against the importation of this product from far-away India."

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. When this question has been raised heretofore, arguments have been used rather effectively that one reason why cotton should not be used was that in the Orient it was not desired to have a cotton covering over a bale of cotton. Last fall on a visit to Shanghai I noticed that the Chinese had their cotton wrapped in cotton and not in jute.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, China produces some cotton.

Mr. BYRNES. The argument has been used that here in the United States we should use jute because it would be acceptable to the cotton buyers and manufacturers in Shanghai.

Mr. RUSSELL. There have been more specious and fallacious arguments against this just demand of the cotton farmer of the South than I have ever heard urged against any other proposal advanced in this body since I have been here. The report of the India Jute Committee, to which I have heretofore referred, points out the various uses to which jute is put and the prospect of new fields.

The report refers to articles of jute clothing and demonstrates that clothing is being made of jute and is worn in many parts of the world. It is used for twine, carpets, bookbinding, furniture, and oilcloth. The most amazing of all are several pages of the report devoted to the competition which they find is being afforded jute by cotton.

This is a sad commentary on the lack of protection afforded the cotton farmers. Imagine a finding by a governmental agency in the land where the jute is produced on wage scales of around 8 cents per day for women and 12 cents per day for men complaining because of competition from cotton. When cotton was down around 5 and 6 cents, this competition must have been keen, and no one can prophesy to what low estate the cotton farmer will be forced by the increasing competition with jute unless he is afforded some protection.

There is no article produced from jute that cannot be produced from cotton. But representatives of the cotton States who vote for the many taxes on various kinds of oil from different products, submitted in the hope of aiding the dairy industry and other lines of agriculture, are now told that it ill becomes anyone to say jute is competitive with cotton.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a table showing the wages paid the laborers who produce jute, and also to have incorporated in the RECORD a statement prepared by an economist of the Department of Agriculture which shows the uses for which jute imported into this country is put, each and every one of them in competition with cotton products of the same type.

There being no objection, the chart and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Average daily wage rates of labor in the Madras Presidency in 1931

Occupation and class of labor	Indian currency	United States currency
	Rs. As. P.	Cents per day
Female coolies (gin)	0 4 10	8.6
Male coolies (gin)	0 7 4	13.1
Female coolies (press)	0 5 1	9.1
Male coolies (press)	0 8 6	15.2
Female coolies (rice mill)	0 4 3	7.6
Male coolies (rice mill)	0 6 9	12.1
Female coolies in fields	0 4 5	7.9
Male coolies in fields	0 7 0	12.5

STATEMENT

The following figures are estimates of the various important uses for jute expressed as percentages of total imports during the 10 years ended with 1935:

Use	Percent
Bags	53
Bagging for cotton	16
Textile wrapping	8
Wool carpets and rugs	8
Twine and cordage	6
Linoleum backing	3
Roofing	1
Webbing	1
Other	4
Total	100

Although these figures are the best we have available at the present time, their accuracy is somewhat questionable in some cases, and for that reason the basis for each estimate is discussed below in considerable detail.

Bags: Jute bags are practically all made of jute burlap, nearly all of which is imported, domestic production being negligible. The estimated production of burlap bags amounted to 488,600,000 pounds in 1929, according to figures submitted in the "Hearing on Processing Taxes on Commodities in Competition with Cotton", under section 15 (d) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, July 31 to August 1, 1933, exhibit 18, p. 315. This was equivalent to about 76.2 percent of the total burlap imported in 1929.

The general impression in the jute trade seems to be that from 75 to 80 percent of the total burlap imported is used for the manufacture of bags. Imports of all kinds of burlap averaged about 504,782,000 pounds during the 10 years ended with 1935, of which about 76 percent, or 383,600,000 pounds, was probably consumed in the manufacture of bags. In addition to bags made from imported burlap, about 38,878,000 pounds of jute bags were imported annually during the 10 years ended with 1935. Thus the average poundage of burlap used in bags probably amounted to something like 422,500,000 pounds annually during the past decade, according to available information. This quantity is equivalent to approximately 53 percent of the total imports of jute and jute manufactures during the past decade.

The following figures show roughly the distribution of burlap bags by uses:

Use	Percent
Millfeed	40
Fertilizer	12
Sugar	10
Potatoes	9
Wheat	8
Flour	3
Other	18
Total	100

These are only rough estimates and canot be more than approximately accurate for the 10-year period ended with 1935, and in some instances these figures may not be at all representative.

Cotton bagging: Imports of new jute bagging for cotton, and waste jute bagging for cotton averaged about 98,500,000 pounds during the decade ended with 1935, according to calculations made on the estimates available for the average weights of these materials and official statistics for imports. Cotton bagging manufactured from imported jute butts averaged about 69,000,000 pounds for the 5 census years ended with 1935. The Bureau of the Census reports cotton bagging in square yards, and these figures are converted to linear yards by multiplying by eight-tenths, and to pounds by multiplying the estimated figures for linear yards by 2. Much of the material used to make the cotton bagging reported by the census is doubtless second-hand materials that have been reworked and rewoven. The average imports of jute butts averaged about 32,000,000 pounds annually during the 10 years ended with 1935 and since available information of these classifications of jute products. On the other hand, this apparent discrepancy may be a real one, accounted for by a lack of representativeness of census figures with respect to the decade ended with 1935. Be that as it may, approximately 50,000,000 pounds is the only figure available showing the use of jute in twine and cordage and is equivalent to about 6 percent of the total jute imports for the past decade.

Linoleum backing: The most recent information available indicates that about 5 percent of all burlap is used for this purpose. This figure was given in testimony at the "Hearing on Processing Taxes on Commodities in Competition with Cotton", under section 15 (d), Agricultural Adjustment Act, July 31–August 1, 1933, page 248. On this basis about 25,000,000 pounds, or approximately 3 percent of the total imports of jute and jute products, would have been used for this purpose during the past 10 years.

Roofing: Very fragmentary information, reported by the Tariff Commission in "Jute Cloths", Tariff Information Surveys on articles in paragraphs 262, 279, 284, and 408 of the Tariff Act of 1913, indicates that less than 1 percent of the total imports of jute and jute products is used for roofing.

Webbing: Imports of jute webbing averaged about 857,000 pounds during the 10 years ended with 1935, against domestic production averaging about 3,600,000 pounds for the 4 census years ended with 1933. Thus, the total poundage of these materials amounted to about 4,500,000 pounds, or considerably less than 1 percent of the total poundage of jute and jute products imported during the last 10 years.

Twine and cordage: The production of jute twine and cordage averaged approximately 50,000,000 pounds during the 4 census years ended with 1933. Most of these materials are made from imported raw jute. However, the fact that the combined poundage of jute carpet yarns and twine and cordage exceeds that for raw jute imports may indicate that some waste materials are used in the manufacture of both, indicates that most of these imported jute butts are used for cotton bagging, it would seem appropriate to add, say, 30,000,000 pounds to the 98,500,000 pounds of imported bagging. Thus, approximately 128,500,000 pounds of jute were probably used, on the average, for cotton bagging, or approximately 16 percent of the total imports of jute for the last decade. These figures obviously do not include some 37,000,000 pounds of "reworked" jute bagging and considerable jute sugar-bag cloth which is imported as containers for raw sugar and subsequently converted to bagging for cotton.

Textile wrapping material: According to trade estimates for 1932, about 12 percent of the total burlap consumed in the United States in that year was used for wrapping textile-mill products. If this figure can be taken as representative for the past decade, about 60,600,000 pounds, or 8 percent of the total jute and jute manufactures imported during the past decade was used for this purpose.

Wool carpets and rugs: The wool carpet and rug industry used approximately 66,000,000 pounds of jute yarns annually during the 3 census years ended with 1931. These yarns are made mainly from imported raw jute, although a small quantity of jute yarns are imported. The volume of these yarns is thus estimated to be about 8 percent of the total imports of jute and jute manufactures.

Miscellaneous uses: Use other than those indicated above include (1) burlap for wrapping materials other than textiles, (2) burlap used for curing concrete, (3) brattice cloth, (4) base for hair felt, (5) foundation material for hooked rugs, (6) paddings and interlinings, (7) cotton-picking sheets, etc. These "other" uses combined probably account for about 3,180,000 pounds or approximately 4 percent of the total imports of jute and jute products into the United States during the past decade.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have pointed out that as the price of cotton has increased the production of jute has greatly increased and, therefore, unless the cotton farmer is to be permanently denied any approach whatever to parity, it will be necessary for the Congress to take some step to protect this industry.

Not only is this a question which affects the cotton farmer, but it is a question which affects the manufacturer and textile worker.

We have heard many complaints here from the representatives of the Eastern States that it has been found necessary to dismantle many cotton mills in New England. The drift of the mills to sites nearer the cotton fields is not the only cause of the loss of these industries. If cotton could be afforded this protection and devoted to the uses to which jute processed in India is now put, I thoroughly believe it would go a long way toward making the spindles in the New England mills hum again.

On this question the interest of the cotton manufacturer, the cotton textile worker, and the cotton producer are identical. All should unite in a common cause for protection against this slave product. The largest part of it is spun and processed in India. One great combine controls most of the trade in jute. Mills have been dismantled in this country to ship the machinery abroad in order that the mills might be reestablished in India to get cheap labor, thereby denying employment and forcing on the relief rolls mill operatives in this country.

A chart showing the annual earnings of the workers in the jute mills in India is most interesting. Bear in mind that the great combine which controls the trade in jute has most of its mills in the Orient, and brings the manufactured articles into this country, not only to the detriment of the cotton farmer, but causing unemployment among our mill workers.

The highest-paid worker in these mills, financed with American capital in India, is the worker at the roving machine. He received $10.14 per month, or $121.68 for a year's work. We find workers in the receiving room, employed by American capital to the loss of the American farmer and laborer, who receive $2.03 per month, or the fabulous sum of $24.43 per year. The pickers in the carding room receive $3.14 per month, or $37.74 per year. Through all of the various classes of work afforded in the jute mill, this is a fair picture of the wages which are paid for a year's labor in processing and manufacturing jute in direct competition with the mill workers of America. These mills were erected with American capital, financed by American dollars, and representing American wealth; and yet when an effort is made to restrict the importations of this product into this country, and to force these jobs to be opened to American workers, we encounter opposition.

Mr. President, this is in no sense a threat, but it might be accepted in the nature of a warning. I do not like to assume the role of prophet. I desire to point out something, however, which may be of interest to those representing lines of agriculture other than cotton. If my amendment be not adopted, the cotton farmer for a season will continue to endure discrimination and hardship, but he will not starve. He is trained in adversity and reared on hardships. However, he lives in a land on which God has smiled and which has unlimited possibilities in lines other than cotton. Senators are helping the dairy industry in this bill and therefore are making dairying more attractive. If they do not help cotton, this very fact will redound to the disadvantage of the dairy industry, because in the South 10 and 12 months' grazing is possible. We have caught new visions down there. It will not be long until the South will have dairy herds and the products of these herds will be invading the markets of this Nation which Senators are seeking to protect. We have started producing wheat in the South and if the farmer is forced out of cotton it will increase competition within this country from those not subject to the 42 cents per bushel tariff. We have started producing cattle to such an extent that some of the great packers of the Nation are even this year opening packing houses in the South.

There are few agricultural commodities which cannot be produced in the South; and while our people by instinct and inheritance are cotton producers, we will not be forced into bondage, or to the standard of living which prevails in India. When the cotton farmer prospers, he is also the greatest market for the manufacturers of this Nation, for he spends that which he earns.

In my judgment, the adoption of this amendment will not only benefit the cotton farmer and the cotton-producing section, but will benefit all sections. Not only will justice be served, but the development of all lines of agriculture will be benefited by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. President, I ask that an editorial printed in the Atlanta Constitution of June 1, 1936, entitled "New Uses for Cotton", be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, June 1, 1936]

NEW USES FOR COTTON

The Cotton Textile Institute is constantly experimenting to find new uses for cotton and demonstrating to interested industrialists its practical value for commercial uses.

Every year the Federal Government spends a large sum of money for the same purpose, but, paradoxically, blocks the use of a huge quantity of cotton for domestic consumption by refusing to place an equalizing tariff duty on all jute, jute products, and sisal coming into the country.

Substitution of cotton for jute in the manufacture of many products would be "new" use, and would not necessitate long and costly experiments. The wrapping of 12,000,000 bales of American cotton requires annually 75,000,000 yards of bagging; the wrapping now used for this purpose is jute, and if the American staple were wrapped in cotton bagging it would require 85,000,000 pounds of cotton bagging annually, using up approximately 170,000 bales for a 12,000,000-bale crop—and more in proportion, if a larger crop were produced.

Jute is also used in making sacks for fertilizers and dozens of other products; in the manufacture of carpets, rugs, and other articles such as twine and rope, preferred for these purposes by the manufacturers because a beneficent Government admits the products of coolie labor to compete with American cotton labor without levying an equalizing tariff.

Cotton could displace jute completely from every use in this country with a resulting better manufactured product that would be more satisfactory to the public, and in the instance of cotton, result in a high-density, gin-compressed bale, graded by Federal inspectors and sold at net weight.

American cotton producers lose millions of dollars every year by reason of the slipshod, unbusinesslike manner with which the staple is handled from the time it is ginned until it reaches the floor of the spinner, and just why all Congressmen and Senators from the cotton States do not unite in a "cotton bloc" to force through measures that will secure for the South's great money crop its full commercial rights, surpasses all understanding.

Despite the fact that American cotton is preferred in the world markets to that of any other country, it is gradually losing out. One reason is that our bale is the most disreputable in appearance that appears in any European market. The jute bagging has been slashed again and again by village "samplers", and bears huge patches; the coarse weave of the jute bagging fails to protect the staple from grime of warehouse floors, loading platforms, and car bottoms, while spinners find it interspersed with threads of jute that have become imbedded.

The American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, at its recent meeting in Pinehurst, N. C., adopted a long set of resolutions, aligning its membership in favor of many benefits to American cotton, but resolutions passed at an annual convention, unless followed by an active campaign to carry out the purpose of such action, are ineffective.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have the deepest sympathy for the Senator from Georgia; but the trouble is, if I may say so to him, that he did not go to see the farm leaders. If he had gone to see the Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation and the Washington representative of the Grange—those leaders who exploit and mislead the farmers of America—and had brought his petition here, it would have been passed overwhelmingly. I am sorry he did not do that.

Yesterday a tax of 205 percent was put on inedible whale oil. Now, the Senator from Georgia comes here, but, lacking the support of the American Farm Bureau Federation leader and the Grange leader, his amendment will be rejected.

Having said that, however, I must say for my farmers—speaking now really for my farmers, and not to the leaders—that every farmer in New York State is opposed to this amendment. The truck farmer and the dairy farmer and all the other farmers are opposed to it, and I sincerely hope, with all the earnestness shown by the Senator from Georgia, that his amendment will be voted down. Next year, however, let me beg the Senator from Georgia to go and see the leaders—these men who come here and farm the farmers—and he will get a tariff even over 205 percent. [Laughter.]

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD sundry telegrams on this subject which I have received.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate:

As members National Association Waste Material Dealers and New York Association Dealers Paper Mills Supplies strongly urge defeat of Senator Russell's amendments to 1936 revenue bill, providing import tax on jute and jute products. Consider proposals discriminating, unfair, and placing undue hardships and expensive costs on manufactures of roofing felts, paper, and kindred lines. Proposed tax is in cases as high as 120 percent of cost of raw materials. Your unceasing efforts to defeat such amendments are earnestly requested.

DARMSTADT, SCOTT & COURTNEY.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate:

Understand proposal to place duty on scrap bagging for paper making and remanufacturing purposes now taking place in Senate amendment proposed by Senator RUSSELL, placed in revenue bill section 702½. In name of New York Association of Dealers in Paper Mills Supplies and National Association of Waste Material Dealers, of which we are members, we emphatically protest against this proposed tax as outlined to you in our letter of April 2.

WILLIAM STECK & CO., INC.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building:

Have just been advised that Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia, is attempting to add an amendment to the revenue bill to provide in section 702½ for an import tax on jute and jute products varying from 1½ to 2⅛ cents per pound. Strongly urge that you oppose this last-minute attempt by sectional interests to secure legislation not in any way justified and harmful to members of this association in every section of United States.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WASTE MATERIAL DEALERS, INC., Times Building.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senator from New York, Senate Office Building:

Senator RUSSELL, Georgia, has proposed an amendment to revenue bill placing additional duty on unmanufactured jute and jute butts, jute waste bagging, and waste sugar cloth; also additional duties on jute yarns of every description. Any such bill, if passed, would be absolutely ruinous to our industry, and we hope we can count on you to see that this Russell amendment is defeated and not slipped through and added to any bill in the rush to adjourn. It was impossible to get you on the phone this morning, but we hope for your support against this unnecessary and discriminatory taxation.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURING CO.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER:

We urgently request your opposition to an amendment to the revenue bill now before the Senate offered by Senator RUSSELL, which proposes an excise tax on burlaps of 2.7 cents a pound which, if passed, will be a severe penalty chiefly upon farmers throughout the country as well as upon all factory products now packed in burlap bags for rice, beans, fertilizer, flour, seed, sugar, and many other commodities.

BEMIS BRO. BAG CO.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building:

Request your opposition to amendment to revenue bill now before Senate by Senator RUSSELL, proposing excise tax on burlaps of 2.7 cents a pound. If passed, this tax would represent a penalty chiefly upon farmers throughout the country but also upon products now packed in burlap bags such as rice, beans, fertilizer, flour, seed, sugar, and many other commodities.

BEMIS BRO. BAG CO.,
F. W. COPLEY.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 5, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Chamber:

Senator Russell amendment to revenue bill placing excise tax on burlap 2.7 cents per pound. Respectfully request you vote against this Russell amendment, as it would inflict an unnecessary penalty on all users of burlap bags.

CHASE BAG CO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated. I also send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed by the chairman of the Finance Committee to the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the amendment and the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the reply, the Treasury Department says that the amendment as drawn is not objected to by the Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

MAY 16, 1936.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Referring to the report of the Acting Secretary, dated March 11, 1936, relative to S. 3941, "A bill to amend paragraph 1730 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, to provide that oil, meal, and other products produced from the processing of sardines by reduction process shall not be exempt from duty", I wish to quote from a letter just received from Senator W. G. McADOO:

"In lieu of the paragraph so proposed by Mr. Taylor, I propose to offer on the floor of the Senate an amendment to the forthcoming revenue bill, as follows:

" 'Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1730 of the Tariff Act of 1930, all fish oil produced from pilchards (Sardenia caerulea) taken and processed on the high seas extending westerly from the territorial waters of the United States contiguous to the western coast of the United States, and brought directly or indirectly into the United States, shall be assessed with duty and import tax at the lowest rates which would be applicable to such oil if produced in a foreign country other than Cuba. Such duty and import tax shall be assessed and collected pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.'

"Will you kindly and at once request the Treasury Department to advise you if it has any objection to the amendment I so propose to offer?"

It will be appreciated if you will give this matter your prompt attention and advise me with reference to the amendment intended to be proposed by Senator McADOO.

Thanking you for a prompt report, I am,

Sincerely yours,

PAT HARRISON.

MAY 22, 1936.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
Chairman, Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter of May 16, 1936, setting forth an amendment which Senator McADOO proposes to make to the revenue act now pending before your committee, and requesting the views of the Department on the proposed amendment.

The amendment proposed is similar in principle to S. 3941, a bill entitled "A bill to amend paragraph 1730 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, to provide that oil, meal, and other products produced from the processing of sardines by reduction process shall not be exempt from duty", upon which this Department commented in a letter transmitted to you under date of March 11, 1936. The amendment intended to be proposed by Senator McADOO, however, does not contain the objectionable features of S. 3941, which were pointed out in that letter.

The Department is informed that the correct scientific name of the pilchards contemplated by the proposed amendment is "Sardinia caerulea" instead of "Sardenia caerulea", as expressed in the proposed amendment.

In order that difficult questions as to the place of taking fish may be avoided without materially changing the intended effect of the proposed amendment, it is suggested that the words "taken and" following the parentheses in the proposed amendment be eliminated.

If these changes are made, the Treasury Department will have no objection to the amendment.

Very truly yours,

WAYNE C. TAYLOR,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from California will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 811. Fish oil produced from sardines: Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1730 of the Tariff Act of 1930, all fish oil produced from pilchards (Sardinia caerulea) processed on the high seas extending westerly from the territorial waters of the United States contiguous to the western coast of the United States, and brought directly or indirectly into the United States, shall be assessed with duty and with import tax at the lowest rates which would be applicable to such oil if produced in a foreign country other than Cuba. Such duty and import tax shall be assessed and collected pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the amendment may go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from California will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have been advised that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] secured an amendment to section 704, to be found on page 270, changing the effective date of title V, the amendments to taxes on certain oils, from 30 days to 60 days following the date of the enactment of the measure.

I ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of that amendment in order that I may present certain considerations which I think are vital to the entire title.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as the Senator who presented the amendment, I make no objection to reconsideration for the presentation that the Senator may require. It was not a question of securing the adoption of an amendment of which the Senator from Wisconsin was not aware, however, because I saw him on the floor during the time of its presentation and during the time that the Senate acted upon the amendment; but I am perfectly willing to consent to a reconsideration so that he may be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Wisconsin whether it will be necessary to reconsider the action on the committee amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be necessary to reconsider the action on the committee amendment, and to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment offered by the senior Senator from California was adopted. I therefore make that request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

Without objection, the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from California to the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want the Senate to be apprised of the effect which I think will flow from the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

An attempt was made in the consideration of a previous revenue bill to lay certain excise taxes upon fats and oils. The immediate effect of that action was to increase the price of the domestic product. However, those in the United States who were using the particular fats and oils soon found that by taking byproducts of these oils, or substitutes for them, they could effectively defeat the action of Congress in imposing the excise taxes.

For the purpose of this discussion I wave aside any of the arguments pro and con concerning the action taken by the Congress. However, in connection with this particular bill, an effort was made by the Senator from North Carolina and the junior Senator from Texas to impose taxes against substitutes and derivatives of these fats and oils which had been employed to all intents and purposes as a means of avoiding and evading the policy of Congress as declared in the previous act.

When the pending bill was being considered by the committee, if my memory serves me correctly, the action of the committee, as publicly announced, took place some 10 days or 2 weeks ago. Therefore all of the consumers of these commodities were put on notice that favorable action had been taken by the committee to plug this loophole which had been discovered in the law.

We considered that allowing the 30-day period following the enactment of the act would be entirely sufficient to meet the situation. The point I desire to make and the point which I think the Senate should take into consideration is that under the amendment offered by the senior Senator from California, importers who desire to use these commodities which have been employed for the purpose of avoiding the policy of Congress and the Government, will have not only the 60-day period the amendment provides, but they have had the period which has elapsed since the time when the committee acted favorably on the amendment and announced its decision to the public.

Therefore, to all intents and purposes, 80 days will probably elapse before these provisions will become effective and after those who have been importing these products have had notice that the plugging of this loophole was to take place.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it is not the purpose to permit the very thing the Senator is talking about, what is the purpose? The purpose of the amendment is to allow people to bring in large quantities of the imports before the law becomes effective.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The point I desire to make is that if we give the importers, the users of these commodities for domestic purposes, 80 days in which to import their supplies, without title V becoming effective, it is my firm conviction that we may be certain that the amendment will not be effective in a great many instances for an entire year. I do not believe the Senate realizes the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. President, if there is some particular commodity which, because of the crop year in which it is grown, or for some other reason, ought to be given special consideration, I shall not object to giving it special consideration, but the insertion of this amendment as to the effective date of the title will, in my opinion, operate to give the processors and manufacturers a full 80 days in which to import their supplies. It is certain, in my opinion, that most of them will import all they need for a whole year during that period of time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Just a word in response, Mr. President. Is this not much ado about nothing? Thirty days additional time was given under the amendment, making the effective date, instead of the thirtieth day, the sixtieth day, after the enactment of the bill. That is the amendment.

If such a wrong is about to be committed, is it not obvious that it will be committed within the 30-day period, or, as put by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, within the 50 days which he says will elapse? So that, after all, we are discussing 30 days of grace which would be accorded under any circumstances, it seems to me, in an amendment of this character.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The action of the Senate committee was taken some time ago, and it was announced to the country. Furthermore, some period is going to elapse before the law will actually become effective. So it is a question of 80 days instead of 30 days.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; the question is whether or not any wrong is going to be done, not a question of 80 days or 50 days or 30 days. If a wrong is going to be done, then there may be some substance to the argument that is advanced by the Senator from Wisconsin. But when he says that 50 days grace are allowed—which I deny—if any wrong were to be committed, the entire wrong could be committed within that time.

If it be such an important thing that must be done to protect somebody who is undisclosed here, then that protection could be accorded by giving no days of grace at all. The committee accorded 30 days of grace. I asked for 60 days of grace, and it seems to me that we are wasting time in this period of the day in debate over whether we will give 60 days of grace to men who have asked it in good faith, men who live in the State from which I come, or whether we will give them, as the bill did originally, 30 days of grace.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just one word in reply. As I see it, it is not merely a question of 60 days or 30 days, because every importer of these commodities against which the tax is now proposed to be invoked has had notice ever since the Finance Committee adopted the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Texas that there was a possibility that the tax would be imposed.

We can assume that the corporations and individuals who import these commodities are intelligent, and that at the moment they learned of that action by the committee they sought to procure from outside of the United States as great a supply as they could possibly procure within the terms of the amendment.

The Senator from California cannot contend, in my opinion, that there is no substantial difference between the 30-day period of grace and the 60-day period of grace, because it means that every boat coming to the United States from the countries of the world which produce these various commodities will be loaded with imports for the domestic processors. If we give them 60 days, we will simply double, or perhaps triple, the quantity of commodities which they can import within that time.

It may be that Senators are opposed to this proposition, and that is all very well and good. If they are opposed to it, they have a perfectly legitimate right to take whatever action here they see fit to take. But I contend that we should not have the policy which has been adopted by the committee and adopted by the Senate destroyed by allowing such a long period of time during which the processors can import huge quantities of these commodities.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I confess, Mr. President, I do not understand why this time should be given at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. What are the articles that come in, and why do they need any time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The articles are found on page 267, line 15, going to line 16 on page 268. A large number of commodities are covered by the amendment at that place.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the object of giving time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the usual procedure to permit the usual period of readjustment, as we do, for example, in a tariff act. We do not make it effective on the day that it passes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think as a rule we do, but we make exceptions. I was wondering in this case why the exception was necessary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This is the usual peroid of grace which, as I understand, is given following the enactment of legislation which affects competitive or import situations. All I am saying is that I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from California will go a long way toward making this provision which the Senate itself already has agreed to, ineffective so far as the next year is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, just a word. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin very much indeed for his gracious remark that some Senators may want to vote one way in this matter and some may want to vote another, and that all have a right so to vote. I am delighted with the admission that is accorded and the consent that is thus given me.

I have been for this amendment. I have been regularly in favor of the amendment and have voted for it when it has been voted on at all. I am not seeking to destroy the amendment. I do seek to protect, if I can, the small individuals who are called "crushers" in the State of California and who will be affected by a 30-day limitation. If what they are doing at the present time is such a wrong, then they ought not to be given any grace at all; and the case recurs, as I said in the beginning, merely to whether we shall give them 30 days' grace or 60 days' grace. They are given 30 days by this bill, and it will do no living soul any harm to accord them the privilege of having 60 days' grace within which to clean up.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I should like to say a word in support of the amendment proposed by my distinguished colleague from California. I cannot see any harm whatever in allowing the 60 days' grace provision to go to conference. If any irremediable injury is going to be done to the Government by giving processors in California an opportunity to protect themselves in a reasonable way, then the amendment can be altered in conference. I earnestly hope that the amendment will not be stricken out and that it may be permitted to go to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall make one brief statement in reply to the argument of the junior Senator from California. It will not be possible to cut this period down in conference. The action that the Senate takes now is the determinant action on the whole proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division.

On a division Mr. JOHNSON's amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of title IV it is proposed to insert the following:

TITLE V—EXCISE TAXES

SEC. 701. TAX ON TAPIOCA, SAGO, AND CASAVA.

The Revenue Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by adding after section 611 the following new section:

"SEC. 611½. TAX ON TAPIOCA, SAGO, AND CASAVA.

"There is hereby imposed upon the first domestic processing or use of sago, sago crude, and sago flour, tapioca, tapioca flour, and casava, whether or not such products or any of them have been refined, modified, or otherwise processed, and in whatever combination or mixtures containing a substantial quantity of any one or more of such products, a tax of 2½ cents per pound, to be paid by the processor or user thereof in manufacturing or processing. For the purposes of this section the term 'first domestic processing' shall mean the first use in the United States, in the manufacture or production of an article intended for sale, of the article with respect to which the tax is imposed. The tax on the article described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to such articles imported after the date of the enactment of this paragraph and shall not be subject to the provisions of subsection (b) (4) of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended (prohibiting draw-back), or section 629 of such act (relating to expiration of taxes)."

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the amendment offered by me would impose an excise tax of 2½ cents a pound on the first domestic processing of sago, tapioca, and cassava flour.

These products—now on the free list—compete directly with starches produced from American corn, wheat, rice, white and sweet potatoes. These imported starches have taken over not only a great part of the previously developed business but are constantly absorbing a large part of the new business developed by the research departments of the domestic starch industry. This is evidenced by the following table, which gives the average annual imports, by 10-year periods, since the year 1905:

From 1905 to 1914, inclusive, 44,000,000 pounds.

From 1915 to 1924, inclusive, 90,835,000 pounds.

From 1925 to 1934, inclusive, 150,304,000 pounds.

In 1935 the imports amounted to 226,986,000 pounds; in the first 3 months of 1936, 77,711,000 pounds, or at the rate of 310,000,000 pounds per annum.

More than 80 percent of these starches are used industrially and displace starches produced from domestically grown agricultural products.

By virtue of this diversion from domestically produced starches to these imported starches many potato-starch mills have been closed, and a surplus of over 20,000,000 pounds of potato starch now remains unsold. At the same time the cornstarch manufacturers have been obliged to curtail their operations, with the result that in 1935 their purchases of corn were many million bushels less than in 1934.

I say that, in all fairness, the American farmer is entitled to the American market in the case of all commodities which can be grown to advantage on the farms of this country.

The imports of these foreign starches are increasing so rapidly from year to year because the price of corn in this country and the price of American labor and all materials used in the manufacture of starch result in a cost far above the cost of these Asiatic starches, which are produced in tropical countries and handled and converted with coolie labor who receive between 25 and 30 cents a day—long hours—as against a wage of 50 cents an hour in the starch-refining plants of this country; the policy of our Government results in a price level for the farmers' products at a figure which makes it entirely impossible to make these domestic starches cheap enough to compete with the Asiatic starches. It seems inconsistent to pay money to take starch-producing products out of production at around $10 an acre and then let these competing products come in duty free and take the market away from manufacturers who are buying and converting the American products.

The starch-refining industry must have its raw products hauled into the plants, which means heavy freight charges; the finished starch products are transported to the industrial centers, again supplying considerable revenue to the railroads. The starch-refining industry has used over a million and a half tons of coal annually, which means large revenue from the railroads, as well as to the miners employed in mining that quantity of coal. The decline in business already occasioned by these imports has resulted in the industry decreasing purchases of coal 150,000 tons during each of the past 2 years, which was a loss of revenue to the miners and the railroads. There was a great loss of revenue to the railroads owing to the corn that was not bought and transported on account of the diversion of business to these foreign starches.

If the rate of import is maintained for the next three-quarters of 1936 at the rate of imports for the first quarter, we will have imported 310,000,000 pounds of these starches, which is equal to the corn starch produced from the corn grown on 400,000 acres of corn land, or 12,400,000 bushels of corn. If this starch were made from potatoes, it would take all the potatoes in several of the States. There are potato-starch plants closed in this country which should be operating and furnishing a market to farmers in the neighborhood. Owing to these free imports, there are 20,000,000 pounds of American potato starch now in storage in warehouses—while the market is being taken over by these imported starches.

I have a letter from the American Farm Bureau Federation, reading as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25, 1936.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: At this time, when additional revenues are so greatly needed for proper conduct of the Government, the American Farm Bureau Federation urges the adoption of an excise-tax program on agricultural products enjoying entry into the United States, which compete effectively with American-grown agricultural products.

Products being imported, from which substantial revenues can be obtained, are tropical starches, such as tapioca and its processed forms, and sago flour and sago starch.

Importations of these commodities have been increasing annually in the last 5 years, notwithstanding relatively low prices for domestically produced starches made from corn, wheat, rice, and potatoes grown by American farmers.

The American Farm Bureau Federation has recognized the situation in each of the last 3 years, when, at each of its annual conventions, it has passed resolutions urging an excise tax on tropically produced starches.

We therefore urge the Senate Finance Committee and the Senate to include in the pending tax measure, H. R. 12395, adequate excise taxes on tropical starches.

Respectfully yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is a member of the committee. His amendment was presented to and carefully considered by the committee and rejected. I ask that the amendment be rejected by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 241, in section 401, after line 5, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

(b) Section 105 (f) of such act is amended by striking out the words in the first parentheses in the first sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Which declaration of value may be amended biennially thereafter;".

And in line 6, to strike out "(b)" and insert "(c)".

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, under the capital-stock-tax act which took effect in 1933, a corporation was allowed to fix the value of its capital stock upon which it would be called upon to pay a tax. The theory was that it would give the actual value because that would be the logical thing to do. It is perfectly evident that when the act expressly provided "which declaration of value cannot be amended", the facts with regard to the corporation could not be obtained.

For instance, a new company starts in business. It has nothing but its physical property. At that time it values its physical property. In 2 years' time, if it has succeeded in its business and its earnings have grown, the value of the physical property is entitled to earn more than the amount then fixed.

Let us take a new company with which I am familiar and with which Senators from California and Wyoming are familiar. A new oil company is organized and begins business.

It has nothing except a lease on a piece of ground owned by the Government of the United States. It has that lease and that is all it has. The value of that is $100,000, we will say. If it never strikes oil, that is all it has. If, on the other hand, it should strike oil the production would probably be anywhere from $100,000 to $1,000,000 a year. The capital stock of the company would be greatly enhanced in value, and yet if they could not amend that return they would have to hold that valuation at $100,000 when they would be earning $100,000 a year legitimately. Therefore, they would have to pay an enormous excess-profits tax by reason of the first valuation placed on the property.

That occurs more or less with regard to every new company that starts in business. A textile company starts in business. It has nothing except its physical property. However, it expects to do a big business. If it does a large business, then the original estimate of the value of the property is wrong and should be increased in accordance with its earning power. To say that when a new company starts, before it really has anything of value, it must fix its value and then when it establishes a real value by reason of its business success it shall not be allowed to state truthfully that value for the purpose of taxation seems to be not only an absurdity but absolutely unreasonable and unjust.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Utah, inasmuch as the House bill repeals completely the capital-stock tax, whether or not the whole subject would be in conference regardless of the amendment going into the bill at this time?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is some doubt as to whether it would be in conference. But I am constrained to the view that no technical rule would be invoked and that the matter might be fully considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why not? The section was repealed by the House.

Mr. KING. The bill as it passed the House would repeal the capital-stock provisions, but the corporations would have an opportunity to make another declaration of value for taxation purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill as it passed the House repealed it, and the bill as reported by the Senate committee keeps the provision in the bill, so it would be in conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the point I should like to make is that the Senate should not pass upon the amendment on the theory that the conferees will have an opportunity to study it. The bill as it passed the House repeals, after 1 year, the capital-stock and excess-profits tax and provides it shall operate at only 50 percent of the existing rate. The bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee, in order to obtain revenue, provides for a continuation of the capital-stock and excess-profits tax at the full rate, and indefinitely. Therefore, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada should prevail, the conferees would be in a situation where they would not be able to consider anything more drastic than the Senate has provided in its provision for continuation of the capital-stock and excess-profits tax.

The capital-stock and excess-profits tax is predicated upon the theory that one tax will operate so as to enforce the other. In my opinion, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada should become law—and in my opinion it would become law if adopted by the Senate, because the conferees would have no discretion in the matter—we may kiss good-bye to the revenue from capital-stock and excess-profits taxes because what is proposed is to give every corporation a chance to guess against the Government every 2 years.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in the first place, I very seriously doubt whether the return from the capital-stock tax will be in conference on the present bill. The question would be, between the two, as to whether it should extend a year or whether it should extend longer than a year. That would be the only question in conference, because that is the only difference between the two bills with regard to the capital-stock tax. Therefore, if the Senate desires to ascertain, for the purpose of taxation, the actual value, as near as may be, of the capital-stock tax, this is the only way in which it can do so. To say that we are going to place a tax of so much on each thousand dollars' worth of capital stock of a corporation, and then say that we are not going to try to ascertain that fact, to me seems dishonest.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Pardon me for just a second.

The Senator from Wisconsin, of course, is correct in his statement. It was intended, by having the excess-profits tax, to force the corporation to give at least a reasonable valuation to its capital stock, and the theory was that every corporation would be induced to give a reasonable valuation to its capital stock. That is what we are trying to find out, and that is the fact; but in the case of a new company that is starting out, the stock of the company may have value, or it may not have value. When a stock is listed the public determine for themselves its value. If the enterprise is entirely speculative the stock has a speculative value, and it continues to have a speculative value until it has an investment value, which is proven by its return.

Assume that a company goes out as an exploration company. It has only $100,000 of capital. That is all it is worth; but in a period of 2 years' time it develops a company that is worth a million dollars. At the start it has been said that the company is worth only $100,000; and although in 2 years it becomes worth a million dollars, under the proposal here that fact may not be established before the collector of internal revenue, but the company will have to go on forever paying excess-profits taxes because it has underestimated the value of its capital stock.

There is not an exploration company in the world that can exist under this provision. An exploration could not be started for oil, for copper, for lead, for zinc, for any metal on earth, and succeed under that provision. No company that starts an exploration has anything to start with except its machinery. If it never discovers the things for which it is exploring, the value of the capital stock is very small; but if it makes its discovery, it gives a value to the capital stock by the very work it is doing and the work it intends to do. This provision would penalize such a company for a discovery. It would penalize it for becoming a successful company by saying to it, "You are bound by your $100,000 valuation, although the corporation is worth a million dollars, and you will pay a tax on all the excess profits over $100,000." That is an absolutely unjust thing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just one word. The statements I have made were not made without consulting the experts; and I say that the Senate ought to hesitate before it jeopardizes $160,000,000 of revenue that is estimated for this year to be derived from the capital-stock and excess-profits tax.

So far as the oil and gas and mining companies are concerned, we give them the most generous kind of treatment in the income-tax law. We allow them percentage depletion and discovery allowances; and there are many companies in the country which have taken advantage of those provisions, and have depleted again and again, and have avoided paying taxes upon their net income after they have had an opportunity to recapture their original capital outlay.

I have no doubt the Senator from Nevada has just cases in mind, but I appeal to the Senate to recognize that when we are passing a tax bill it is impossible to take care of every hardship case, and some consideration must be given to the revenue of the Government. We cannot afford to jeopardize it.

I hesitate very much to argue with the Senator from Nevada about the parliamentary situation, but I am advised that in view of the fact that the House conferees have proposed a repeal of the tax at the end of 1 year, and the Senate has proposed to continue it, the House conferees are in a position where they cannot consider the particular amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, and that it will be a question of accepting the Senate committee amendment as adopted by the Senate or of not accepting it at all.

Therefore, despite the fact that everything that is said may appeal to the Senate, in view of the fact that $160,000,000 of revenue for this taxable year is involved, I think the Senate should hesitate before it jeopardizes any opportunity to collect that amount.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, has the Senator any idea how much of the $160,000,000 would be lost by the adoption of the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I cannot answer that question It is 5 minutes after 7. There is no opportunity to get any estimate from the actuaries of the Treasury. The experts here upon the floor have no desire to affect policy in any way at all. That is a question for the committee, for the Senate, and for the Congress to decide. These gentlemen have been very circumspect in any attempt to influence policy; but I do wish to present to the Senate, before it votes upon the amendment, their apprehension that it will jeopardize the collection of the tax.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I simply do not wish to have the impression prevail that we are likely to lose $160,000,000 by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, I did not mean to leave that impression. I meant to say that that is the estimated revenue, and that I have been advised that there will be substantial losses from it if this amendment shall prevail.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator suggested that we would jeopardize $160,000,000 of revenue.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I may have made that statement, Mr. President; but the point I tried to make was that a return of $160,000,000 is estimated for this tax, and that there is grave apprehension on the part of those I have consulted, who know more about this provision than I do, that the amendment will result in very substantial diminution of the revenue received from the capital-stock and excess-profits tax. Therefore, I hope the Senate will pause before it acts on the amendment, because, as a matter of fact, the bill now falls short of producing the revenue which was requested by the President in his message.

Mr. PITTMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. In view of the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I am wondering, in the event the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is accomplished, whether it might not be wise to do something in the way of making it impossible for these companies to claim over and over and over and over again what amounts to several times their capital taken up in the form of depletion. It seems to me that should have been taken care of years ago. A company should not be permitted to write itself off time after time and still keep claiming that sort of thing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield to me——

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to say that this matter of percentage depletion is a very complicated problem, and certainly could not be settled on the floor of the Senate at this late hour; but I pointed that out simply as an indication that the policy of the Government has been very generous toward those who are operating in what I admit to be a hazardous field of enterprise—namely, exploring for oil, gas, and minerals.

Mr. PITTMAN. No, Mr. President; the Government has not been very generous. The experts have been intelligent in a few matters, and that is one of them. When the copper is taken out of a mine, there is not anything left. When water is taken out of a stream, it flows back; but the depletion of an oil well or a copper mine or a lead mine is complete, and none of them last over about 10 years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not know that this matter was coming up, since it was not touched in the bill; but I should be very glad to furnish the Senator with 13 examples which have been given to me of companies which have taken out their original capital investment time and time again, and are not today paying taxes on their statutory net income, because they continue to take out their capital investment.

Mr. PITTMAN. That has not anything to do with this amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It has something to do, if the Senator will pardon me, with the generous treatment which Congress and the Government have extended to those who are operating in these hazardous fields.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the expression "generous treatment" with regard to taxes is not an accurate one. There never was any generous treatment with regard to taxes; so let us drop the idea of generous treatment.

Senators stand here and tell us that we have no right to consider a question before this body because some tax experts have told them so-and-so, and so-and-so. I think one of the curses of the way measures are passed through this body is the fact that we do not think for ourselves but constantly whirl around and ask what some tax expert thinks, or what some other kind of expert thinks. When we are dealing with a common-sense proposal, at least we do not have to consult some tax expert, who generally has not any common sense.

What we are dealing with in connection with this matter is that there is a law which we passed 2 years ago which provided a tax of so much on every thousand dollars of the capital-stock value of companies. We are supposed to know what the capital-stock value is. We are supposed to ascertain that value for the purpose of taxation. We leave it to the company itself, because if they report an undervaluation we recover what we would lose in excess-profits taxes.

The idea of the experts is that the actual value of a company having been given today, when its value increases in 2 years, they will not let them give the actual value, because they wish to have the Government collect the excess-profits tax not on the actual value of the stock but to collect it on the original value before it attained its new value.

The proposition of having a committee constantly attempt to howl down a Senator on this floor because he is not a member of the committee, and then to base that howl on the constant claim that some tax expert has said so-and-so, does not appeal to me. We do not know the facts ourselves; we do not know a thing on God's earth about it; we do not know how much loss there will be or whether there will be any loss; but the tax expert says so-and-so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am sorry that in this connection I brought in the tax experts to have them castigated by the Senator from Nevada. I have been on the Committee on Finance during four general revisions of the revenue laws, and have participated in their deliberations, and at this time I desire to pay tribute to the service rendered by the experts of the joint committee and of the Treasury in connection with those measures, and to state that, despite the study I have been able to give to the complex problems involved in the bills, I am still ready to acknowledge that there are a great many people who know more about the subject of taxation than I do, and the more I see of the way in which the Senate handles these matters the more I wish that we could have expert advice instead of having measures chucked out on the floor and passed on without proper consideration.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to join with the Senator from Wisconsin in resenting the imputations against these so-called tax experts. There would be no legislation if it were not for the services of these men, who are constantly on the job, studying the questions presented to us.

No man should be permitted to come here and plead special privilege for some particular client without having a committee of Congress analyze the facts. This matter was never discussed in the committee. A single Senator comes on the floor pleading for a special interest, and we are supposed to jump through the hoop.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, for what special interest does the Senator charge the Senator from Nevada is pleading?

Mr. COUZENS. The interest the Senator has disclosed in the record, and I am only talking from the record.

Mr. PITTMAN. I represent no special interest.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator's own argument, the defense of his amendment, speaks for itself.

Mr. PITTMAN. I resent the Senator attempting to place a construction on what I have said to the effect that it is plain that on this floor I am representing any special interest.

Mr. COUZENS. When a Senator rises and pleads for an amendment for a particular class of taxpayers, he certainly is pleading for that particular special interest.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator holds that when the Senator from Nevada is pleading for new companies, no matter in what business they are engaged, and gives an example of various kinds of new companies whose value cannot be determined at the start, then I am willing for him to use the language he has employed, offensive as he intends it to be.

Mr. COUZENS. I had no intention of being offensive. I say that the Senator's own speech in pleading for the amendment speaks for itself and that is all I am making reference to.

Mr. President, what I particularly resent is having an intricate question like this brought up on the floor of the Senate at this hour of the night without it ever having been considered by any committee of the Senate. I do not know now why it was not presented to the committee for consideration, instead of the Senator coming here at the last hour and presenting an amendment, which undoubtedly has appeal, as all of these proposed amendments have appeal. But that does not justify the Senate, without any knowledge whatsoever of the facts, adopting such a broad amendment as this without consideration of its effect upon the Treasury's revenues, or without any information as to its effect upon the corporations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am informed that several representatives, in testifying before the committee, urged the adoption of the amendment. Not being a member of the committee personally, I know nothing about it. I am satisfied, however, that members of the committee have discussed this proposed amendment before today. I do not know why they discussed it, or who brought it to their attention, but I am satisfied it has been discussed by members of the committee before today.

Not being a member of the committee, I did not present the amendment. As a matter of fact, I was never requested to present it. It came to my attention from the hearings before the committee that this amendment had been presented, and I think it is a sound proposal.

I do not think there will be any great loss of revenue as a result of the amendment. I think the result will be to force new companies, which hope to succeed, to pay a tax on an overvaluation, so that, if they do succeed, they will not pay an extra tax in the form of an excess-profits tax.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Obviously the taxpayer is going to be allowed, in connection with this amendment, to fix his own schedules. In other words, wherever it is to his advantage to raise his capital-stock tax up or down he is going to do it so as to be able to regulate the extent to which he pays excess-profits taxes.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is now the law.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but he cannot keep changing from time to time. When he supplies the information he supplies it, and he abides by his judgment at the time. Whenever he finds the opportunity, under this amendment, to circumvent the Treasury he can change his return so as to fix his capital-stock tax as he desires.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under existing law he has been allowed a certain time in which to amend his valuation. I think that time extends to July.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I may suggest to the Senator from Nevada that these two taxes work somewhat concurrently. In other words, the corporation pays a capital-stock tax. If it puts the value too high, it will pay a great deal higher capital-stock tax.

On the other hand, we passed an excess-profits tax. If the corporation has a different basis of valuation, it pays that tax. So the corporation was given the privilege in the present law of fixing its own capital value on the theory that the gain or the loss would probably offset each other, and allow the corporation to fix its own basis of taxation. The corporations have had that advantage under the present law. Under the Senator's amendment they would be enabled to change their basis and readjust it in such a fashion as to take advantage of any ameliorating circumstances in the way of lowering the tax.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Texas knows human nature quite well, because through his great personality and influence he has now secured in the bill a nefarious amendment to protect certain oil investments. The Senator from Texas knows human nature well enough to know that a corporation is going to regulate its capital-stock basis up or down so as to pay no more tax than can be helped.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan misunderstood me. I was endeavoring to support the position taken by the Senator from Michigan, and agree with him in his views. I must apologize to the Senator for being so obtuse as not to be able to make my meaning clear.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to plead dumbness for not understanding.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will admit it on both sides and go on.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall reserve for a later time reply to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan with reference to my having inserted a certain provision in the bill, and wish to say that the Senator from Texas is not the Committee on Finance. The committee inserted whatever is in the bill. With all due apology, I beg to remind the Senate that the Senator from Michigan is a very influential and very powerful member of that committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I simply desire to point out that the Finance Committee overwhelmingly defeated the amendment of the Senator from Texas at one time, but the members of the committee fell for his pleading and smiles and eloquence and reversed themselves.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. My recollection is imperfect as to the discussion which took place in the committee concerning mining properties. A number of witnesses appeared and presented in a very comprehensive manner the problems involved in the development of mines and the hazards incident to mining operations. They made a number of suggestions for legislation, and my recollection is that among them was one indicating the importance of amending the law so that capital-stock valuations might be changed from time to time as conditions justified.

I recall that informally some of the members of the committee, as well as some of the experts, took the view that under the law revaluation might be made during this year, and that it was quite likely that before another revenue year should have elapsed further tax legislation would be enacted, and the whole question could then be investigated, with a view to granting such relief as would be fair and just not only to those engaged in mining operations but to the Government itself.

I am sure the members of the committee appreciated some of the problems and hazards incident to the development of the mining resources of our country; and, speaking for myself, I have no doubt that when the next revenue law is enacted—which I feel sure will be in 1937—ample provision will be made to meet the just demands of those engaged in the mining industry.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Texas has stated the purpose of the amendment, which is that there shall be a self-balancing of the tax basis; that if the capital-stock tax is too low then the excess-profits tax will be collected, and vice versa. That is all true. I think it is not his conclusion, however, that one valuation having been fixed there should never be another valuation fixed, whether the actual value of the property is changed or not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

I think it was an unwise provision and I did not agree to that method. However, since that method was adopted and the corporation has received the benefit of it, I do not favor now changing it in a hurried and unstudied manner. If the general excess-profits tax is to be revised I shall be glad to give consideration to it. I thought it was unwise in the first place. To me the invested capital basis tax represented sounder doctrine.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the act itself provided a period of time—I think 2 years' time—in which to amend it. That was probably satisfactory as to great and old-established companies which we have in mind. Let us assume, however, that a company is organized today and it is told, "On organizing your new company you must establish the value of your capital stock for the purpose of taxation." I say it is physically impossible for a new company which is just starting out actually to fix its capital-stock value, and such a new company should be given a period of 2 years, or some period after starting, in which to determine the facts upon which to base the tax on capital stock. If the amendment were to go to the conference, then the conferees would have something which they could change in any form they wanted to. They could provide a period of 2 years after the organization of a new company in which the company could determine what the actual value of its property was.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think there is very much in what the Senator from Nevada has had to say upon this question. However, early in the deliberations of the Finance Committee I felt I was old enough to make the suggestion that the fair way of arriving at the value of capital investment was to multiply the ascertained net income under the income-tax law applicable to corporations by 8 or 10 or 12, or any other arbitrary amount the committee wished to fix. That is exactly what a corporation undertakes to do. If a corporation earns $100,000, and it were then privileged to fix the value of its capital assets, it would multiply its earnings by 8 or 10 or 12 and say that its capital investment was worth a million dollars.

The Treasury officials pointed out, however, that in times of prosperity earnings might be relatively large and that the capital-stock tax, based upon the values fixed upon the basis I suggested, would be rather heavy. But in times of depression, when the corporation was making no real profit, the Government would not get any money from a capital-stock tax. Of course, I was compelled to recognize the statement as being in large measure true. It is just one of those unfortunate situations that exist.

I repeat, there is much in what the Senator from Nevada says, because in the case of a new corporation starting out upon a rather venturesome program the capital fixed is not what it actually is, but what those who engage in the interprise hope it will be. If they happen to fix irrevocably the capital stock or capital invested, and have no privilege of revaluing, they may be caught with very high excess profits when, as a matter of fact, their investment may have increased in value.

I believe it to be eminently fair and just that the annual earnings of a corporation should be multiplied, say, by 10 or 12½, and the capital-stock tax automatically fixed in that way so that there will be no guessing on the part of those charged with the management of the corporation, and the Government would get a capital-stock tax on that basis.

I recognize, however, that in times of great depression or in times of great leanness, when the corporation did not make any earnings, then its capital-stock tax would be greatly reduced and could indeed pass out of the picture. However, it seems to me that there might be fixed some minimum of value, either on the basis of original investment or what not, and then the capital stock fixed in some proportion to the annual net taxable earnings of the corporation.

I may say to the Senator from Nevada that, if I rightly interpret the situation, the bill as it passed the House would repeal the capital-stock tax and the bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee would reenact the capital-stock tax, so it seems to me that the whole matter would be open for conference, and the conferees might have a free hand to arrive at some fair basis of settling the particular controversy if no amendment were adopted.

I may say also that while, of course, we have come probably to a change in our national policy with reference to corporations, nevertheless the problem presented by the Senator from Nevada is not so important if one is dealing with one corporation, but in the case of a series of corporate enterprises or a number of corporations which are interlinked or affiliated under one management, where one management is responsible for fixing the value or valuing the investments in half a dozen or a dozen corporations if they are legitimate—and if they are not legitimate structures a different question would be involved—when those values have become fixed and have become irrevocable for a series of corporations, which are the result of a normal expansion of business on the lines along which we have allowed it to develop in this country, then we have a very acute problem, and what the Senator from Nevada points out is entitled to very grave consideration.

Of course I should like to get through with the tax bill, but while on that very point I desire to make this statement. I am not sure whether or not our business in America ought to be conducted under the corporate form. I am not sure but that a corporation with immense power, with immense holdings, may not be an evil as well as a benefit. That is not the question, it seems to me. If we are going to continue the corporate form of business—and we do most of our business under the corporate form—then these problems are coming back and back and back again for consideration and reconsideration year after year.

There is much justice and much good common sense and plain fairness in the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada. On that very point the question whether or not under a pressure tax we are to force out corporate earnings and place them in the hands of the individual stockholders comes at last to our own conclusion as to whether business in America shall be carried on under the corporate form or whether the Congress has upon it the higher prerogative of determining a sound policy for the Nation.

It seems to me, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me to make this brief suggestion, that as the bill stands, as passed by the House and as reported by the Finance Committee, there is freedom on the part of the conferees to consider the suggestion which he makes and which I believe has in it a great deal of merit.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I do not object to the fixing of the capital-stock declaration based on a percentage such as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has suggested, or on the basis of earnings, but when we leave it wide open in accordance with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada, whenever the taxpayer finds he has his capital-stock declaration too low, and is paying more in excess-profits taxes than he thinks he ought to, he would be able to fix his own tax.

In that connection I point out that the excess-profits taxes may be a great deal higher than the capital-stock tax. He then elects to increase the capital-stock tax so as to pay a very small rate on capital stock and thereby save a great deal of money. The next year comes along and he says, "I have this too high. I am not going to have much excess-profits tax this year, because I am not going to have any excess profits, so I will reduce my capital-stock tax to secure a lower rate."

If we had a standard such as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], it might be applicable, but under the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nevada it seems to me it is left wide open for any taxpayer to fix his own tax.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I feel that in justice to what has been said respecting the presentation of this matter to the committee I should refer to the hearings, in which I find this, among other statements:

> In the same connection we strongly urge the repeal of the capital-stock and excess-profits tax, particularly because a fair application of the law to the mining industry is almost impossible unless provision be made for the periodical revision of the declared value.

Suggestions were made by a number of persons who came before the committee that there should be an opportunity for a new declaration of value. Upon further reflection, I am inclined to believe that the conferees will have power to provide for revaluation so that the results sought by the Senator from Nevada may be accomplished.

Personally I believe there should be a modification of existing law in the matter of revaluation. The mining industry is to be differentiated from most other industries. Ore deposits are exhausted, mines are depleted, and values of mining properties are variable, as a result of which an opportunity should be afforded for redeclaring value where the capital-stock plan of taxation prevails.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to modify my amendment. I send the modified amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 241, in section 401, after line 5, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

> (b) Section 105 (f) of such act is amended by striking out the words in the first parenthesis in the first sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "which declaration of value may be amended within the period of 3 years after incorporation of a new corporation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada as modified.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, my colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] was called from the Chamber on important public matters. At his request and in his behalf I submit the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it may be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, between lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

> SEC. 812. TAX ON LUMBER.
> Effective on and after the date of enactment of this act, section 601 (c) (6) of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:
> "For the purposes of this paragraph, lumber is defined as the product of the sawmill not further manufactured than by sawing, resawing, or passing lengthwise through a standard planing machine, crosscut to length and matched. The board measurement of dressed lumber shall be based upon the corresponding nominal dimensions of rough green lumber."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this amendment in nowise contravenes the Revenue Act of 1932, which deals with this problem. Recently, in some of the Government agencies, different views have been taken with respect to the definition of the term "lumber." In order to remove that doubt which exists about the definition of the term, and to make the term accurate in its meaning, I have proposed, in behalf of my colleague, the amendment which has just been read. It does not in any way affect the duty or the revenue derived from the item under the Revenue Act of 1932. It is simply clarifying language, and I sincerely hope the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is in charge of the bill, will take it to conference in order that the conferees may work out some language appropriate to meet the situation I have briefly described.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will say in response to the plea of my friend that his colleague [Mr. STEIWER] came before the committee and presented the substance of the amendment. My recollection is that the committee voted against the amendment on the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understood that my colleague did not present the amendment to the committee; that he made a statement, but did not propose the language. At the present time the amendment has been reduced to definite language. I am not familiar with the history of the matter; but for the reason that my colleague did not actually present his amendment, but made a statement, I should like to have the Senator take the language into conference and work out some language that may be an improvement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it is true that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] came before the committee and requested that the change be made, but he did not himself present an amendment in language. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Very well, Mr. President; the amendment may go to conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the amendment is agreed to——

Mr. KING. I shall withdraw consent until I hear from my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. We have established the precedent this afternoon that if we wish to get a matter into conference the way to do so is to keep it out of the bill. In order to save the conferees a lot of trouble, I call attention to the fact that now the Senator in charge of the bill proposes to get something into conference by putting it in the bill. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] in behalf of his colleague [Mr. STEIWER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether all the committee amendments have been presented and disposed of?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I have two or three more.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have an amendment to offer; but, as I understand, the committee wishes to finish presenting its amendments before other amendments are offered.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is desirable, but not absolutely necessary, that that be done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then I shall offer mine now, because I wish to get it before the Senate. I shall be as brief as possible.

I have an amendment on the table which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. —. Section 5219 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5219. The legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing national banking associations located within its limits upon their real and tangible personal property and also upon their shares: Provided, That in lieu of such tax upon the shares, the legislature may impose either a tax upon the net income of such associations or an excise tax measured by net income received by them from all sources: Provided further, That such taxation shall not be at greater rates than are imposed, respectively, upon the real and tangible personal property or shares or income of, or by way of excise (or franchise) tax upon State banks: And provided further, That a State which imposes a tax on the net income of individuals or corporations, or an excise or a franchise tax on corporations measured by their net income, may also include in such income of individuals or corporations the dividends from national banking associations located in the State, but only if dividends from the State banks of such State are similarly included; and may also tax dividends from such associations located without the State, but in such case at no higher rate than is imposed on the dividends from foreign corporations. As herein used, the words 'State banks' shall mean and include all persons and corporations engaged primarily in the business of commercial banking; and the word 'shares' in its application to individuals engaged primarily in the business of commercial banking shall mean the capital and surplus of such business, and the word 'dividends' shall in such case mean the distributed profits therefrom."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in spite of the fact that this amendment is very important to half or all of the States of the Union, I shall be very brief. I should not bring the amendment here at all at this hour, or offer it to this bill, were it not for the fact that in the various States a very serious emergency exists in the matter of taxation of national banks, due to an outrageous provision of the Federal law.

The amendment speaks for itself. In short, it provides that the Federal statute shall be amended so that States may tax national banks on the same basis and at the same rate that State banks are taxed in the various States.

This matter has been coming here since 1921 or 1922. To the best of my knowledge, it was first brought to the attention of the Congress by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. For several years the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], introduced bills to provide equality or to do away with discrimination against State banks such as now is provided by the Federal law. The matter has never been permitted to come to the floor of the Senate. It has had hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee. All sides have been heard on many occasions, but the discrimination against State banks still exists.

As a matter of fact, in a number of States—I do not know how many, but I understand in at least 16 States from which I have communications here—the tax commissioners are in favor of the enactment of a bill of this character. For instance, in my State—and I think the same thing is true in other States—national banks pay taxes on their real estate only. State banks must pay taxes on their real estate and also on their capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

As a result, in communities where during the depression the relief problem has been so severe as to strain the taxpaying power of the entire community, the national banks have not carried their load.

As a result of this situation, we find that in the United States as a whole, from the time this situation arose in 1922, the capital and surplus of national banks increased 11 percent, but taxes on them decreased an average of 39½ percent. To repeat, in the United States as a whole, the local taxes on national banks have decreased 39½ percent since 1922, while their capital and surplus have increased 11 per cent.

If there is any other form of corporation or industry or business which has had a special privilege from the Federal Government in saving it from carrying its burdens of local taxation, I should like to know what it is.

In showing what the various States that have sent communications on the subject have to say, I shall be very brief.

A communication from Jackson, Miss., signed by A. S. Coody, secretary of the Mississippi State Tax Commission, reads as follows:

MISSISSIPPI STATE TAX COMMISSION,
Jackson, Miss., August 24, 1932.

Hon. GEORGE H. SULLIVAN,
Chairman, Bank Tax Commission,
St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 16th with reference to the proposed amendment to section 5219, United States Revised Statutes. This commission agrees with the action taken by your commission. It seems that enough time has been spent in attempting to reach a compromise on this matter.

It seems to me that the matter of discrimination could be disposed of by the simple proviso that national-bank shares could not be taxed to a greater extent than the shares of State banks. States would certainly not overtax State banks. The amendment suggested in item 4 of your letter would likely have the same effect.

With best wishes and regards, • • •

Yours very truly,

A. S. COODY, Secretary.

These communications were written to the chairman of the Minnesota Bank Tax Commission, which was organized for the purpose of obtaining relief; and these communications came to that body from the tax commissions of other States.

From the Indiana State Board of Tax Commissioners, Mr. Zoercher writes as follows:

STATE BOARD OF TAX COMMISSIONERS,
Indianapolis, Ind., August 15, 1932.

GEORGE H. SULLIVAN,
Chairman, Bank Tax Commission of Minnesota,
St. Paul, Minn.

MY DEAR MR. SULLIVAN: Yours of recent date received and in reply will say that the members of this board feel that the amendment proposed by the Senate committee at its recent session is the proper way to solve this question of section 5219—that is, other money capital shall be capital engaged in the banking business. As long as national banks are treated the same as State banks and trust companies are treated, they ought to be satisfied. There is no reason for any objection to that provision in the statute.

People are getting disgusted with the fight these high-powered attorneys are making in trying to have the banks not pay any taxes at all. It seems to me that the committee representing the States in the Union ought to meet the objections by a statement that is clean- and clear-cut, without any doubt as to its meaning, and the last Senate amendment is clear- and clean-cut and ought to settle the whole controversy.

Very truly yours,

PHILIP ZOERCHER.

From the State of California I have the following letter signed by Dixwell L. Pierce, secretary of the State board of equalization, at Sacramento:

STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION,
Sacramento, Calif., August 16, 1932.

Hon. GEORGE H. SULLIVAN,
Chairman, Bank Tax Commission of Minnesota,
St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR SIR: This is in acknowledgment of your letter of August 12 in which you enumerate the tentative conclusions reached by the members of your commission at a meeting held on August 10.

This board finds itself in agreement as to all of your conclusions. As you know, we have felt for sometime that the compromise bill introduced last April by Mr. STEAGALL as H. R. 11118 would not entirely meet our needs and has not given much promise of passage.

We definitely favor the Norbeck bill and have urged favorable action on it. While we realize that the bankers are strongly represented, we think that through concerted effort on the part of the States we would stand a better chance of getting the Norbeck bill passed than any other that has recently been offered. It does not seem to us that the banks required any further protection than that which is afforded by the fourteenth amendment and that the alleged discrimination has never been proved so far, at least, as California is concerned.

Very truly yours,

DIXWELL L. PIERCE, Secretary.

The Norbeck bill, to which Mr. Pierce refers, is to the same effect as the pending amendment.

From the State of South Carolina, Mr. W. G. Query, chairman of the South Carolina Tax Commission, says:

SOUTH CAROLINA TAX COMMISSION,
Columbia, June 1, 1932.

Mr. GEORGE SULLIVAN,
Chairman, Bank Tax Commission of Minnesota,
St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR MR. SULLIVAN: I have your letter of May 26, enclosing report no. 625, in re Senate bill 4291. I have written the South Carolina Senators and expect them to support the bill when taken up for consideration.

W. G. QUERY,
Chairman, South Carolina Tax Commission.

From the State of Montana comes a letter signed by James H. Stewart, from the board of equalization, in which he states:

STATE OF MONTANA,
BOARD OF EQUALIZATION,
Helena, September 1, 1932.

Hon. GEORGE H. SULLIVAN,
Chairman, Bank Tax Commission of Minnesota,
State Capitol, St. Paul, Minn.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your communication respecting the bank-tax legislation so long under consideration, beg to say that I am confident that with the efforts you are making and with the opportunity you have to give consideration to the matter that whatever conclusion you reach will be the best that could be had under the circumstances.

No fair-minded person could object to the legislation proposed, in that the property of banks should bear no higher rate of taxation than would the property in the hands of individual citizens or corporations other than banks. * * *

With very best personal regards to you and others of our acquaintance working in cooperation with you, I am

Yours sincerely,

JAMES H. STEWART.

John P. Hennessey, tax commissioner of the State of New York, has this to say:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF TAXATION AND FINANCE,
Albany, September 2, 1932.

Hon. GEORGE H. SULLIVAN,
Chairman, Bank Tax Commission of Minnesota,
State Capitol, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR SIR: In the absence of Hon. Thomas M. Lynch, president of the Department of Taxation and Finance of New York State, I am replying to your letter of August 26, addressed to Hon. Mark Graves and referred by him to President Lynch.

I have been unable to confer with President Lynch or John J. Merrill, members of the tax commission, to ascertain their views concerning the subject of taxation of national banks, mentioned in your letter.

This matter was carefully considered by the Mastick commission, a local commission reviewing the tax laws of New York State.

I am personally in favor of the recommendation contained in this report, that a State should be authorized to tax the property of national banks to the same extent and in the same manner as it taxes other property and to tax national banks' business to the same extent and in the same manner that it taxes other business and to tax stockholders in national banks to the same extent and in the same manner as it taxes other stockholders. In other words, the authority conferred by section 5219 of the United States Revised Statutes should be broadened somewhat so that it might be exercised in the several States without imposing restrictions and making compliance therewith difficult and subject to possible constitutional objections.

The representatives of New York State at the National Tax Conference, to be held in Columbus, Ohio, September 12–19, will be pleased to attend any suggested conference to consider proposed amendments to section 5219 of the United States Revised Statutes.

Very truly yours,

JOHN P. HENNESSEY,
Tax Commissioner.

From the State of Utah, R. E. Hammond, commissioner of the State tax commission, says:

THE STATE OF UTAH,
STATE TAX COMMISSION,
Salt Lake City, August 25, 1932.

Your letter of August 18, relative to proposed amendments to section 5219, has just come to my attention and I have read it with considerable interest. In answer to your request for my opinion on certain points, I suggest the following:

1. I think it would be advisable to recede from the support of the compromise bill.

2. I agree with you that we should favor and support the Norbeck bill. * * *

With best wishes, I remain,

Yours truly,

R. E. HAMMOND, Commissioner.

From the State of Wyoming comes a letter signed by F. Chatterton, chairman of the board of equalization, in which it is stated:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
BOARD OF EQUALIZATION,
Cheyenne, September 2, 1932.

Replying to your favor of August 19 relative to amending the Norbeck bill for amendment of section 5219, relative to taxation of national banks, I think your suggestion is O. K.

I still think that a simple provision that national banks should not be taxed differently or at a higher rate than State banks are taxed in the respective States would be most satisfactory.

Yours truly,

F. CHATTERTON, Chairman.

From the State of Michigan Mr. Wayne Newton, of the State commission of inquiry into county, township, and school-district government, Lansing, Mich., comes this letter:

STATE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO COUNTY, TOWNSHIP, AND SCHOOL-DISTRICT GOVERNMENT,
Lansing, October 11, 1932.

Speaking for myself alone, I heartily applaud the return of a common-sense point of view upon the subject of bank taxation. I believe the States should have the power to tax national banks in the same manner that State banks are taxed.

Very truly yours,

R. WAYNE NEWTON, Secretary.

From the State of Missouri there is this letter from the chairman of the State tax commission, Mr. J. T. Waddill:

STATE TAX COMMISSION OF MISSOURI,
Jefferson City, Mo., October 13, 1932.

I have your letter of October 6 with reference to taxation on banks. I most heartily agree with your views with reference to taxation of banks. Undoubtedly National banks, State banks, and trust companies doing a banking business should be taxed to the same extent.

Yours truly,

STATE TAX COMMISSION,
By J. T. WADDILL, Chairman.

From the State of Washington comes this letter from S. H. Chase, State tax commissioner of the State of Washington:

OCTOBER 19, 1932.

We are in receipt of your letter of the 12th instant in re bank taxation, with enclosure as stated, for which we thank you.

This commission is in full accord with the provisions of the resolution adopted at the Columbus meeting and with those of the proposed bill drafted thereunder. We shall be glad to forward copies of the same to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to urge upon them the desirability of the enactment of this bill into law.

For your information we are enclosing copy of our letter of September 30, 1932, to Mr. John Miller, tax editor of the United States Daily, Washington, D. C.

If we can be of other service, please advise.

Yours truly,

TAX COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF WASHINGTON,
By S. H. CHASE, Chairman.

Then there is a resolution which I should like to have printed in the RECORD. It was adopted in 1932 in a convention at Columbus by the representatives of States constituting the Association of States on Bank Taxation. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the representatives of States constituting the Association of States on Bank Taxation, being in attendance upon the twenty-fifth annual conference on taxation under the auspices of the National Tax Association, held at Columbus, Ohio, September 12 to 16, 1932, having given consideration to the problems confronting the States respecting the taxation of national banking associations, take the position that the existing Federal statutes limiting, restricting, and, we believe, in effect, prohibiting States from lawfully imposing reasonable taxes in any form upon such associations and upon their shares in the hands of holders, should be amended, and that in lieu thereof Congress should enact a statute extending to States the power to tax such association by the employment of such methods under their own systems of taxation as they may consider desirable, limited only by the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, provided that such taxation does not impose a greater burden than is assessed or imposed by the taxing State upon the property, income, and/or shares of banks organized and existing by authority of the taxing State: Be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby approve and reaffirm the resolution adopted at the 1921 session of the National Tax Association, reading as follows: "Be it

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this conference, section 5219 of the United States Revised Statutes should be so amended as to permit the States to tax national banks or the shares thereof or the income therefrom, according to such systems as they may consider desirable, provided that such taxation shall not be at a greater rate nor impose a heavier burden than is assessed or imposed upon capital invested in general banking business and the income derived therefrom."

From the State of New Mexico comes a letter from Mr. Byron O. Beall, State tax commissioner, as follows:

NEW MEXICO,
STATE TAX COMMISSION,
Santa Fe, January 29, 1934.

MR. GEORGE H. SULLIVAN,
President, Association of States on Bank Taxation,
State Capitol, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR SIR: In connection with your recent letter relative to the proposed amendment to section 5219, United States Revised Statutes, please be advised that our commission will prepare and forward to our Representative in Congress a resolution urging the support of this amendment.

Assuring you that we are glad to assist, we are,

Respectfully yours,

STATE TAX COMMISSION,
By BYRON O. BEALL,
Chief Tax Commissioner.

Mr. President, these are a few communications in regard to this subject. I have already called attention to the fact that since this situation arose while capital and surplus of the national banks in the United States have increased 11 percent, and their taxes have decreased 39½ percent, showing that they are not carrying their just share of the burdens in the various local communities to pay for relief and to pay for local government, a situation which has existed entirely too long.

Because of the lateness of the hour, I do not care to impose upon the Senate by making a long, technical, and detailed discussion. I have stated the facts as to the situation which exists. I have brought here the testimony of tax commissioners from the various States who have probed and explored this subject for years. We have not been able to get relief from the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate.

I am sure that they have acted, in denying the relief, to their best judgment, and according to their consciences, but I cannot agree with them, and because of the emergency which exists in the taxing policies of the local governments supporting relief and local government, I have at this hour and on the pending bill offered the amendment which I have suggested in order that relief shall be granted by the only authority that has the power to grant relief. Failure to act will mean a discrimination against the States which works a hardship on every local community, and it is a situation which the Federal Government should not tolerate and should not be guilty of continuing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, this is by no means a new proposal. It has been brought before the Congress and before the Committee on Banking and Currency from time to time for 14 years. Every Secretary of the Treasury since 1920 and every Comptroller of the Currency up to the present time has been opposed to the suggestion.

The Senator from Minnesota has not fully stated the question. It is not merely a question of States taxing national banks at the same rate at which they tax State banks. The proposal of the Senator from Minnesota is to segregate all banks, national as well as State banks, and to let the States tax them as they please.

I have here the last letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, a communication to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and referring to the bill to which the Senator from Minnesota has addressed himself, the Secretary stated:

This bill would place both State and National banks in a segregated class for taxation purposes. National banks are still instrumentalities of the Government. While they are no longer the chief source of paper money, they are the compulsory and most numerous members of the Federal Reserve System, and as such are essential not only to the currency function, but to an adequate supply of credit in other forms. The bill would in effect place power in individual States to wreck these Federal instrumentalities by unsound taxation if the States should so desire, and it is therefore dangerous.

It must be remembered that it is often difficult to reach the property of individuals for taxation purposes and that where the burden of taxation on moneyed capital employed upon individuals becomes too great, it can and usually does leave the State which imposes the heavy burden. On the other hand the bank's property may be easily ascertained and reached. It cannot leave the State and must either pay the tax or cease to do business. Moreover, the individual would look with favor upon the burden of heavy taxation on banks when the result would be to lighten his taxes, thus giving to the legislature which enacts the tax law a strong temptation to impose the heavy burden on the banks. The safety of the Federal banking structure should not be left to the powers of the legislature to resist such temptation. Therefore the Treasury is opposed to the enactment of S. 3009 into law but does favor the enactment of S. 2788, which has already been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate.

That is with reference to the bill that was passed by the Senate at the last session but failed of enactment in the House.

In the same connection T. J. Coolidge, one of the clearest-headed men who has ever been connected with the Treasury Department, vigorously opposes the segregation of banks for taxation purposes.

The Senator has quoted some banking commissioner from Utah. I have a letter here from Marriner S. Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, whose home is in Utah, agreeing entirely with Under Secretary Coolidge in opposition to this bill.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BENSON. The Senator has just quoted from Marriner S. Eccles, the present Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BENSON. Would it surprise the Senator to know that probably Governor Eccles from Utah has a personal interest in this matter?

Mr. GLASS. No; that would not surprise me the least bit in the world.

Mr. BENSON. Would it surprise the Senator to know that Mr. Eccles himself had stated that he does not pay his taxes in Utah? Naturally he would be in favor of maintaining the law as it now is. Governor Eccles has stated publicly that he does not pay his taxes in Utah.

Mr. GLASS. That is a matter with which I cannot deal. I know nothing in the world about Governor Eccles' taxes—whether he pays them or does not pay them. I do know that he is the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and this bill was referred to him for his consideration, and that he is utterly opposed to it.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the State banks are utterly opposed to the bill. They have opposed it for 14 years successively by resolution and by the appearance before the Banking and Currency Committee of their representatives. The American Bankers' Association has uniformly and persistently opposed this proposition.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BENSON. When the Senator says the State banks of this country are opposed to the bill, is the Senator referring to the American Bankers' Association or is he referring to the State banks?

Mr. GLASS. I am referring to the American Bankers' Association, in which the State banks are very largely represented.

Mr. BENSON. Very largely misrepresented, the Senator means.

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not mean that at all. I mean they are largely represented, and I should venture to say that a majority of the State banks belong to the American Bankers' Association.

Mr. BENSON. They may belong to it, but that does not say that they are getting representation by officers of the American Bankers' Association.

Let me ask the Senator another question. He stated that it would be highly improper to agree to the amendment because it would have a tendency to segregate banks for taxation purposes? I call his attention to page 31 of the bill and ask him if the last paragraph in section 14 is not a segregation of banks for exemption purposes.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is talking about the tax bill?

Mr. BENSON. Yes; I am.

Mr. GLASS. I am talking about the amendment presented by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BENSON. Yes; but is it not just as logical to segregate banks for taxation purposes as it is to segregate them in the bill for exemption purposes?

Mr. GLASS. I am stating to the Senate that the American Bankers' Association, to which belong all the national banks, and I think a considerable majority of the State banks, has uniformly objected to a provision similar to the one under discussion; that the Banking and Currency Committee over and over again has had hearings on the subject and has disapproved such a provision; that every Secretary of the Treasury since 1920 has disapproved such a measure, as has every Comptroller of the Currency. I do not think at this late hour of the night as the last proposition in connection with the tax bill we ought to take up a complex subject of this sort and put it onto the tax measure.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak upon this amendment, and I do not want to take up very much time to speak on it, but in view of the letter which the Senator from Virginia has read from an Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Coolidge, I think the Democratic side of the Senate should not permit a statement which is so palpably fallacious to come from a representative of the Democratic administration without some effort upon the part of the Democrats in the Senate to answer it.

In the first place it is assumed in that letter that the result of an amendment of this kind would be to segregate banks for taxation purposes. I wish to say to the Members of the Senate that the banks of this country are today segregated for the basis of taxation. They are segregated out of all taxation, and they certainly would not object to some sort of segregation within the class of those that should be taxed.

I can see no reason for objection upon the part of the banks to join with the rest of the businesses of the country and the people of the country and pay some tax upon their assets and upon their businesses.

The second argument used by the Under Secretary is that it is dangerous to tax banks—that it may affect the business of the country adversely if we tax banks. I have no quarrel with banks. I at one time was the president of a bank, and I know something about the banking business, and I do not think that bankers are all crooks, because I do not agree that I was a crook.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator thinks that banks do not pay taxes at all he knows very little about banks.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I know what taxes are paid upon the assets of the banks in 16 States in the country, and I know that the national banks are not paying any taxes, and I know that as the result of that situation in many of the States the State banks are not paying any taxes. They pay a tax upon the real estate and upon nothing else. They do not pay a tax upon their assets. They do not pay a tax upon the amount of money that they used in their business for the purpose of owning property.

Mr. President, I am sorry to disagree with the Senator from Virginia, but I have been engaged in multitudinous litigation about this subject. I have carefully studied and presented to the court all of the decisions of the Supreme Court on the subject, and I do know something about it. I am sorry to disagree with him when the Senator from Virginia says that I do not know anything about it; but I do know something about it as the result of a very careful study of the subject.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator made the bald statement that the banks do not pay any taxes. The banks do pay taxes.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I say that in 16 States of this country the national banks do not pay taxes, and that in many of those States the State banks do not pay taxes. I do not agree with the Under Secretary of the Treasury when he said that we have a banking institution in this country that is so close to the danger line that we do not dare entrust them to the State legislatures for the purpose of taxing. I have more confidence in the banking structure of the country than that. The Under Secretary of the Treasury completely overlooks one of the fundamental principles of taxation, and that is that taxation should be fair, and that in securing fair taxes we should levy taxes that are possible of accurate ascertainment. When he says that one danger about taxing banks is that their property can be easily taxed, that it is easily possible to ascertain proper taxes upon them, and that we should tax them because it is difficult in other instances, the Under Secretary simply flies in the face of the fundamental principles of taxation known to anybody who has ever studied the most simple principles of taxation or economics.

Mr. GLASS. In some way the Senator simply emphasizes the Under Secretary when I told him that every Secretary of the Treasury, including the present incumbent of that office, has been opposed to this principle.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I stated in the beginning that my reason for speaking at this time was that I did not feel that there should be left in the RECORD a statement made by a Democratic Under Secretary of the Treasury that is as absolutely fallacious as the one read by the Senator from Virginia without someone on the Democratic side of the Chamber attempting to answer it.

Mr. GLASS. The letter I read was from Secretary Morgenthau.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. If it was, then there is twice the reason. I understood it was written by the Under Secretary.

Mr. GLASS. I said it was concurred in by the Under Secretary.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. There is twice the reason if the Secretary of the Treasury does not know anything more about taxation or about the principles of economics than that. If that be true then somebody ought to rise and answer his argument.

Here is the fundamental controversy: The reason why we do not tax these banks is that they contend that competing capital is not taxed. We have savings-and-loan associations. They contend they are taxed and they come before every committee and draw their comparisons.

We have a bank with a capital of $1,000,000 and deposits of $20,000,000, $21,000,000 altogether. We having a savings-and-loan association with shares sold at $21,000,000.

Every time bankers appear before a legislative committee their contention is that the savings-and-loan associations should have a tax upon their entire $21,000,000, while the banks should not be taxed except upon $1,000,000. That is not fair.

A few years ago I presented to the banks of my State a proposition to enact a law in that State by which savings-and-loan associations and mortgage companies would be taxed on precisely the same basis; that the percentage the capital in the banks of the State bore to the capital, surplus, and deposits should be taxed, and that the same percentage should be taxed with reference to savings-and-loan associations. Does anyone think they were willing to agree to it? Absolutely not. They were not willing to agree upon any fair basis of taxation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The illustration given by the Senator from Washington of the bank with $1,000,000 of stock and $20,000,000 of deposits, and the savings-and-loan association with $21,000,000 worth of stock, seems to me to present a situation which is not analogous. The $20,000,000 of bank stock is not the property of the bank. Of course, it is used by it to do business with; but in many States, if not most of them, that $20,000,000 is assessable against the depositor who has the money in the bank at a given date during the year which is the assessable date. Some States provide the bank shall pay the tax upon the deposit, but it is a tax chargeable against the depositor and not against the bank.

In the case of the savings-and-loan association the shares of stock are not the property of the association, but of the shareholders, so the provision of the law dealing with the subject provides the method by which the shares of the banks may be taxed, not the money which is on deposit in any of them. It seems to me that is really not a fair illustration of the situation.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I may say to the Senator from Kentucky that the savings-and-loan association shareholders are in no different position than the depositors of the banks. It is true they own shares. If they could be taxed upon the same basis that the capital and surplus of the bank, which is the property of the shareholders in the bank, bear to the total amount of capital, surplus, and deposit liability, and if that same tax should be levied against savings-and-loan associations, then we would have a fair tax upon every one of them; but the bankers continually have refused to permit proposals of that kind to be carried out and have always said, "It would be unfair to tax us because you do not tax competing capital."

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress never made any effort to dictate to the States how they should tax deposits in national banks. They may be taxed by States as real estate may be taxed, as a bank building itself may be taxed. They are taxed in my State and in most States against the depositor of the bank who owns the deposit which is there, according to the amount at a certain time.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. That does not tax the $1,000,000 of capital on which the money is earned.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; that does not tax the $1,000,000 of capital. The present law provides that the $1,000,000 of capital represented in shares may be taxed by the State at the same rate and in the same manner that the State taxes are levied against competing financial institutions.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Then they insist on taxing the entire $21,000,000 of the shares of the savings-and-loan association.

Mr. BARKLEY. That situation grows out of a decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota case, which holds that inasmuch as the State of Minnesota does not tax the other competing financial institutions in the same way it proposes to tax the shares of national banks, therefore the tax is not lawful; in other words, if they do not tax the shares of the competing companies under the national law, then they cannot tax the shares of national banks.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Certainly.

Mr. BENSON. I want to make one slight correction. The decision of the Supreme Court does not state in so many words what the Senator from Kentucky attempted to say it does. The decision does say they cannot tax national banks on any different basis than that on which they tax any other moneyed capital coming in competition with national banks. Suppose the Jones Grocery Co. loans money to someone who may not, perchance, have an opportunity to borrow money from a national bank. Are we going to say that we cannot tax the national bank on any different basis than that on which we tax the Jones Grocery Co.?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether the Jones Grocery Co. would come under the definition of "moneyed institution" in the sense in which section 5219 contemplates.

Mr. BENSON. It does not have any bearing in this case because the Supreme Court has legislated on the matter and has said "other moneyed capital."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It depends on what we call competing capital. The national bank does a commercial banking business. I do not know of any other institution that does that kind of business unless it is the State bank doing a commercial banking business. I cannot understand how mutual loan associations, if conducted for mutual benefit, or building-and-loan associations can be said to compete with a national bank or even a savings bank.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, it does not lie with us here to discuss the question. That was discussed by the Supreme Court.

I want to apologize for having taken the time of the Senate at this hour in the evening. I have no quarrel with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. It was really the letter from Secretary Morgenthau which I thought should be answered, and I am sorry so much time has been taken.

Mr. GLASS. Just let me correct one impression that is sought to be made, perhaps inadvertently, and that is that the States are not authorized to tax national banks as they tax State banks.

The existing law says:

> The legislature of each State may determine and direct, subject to the provisions of this section, the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within its limits. The several States may (1) tax said shares, or (2) include dividends derived therefrom in the taxable income of an owner or holder thereof—

That is what they do in Virginia—

> or (3) tax such associations on their net income, or (4) according to or measured by their net income, provided the following conditions are complied with:

And therein comes the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which this amendment seeks to evade. The Supreme Court decided that under the law, moneyed capital that comes in competition with banks could be taxed at the same rate at which the banks are taxed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Of course everybody recognizes the right of a Senator to put anything on a tax bill; but is there any possible reason why we should be considering here, on a tax bill, what power the State ought to have to tax the capital invested in a national bank?

Mr. GLASS. The Supreme Court has already decided that question, and this amendment is simply designed to evade the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. GEORGE. What possible jurisdiction of that subject ought we to have here when we are considering a tax measure? It is peculiarly a matter for the Banking and Currency Committee and for other committees of the Senate; and manifestly, while we have the sheer power, if we are to consider these matters which have no possible connection with a revenue act, we shall probably be here for an indefinite period of time yet.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I have concluded. I recognize the right of the Senator from Minnesota to urge the amendment, but I cannot see the purpose of urging it on a tax measure.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I tried to explain the purpose when I offered the amendment. I stated to the Senate that I did not like to bring in this matter on the tax bill; I did not like to bring it in here at this late hour; but because of the outrageous situation that exists, due to Federal law, I am here asking for relief on behalf of 16 States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the bill is pending before the proper committee of the Senate, the Banking and Currency Committee, the membership of which is composed of outstanding men. They understand the banking business. They are competent to deal with this important question. Why should we siphon out of that committee this important measure—I assume the Senator believes it to be important—and take it over into the Finance Committee, which has no jurisdiction at all over the subject?

While, as the Senator from Georgia stated, the Senator from Minnesota has the power to offer the amendment to this bill, I do not think he ought to exercise it. I think he ought to pretermit any discusison of the matter on this bill, if the Senator will pardon the suggestion.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the Banking and Currency Committee has power to prevent action by the Senate on this subject, and it has exercised that power. While I disagree with the committee, I find no fault with it for exercising the power according to its judgment; and I assume the same right and take this opportunity to get relief.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not only has the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency declined to act favorably on this measure, but the Senate itself declined to do so when the proposal was offered as an amendment to the last banking bill which was passed in the last session of Congress. If the Senate declined to put the proposal on a banking bill, why should the Senate be asked to put it on a tax bill?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I have presented the matter to the Senate. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, before we go on to other business I wish to make a brief statement.

It has been said here that the Congress is not attempting to legislate on how the States should tax banks; and yet just a moment ago the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] read from the banking law, in which he contends the Congress has given the States the right to tax national banks. It seems to me there is some inconsistency between what was said just a few minutes ago and the law which the Senator has read. I should like to have that matter explained.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; that is not important. Let us vote.

Mr. BENSON. Just a minute.

It has been represented to the Senate time and time again, several times in the short time I have been here, that Congress is in no position to pass laws giving the States the right to tax national banks; and yet the Senator from Virginia just a moment ago read a portion of the Banking Act which he said gives the various States a perfect right to tax national banks in any manner they see fit.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; not in any manner they see fit. That is just what we wish to avoid.

Mr. BENSON. Just so long as they do not tax national banks in a different manner from that in which they tax State banks.

I contend that is not the case. It is true if the law should be interpreted as the Senator from Virginia has just interpreted it, and probably as Congress intended when it passed the law. The Supreme Court of the United States has interpreted it otherwise, however; and there are today 16 States in the United States which cannot tax their national banks on the same basis on which they tax their State banks.

It has also been said, both by the Senator from Virginia and in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, that it would be dangerous to permit the various States to tax national banks on any basis on which the legislatures of the various States should decide. It is also stated there that it would be segregating banks and putting them into a special class. I desire to call the attention of the Senate again to page 31 of the bill we are now considering, in which the Senate today is placing banks in a separate class and segregating them; but we are not segregating them for purposes of taxation. We are segregating them so that they may be exempt from taxation. If we have a right to segregate banks for the purpose of exempting them from taxation, we ought to be willing to give the various States the right to tax them in the manner they deem best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, how many hands have to be held up—what percentage of the Senators present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators were present on the last quorum call. It is necessary to have one-fifth of that number. Seven hands only were raised.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 76, line 19, after the word "organizations", it is proposed to insert a comma and the words, "or water-users' associations operating Federal reclamation projects".

Mr. KING. I accept the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the purpose of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. To place water-users' associations in the same status as municipal water districts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement regarding the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

Water users' associations operating Federal reclamation projects should not be subject to corporate income tax.

Federal reclamation projects are operated in three ways: (1) By the United States directly; (2) by irrigation districts which are municipal corporations; and (3) by incorporated water users' associations. The United States has contracts with water users' associations, as distinguished from irrigation districts, on 12 projects out of a total number of 37.

All of the revenues of a Federal reclamation project, whether operated by the Government, by a district, or by an association, are derived from Government properties; that is, operation of Government-owned power plants and Government-owned water canals. There are power plants on six water users' association projects, on four of which the association has assumed operation.

There should be no discrimination in the tax laws between the various types of projects. Power revenues on all of them are pledged by statute to the United States to repay the Government the cost of constructing the project and, if power revenues are taxable, the deficit paid by the farmers in the form of assessment is increased.

A water users' association is not a municipal corporation but, as the Supreme Court of Arizona has said:

"It can probably be best described as a private corporation with a public purpose, and having quasi-governmental powers" (Citrus, etc., Assn. v. Salt River, etc., Assn., 34 Ariz. 105).

Federal statutes recognize water-users' associations and irrigation districts indiscriminately as instrumentalities for operating Federal reclamation projects. Thus the reclamation law authorizes Federal projects to be operated under contract with the Secretary either by irrigation districts or water users' associations. Title 43, United States Code, section 500 provides:

"Subsection G. (Transfer of project to water users—receipts credited as part of construction repayments.) That whenever two-thirds of the irrigable area of any project, or division of a project, shall be covered by water-right contracts between the water users and the United States, said project shall be required, as a condition precedent to receiving the benefits of this section to take over, through a legally organized water-users' association or irrigation district, the care, operation, and maintenance of all or any part of the project works, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, and thereafter the United States, in its relation to said project, shall deal with a water-users' association or irrigation district, and when the water users assume control of a project the operation and maintenance charges for the year then current shall be covered into the construction account to be repaid as part of the construction repayments (43 Stat. 702)."

Section 36 of the Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended by the joint resolution of June 27, 1934, makes the following authorization:

"SEC. 36. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $125,000,000 to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts, mutual nonprofit companies, and incorporated water users' associations duly organized under the laws of any State, and to or for the benefit of political subdivisions of States, which prior to the date of enactment of this act have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands for agricultural purposes."

Under that section the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made loans to irrigation districts and water users' associations, including the Salt River Valley. All of the other organizations named in that section are nontaxable and the statute apparently grouped them all as one class.

The counsel for the Securities and Exchange Commission, in exempting from registration securities proposed to be issued by the Salt River Valley Water Users' Association under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation refunding loan, just referred to, ruled, on November 16, 1935:

"In the light of the history of your association, and in view of the provisions of the Reclamation Act and the provisions of its several contracts with the United States by which it operates the Salt River project, it is my opinion that your association is a 'person controlled or supervised by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States.' I therefore feel that securities (including guaranties) issued by your association are exempted from the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the bill, the following:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to collect an excise tax on the entry into the United States of all goods, articles, or commodities, which goods, articles, or commodities were made dutiable under the Tariff Act of 1930, or carry an excise tax by action of the excise taxes of 1932. The tax herein assessed and levied shall represent the difference, less 8 percent allowed for profits and handling charges, between foreign costs and the American wholesale selling prices, or cost of production, whichever is higher, of a similar or comparable goods, articles, or commodities, the products of American workers or farmers. Such tax shall be assessed and collected notwithstanding any other provision of law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is not a tariff bill under consideration, and speaking for the committee, I may say the amendment cannot be accepted. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I should like to have it go to conference.

Mr. KING. I could not agree to that, in view of the position of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask whether there are any other amendments to be offered by Senators?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have two or three more to offer.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can see no reason why I should not go forward with my amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not desire to take the Senator off the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. In the absence of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I call attention to a conference which we had last August relative to an amendment which I proposed to a bill then pending providing a different system of liquor taxation.

The bill before us is one to provide revenue. I have a proposal here which will raise $250,000,000 of revenue and it is well worth considering.

I call attention to the RECORD of August 24, 1935, and to the inclusion in the RECORD of an agreement entered into at that time. I quote this what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] stated:

This matter was brought to the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee and the members of the committee, and I wish to congratulate the Senator from New York for having brought it to our attention. I will say that the Senator performed a great public function in bringing it to our attention. I can assure him, in view of a conference with the Ways and Means Committee which we had this afternoon, that this matter will receive all due consideration.

I place in the RECORD, as it appears on page 14951, a statement I made at that time. I quote my own language:

I had a talk with the chairman of the House committee [Mr. DOUGHTON], and the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. HARRISON], and with our leader [Mr. ROBINSON], and with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I want this to appear in the RECORD, and I want Senators to remember it. I had been solemnly promised that a joint subcommittee of the two committees should be appointed to study the plan.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate further. I have this amendment, which I should like to have taken to conference, and I ask the Senators whether they will accept it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I just heard the Senator express a hope that they would take the amendment to conference. The way to have that done is to have it defeated. That is the rule we have established.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this matter was presented to the Committee on Finance, and given very careful consideration in connection with the alcohol-control bill, which has passed both Houses, and upon which a conference report has been agreed to. It has no real business in a tax bill of this sort and, so far as I am personally concerned, I will say frankly that I was unable to support the proposal when it was offered as an amendment to the alcohol tax bill, and I have not changed my attitude toward it. But if it is agreeable to the Senator from Utah and other Senators on the committee who are in charge of the bill, I see no objection to letting it go to conference, and having it dealt with there.

Mr. COPELAND. I appreciate that, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. May I say that I gave consideration to this proposal at the time indicated by the Senator from Kentucky, and I was opposed to it and am still opposed to it. However, if the members of the committee are willing that it go to conference, I shall not attempt to prevent such action, but I wish to have it understood that I do not favor the amendment or the plan which it involves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the bill title II of the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934, as follows:

(c) Title II of the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 201. (a) There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all distilled spirits sold at retail a tax of $2 on each proof gallon or wine gallon when below proof and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon.

"(b) No tax shall be imposed upon any distiller or importer under paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of section 600, as amended, of the Revenue Act of 1918, in respect to any distilled spirits taxable under this section.

"SEC. 202. The internal-revenue tax imposed by the preceding section upon distilled spirits shall be collected from retailers, who shall affix to every bottle or other container of distilled spirits at the time of its first retail sale or retail transfer unopened in a container for on- or off-premise consumption, and to every bottle or other container of distilled spirits out of which any part of the contents is removed for the purpose of retail sale, transfer, or use on or off the premises, before such container is opened, a stamp or stamps indelibly canceled, denoting the quantity of distilled spirits contained therein and evidencing payment of all internal-revenue taxes imposed on such spirits, and in the case of imported spirits, of all customs duties imposed thereon.

"SEC. 203. Any licensed retailer possessing or coming into possession of distilled spirits upon which all internal-revenue taxes and customs duties imposed by law shall have been paid, shall be entitled to purchase such stamps as are necessary for stamping the containers of distilled spirits in the manner required by the preceding section. Stamps for this purpose may be purchased by such retailer only from the collector of internal revenue for the revenue district in which such retailer's place or places of business for retail sales shall be located. Such retailer shall present satisfactory proof to such collector of internal revenue that such tax and customs duties on such distilled spirits have been paid. Such stamps shall be sold by the collector to such retailer at a price of 1 cent for each stamp, except that in case of stamps for containers of less than one-half pint, the price shall be one-fourth of 1 cent for each stamp.

"SEC. 204. No person shall manufacture, distill, rectify, import, transfer, or sell at wholesale or at retail any distilled spirits unless such person shall have furnished a surety-company bond given by a company, companies, or syndicate of companies approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and guaranteeing the payment of all taxes and customs duties imposed by law on such distilled spirits, with such terms and conditions and in such penal sum as may be approved by said Commissioner. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any regularly established common carrier receiving, transporting, delivering, or holding for transportation or delivery distilled spirits in the ordinary course of its business as a common carrier.

"SEC. 205. The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe (a) regulations with respect to the time and manner of applying for, issuing, affixing, and canceling stamps required by this title, the form and denominations of such stamps, proof that applicants are entitled to such stamps, and the method of accounting for receipts from the sale of such stamps; and (b) such other regulations as he shall deem necessary for the enforcement of this title.

"SEC. 206. All distilled spirits found in any container required to bear a stamp by this title, which container is not stamped in compliance with this title and regulations issued thereunder, shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 207. Any person who violates any provision of this title, or who, with intent to defraud, falsely makes, forges, alters, or counterfeits any stamp made or used under this title, or who uses, sells, or has in his possession any such forged, altered, or counterfeited stamp, or any plate or die used or which may be used in the manufacture thereof, or any stamp required to be canceled by this title, or who makes, uses, sells, or has in his possession any paper in imitation of the paper used in the manufacture of any such stamp, or who reuses any stamp required by this title to be canceled, or who affixes any stamp issued under this title to any container of distilled spirits on which any tax is unpaid, or who makes any false statement in any application for stamps under this title, or who has in his possession any such stamps obtained by him otherwise than as provided in this title, or who sells or transfers any such stamp otherwise than as provided in this title, shall on conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding 5 years, or by both. Any officer authorized to enforce any provisions of law relating to internal-revenue stamps is authorized to enforce the provisions of this section and the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 3, 1897, relating to the bottling of distilled spirits in bond."

(d) This section shall take effect 60 days after the date of enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement regarding the amendment just voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The amendment which is offered is designed to accomplish four specific objectives:

First, as I view it, there will be an increase in Federal and State revenues from distilled spirits by more than $300,000,000 annually.

Second, it will eliminate bootlegging, rum-running, and other illicit selling, as far as it is possible to do that, because all liquor sold at retail will be tax paid.

Third, it will reduce liquor prices to consumers by from 25 to 50 percent, which in itself will interfere seriously with bootlegging operations.

Fourth, it makes the buyers, as well as the sellers, of non-tax-paid spirits liable to conviction as conspirators defrauding the Government of lawful taxes.

The tax now being paid at the bonded warehouse is pyramided. The tax is $2 a gallon. On a case of liquor, assuming that they are quart bottles, that is $6 a case at the bonded warehouse. Now, when that liquor goes to the wholesaler he adds 16⅔ percent, so that the case of liquor, when it leaves the wholesaler for the retailer, has its tax increased to $7. The retailer gets his 40 percent, and so that adds about $2. By this pyramiding process, as I view it, the liquor is materially increased in price at the retail store because of the pyramiding of the tax. If that could be prevented in some manner it would mean that the liquor sold to the consumer would be at least 25 percent cheaper than it is today, and also would be discouraging to the bootlegger, because, improved as his methods are, he cannot make liquor as cheaply as the large commercial concerns.

Mr. President, last year this amendment was passed by the Senate. Then, in conference with the House, the amendment was eliminated because the House Members took the position they had not had an opportunity to study the proposal. Of course, I was disappointed and when the conference report came in, expressed my disappointment.

I had a conference, which I mentioned on the floor of the Senate on the 24th of August, with Mr. DOUGHTON of the House, Mr. HARRISON of the Senate, Mr. ROBINSON, our leader, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and I think one or two others, and it was agreed then that both committees would this year give serious consideration to my proposal.

There was a hearing held last year by a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance, presided over by Mr. WALSH, and, as I understand the matter, he made a favorable report of the amendment and it was adopted by his committee and included in the bill.

I was convinced last year, and I am now, that this amendment will accomplish all of these four objectives, and whoever has taken the time to study the detailed workings of this proposed system of tax collection agrees with this position. This has been submitted to a great many persons who have, after studying it, taken the same view of the matter as I have.

It will put the responsibility of the tax payment where it belongs—on the man who passes the distilled spirits to the ultimate consumer who pays the taxes. Then, and only then, can bootlegging be eliminated and all tax evasion overcome.

And I claim that at least 200 million dollars annually is being lost to the Treasury through such tax evasion.

Under the present system we are inviting any or all of three individuals who are between the consumer and producer to evade taxes, namely, the distiller or rectifier or importer; second, the wholesaler; and third, the retailer, who either sells by bottle for off-premises consumption or sells liquor by the glass for consumption on the premises.

The present system, as I view it, has two outstanding disadvantages which operate to defeat tax-collecting machinery. First, because taxes and import duties are now collected at the source the result is what I have already mentioned. The pyramiding of overhead and profit create not only a profit on the manufacturer's cost but on each successive distributing turn-over because each successive handler adds his operating profit, not only on the manufactured value of the goods, but on the additional taxes and duties as well. On each dollar of tax and duty collected by the Federal Government the consumer pays approximately $2. Every dollar that the Government collects by the pyramiding process is doubled; it becomes $2.

I have mentioned one disadvantage of the present system, that of defeating tax collection. The second one is this: a strip stamp attached to the neck of a bottle acts as the sole evidence that all tax and import duties have been paid. Huge tax evasions are possible, because the strip stamp costs only 1 penny while that stamp might authenticate tax payment of from 50 to 200 times the cost of the strip stamp.

Now I will show you a little later that it is possible to obtain these strip stamps, which cost only a penny, and put them on liquor which has been made by a bootlegger. And yet, so far as the honest retail man is concerned, and the consumer who desires to be square with the Government, he has no evidence of the fact that this tax or that this liquor is actually liquor which has passed through a bonded warehouse and paid the Government the tax.

We are talking now about increased taxes and the necessity for having more money from the taxpayer.

If I am right about this, there are here two or three hundred million dollars' revenue for the Government which will not come out of the taxpayer but will come out of the profits of a group of bootleggers who are certainly not entitled to the money.

This amendment is based upon the tax plan of the District of Columbia, slightly modified. Here in the District taxes are collected by affixing tax stamps to bottles which cost the amount of the 50 cents per gallon tax. In other words, instead of allowing the tax to be evidenced by the issuance of stamps costing 1 cent, which might represent a tax payment of $1, the District sells stamps which cost the amount of the actual tax due. And then the retailer, or the wholesaler who sells the retailer, affixes these stamps to the bottles. The retailer cancels them with an imprint bearing his license number.

And what are the results?

Figures were submitted at the hearings proving that the District of Columbia is collecting taxes on approximately six times the gallonage on either an outlet or per-capita basis that the Federal Government is collecting. I am going to enlarge upon this. In other words, the District tax-collecting method is six times as effective as is the method now used by the Federal Government.

Of course such a result prompts the suggestion that the District system must cost more money to administer. It just so happens, however, that it costs the District of Columbia only about 25 percent of the cost per gallon that it costs the Federal Government. Therefore, it may be said the District is collecting six times the tax at one-fourth of the cost. Surely such a demonstration should remove any question as to the desirability of adopting this proposal.

I have already told you what the action was last year. I am more than ever impressed that this amendment should be enacted into law. I am convinced that it will result in hundreds of millions of dollars in Federal revenue at a time when we are compelled to find new methods of taxation to raise additional revenue to balance our Budget.

My proposal does not contemplate new taxes on liquor. It imposes a hardship on no legitimate-business man or industry. It merely proposes to get for the Government money and profits which are now going into the pockets of bootleggers or racketeers. It will reduce liquor prices to the consumer by from 25 to 50 percent, which is another reason why it would discourage the bootlegger. I am sure it will work, because a similar plan is working here in the District getting four times better tax-collecting results than is the Treasury.

Now you may properly ask, If this method is so good, why has it not been adopted before? Frankly, I don't know. You would imagine that any plan which held out the hope of collecting from two hundred to three hundred million dollars more than is now being collected annually and of also reducing liquor prices and stamping out bootleggers would be pounced on eagerly by Treasury officials.

There are some persons who believe that the Treasury Department is gifted with infallibility. Most of these persons are in the Treasury Department. I am convinced very few of the gentlemen on this floor share that belief. Their experiences with the Treasury Department have tended to set up a contrary feeling. At least that is the case with me.

A considerable number of the Treasury Department personnel seem supersenitive to intrusion. They resent outsiders and any ideas begotten by outsiders with reference to their duties. So they find it difficult to discover merit in conceptions or calculations that do not originate among themselves. That is a sad state of affairs, because it excludes a great many valuable ideas from which constructive tax legislation might be evolved.

Are these Treasury officials so infallible in their judgment, so sure of their facts that if they disapprove of some plan or program we must accept their views without question?

By no means, as I shall soon show you. Not only are they not infallible, not only are their representations of facts often incorrect (as the Finance Committee found out when Mr. May testified before it on this very bill), but if they decide for some reason best known to themselves that they are against something they will fight with every resource at their command.

However, this is one time that a Member of this body also has some resources to marshal. There was offered before the Finance Committee incontrovertible evidence of gross inefficiency and incompetence in the collection of liquor taxes due the Government which today result in a tax loss of at least $200,000,000. If you will bear with me, I will prove it. And I want you to follow me closely, because if I am right, and I am sure I am, then the requirements of the tax bill we have under consideration now can be reduced by at least $200,000,000.

The time has come for us to stop extravagance, waste, and inefficiency in administration. If I can show you a loss annually of $200,000,000 on one item alone—liquor—would it not cause you to ask, how much more might there now be collectible were our tax-collecting machinery more efficient? No department that allows that much to slip through each year can be wholly competent in all other tax-collecting procedure.

As I told you, this amendment was introduced by me last year. It was accepted by the Finance Committee as an amendment to the F. A. A. bill, passed by the Senate and then went to conference with other Senate amendments. When the bill came back from conference this amendment had been deleted.

When the conference report was offered to the Senate for passage, I reintroduced the amendment, knowing that such action on my part might delay the program before us.

But I insisted then, as I do now, that too much money is not being collected from liquor taxes which are due. In the discussions which followed assurance was given me that the matter would be carefully studied. So I withdrew my objections to the conference report.

Two months ago a subcommittee sat with my good friend from Utah as chairman and took testimony for and against my amendment. I spent the whole day in the committee room. I testified myself and heard expert testimony for the amendment. I heard the testimony of Mr. Berkshire representing the Treasury. I am going to tell you about the Treasury testimony first.

The Treasury set forth seven main arguments, namely:

1. That bootlegging has steadily diminished since last year, due to more vigorous enforcement methods and to the steadily improving quality and diminishing price of legitimate spirits.

In the testimony before the subcommittee on my amendments Treasury records were introduced that conclusively proved that illicit liquor still seizures in 1935 exceeded those of 1934 by more than 50 percent. This shows that illicit distilling was sufficiently profitable in 1935 to encourage more bootleggers to operate illicit stills in that year than in the previous year. Obviously, bootleggers do not build stills with a capacity, computed on Mr. Choate's basis, exceeding 600,000,000 gallons annually, unless an established market exists for this illicit product.

Furthermore, evidence was introduced showing that there were twice as many liquor-law commitments to Federal prisons in 1935 as in 1934, which would indicate that there had been 69,000 prosecutions for liquor-law violations in 1935, a greater amount than in any prohibition year.

Now, you know as well as I do that this great army of bootleggers and rum runners would not remain in business, subjecting themselves to prison penalties and heavy fines, unless enormous profits continue to exist in illicit distillation and in illicit distribution.

The Treasury contends further:

"2. That the present-day consumption, if it reaches 110,000,000 gallons annually, would reflect true demand."

Mr. Berkshire testified before the committee that for the 5-year period from 1910 to 1914 average consumption was 127,000,000 gallons; that for the 5 years immediately preceding repeal consumption averaged 110,000,000 gallons annually. Hence, he argued, if present-day consumption would amount this year to 110,000,000 gallons from last year's 90,000,000 gallons, that in itself would prove that all is well, that we are collecting all the taxes due us, that there is no bootlegging.

Furthermore, Mr. Berkshire argued that "if it is a fact that the Government is today losing from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 in taxes by reason of illicit sales, this means that the consumption of bootleg spirits amounts to from 100,000,000 to 150,000,000 gallons a year or in the neighborhood of from 200,000,000 to 260,000,000 gallons a year by comparison with the maximum preprohibition figure of approximately 127,000,000 gallons."

That is correct. That is my contention. Consumption is nearer the 200,000,000-gallon mark than the 110,000,000 mark. This I shall prove to you beyond reasonable doubt. But first let me call your attention to how the figures submitted by the Treasury to the committee were made to prove the one hundred and twenty-seven and the one hundred and ten million gallon maximums. Personally I am sorry that the Treasury estimate of liquor consumption is so far from the mark, and more regrettable is the way they select their figures in attempting to prove their argument.

In 1918, taxes on liquor were revised from $1.10 per gallon to $2.20 per gallon. Taxes were paid on 91,000,000 gallons in 1918, as against 167,000,000 gallons the previous year, when the tax was $1.10 per gallon. The Treasury did not state to the committee that for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917 the tax-paid consumption was one hundred and twenty-seven, one hundred and forty, and one hundred and sixty-seven million gallons, respective, making an average of 145,000,000 gallons annually for the 3 years, a high of 167,000,000 gallons, not 127,000,000 mind you. No. They took those 3 years and added them to the 2 following, when consumption was 91,000,000 and 83,000,000—due to increased taxes and wartime prohibition—added the 5 years together, and said 110,000,000 gallons was the average.

And therefore, they argue, if we ever get back to 110,000,000 gallons everybody should be satisfied and no one should question the Treasury's ability, efficiency, or system of tax collection.

Well, I for one am not satisfied. I question the efficiency of the system, of the efficiency and the ability of any official who submits such proof to substantiate his claim of efficient administration, who proves he knows so little about his subject, or else, what is worse, deliberately submits his figures in such fashion and by such groupings as to misinform us of the true facts. After reading of the Treasury's estimate of revenue offered to the committee on the tax bill we now have before us and looking over their figures on liquor one is prompted to question if any of their figures represent facts.

Now, what are the true facts regarding liquor consumption?

Simply this: In 1916 and 1917 our population was about 98,000,000 people. Of these, some 58,000,000 lived in the 20 States which were wet, 28 States of the Union being dry by statute.

Today we have 127,000,000 people, 115,000,000 of whom live in wet States. If 60,000,000 people living in wet States in 1917 consumed 167,000,000 gallons of liquor, how much liquor would you say was being consumed by 115,000,000 people living in wet States today? Were we to project our figures mathematically we could argue that if 60,000,000 people consumed 167,000,000 gallons in 1917, then 115,000,000 people in 1936 are consuming 320,000,000 gallons annually, which is 230,000,000 gallons above the amount on which the Treasury collected taxes last year.

Here is another reason why consumption surely exceeds 200,000,000 gallons annually.

The Treasury has stated that there are from 225,000 to 250,000 licensed retail outlets. This would mean that each licensee's sales averaged 480 gallons annually, or 40 gallons per month. Furthermore, the Treasury states that more than one-half of the whisky being sold today is priced at $1.50 per quart.

Now, license fees for retailers throughout the country average $500 annually; rent would average perhaps $1,200, without considering clerks, insurance, or the maintenance of the owner and his family, costing at least $350 monthly. How can a man remain in business if his gross sales per month amount to $240 of which (as in the case of a package store) his gross profit could not exceed $80, whereas his expenses amount to at least $500 per month?

I conclude, therefore, that since all these people are remaining in business and more are trying to take out licenses, that licenses are being used as cloaks to sell illicit spirits far in excess of the amount sold which has been tax paid. I contend that the average package store throughout the country must do a gross business exceeding $30,000 annually(this would mean 5,000 gallons, not 480, at $6 per gallon) in order that it might stay in business.

Mathematically speaking, if one-half of the consumption of the country is represented by sales from package stores, then the present consumption would be considerably in excess of 300,000,000 gallons. The best illustration of this is that consumption here, in the District, where a system similar to that proposed in my amendment is in operation, is at the rate of 3,000 gallons annually per outlet, or six times the tax-paid consumption reflected by Federal tax collections.

The Treasury contends:

3. That counterfeit labels, counterfeit strip stamps, and counterfeit bottles are not being used due to improved enforcement methods and to the supervision by the Department over the manufacture and distribution of liquor bottles and strip stamps.

An expert witness testifying before the committee offered to produce counterfeit labels, counterfeit American strip stamps, counterfeit Canadian bottled-in-bond stamps, and counterfeit bottles in any quantity, to prove that they are as readily available today as ever they were in prerepeal days. Furthermore, if the committee guaranteed immunity, he offered to have delivered to it as much as it desired of 100-proof whisky of good quality in quarts or pints bearing legitimate strip stamps and District of Columbia tax stamps, at a cost not exceeding $7.50 per case of 3 full gallons. Obviously this liquor is bootleg, because the $7.50 is only sufficient to cover the cost of the Federal and District tax.

The Treasury contends:

4. That because excise taxes on distilled spirits are now collected from distillers and importers, and because these collections are under the supervision of revenue officers, there can be no evasion: That there is no loophole "save for possible instances of collusion between producer and Government officers."

I have not raised the issue of possible collusion between producer and Government officers. The quotation is Mr. Hester's. It is general knowledge, however, that considerable collusion existed in pre-repeal days. If the same men are in the Department in responsible posts who were there during the prohibition days it might be argued that since collusion existed then it continues to exist now.

However, whatever taxes are being collected from distilleries and importers under revenue officers have no bearing on the taxes which are not collected from those who do not pay taxes.

For instance, Treasury agents in 1935 captured more than 16,500 stills. Additionally, the State enforcement agencies captured about an equal amount. These stills were in operation making illicit liquor. Did not the Treasury Department fail to collect the $2 Federal tax which was due the Government on every gallon of liquor distilled by these stills? If they ran only an average of 2 months, the tax loss to the Government would be far greater than the total amount of tax collected from legitimate distillers, rectifiers, and importers.

Let me read you from the report to the Governor and Legislature of the State of New Jersey, by D. Frederick Burnett, Commissioner, Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control:

"Alcohol costs but 20 cents a gallon to produce. It bears a Federal tax of $2 and a State tax of $1 per gallon, or a tax of 1,500 percent. When to this is added the expense of distribution and the reasonable profits of the distiller, the wholesaler, and the retailer—say, $1.27 altogether—the minimum price at which legitimate alcohol may reach the consumer is $4.47. The bootlegger, however, sells it for $2.50 a gallon. Fair competition is obviously out of question. As long as these high taxes remain, the differential between legitimate and illicit industry is a standing invitation to violate the law. Because the bootlegger pays no tax, he can always undersell the legitimate licensee by a substantial margin. He captures the market of the price-conscious public, who gulp his products while he gobbles the profit.

An illicit still that produces 1,000 gallons per day costs $10,000 to install. The sale of 1,000 gallons brings a gross income of $2,500. If the cost of bootleg production is 40 cents per gallon, or twice that of legitimate mass production, he has left $2,100. Assuming his distribution cost to be extremely high—say, $1,100 to include the "pay-off" to dishonest officials—he still has left $1,000 per day net profit. If he pays less for protection, his net profit is even higher. If he runs 10 days unmolested, his capital cost is repaid. If we are able to detect and seize his still in a month from the time it started, he forfeits his property, to be sure, but he has his original investment in hand and enough profit to start two new stills "on velvet." The result is the same whatever the gallon capacity, since the ratio to cost of installation is roughly 1 to 10. Thus a still of 100-gallon capacity costs $1,000. Hence, with a small capital investment, the bootlegger is on his way to fortune. He himself not only pays no taxes, but every gallon sold slakes a demand which otherwise would be satisfied from the lawful supply and so bear its share of tax. He is not only a tax evader, but he deprives the State of taxes, which, otherwise, would be collected from legitimate sources. So long as enormous profits are to be made, men will take the risk.

The Treasury contends:

5. That the proposed system would very substantially increase the rate of taxes on distilled spirits. This is not so.

The custom of the trade is to add a percentage for operating expense and profit on the cost of the product. It stands to reason that where the cost is reduced initially, by perhaps one-half, because the taxes are not included, the retail price must be substantially less than the price now charged.

The Treasury contends:

6. That the cost of the proposed system would be very great, requiring not fewer than 20,000 additional employees.

Less employees would be needed rather than more. In the statement made before the committee a comparison was made between the Secretary's estimate of the Treasury's cost in collecting revenue and the actual expenses of the District A. B. C. Board's entire operation. This showed that the District is collecting six times as much revenue at one-fourth cost, due to the system it is using in the District, similar to the one I propose should be nationalized. The District has two investigators on its pay roll covering 653 outlets. On the same basis the Federal Government would need some 700, or about one-fourth of the number now in the Treasury doing similar work.

The Treasury contends:

7. That the tax as now imposed is not pyramided by reason of a percentage mark-up; that all handlers of liquor fix arbitrary amounts on each transaction in dollars and not in percentages; that the dollar element would remain constant regardless of the cost of the goods to manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers.

I am prepared to submit printed price lists showing what are the retail mark-ups on practically all distilled spirits now being sold throughout the country. These price lists are compiled by manufacturers and establish the retail selling price. They show that the mark-up is a definite percentage, ranging from 33⅓ percent to 40 percent on the cost of the goods to the retailers, regardless of the price of the goods.

All retailing is done in all lines of business on what is known as a retail mark-up, namely, a specified percentage on the cost to the vendor of the goods. If the goods cost less, the mark-up in dollars is less; if the goods cost more, the mark-up in dollars is more and the percentage remains constant. Hence, if the goods included prepaid taxes, which on all liquors represent from two to five times the actual value of the distilled spirits themselves, the pyramiding of these taxes means that the consumer pays from 30 to 50 percent more for goods which are tax paid than he would under my amendment.

Those are the seven main arguments set forth by the Treasury. They claim that bootlegging has diminished and I have proven to you that it has increased.

They claim that present-day consumption, if it reaches 110,000,000 gallons annually, would reflect the true demand of the country, and I have shown you that the true demand would amount to at least twice this much either on a population basis or if all those now licensed to handle liquor can continue to remain in the business.

They claim that there are no counterfeit labels, counterfeit strip stamps, or counterfeit bottles being used due to the supervision by the Department, and I have proven that counterfeit labels, counterfeit strip stamps, and counterfeit bottles are as readily available today as ever before, and also that 100-proof whisky can be bought bearing both legitimate strip stamps and District stamps at a cost equal to the taxes these stamps represent.

They claim that because excise taxes are now collected from distillers and importers there can be no evasion. I show that hundreds of millions of gallons were illicitly distilled in the 16,000 stills captured by them before the stills were destroyed. What happened to the liquor made in these stills before they were destroyed? Surely it was introduced into channels of distribution.

They claim that the proposed system would require many additional employees. I have shown that if they do as well as the District A. B. C. Board is doing, they can probably cut the cost of supervision and administration by 70 percent.

They claim that adopting my plan would increase the cost of liquor. I have proven to you conclusively that it will reduce liquor prices to the consumer by from 25 to 50 percent.

Here is an additional piece of information:

As I told you before, the Treasury records show that there were captured by Treasury agents last year 16,500 stills, 50 percent more than in 1934. If these stills ran only 2 months their output would have exceeded 100,000,000 gallons of moonshine.

To distribute this liquor through licensed retail channels, strip stamps were needed to give it the appearance of legitimacy and authenticity. Bottles, labels, and caps and corks are easy to get, but strip stamps must be on the bottle when it's sold to the public.

Well, strip stamps come from two sources. Large quantities are being counterfeited and sold to bootleggers. But also large amounts were issued to the collectors of internal revenue which are unaccounted for. A witness testified before the committee that some 400,000,000 of these stamps were unaccounted for.

Here is what is shown in the printed record of the hearings:

Now practically every citizen who sees a strip stamp on a bottle assumes that the stamp itself costs the amount of the tax. This is not so. This stamp costs 1 cent, whereas for domestically made liquor, in the case of a quart, it would represent the evidence of tax payment of 50 cents. In the case of a quart of foreign liquor, such as Canadian bottled in bond whisky, it would represent only the 50-cent full excise tax, but also, up to January 1 of this year, $1.25 of import duty. Furthermore, the tax in most States approximates $1 per gallon and this too is covered by the strip stamp except where local taxes are paid by stamps as they are here in the District.

Hence, if large-scale operators could secure these strip stamps they could, for the small cost of the strip stamp, authenticate liquor which had avoided tax payment of from 50 to 200 times the value of the strip stamp.

Have the stamps been available? The Treasury Department says, "No." We say they are available in enormous quantities, perhaps to the extent of from two hundred to four hundred million, not counting counterfeit stamps which are being counterfeited in large quantities by various groups, who then sell them to the illicit producer, who thereby authenticates his products and gives it the appearance of legitimacy.

Mr. Chairman, I went to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and obtained detailed information on the strip-stamp situation from the date the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934 became effective through December 31, 1935. The figures I am putting into the record now cover three periods, namely—

(1) From February 1934 to June 30, 1934.
(2) From July 1, 1934, to June 30, 1935.
(3) From July 1, 1935, to December 31, 1935.

These figures cover the issuance of strip stamps to collectors of Internal Revenue, of whom there are, I believe, 62. These stamps are sent out from the Bureau direct to collectors on their own order. The Bureau keeps on hand at all times, of different denominations, from 2 to 3 months' supply. The Bureau's inventory on December 31, 1935, was:

Red strip stamps, 263,320,964.
Green bottled-in-bond stamps, 14,970,384.
Blue export stamps, 457,984.

Any stamps which do not reflect actual excise-tax payments in the Treasury Department's Form 7095 (which details monthly collections of internal revenue) should be in the hands of collectors or the trade.

Below, in detail, is the history of the issuance of these stamps to collectors. The column "Gallons authenticated" represents the amount of gallonage-tax payment the issuance of these stamps should cover.

[1] Including January 1936.

This table discloses, perhaps better than anything else which can be submitted, the fallacy of using strip stamps to authenticate tax-paid liquor. During the period from February 1, 1934, to December 31, 1935, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing issued 1,743,050,000 strip stamps, which, when affixed to the neck of a bottle, would certify that all taxes and import duties on that particular bottle had been paid.

This amount of stamps actually would authenticate more than 242,000,000 gallons.

The actual amount of gallonage which was authenticated as a result of taxes received by the Federal Treasury in this period was less than 155,000,000. Hence the amount of strip stamps in the hands of collectors and the trade would be sufficient to authenticate more than 87,000,000 gallons. In terms of stamps, this would mean that at the present time more than 650,000,000 stamps are in the hands of collectors and the trade.

The trade carries for its total requirements a running inventory of between twenty and twenty-five million stamps. Hence the excess in the hands of collectors should be more than 625,000,000.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing has on hand more than 275,000,000 stamps available to all collectors within no more than 2 weeks' time.

These facts show that collectors received in excess of their tax-paid requirements of 215,000,000 stamps in the fiscal year of 1934, 304,000,000 stamps in the fiscal year of 1935, 107,000,000 stamps between July 1 and December 31, 1935, and an estimated 25,000,000 for January 1936, an estimated excess of 625,000,000 since the act went into effect.

We admit that some of the stamps are in the hands of collectors and some are in the hands of the trade. Just how many are in the hands of collectors we have been unable to find out. An inquiry to the Treasury Department from Senator COPELAND'S office brought the following letter from the Honorable Guy T. Helvering, Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

FEBRUARY 1, 1936.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Further reference is made to your letter of January 24, 1936, in the third paragraph of which you request information relative to the number of strip stamps for distilled spirits which were in the possession of various collectors of internal revenue and any other agency of the Treasury Department as of June 30, 1935.

It may be stated for your information that there are three types of strip stamps supplied for the use of the liquor industry for application to containers of distilled spirits, namely, red strips for the ordinary liquor and imported spirits, green strips for bonded liquor marketed in the United States which must be at least 4 years old before it is bottled, and blue strips for the same type of bonded liquor which is exported. The records of the Bureau do not disclose the number of these strip stamps in the hands of collectors of internal revenue on June 30, 1935. However, the records show that during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1934, and ended June 30, 1935, this Bureau shipped to collectors of internal revenue for sale to the liquor industry a total of 928,540,420 strip stamps of the three types mentioned, in denominations ranging from one-tenth pint to 1 gallon.

Very truly yours,

GUY T. HELVERING, Commissioner.

The Commissioner says in his letter that "the records of the Bureau do not disclose the number of these strip stamps in the hands of collectors of internal revenue on June 30, 1935."

Mr. Chairman, these 625,000,000 stamps could, in the case of imported liquor on which duties as well as taxes are collectible, represent evidence of possible tax revenue exceeding $700,000,000.

Does it reflect efficient supervision on the part of the Treasury that there are no records of their disposal?

We have done some checking on our own initiative and set forth as our unqualified conviction that these 625,000,000 stamps are not all now in the possession of the various collectors of internal revenue. If they are not, Mr. Chairman, it means that they have found their way into the hands of those who propose to use them to avoid paying the duties and taxes which are due the Federal Government under law. Furthermore, the fact that any appreciable amount of these stamps may have been secured by illicit operators would constitute definite evidence that the system which the Treasury Department insists is the most perfect which can be devised breaks down completely in its operation because it does not accomplish the purpose for which it was designed, namely, the assurance of collection of all taxes which are due.

Another point which may interest you is the fact that the strip stamp is perhaps the only revenue stamp used by the Treasury Department as an evidence of tax payment which does not cost the buyer the full amount of tax which it represents.

The strip stamp which costs 1 penny can be used to authenticate as much as a $2 tax payment—in other words, 200 times its actual cost. No illicit operator would try to obtain these stamps if they cost the full amount of tax payment which they authenticate.

Let me furnish you an additional example which shows that strip stamps are being used to authenticate liquor on which taxes have not been paid. Here is another letter from Commissioner of Internal Revenue Helvering to Senator COPELAND:

FEBRUARY 17, 1936.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring further to your inquiry of January 24, 1936, the total number of each size liquor bottle manufactured during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, as reported by bottle manufacturers, is as follows:

Size of container:	Number of bottles
½ pint	151,767,360
*¾ pint	2,817,216
⅘ pint	4,135,824
*⅞ pint	117,360
1 pint	255,917,520
*¾ quart	884,448
⅘ quart	67,458,240
⅞ quart	1,609,632
1 quart	88,246,224
½ gallon	1,102,608
1 gallon	2,507,904
*13 ounce	16,128
*12⅘ ounce	28,656
*20 ounce	1,872

The figures preceded by asterisks denote containers for "specialties", which are not eligible for use in packaging whisky, brandy, rum, gin, or alcohol.

Very truly yours,

GUY T. HELVERING,
Commissioner.

This letter, translated into stamps needed and stamps actually issued, offers the following comparison:

[All figures in thousands]

	Gallonage represented	Stamps needed to reflect tax payments	Stamps actually issued	Percent issued to those needed
½ pint	9,485	151,767	182,605	121
⅘ pint	413	4,135	9,588	234
1 pint	31,989	255,917	334,790	131
⅘ quart	13,491	67,458	113,560	170
1 quart	22,061	88,246	115,094	130
½ gallon	555	1,102	4,096	372
1 gallon	2,507	2,507	5,046	200
Total	80,504	517,135
Domestic gallonage, tax paid	75,262
Imported gallonage, tax paid	7,553
Total gallonage, tax paid	82,816	589,535	829,540	141

These bottles, bought by distillers and rectifiers during the fiscal year of 1935, are sufficient for about 80,000,000 gallons. Tax-paid imports in bottles of foreign manufacture added to domestic tax-paid gallonage would increase this total to less than 83,000,000 gallons. The domestic and import requirements, therefore, would amount to bottles sufficient for 83,000,000 gallons. These bottles, based upon Commissioner Helvering's report of bottle sizes, would need less than 590,000,000 stamps.

Up to June 1934 there had been issued to collectors and the trade 215,000,000 stamps more than needed to authenticate all tax-paid consumption to that date. Hence, these excess stamps should have represented the inventory available to legitimate producers. No stamps are needed by the legitimate trade in excess of the amount of bottles legitimately used. It is against the law to reuse bottles, so the amount of stamps used should equal the bottles bought.

There were some 250,000,000 more stamps issued than bottles bought during 1935, despite the fact that there had been some 215,000,000 more stamps issued in 1934 than required by the gallonage-tax payments.

Furthermore, during the next 6 months again more stamps were issued than needed to the extent of 107,000,000.

Also in January of this year an additional fifteen to twenty million more than required went to collectors.

What becomes of them? Where are they? Commissioner Helvering says the records of his Bureau do not disclose the number in the hands of collectors. Well, our investigation has proved to us that they are not all in the hand of collectors and the legitimate trade, that many are and have been available to the illicit industry; and if these were used exclusively to authenticate liquor on which duties as well as taxes were due, then the tax evasion could amount to many hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments, one to be inserted on page 262 and the other on page 266. The amendments are exactly alike, and I ask that they be considered together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 262, line 3, to strike out the phrase "or mistake in mathematical calculation", and after the word "section", in line 6, to insert the words "and the mathematical calculation therein",

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the object of the amendment is to save about 90 days in the payment of the refunds already provided for in the bill. It will save the necessity of the General Accounting Office making calculations after the Bureau of Internal Revenue has already done so and determined the amounts due.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed on page 266, lines 12 and 13, to strike out the words "or mistake in mathematical calculation", and on line 15, after the word "section", to insert a comma and the words "and the mathematical calculation therein".

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 290, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

Section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place the following:

Section 604 and section 608 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, are hereby repealed and the following provisions are substituted therefor and shall be known as section 604:

"SEC. 604. TAX ON FURS.

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold, articles made of fur on the hide or pelt of which any such fur is the component material of chief value."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the committee is familiar with the amendment, and it may go to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD a letter which I have written to the chairman of the committee which fully explains this amendment. I desire also to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a letter from the representative of the National Grange in support of this amendment, a letter from the American Farm Bureau Federation in support of the amendment, and a letter from the Farmers National Grain Corporation in support of the amendment, all representing the fur growers of the United States. I desire also to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the National Fur Tax Committee giving a list of all the associations of furriers, cleaners, manufacturers, and fur producers throughout the United States in support of this amendment.

I desire to say also that, so far as the fur industry is concerned, the farmers, those who produce the furs on the farm—and about 80 percent of all the furs are produced by farmers—as well as all the dyers and cleaners and manufacturers, are united in support of this amendment; and, in addition to that, the Treasury Department also supports this amendment. It will provide just as much revenue as is now being received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho for the printing in the RECORD of the letters referred to by him?

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 6, 1936.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
Chairman, Finance Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: Pursuant to our conversation concerning the matter, I desire to call to your attention the enclosed suggested amendment to the revenue bill which the Finance Committee now has under consideration. It is the intent of this amendment to revise the tax on furs. I realize that it is not the intention of the administration to open the excise-tax question to discussion, but I feel that there are several reasons why this amendment can be adopted as an exception, without opening the general excise question to discussion.

The fur industry and the Treasury Department have indicated to me that the luxury tax on furs imposed under sections 604 and 608 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is in a chaotic condition. Evasions of the tax have become so prevalent that the Treasury feels that a 3-percent "over all" tax will yield just as much revenue as the present 10 percent on articles over $75. Farmer-trappers have reported to me that prices offered them for furs valued from $75 to $100 have been reduced by buyers to $74.95 to evade the tax. The fur manufacturers in many instances are further evading the tax in the following manner:

A $150 fur coat is sent in two packages, one containing the collar, one containing the coat. These articles are billed separately at $74.95 each.

Sometime ago I introduced Senate bill 3654, which changed the point of taxation from manufacturing to processing, reduced the tax to 4 percent, and eliminated the $75 exemption. In reporting on that bill the Secretary of the Treasury said:

"In the event that a change with respect to the tax on furs now imposed under section 604 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended by section 608 of the Revenue Act of 1934, should be in contemplation for the relief of the industry, it is the recommendation of this Department that a revision of the law be effected by eliminating the exemption with respect to articles selling for less than $75 and substantially lowering the rate of tax. The exemption in the case of articles selling for less than $75 has afforded a broad field of tax evasion, and has increased substantially the difficulties encountered in administering the law and the cost of such administration."

Pursuant to that suggestion I introduced the bill S. 4375, which merely revised the existing tax by reducing it to 3 percent and eliminating the $75 exemption. In reporting on this bill Acting Secretary of the Treasury Wayne C. Taylor made certain routine suggestions, which have been complied with, with respect to the bill, and stated:

"Your attention is directed to my letter of February 21, 1936, relative to the merits of S. 3654 (74th Cong., 2d sess.). In view of the recommendation contained in that letter in the event a change was contemplated in respect to the tax on furs, this Department does not offer any objections to the enactment of S. 4375 (74th Cong., 2d sess.), other than the suggestions noted above."

I believe, therefore, that the proposed amendment enclosed herewith is agreeable to the Treasury Department. The National Fur Tax Committee, representing the industry as a whole, has advised me of its desire that the amendment be adopted. Many individual interests within the fur industry have likewise advised me.

Trappers and farmers of the West have expressed support of the bill. I am sure you will be interested in the enclosed letters from the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and the National Grange, which are in support of the amendment.

In view of the peculiar conditions surrounding this situation and the urgent need for a reform of the tax on furs, I would appreciate the consideration of the Finance Committee in placing this amendment in the bill.

Very sincerely yours,

J. P. POPE.

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1936.

Hon. JAMES P. POPE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to your bill repealing the 10-percent tax on all fur garments costing more than $75 and imposing in lieu thereof a 3-percent ad valorem tax on all manufactured furs.

It is our belief that the existing tax on furs has not worked out as was intended, but that it has resulted in lower prices on furs and pelts to trappers and producers.

Under the circumstances we would be satisfied to see the provisions of your bill incorporated in the pending revenue act.

Sincerely yours,

FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1936.

Senator JAMES P. POPE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR POPE: Perhaps I have previously called your attention to the position of the American Farm Bureau Federation in regard to the Federal luxury tax on furs. However, in looking over our farm bureau policy on tax matters generally, I notice, in connection with your bill, S. 4375, a resolution of the federation, adopted at the last annual meeting in December 1935, which reads as follows:

"We favor the elimination or modification of the so-called luxury tax on furs, which now has a depressing influence on prices received by farmer-trappers for raw furs."

The present luxury tax on furs begins at a $75 value on the garment, the result of which is to force garments below the $75 price line which otherwise would sell above that line. This tendency forces the purchaser of raw furs to pay less prices for these products which are produced very largely by farmer-trappers in all parts of the Nation. In fact, I believe it is approximately right to state that between 75 percent and 80 percent of the furs of this Nation are gathered by farmer-trappers and their sons. Anything which tends to beat down the prices on raw furs is serious to a large list of farmers who, in the winter months mostly, when work is light, gather the fur crop of the Nation.

Your pending measure modifies the present luxury tax on furs by substituting for it a 3-percent tax on furs, irrespective of the prices at which such furs are sold. This plan will produce approximately the same amount of revenue as is secured from the present luxury tax on furs, will not depress prices received by farmer-trappers for raw furs, will be easier to enforce and less costly than is the present tax, and will apply to imported as well as domestic furs.

It is hoped that you can secure the incorporation of your measure in the pending revenue bill, and you may feel free to call on me to help in any way in which this objective may be attained.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

FARMERS NATIONAL GRAIN CORPORATION,
Chevy Chase, Md., May 7, 1936.

Hon. JAMES P. POPE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The leaders in our organization, as well as those in the Northwest Farmers Union group, whom I have the honor to represent here at Washington, have become very much interested in your bill, S. 4375.

We have come to the conclusion that it will best serve the purposes of both the Government and those interested in the first sale of furs to reduce the excise tax from 10 to 3 percent and entirely eliminate the $75 exemption.

We will be deeply obliged for your advice as to what we may do to gain the favorable consideration of Congress in this matter.

Respectfully yours,

M. W. THATCHER.

NATIONAL FUR TAX COMMITTEE,
New York, May 18, 1936.

Senator JAMES P. POPE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR POPE: This committee, which represents the majority of the fur industry, doing about 90 percent of the fur business, heartily endorses your bill which calls for elimination of the $75 exemption and the taxing of all manufactured furs at 3 percent.

Not only will this measure produce more money for the Government, but it will, in addition, eliminate all of the evils of the present tax.

With very few exceptions, every worth-while association of the industry, whether it be an association of retailers or manufacturers, is strongly in favor of your bill. The American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, all recognize the value of the bill and in letters to this committee have expressed themselves in favor of the measure.

If there is any way that this committee can help you, please call upon us.

Very sincerly yours,

NATIONAL FUR TAX COMMITTEE,
MICHAEL HOLLANDER,
National Chairman.

NATIONAL FUR TAX COMMITTEE,
New York City, May 20, 1936.

Senator JAMES P. POPE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Here is a list of a number of associations which have written the national headquarters and put themselves on record in favor of your bill.

In every case a poll of membership was taken by the association, and its board of directors were authorized to issue a statement to National Fur Tax Committee headquarters expressing the feeling of the membership: Washington State Fur Dealers Association, 72 Columbia Street, Seattle, president, C. B. Coselman; Louisiana Fur Dealers Association, 413 Decatur Street, New Orleans, secretary, Edward H. Ceite; the Raw Fur Dealers Association of the State of New York, Syracuse, N. Y., president, Joseph F. Brightman; Association of Landowners and Lessees of Landowners of Fur Industry, 413 Decatur Street, New Orleans, secretary, Edward H. Ceite; Association Fur Merchants Salesmen's Association, Hotel Governor, Clinton, N. Y., secretary, Sidney Kramer; Iowa-Nebraska Furriers Association, 613 Pierce Street, Sioux City, Iowa, president, August Williges; Chicago Wholesale Fur Credit Association, Inc., 190 North State Street, Chicago, Ill., president, S. Watzer; Illinois Silver Fox & Fur Breeder Association, room 1476, 208 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill., president, Lou Silverman; San Francisco Retail Fur Merchants' Association, 625 Market Street, San Francisco, Calif., president, L. J. Grueger; Technical Association of the Fur Industry, 199 Pacific Street, Newark, N. J., vice president, Leo Altenberg; National Association of Resident Fur Commission Salesmen, 36 South State Street, Chicago, Ill., president, Frank L. Finch.

I venture to say that nine out of ten associations are in favor of your bill. These associations represent those devoted to fur farming, dressing and dyeing, manufacturing, and retailing. In other words, a complete cross-section of the fur industry shows strong support for you.

I am also sending you under separate cover a poll of the outstanding men of the industry on questions of interest to you. You will see that here, too, there is a great majority in favor of your plan.

A thousand thanks to you, Senator, for your efforts to relieve us of a horrible state of affairs which exists in the fur trade today. Your bill will help everyone who has anything to do with furs, from the farmer-trapper to the retailer.

I want you to know how much we appreciate your very splendid efforts.

Very sincerely yours,

NATIONAL FUR TAX COMMITTEE,
MICHAEL HOLLANDER,
National Chairman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in 1935 we negotiated successfully a reciprocal agreement with Canada. In section 1760 of that agreement shingles were placed on the free list and all shingles are now brought into the United States duty free. There was, however, a provision in the agreement that the Canadian producers of red-cedar shingles might export to the United States from Canada the equivalent of 25 percent of the total consumption in the United States, which is equal to about 75 percent of the total production in Canada. There was a provision in section 1760 reserving to the United States the right to limit the total quantity of red-cedar shingles, which are only a fraction of the free shingles coming into the country, and to restrict Canada to 25 percent of the combined total of the shipments of red-cedar shingles by producers in the United States and the imports of such shingles during the preceding half calendar year.

Let me say to my colleagues and to the Chair that under the N. R. A. there had been a 25-percent import arrangement entered into between the producers of this country and the producers in Canada as affecting red-cedar shingles, and the amendment which my colleague [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] and myself offer, and which has been presented to the Committee on Finance and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], merely implements this provision of section 1760 of the reciprocal-trade agreement, and authorizes the President to breathe the breath of life into it. It was assumed that the 25-percent arrangement as to red-cedar shingles, which, as I have said, are only a fraction of the shingles introduced into this country, would be entered into subsequently; but there was some question in the mind of the Secretary of State as to the right of the President to do that; and the amendment we are now tendering to the pending bill is, I repeat, merely to implement the section and breathe the breath of life into it. We are asking that it be adopted so that at least it may go to conference. I understand that the Senator from Utah has no objection to it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] has no objection, speaking for the committee, the amendment may go to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NYE. I inquire if the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington has been reported at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to.

Mr. NYE. Was it reported to the Senate?

Mr. KING. I understood that it was reported while I was conferring with the clerk.

Mr. BONE. The amendment follows, in considerable measure, the exact language of the reciprocal treaty itself.

Mr. NYE. Yes; but is it not rather a departure from the rule to agree to amendments without having them even reported to the Senate?

Mr. KING. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

Whenever any organization or association representing the producers of more than 75 percent of the red cedar shingles produced in the United States during the previous half-year period shall request the President to limit the importation of red cedar shingles from Canada under paragraph 1760 of the reciprocal trade agreement entered into with the Dominion of Canada under date of November 15, 1935, and the President finds from available statistics that the total quantity of red cedar shingles produced in the Dominion of Canada which is entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in the United States, during any given half of any calendar year exceeds or will exceed 25 percent of the combined total of the shipments of red cedar shingles by producers in the United States and the imports during the preceding half year, the President shall issue an order limiting for the 6 months immediately following the half of the calendar year in which said excess occurred, the quantity of red cedar shingles to be imported from Canada to 25 percent of the combined total of the shipments and imports of red cedar shingles for such preceding half calendar year. The President shall issue a new order for each half of the calendar year thereafter during the continuation of the operation of the reciprocal trade agreement entered into with the Dominion of Canada, under date of November 15, 1935, with the same limitations as hereinbefore set forth.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, understanding that the amendment is going to be taken to conference, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD a memorandum concerning the amendment prepared by the New York lumber trade may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON THE AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY SENATORS BONE AND SCHWELLENBACH TO REVENUE BILL (H. R. 12395)

Senators BONE and SCHWELLENBACH introduced on May 15, 1936, an amendment which they intend to propose to the revenue bill. The amendment provides that whenever the manufacturers of 75 percent of the domestic production of red-cedar shingles may request, the President shall be compelled to issue an order limiting imports of red-cedar shingles to 25 percent of the domestic consumption in the preceding half year.

This proposal should be defeated. It is not revenue legislation. It has no place in a revenue bill. It cannot produce and is not designed to produce revenue. It is purely and simply a matter of customs administration.

Furthermore, this legislation is not necessary. Under existing law (the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by the Trade Agreements Act, Public, No. 816, 73d Cong.) the President has the power "to proclaim * * * such additional import restrictions * * * as are required or appropriate to carry out any further trade agreement that the President has entered into * * *."

"Import restrictions" are further defined as including "limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties imposed on imports or imposed for the regulation of imports."

Exercising his authority under this act, the President entered into a trade agreement with Canada in which it was provided that the President could limit imports of shingles to 25 percent of the domestic consumption.

In enacting the Trade Agreements Act in 1934, the Congress repealed all of the countervailing provisions in the tariff act. The amendment of Senators BONE and SCHWELLENBACH is an attempt to insert again a provision equivalent to the old countervailing provisions with respect to shingles, a commodity which was not before subject even to a countervailing duty, although lumber had such a provision in paragraph 1803 of the Tariff Act. Worse, it makes the countervailing provision mandatory and removes the discretionary authority of the President to limit imports which he specifically retained in enacting the trade agreement with Canada. The amendment would change the terms of the trade agreement with Canada. To enact the amendment would be a breach of faith and might lead to serious retaliatory measures on the part of Canada, such as a log-export embargo, which would seriously injure the lumber and shingle mills of Washington, which are dependent on imports of cedar and fir logs for their raw material supply.

Senators BONE and SCHWELLENBACH by the use of the word "shall" in their amendment wish to make mandatory the provision in the trade agreement which authorizes the President to limit the imports of shingles to 25 percent of domestic consumption. But the proposal goes much further that this. They propose to split the year into two 6-month periods and limit importations in any 6-month period to the basis of the preceding 6 months.

In an industry such as the shingle industry, which is highly seasonal in character, importations in the busy 6 months would be limited to the basis of the preceding slack 6 months' period. Then in the following 6 months, when business was again poor, importations could be increased to 25 percent of the consumption during the preceding period when business was good, if the importers could get the necessary orders in a slack period, which would be extremely difficult and expensive, if not impossible.

In considering this matter it might be well to go back and consider the economic situation in the shingle industry in Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia. Shingles are manufactured from red-cedar logs. Red cedar grows in the forest intermingled with various other timber species, usually but a small percentage of the total cut in any logging operation being red cedar. The best quality of red cedar is found in the North. Stands to the South are of poorer quality. As a consequence, the best cedar timber is found in British Columbia. The most accessible stands of the better quality in Washington, particularly around Puget Sound, have been cut out.

Many American shingle mills which formerly secured their timber from nearby Puget Sound stands are now importing large quantities of cedar logs from British Columbia. In many instances mills not located on tidewater have been forced to suspend operations because of the serious depletion of cedar timber in Washington. It has been estimated that the total remaining stand of cedar in the State of Washington is sufficient for no more than 15 years of continued operation at the present rate of use, but the better grades will be exhausted in 10 years or less.

Shingles were put on the free list by the Underwood Tariff Act of 1913.

In 1921 a serious effort was made in the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill to impose a duty on shingles. It was overwhelmingly rejected by the Congress.

In July 1926, at the instance of domestic manufacturers of red-cedar shingles, the President of the United States ordered an investigation of the red-cedar shingle industry with a view to ascertaining conditions prevailing in the industry. The Tariff Commission made an exhaustive investigation of the competitive positions of the shingle-manufacturing industries in the United States and Canada. The Tariff Commission found no facts which would justify the imposition of a tariff on Canadian shingles imported into the United States. (See the report of the Tariff Commission to the President on red-cedar shingles, Feb. 27, 1927.)

A further appeal was made by the domestic manufacturers in the consideration of the tariff bill by the Congress in 1929 and 1930. Congress, after hearing all of the testimony and examining the evidence, quite overwhelmingly refused to impose a tariff on shingles.

When the National Recovery Act was passed, domestic shingle manufacturers saw an opportunity to use the act as a lever to exclude British Columbia shingles. Immediately upon passage of the act, the Red Cedar Shingle Bureau, an organization of the major part of the shingle industry in Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia, assembled in Seattle for the purpose of devising a code for the shingle industry. British Columbia manufacturers were invited to attend the meeting, but when they arrived there was some argument as to the propriety of their presence. After some discussion, the Canadians were asked to withdraw. Later the Canadian representatives were informed that the American manufacturers had decided to form a new association which would eliminate the British Columbia shingle manufacturers.

This was somewhat of an affront to the British Columbia manufacturers as they had for many years worked hand in hand with the better manufacturers of shingles in Washington and Oregon as members of the Red Cedar Shingle Bureau which had for its purpose the combating of antishingle ordinances and propaganda, promoting shingle trade, advertising, and other activities calculated to increase the demand for red-cedar shingles and during all these years shared the expense of developing and saving the American market for shingles.

British Columbia manufacturers, as members of the Red Cedar Shingle Bureau, meticulously cooperated in every possible way in the promotion and development of the shingle business in the United States. These manufacturers expected that when the code for the shingle industry was adopted, the association of long standing (the Red Cedar Shingle Bureau), would prepare the code and administer it. They expressed a willingness to participate and bind themselves to the N. R. A. and a code was prepared with that expectation in view.

However, the militant minority of the American industry, which desired the exclusion of the British Columbia shingles, obtained enough support to become a militant majority and they succeeded in forcing the formation of the new association to be known as the Washington and Oregon Shingle Association. This new association presented its code in the lumber and timber industries code and it was adopted.

British Columbia manufacturers cooperated in every possible way in maintaining the code, though they were not a part of it. In order to definitely limit imports and get them on a controlled-quota basis, an agrement was entered into between the Washington-Oregon Shingle Association and the Canadian manufacturers. There was considerable argument as to the size of the quota to be allotted to British Columbia manufacturers. The Americans wanted to arbitrarily assign them a quota of 20 percent of the consumption, although in the preceding 2 years the British Columbia manufacturers had supplied approximately 35 percent of consumption.

British Columbia manufacturers were not only willing, but anxious to cooperate in maintaining the code, but to have their market cut in two appealed to them as something in the nature of a dry bone thrown to the dog in view of the fact that they had been largely instrumental in developing the shingle market and saving it from the competition of substitute materials through their association work, contributions, and advertising.

Through the coercion of the Washington and Oregon manufacturers, the Canadians were compelled to sign an agreement to limit shipments to 20 percent but with a condition precedent that the American manufacturers were to provide the method of regulation so as to secure substantial equality and justice as between the various manufacturers. As a result, the domestic manufacturers requested the N. R. A. to approve the contract and put it in force.

The N. R. A. presented the matter to the Tariff Commission in 1934 for investigation and the facts with reference to the competition between Washington and Oregon and British Columbia manufacturers were carefully examined. Costs and other competitive factors were considered but no facts were found which would justify any tariff restriction on shingle imports. Inasmuch as the British Columbia manufacturers under the coercion of their American competitors had signed an agreement to limit exports, the Tariff Commission accepted the contract and made it official. But the Tariff Commission, on its own initiative, increased the quota 5 percent, making it 25 percent.

British Columbia manufacturers accepted and continued their voluntary cooperation, limiting their production and shipments to this basis and voluntarily increasing their wages to code levels on the shingles produced for the American market. They were enabled to exercise this control under the authority of the Canadian Marketing Act—a Canadian legislative act comparable in some respects to the N. R. A. Under the terms of this act, which the Canadian shingle manufacturers voluntarily accepted to make possible their cooperation with the American lumber code, no exports of cedar shingles can be made from Canada without first securing a certificate from the agency established under the act.

At the termination of the N. R. A. on May 27, 1935, the Canadian Marketing Act was still in existence, and even during the time of the N. R. A. the Canadian Marketing Act was in existence. The lumber code had practically collapsed. The strike among the American shingle mills on the west coast which had not been able to ship American shingles for many months was resulting in rapid depletion of stocks of shingles in retail lumber yards. The matter was brought to the attention of Members of Congress, who intervened with N. R. A., and were informed by N. R. A. that under the circumstances they could not offer any objection to an increase in the shipments of shingles from Canada in order to save the situation.

As a result, contacts were made with the representatives of Canadian mills, and upon pleadings of dealers in the United States, the Canadian shippers increased their quota and rapidly took care of the situation, which was impossible of handling by the American mills. The action saved the day, and it was only upon agreement of protection that the Canadian mills agreed to increase their quota which had previously been agreed to. This is a very good example of what can happen if the American mills suddenly find themselves in the position of being unable to take care of the demand. With heavy increases reported in all lumber-producing territories, and with forecasts of estimated building of 200,000 homes during the next year, it is vitally important to consider whether the American mills can supply this demand without the aid of the British Columbia mills, over and above the 25-percent quota. If this quota is rigidly enforced and cannot be changed except through action of Congress, the supply would be limited, and naturally would result in heavily increased prices to the consumers and loss of business to the shingle manufacturers, to shingle substitutes and asphalt products.

After the settlement of the labor difficulties in Washington and Oregon, the British Columbia Shingle Marketing Authority resumed its control and maintains it today. They are attempting, and the individual manufacturers of shingles in Canada are cooperating in the attempt, to maintain Canadian shingle imports to the United States at a reasonable level of approximately 25 percent of the American consumption.

There has been no complaint that they have exceeded this figure. Ex-Senator Dill, testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, conceded that Canadian exports have been maintained below this figure. Ex-Senator Dill only emphasized the possibility that British Columbia might exceed the 25-percent quota after Congress had adjourned. There is absolutely no ground for this fear.

Canadian manufacturers are at this time voluntarily limiting their shipments for the sake of orderly marketing. If they should discontinue this policy and imports should increase to an unreasonable level over 25 percent of the domestic consumption, the President, as above stated, has in his power to invoke the limitation provided in the trade agreement.

The proposed control to be inaugurated if the amendment is enacted would take at least 6 months to place in operation. The Congress will have returned to Washington before that time has expired and will be able to deal directly with any problem which may arise in the unlikely event of excessive shipments from Canada.

Certainly the Congress would be ill-advised to enact legislation so out of spirit with the express terms of the trade agreement entered into by the President with the Canadian Government, on the mere possibility of the occurrence of an event which all past records indicate is extremely unlikely to happen.

It is proposed that the amendment of Senators JONES and SCHWELLENBACH shall be operated on the basis of statistics to be gathered by the Census Bureau of the shipment of shingles from mills in Washington and Oregon. They propose to take the figures thus gathered as being representative of the domestic consumption. While there could be no objection to the use of these figures, inasmuch as more exact figures would be impossible if not impracticable to obtain, there is no assurance that the census reports on which the totals would be based would be as comprehensive as the figures furnished by the import statistics. Every shingle imported into the United States is counted, but it would be almost impossible for the Census Bureau or any other agency to get as complete and accurate a record of the shipments (including local consumption of the many small backwoods shingle mills) which operate in some cases only a few weeks out of the year. If the Senators from Washington are sincere in their desire to get accurate and complete consumption statistics, it might be suggested that a statutory enactment specifically requiring complete reports from every manufacturer of shingles of his production, local sales, and shipments made periodically would be more likely to result in accurate total figures for consumption. Such a provision should be incorporated in the amendment if it is to be seriously considered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the RECORD does not already so show, I will say, in behalf of the committee, that the amendment just offered by the Senator from Washington may be accepted and go to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have two amendments I desire to offer. The first amendment which I present relates to citizens doing business in the Philippine Islands. If unincorporated, a citizen who does business in the Philippine Islands is not subject to our Federal individual income-tax law; but if incorporated, he is subject to the corporation tax, and his competition with the German, French, Filipino, and Japanese in the islands is very greatly aggravated and increased. I offer the amendment for the sake of having it go to conference so that it may be there considered, although I do not commit myself to it.

Mr. KING. For that purpose only, I accept the amendment, so that it may go to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 201, line 13, after the word "another", it is proposed to strike out the period and to insert a comma and the following proviso:

Provided, however, That for the purposes of this paragraph, dividends received from a corporation, sociedad anonima, partnership, trade, or business, shall be deemed to be gross income derived from the active conduct of a trade or business, when such citizen is actively engaged in the conduct of such corporation, sociedad anonima, partnership, trade, or business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah state that he will accept the amendment so that it may go to conference for consideration?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I ask that it be taken to conference, without committing myself to it, but I think it has enough merit to be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have an additional amendment. I wish to explain that this amendment was presented to the Finance Committee at a time when there was not a full attendance. I am not offering it as a committee amendment, but in my place as a Senator. I ask that it be taken to conference, in order that if it should be deemed proper that something may be done.

The amendment simply proposes to give to the payer of excise taxes the right to appeal to the Board of Tax Appeals, as in the case of estate taxes, income taxes, and all other taxes.

I realize that there are some objections to the amendment, but I should like to ask the acting chairman of the committee to let it go to conference, so that it may be there studied and, if found meritorious, that it may be placed in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 272, after line 12, following the amendments heretofore agreed to, to insert the following:

SEC. 815. SECTION 700—REVIEW OF EXCISE-TAX DEFICIENCIES BY BOARD OF TAX APPEALS.

Deficiences in respect of taxes imposed by title IV of the Revenue Act of 1932 as amended shall from and after the enactment of this act be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner and subject insofar as applicable to the same provisions of law as deficiencies in respect of taxes imposed by title I of this act.

Mr. KING. The amendment may be accepted and go to conference.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is this the greatest deliberative body in the world?

Mr. KING. It is when the Senator is present. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to be offered the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a request for unanimous consent, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12395 the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make such changes in the table of contents of the bill as may be necessary to make it conform to the action of the Senate on the bill, and that such changes be treated as one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement requested by the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. I also ask unanimous consent that House bill 12395, as passed by the Senate, be printed with the amendments of the Senate numbered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, ask for a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. KING, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. WALSH, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. COUZENS, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, feeling as I do about this tax bill, both as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate, I desire to resign as a conferee.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, sharing the feeling of the Senator from Michigan, I also prefer not to serve as a conferee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of that unexpected situation, I hope the conferees will not be appointed until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senator from Utah having charge of the bill with regard to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of the resignation as conferees of two members of the Finance Committee, I have asked that the appointment of conferees go over until tomorrow at our regular session. I should like to have an opportunity to consider the matter and to confer with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. KING. I suppose the Senator is appealing for delay only in behalf of the Republican vacancies?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. I think the minority are entitled to some consideration.

Mr. KING. The acting chairman has not insisted that they should not receive consideration; and, acceding to the request of the Senator from Oregon, the matter of the further appointees may go over until tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator very much.

TAXATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. KING submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION IN WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I am sending to the desk to be printed in the RECORD two resolutions passed by the Council of the City of Wheeling and the County Commissioners of Ohio County, also a letter written by Robert Plummer, manager of the Wheeling district of the Works Progress Administration. It is very interesting to check the votes in the counties mentioned by Mr. Plummer. One will find, where the relief load was carried in Harrison, Marion, Preston, and Barbour Counties, that the Works Progress Administration slate had a much larger percentage of votes than in Ohio, Hancock, Brook, and Marshall, where the relief load was materially reduced.

Mr. Plummer's letter, coupled with a survey of the election figures, adds further proof that the Works Progress Administration has built a huge political machine in the State of West Virginia, and coupled with the letters and affidavits which I have presented, indicates that the workers were coerced into voting for the Works Progress Administration candidates in the recent primary.

It could not be just a strange coincidence that the records were so definite.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

After more than a month of effort I have at least succeeded in compiling a comparative statement showing the reduction in relief personnel of the Works Progress Administration in the 11 counties of the second district. The delay in this compilation was due, of course, to the week-to-week changes since this reduction has been under way, beginning in early April.

The result puts credulity to a severe strain. I feel that no person with fit sense of responsibility toward the needy relief workers of this district can avoid reaching the conclusion that most unfair discrimination has been made among the various counties, particularly those of the panhandle district, Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, and Marshall.

Ohio County since April 3 has suffered a reduction of 669 workers, leaving employed only 1,279 workers of a former total of 1,948, or a forced decrease of 34.3 percent.

In Hancock County the reduction for the same period was from 657 to 456, or 30.6 percent; in Brooke County, from 362 to 190, or 47.5 percent, and in Marshall County, from 823 to 622, or 24.4 percent.

Wetzel County, adjoining the panhandle section, was another to suffer a similarly heavy cut of 28.1 percent. Next comes Monongalia County with a reduction of 27.5 percent.

These figures are fairly unbelievable when compared with Harrison, Marion, Preston, Taylor, and Barbour Counties, with an average reduction of but 12.4 percent.

BORE 22.8 PERCENT OF CUT

One finds it difficult to believe that Ohio County has been made to bear 22.8 percent of the reduction for the entire district.

The hardship on the unemployment here has been made all the greater by the fact that Ohio County never was assigned its full work quota by some 260 men.

Based on district quota figures, issued from Fairmont in January, the local district is now exactly 940 workers short of what would be an effective relief program.

Compared to this, and estimated by means of this same quota, Harrison and Preston Counties, even today, have an excess over their quotas as originally announced. Marion County, too, is but 191 workers under quota.

There has been still another discrimination against this district and a most serious one. This is the low percentage of women workers assigned in Ohio County. Whereas this county, on May 23, has 551 women of first priority certified for work, the total employed is but 239. Until the recent flood brought this situation to the attention of State and National officials of the Works Progress Administration, the total women employed was but 159. Compare this percentage to that of Marion County, with, 414 eligible women workers and 288 at work, or Harrison County, with 560 eligibles and 286 at work most of the entire program.

You cannot but agree that employment of women relief workers is especially desirable. For one thing, the money they earn goes so unselfishly toward the support of dependents and, too, their opportunity for private employment in times of depression is far more restricted than for men workers. And the service of their projects in making clothing for destitute families and conducting feeding centers for undernourished families, meets a social need more essential than repairing streets and roads. There can be no doubt that this district has not been taken care of adequately in the employment of women, a condition to be thoroughly deplored.

NO RELIEF

I sincerely trust that I need not remind you that these figures I have quoted do not represent dollars and cents. They stand for a casualty list of distressed victims of depression, heads of families in many cases hungry and shelterless, who have no place to turn for aid, not even to the State relief administration, which takes the attitude that the Works Progress Administration, having once assigned these persons to work, is responsible for their welfare until they find private employment. While we may deplore this shifting of duty on the part of the State, it is no help to these workers cut off from the meager wages that have been keeping them alive.

The local district may not have felt this drastic reduction so badly in the cases of single men without dependents, but here, too, there has been neglect toward those who were told they could be assigned to transient camps. Scores of these men have passed weeks awaiting some word or action on their applications. I am now advised that far more were removed from the Works Progress Administration rolls than the camps can possibly provide quarters.

Repeated inquiries and requests directed to Fairmont for some action in this matter have brought only form-letter regrets at such times when there has been any reply at all. Incidentally, many of these men are in no sense transients. Their homes are in Wheeling, and their only handicap is that in most cases they have reached an age at which mines, mills, or factories will not employ them. Certainly they are entitled to some consideration better than the heedless manner in which they were cut adrift with no provision made for those who cannot find work.

But far more tragic is the lot of those men with families who have received their dismissal notices from Fairmont. There can be no condoning the inroads which have been made into large family groups in the Panhandle district counties. It is not a pleasant sight to see grown men in tears, pleading desperately for their wives and children, asking frantically what they are to do, while knowing that much of this distress would have been avoided if the reduction you were called upon to make, and of which you had sole charge, had been fairly divided among the 11 counties of the district.

As the situation stands, and as these reports which have been quoted indisputably prove, there has been little or no reduction at all in some counties, while Ohio and neighboring counties have been made to bear the burden and face the stark problem of human suffering.

PROGRAM CRIPPLED

There will be still another consequence resulting from this local disparity, but in which I have less immediate concern. This is the crippling of the work program. Already we have been forced to suspend two operations, and other shut-downs will probably be necessary. The number of emergency projects has been substantially increased here since the flood, and there is now a general shortage of available workers. In the end this discrimination against the local workers will also mean discrimination against the communities in the number of projects that can be operated or that will be approved.

It is axiomatic that this particular section of the State rarely receives its due in the matter of governmental dispensations. This has come to be an accepted condition in many ways, but in this particular matter, with needy and destitute families affected, nothing less than fair treatment can be demanded.

Therefore, I feel it to be my solemn duty, as one of the few persons acquainted with what has occurred, to request in behalf of the employed of the local district a complete readjustment of this reduction, to the end that every unemployed and needy worker with a family group to support may be reassigned to work. If the reduction is changed to a basis of fair treatment among the various counties of the district, this can be done.

I cannot believe that you can afford to be left in the position of having been anything less than fair. Since the time the Wheeling area office opened under Mr. George W. Oldham in September of last year there have been many things take place from which one might draw quite positive conclusions that you were unfriendly toward this district, and office, and that one of your chief desires would be to have the latter closed. I am sure there have been many, many instances in which the importance of the Wheeling office has been demonstrated, particularly during the recent flood emergency, as you doubtless realize.

However, as long as such feeling would be confined to administrative heads and their activities, it might be regarded as of no great moment. But it becomes quite another kind of matter when the rights of unemployed workers are involved, and something altogether inimical to the spirit of the great humanitarian who has conceived this relief program and to whom every person placed in a position of responsibility owes allegiance.

I ask again that there be a prompt readjustment among the counties in this reduction, and that the many deserving family heads in this district who have been made the victims of this inequality, be returned to work.

CITY OF WHEELING,
Wheeling, W. Va., June 3, 1936.

Hon. RUSH D. HOLT, Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HOLT: Attached herewith please find copy of a resolution presented at last night's council meeting by Attorney Russell B. Goodwin, one of our councilmen, which resolution was unanimously adopted.

Cutting down the force on the Works Progress Administration projects in this district is not only going to be a great hardship on the unemployed, but it is also going to cause lengthy delay on the 38 projects that have already been started, only 1 of which has been actually finished.

Some of these projects, which were started under the old E. R. A. over a year and a half ago, are not yet finished, and it certainly is causing a great hardship on the citizens living on the streets where the street and sewer jobs are under construction because they have been dragged out so long.

We have requested Mr. Robert L. Plummer, director of the Wheeling office of the Works Progress Administration, to put additional men on these jobs. He agrees with us that this should be done in order that the jobs could proceed more efficiently and quickly, but he is unable to do so because he does not have the labor.

The reduction in the work personnel in our local Works Progress Administration office is not only going to work a great hardship on both present and future projects in Wheeling and Ohio County, but it has caused a serious problem through unemployment.

We would appreciate it if you would give this matter your immediate attention and consideration with a view of giving this county some relief from this unfortunate situation.

Yours very truly,

H. J. HUMPHREY, City Manager.

At a meeting of the Council of the City of Wheeling on June 2, 1936, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas it has come to the attention of this body that a reduction in the number of employees of the Works Progress Administration has recently been effected, in which residents of this city and county were victims of obvious discrimination because of the number discharged here as compared to other counties under the administration of the Fairmont office of the Works Progress Administration; and

Whereas we believe that in administration of unemployment relief most scrupulous impartiality should be observed among various districts and everything possible done to avoid suspicion of political influence in favor of one district as against another; that the number of workers laid off in Ohio County as compared to Marion, Harrison, Taylor, Preston, and Barbour Counties is unreasonable, unfair, and unjust, and will cause great hardship and suffering among our needy and unemployed citizens, especially those with dependent families; and that the projects now under way will, in many instances, fail of completion; that this entire district will suffer in the apportionment of future work by the Works Progress Administration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we respectfully petition our United States Senators and Representative in Congress, Hon. Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, and Hon. F. Witcher McCullough, Administrator for the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia, for immediate readjustment of this disparity, to the end that the rights of our unemployed citizens may be protected; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to these officials by the city manager, with the request that the matter be given immediate consideration.

RUSSELL B. GOODWIN.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and exact copy of a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Wheeling at a regular meeting, held June 2, 1936.

HOWARD C. LANE, City Clerk.

Be it remembered that at a regular meeting of the Board of Commissioners of the County of Ohio, W. Va., held in regular session on the 1st day of June 1936, among other proceedings the following was a part:

Commissioner Gavin presented the following resolution and moved its adoption:

Be it resolved by the Board of Commissioners of the County of Ohio, W. Va.—

Whereas it has come to the attention of this body that a reduction in the number of employees of the Works Progress Administration has recently been effected, in which residents of this county were victims of obvious discrimination because of the number discharged here, as compared to the reduction in other counties under the administration of the Fairmont office of the Works Progress Administration; and

Whereas we believe that in the administration of unemployment relief the most scrupulous impartiality should be observed among the various districts; that everything possible should be done to avoid any suspicion of political influence in favor of one district as against another; that the number of workers laid off in Ohio County as compared to Marion, Harrison, Taylor, Preston, and Barbour Counties, will cause great hardship and suffering among our needy and unemployed citizens, especially those with dependent families; that the projects now under way will in many instances fail of completion; that this entire district will suffer in the apportionment of future work by the Works Progress Administration, and that unemployed men and women of Ohio County will be denied opportunity for relief equal to that in more favored counties: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we respectfully petition our United States Senators and Representative in Congress, Hon. Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, and Hon. F.

Witcher McCullough, administrator for the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia, to use their influence to secure prompt readjustment of this disparity among the various counties of this district to the end that justice may be done and the rights of our distressed citizens protected; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the officials indicated herein, with the request that the matter be given immediate consideration.

The foregoing resolution having been read by all members of the board, Commissioner Koller seconded the motion for the adoption of the said resolution.

Vote being called, Commissioners Gavin, Koller, and President Lally voted aye, and it was so ordered.

EDWARD J. LALLY, President.
ORION KOLLER, Commissioner.

Mr. TYDINGS. The nomination was sent to the Senate only a day or so ago, and the situation in Hawaii makes it imperative that the nomination be confirmed, because if anything were to happen to the Governor there would be no acting Governor in the interim before a new Governor could be appointed, since the secretary, who would be the Acting Governor, has died.

JUNE 4, 1936—7 P. M.

Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives:

Deeply moved by death illustrious Speaker, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS. I desire to extend to the House of Representatives the expression of my heartfelt sympathy for irreparable loss sustained.

MIGUEL A. GARCIA MANDEZ,
Speaker of the House.

RECESS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House (at 11 o'clock and 13 minutes a. m.) stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The House was called to order by the Speaker at 11 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Father of us all, give ear to our supplication. Loneliness and silence are broken as our hearts move on through the stillness at the bidding of the voice divine. "O grave, where is thy sting?" Through its gloom and anguish our faith arises. Blessed Lord, we thank Thee for this great soul who has fallen amid his earthly labor and glory. How deep are Thy mysteries and how inscrutable are Thy ways, yet Thy voice is heard. It is heard in solemn warning; it is heard in sweet encouragement to virtue; it is heard in the monitions of conscience and in the aspirations of our better natures. Our beloved Speaker has left us; how blessed his memory. His heights of thought were the hilltops of the common heart; his broad philanthropy reached over all classes with revealing benediction. His loftiness of patriotism fell upon the ears of the reluctant and summoned them to a higher plane. His great nature touched poverty, toil, and wealth. We praise Thee for this statesman whose conscience was ever the pilot of his reason. O divine One of love and mercy, give peace and comfort to his family circle. Bless her who has been at his side with heavenly devotion. Help us all to rise above the gloom of this great shadow into the upper air of spiritual outlook, where there are palaces made without hands and crowns of glory that never fade away. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE SPEAKER JOSEPH W. BYRNS

ORDER OF SERVICE

Prayer, Dr. James Shera Montgomery, Chaplain of the House of Representatives.
Selection, Representative LOUIS C. RABAUT.
Funeral services, the Chaplain of the House of Representatives.
Address, Mr. Speaker BANKHEAD.
Selection, Representative LOUIS C. RABAUT.
Address, Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL.
Benediction, the Chaplain of the Senate, Rev. ZeBarney Thorne Phillips.

At 12:05 p. m. the Vice President and Members of the Senate entered the Chamber and occupied the seats assigned to them, the Vice President occupying a seat at the left of the Speaker.

The Ambassadors, the Ministers, and the Chargé d'Affaires of foreign governments, the Major General Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard, the members of the President's Cabinet, the President of the United States, and the members of the family of the deceased Speaker entered the Chamber and were escorted to the seats assigned to them.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art not only our Father in Heaven but Thou art our Father upon earth. Thou wilt surely hear us when we call and answer us when we pray. Thou hast been our dwelling place in all the generations. Before the mountains were brought forth Thou hast formed the earth and the world, even, yea even, from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God. O look upon us in our sorrow. Pity us, Heavenly Father, in our weakness and our limitations, and shed upon us all the light of Thy Holy countenance and claim us as Thine own. O let the blessings of Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, be upon this stricken family circle. Remember her in rich blessings who has been his support and his encouragement all these years. God bless her with great peace and consolation. Heavenly Father, remind us of the uncertainty of life and the brevity of time and meet us each day by this wisdom and Thy mercy. We praise the memory of him, Heavenly Father. O we have lost such a friend, such a brother, such a Speaker! Gracious God, the armament of his character was courtesy. God bless his memory unto us. Do Thou hear us as we breathe the Savior's prayer.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us, and lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

LOUIS C. RABAUT sang Absent (Metcalf).

Reading of Scripture by the Chaplain.

The Chaplain also read the following verses by CLARE GERALD FENERTY:

O Death, thou wert unkind; Why didst thou dim
Those smiling eyes that saw but to console,
Like windows pouring light from out his soul
Into our sunless hearts? Why didst thou limn
With icy touch those lips that knew to brim
With love made vocal for our land? Now toll
Ye bells!—immortal now upon our roll
He lives; and eyes are wet with thought of him.

Ah, Death, not thine the laurels; he shall rob
Thee of thy verdict, nor canst thou decree
A stillness to that heart that knew not dross,
That sacrificial heart whose every throb
Was but a bead in Honor's Rosary,
Whose mysteries have led him to the Cross.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The heart of every Member of the House of Representatives is sorely torn and bruised this day as we contemplate the scene before us—for there lies the recumbent figure of that great American who only the day before yesterday presided over the popular branch of our Federal Government with such grace, dignity, and ability. The cruel blow of destiny which fell with such merciless devastation upon us leaves us chilled and unreconciled. It is but another illustration of the saying that "those who stand high have many blasts to shake them", for there is no question but that the arduous and exacting duties of the Speaker of the House must have contributed very largely to his untimely end.

And so we come, in this solemn and historic hour, to pay sincere but necessarily limited tribute of praise and affection for our departed friend. I use the word "friend" advisedly, for there were so tempered in the heart and soul of JOE BYRNS elements of tolerance, patience, and sympathy that he had drawn to him the ungrudging regard and affection of all men who came within the radius of his genial influence.

It will not be possible within the limitations of this hour to undertake even a partial summary of the long and distinguished public career of our late beloved Speaker. At a later day those who loved and admired him will have fuller opportunity to lay upon the bier of memory the tender flowers of tribute and devotion which his remarkable personality and career so amply justify. Mr. Speaker BYRNS came of a long line of sturdy, devoted, patriotic American ancestors. He was bred and nourished within the bosom of a great Commonwealth, one which has contributed so plentifully to the roster of distinguished men who have played heroic parts in the development of our Republic and in the perpetuation of our institutions.

I imagine that he found constant and enduring inspiration from that sanctuary in his home district where repose the blessed ashes of one of the most picturesque and distinguished sons of America, the indomitable Andrew Jackson. However some men in these modern times seem to find gratification in undertaking to belittle in the estimation of the people the character and ability of their Representatives in Congress, a thoughtful public must believe that under the spirit of our Democratic institution it is no small tribute of praise to be elected to this body for even one term of service, and when such service is extended year by year and into the decades as was the case of JOSEPH W. BYRNS, it is indisputable evidence that he had by his character and ability gained such a high place in the esteem and affection of his constituency that no thought entered their minds of replacing by another this invaluable public servant.

Mr. BYRNS served in the House of Representatives for 28 years and was at the time of his passing away only exceeded in length of service by one Member of the House. No man from the great State of Tennessee during all of its long history had ever served in the Congress of the United States continuously for as long a consecutive period as had Speaker BYRNS. It is needless for me to remind those who hear me of his ability, of his courage, of the equity of his decisions as a presiding officer, of the unfailing patience and generosity with which he treated every approach of his colleagues in the discharge of his public duties, of the dignity with which he presided over a great parliamentary body. These things were part and parcel of the daily life of our late Speaker. There was no vanity in him. There was no retribution in his spirit. There was no littleness in the man. His portrait will be hung in the lobby of the House of Representatives along with those of other great Americans who have presided throughout the years over the destinies of Federal legislation and his portrait well deserves to be placed alongside of those other great Americans. He earned his distinction. It was not in any wise a gratuity.

One other reference—and I trust that I will not violate the cloistered environments of the grief-stricken room where I heard these words fall from the lips of his lovely and devoted companion, with so many years of married happiness, when in speaking of the spiritual courage of JOE BYRNS, she told me that they had been married for 35 years and that never under any circumstances had her husband failed to kneel at his bedside every night to pay his devotion to his Maker and to invoke upon himself the blessings that always come to a humble and a contrite heart. To such a man the grave cannot be a charnel house. It must be a lighted thoroughfare whereby one may pass into a happier and a better world.

I employ a quotation from the eulogy to Ben Hill delivered in the Senate of the United States.

> Every man's life is the center of a circle. Within its narrow confines he is potential. Beyond it, he perishes. And if immortality be a splendid but delusive dream—if the incompleteness of every human career, even the longest and most fortunate, be not perfected and supplemented after its termination here, then he who dreads to die should fear to live, for life would be a tragedy more desolate and inexplicable than death.

I believe JOE BYRNS has gone that way, head up and unafraid.

LOUIS C. RABAUT sang My God and Father, While I Stray (Marston).

Mr. SNELL. My personal friend and colleague, JOE BYRNS, is gone. He has entered that Great Beyond from which no voyager returns.

That inexorable and inevitable thing we call death beckoned our friend away with terrible swiftness, leaving us stunned and our hearts filled with grief.

His life and character cannot better be described than in his own words spoken of another. Eulogizing the late Martin Madden, Mr. BYRNS said:

> We all know that a leader has fallen, a truly great man has passed away; a great legislator and statesman; a splendid, outstanding citizen; * * * a devoted and tender husband and father; a good and intensely loyal friend.

This, he said, epitomized the life and record of Madden, whose sudden death deeply grieved his colleagues and shocked the entire country.

Is not this eulogy by BYRNS in life peculiarly applicable to BYRNS in death?

He died as he had lived—a real man; loved, honored, and respected by his colleagues, and a distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Our friend "Joe", as we like to think of him, preceded me in the House by three terms. We were contemporaries for 22 years. He apprenticed in lawmaking in the Tennessee Legislature. His experience there as speaker of the house and as a State senator was a firm foundation upon which he reared a notable record of achievement in the larger arena of this House. He went from strength to strength.

Not many days ago, on the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of "Uncle Joe" Cannon, the business of the House was suspended to enable us to pay tribute to his unique life and character as a man and a statesman. And now, today, with heavy hearts, but with unfaltering trust we gather around another "Joe", beloved of all of us, whose mortal, tired body lies in the embrace of death, but the transition of whose soul we behold reborn into a never-ending life.

He and "Uncle Joe" Cannon, who was Speaker when JOE BYRNS first came here, were warm personal friends. "Uncle Joe" was always kind and tolerant toward newcomers. So was JOE BYRNS. This characteristic endeared them to their fellow Members, and many of our colleagues will always remember JOE BYRNS' helping hand, kindly advice, and guidance. Kindliness, I would say, was his outstanding characteristic.

This House, accustomed to appraising men at their true worth, long since came to regard Mr. BYRNS as a potential Speaker. Step by step his conduct in the House and in committee led unerringly to the Speakership. He passed through all the gradations which make for higher honors and greater responsibilities. His successful chairmanship of Appropriations Committee and his deportment on the floor marked him for leadership, and in the fullness of time he became majority floor leader. This service he rendered with marked ability and resourcefulness.

This duty was laid upon him at a crucial period, during the first 2 years of the present administration, when the greater part of the administration's policy and program was enacted into law. And while, as minority leader, I was not in political accord with all that was done, and often took issue with him, it is only fair to say that no more worthy nor more dauntless friend nor foe than JOE BYRNS ever smiled across yonder dividing aisle. No floor leader was ever put to a greater test. No President ever had a more loyal, faithful, and dependable ally. In good report and ill JOE BYRNS stood steadfast, and it was his intense loyalty to the Chief Executive and his adroit and skillful leadership that piloted administrative measures through the shoals and over the rocks of legislative processes.

The Speakership was the next logical and upward step. And if we consider this elevation as a reward for past political and legislative services well and faithfully discharged, the mantle could not have fallen upon more deserving shoulders than those of JOE BYRNS, of Tennessee, and no man in recent years has come to this high office better equipped by ability, character, and rich experience to perform the exacting duties of Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Speaker BYRNS was a prodigious worker. He did not conserve his energies. This was true to such an extent that his closest friends were alarmed lest he overworked. But his sense of duty was such that he persisted in carrying the full load to the journey's end. If he could have been consulted, he would not have said "nay" to the summons. For an indomitable spirit such as his was would have proclaimed "Let me die at the post of duty, let me go in my harness."

And so the busy, useful, earthly career of JOSEPH WELLINGTON BYRNS is ended.

A busy workman has been beckoned away. The door is shut. We realize that our friend "Joe" has gone, leaving us the rich legacy of an exalted example of life's work well done.

BENEDICTION

Rev. ZeBarney Thorne Phillips, D. D., LL. D., Chaplain of the Senate, pronounced the benediction, as follows:

Amen.

Thereupon the President and his Cabinet, the Diplomatic Corps, the General of the Armies, the Chief of Staff of the United States Army, the Chief of Naval Operations of the Navy, the Major General Commandant of the Marine Corps, the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard, the Vice President, and the Senate retired.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whose throne is raised upon the skies, whose footstool is the pave whereon we pray, who dost transcend and yet pervadest all things: Manifest Thyself to us who seek Thee in the shades of ignorance, for seeking Thee and finding Thee are one. Order Thou the ritual of this holy hour, that, rapt into still communion which exceeds the imperfect offices of prayer and praise, we may find in silence the sublimest eloquence of worship as we contemplate Thy blessedness and love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

RUTH J. BARNES—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 266)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I return, without my approval, S. 920, entitled "An act for the relief of Ruth J. Barnes."

This bill provides for the payment to Ruth J. Barnes, wife of Joseph A. Barnes, an amount equal to 6 months' pay at the rate said Joseph A. Barnes was receiving at the date of his death.

Joseph A. Barnes entered upon active duty for 1 year as a second lieutenant, Air Corps Reserve, March 1, 1932, and remained on active duty continuously until his death on October 12, 1932, as a result of an airplane accident on that date while piloting an Army plane. Death was in line of duty and not as a result of the deceased's own misconduct. Had he held a commission in the Regular Army of the United States, his wife would have been entitled under existing law to receive the gratuity in question. However, the Congress, in enacting the law governing the granting of such gratuities, provided in the act of December 17, 1919 (41 Stat., p. 367)—

That nothing in this act shall be construed as making the provisions of this act applicable to officers or enlisted men of any forces or troops of the Army of the United States other than those of the Regular Army, and nothing in this act shall be construed to apply in commissioned grades to any officers except those holding permanent or provisional appointments in the Regular Army.

This law is, and has been since its enactment, applicable in equal measure to all persons coming under its provisions, and, while I have the greatest sympathy for the widow of the young Reserve officer in question who gave his life for his country, I do not feel that it would be just to single her out for preferential treatment not accorded the widows or other dependents of other Reserve officers who have heretofore or may hereafter suffer death while on active duty under their Reserve commissions. In this connection I would suggest the propriety of the Congress giving consideration to the changed conditions affecting the employment of Army Reservists which have intervened since the passage of the above-mentioned act of December 17, 1919, with a view to remedying such inequalities and inequities as may be found to exist between the treatment accorded personnel of the Regular Army and that of the Army Reserves.

While I am withholding my approval of this measure for the reasons above stated, it should be noted that the beneficiary named therein has already been afforded such relief by the Government as existing law permits, namely, the granting to her on June 15, 1933, of a widow's pension at the rate of $22 per month.

ESTATE OF TERESA DE PREVOST—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 265)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I am returning, without my approval, S. 1360, Seventy-fourth Congress, entitled "An act for the relief of the estate of Teresa de Prevost."

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury—

To pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Teresa de Prevost the sum of $25,000, in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for losses sustained by reason of alleged irregularities in the distribution through the State Department to claimants under the so-called "Alsop award of July 4, 1911", made by the King of Great Britain as arbitrator.

The Alsop award provided for the payment of a sum of money by the Government of Chile to the United States for the benefit of certain citizens thereof, in liquidation of Chile's indebtedness to Alsop & Co., a group of American citizens organized as a partnership for the purpose of doing business in Valparaiso, Chile, and Lima, Peru, and distribution of the award was made by the Secretary of State under authority of the act of February 27, 1896 (29 Stat. 32), which provides that all moneys received by the Secretary of State from foreign governments and other sources in trust for citizens of the United States shall be deposited into the Treasury, and that the Secretary of State shall determine the amounts due claimants and certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment.

Among the claims was one presented by Teresa de Prevost, heir of Stanhope Prevost, for payment from the share of the estate of George G. Hobson, in the Alsop award, of $25,000, with accrued interest, on account of a loan alleged to have been made in 1867 by Prevost to Hobson, both of whom were partners in Alsop & Co., and beneficiaries under the award.

In the distribution of the award the Secretary of State followed an opinion of the Solicitor for the Department of State, in which it was held that the interests in the fund could be readily classified into two groups, as follows:

(1) Those having initial or primary rights, that is, those who have rights by reason of having suffered the injury at the hands of the foreign government, who will, under normal conditions, be those for whom this Government intervenes; and

(2) Those who have secondary or derivative rights, that is, rights arising either by operation of law or out of transactions between themselves and the persons having the primordial rights. These will be such rights, for example, as result from inheritance, assignments, bargain and sale, etc.

The Prevost claim fell within the latter classification, and although the Secretary of State authorized the payment of certain derivative claims which were not contested by the parties from whom they were derived, as a matter of grace and convenience to the parties, he refused to pass on the claim of Mrs. Prevost and other similar claims of a derivative nature because these claims were contested by the parties from whom they were alleged to be derived.

However, the justness of the present claim is based upon alleged irregularities on the part of officials of the Department of State, who were concerned in the distribution of the trust fund, but such irregularity has not been shown. There would seem, therefore, to be no justification for my approval of this bill.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. VAN NUYS submitted the following report, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8442) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 13), and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That section 2 of the Act entitled 'An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes', approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 13), is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 2. (a) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale, within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered: Provided, however, That the Federal Trade Commission may, after due investigation and hearing to all interested parties, fix and establish quantity limits, and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce; and the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona-fide transactions and not in restraint of trade: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent price changes from time to time where in response to changing conditions affecting the market for or the marketability of the goods concerned, such as but not limited to actual or imminent deterioration of perishable goods, obsolescence of seasonal goods, distress sales under court process, or sales in good faith in discontinuance of business in the goods concerned.

"'(b) Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price or services or facilities furnished, the burden of rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing justification shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and unless justification shall be affirmatively shown, the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor.

"'(c) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid.

"'(d) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold, or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionately equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities.

"'(e) That it shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale, with or without processing, by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms.

"'(f) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, knowingly to induce or receive a discrimination in price which is prohibited by this section.'

"SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall affect rights of action arising, or litigation pending, or orders of the Federal Trade Commission issued and in effect or pending on review, based on section 2 of said Act of October 15, 1914, prior to the effective date of this amendatory Act: Provided, That where, prior to the effective date of this amendatory Act, the Federal Trade Commission has issued an order requiring any person to cease and desist from a violation of section 2 of said Act of October 15, 1914, and such order is pending on review or is in effect, either as issued or as affirmed or modified by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the Commission shall have reason to believe that such person has committed, used or carried on, since the effective date of this amendatory Act, or is committing, using or carrying on, any act, practice or method in violation of any of the provisions of said section 2 as amended by this Act, it may reopen such original proceeding and may issue and serve upon such person its complaint, supplementary to the original complaint, stating its charges in that respect. Thereupon the same proceedings shall be had upon such supplementary complaint as provided in section 11 of said Act of October 15, 1914. If upon such hearing the Commission shall be of the opinion that any act, practice, or method charged in said supplementary complaint has been committed, used, or carried on since the effective date of this amendatory Act, or is being committeed, used or carried on, in violation of said section 2 as amended by this Act, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and serve upon such person its order modifying or amending its original order to include any additional violations of law so found. Thereafter the provisions of section 11 of said Act of October 15, 1914, as to review and enforcement of orders of the Commission shall in all things apply to such modified or amended order. If upon review as provided in said section 11 the court shall set aside such modified or amended order, the original order shall not be affected thereby, but it shall be and remain in force and effect as fully and to the same extent as if such supplementary proceedings had not been taken.

"SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to be a party to, or assist in, any transaction of sale, or contract to sell, which discriminates to his knowledge against competitors of the purchaser, in that, any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, or advertising service charge available at the time of such transaction to said competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like grade, quality, and quantity; to sell, or contract to sell, goods in any part of the United States at prices lower than those exacted by said person elsewhere in the United States for the purpose of destroying competition, or eliminating a competitor in such part of the United States; or, to sell, or contract to sell, goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"SEC. 4. Nothing in this act shall prevent a cooperative association from returning to its members, producers, or consumers the whole, or any part of, the net earnings or surplus resulting from its trading operations, in proportion to their purchases or sales from, to, or through the association."

And the Senate agree to the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that the Speaker had appointed Mr. MCSWAIN and Mr. PLUMLEY additional managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11140) to provide more effectively for the national defense by further increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on a former date I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 279 in the hope, by the passage of the joint resolution, to bring about an adjustment of the differences between the conferees on the part of the House and the part of the Senate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. At the time of the introduction of the joint resolution, when request was made for its consideration, objection was made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. I am going at this time to renew the request for the consideration of the joint resolution, and I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 279) establishing a commission to make a study and report with respect to the fair and equitable amount to be paid by the United States toward the expense of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Whereas (a) the 1937 District of Columbia appropriation bill is now in conference; (b) the Budget estimate for the Federal contribution toward the support of the District of Columbia is $5,700,000; (c) the House of Representatives reduced said Budget estimate to $2,700,000; (d) the Senate approved said Budget estimate in the sum of $5,700,000; (e) the two Houses are in disagreement over the amount of such Federal contribution: Therefore, in order to adjust the difference between the House and Senate on said item, be it

Resolved, etc., That the conferees of the respective Houses are hereby authorized and directed to agree to the Budget estimate in the sum of $5,700,000 as the Federal Government's contribution to the support of the District of Columbia for the 1937 fiscal year; and be it further

Resolved, That there is hereby established a commission, to be known as the Commission on Federal Expenditures for the District of Columbia (hereinafter referred to as the Commission), to be composed of three members to be appointed as follows: One member, the chairman, to be appointed by the President; one member to be appointed by the President of the Senate; and one member to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. No person shall be eligible for appointment as a member of the Commission who is a resident of the District of Columbia or who is, directly or indirectly, the owner of or interested in any real or other property in the District of Columbia. The members of the Commission shall be paid such compensation for their services as shall be fixed by the President and shall receive their necessary traveling and subsistence expenses while engaged in the work of the Commission.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Commission to study and report to the President not later than January 1, 1937, the fair and equitable amount to be paid by the United States as a contribution toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and the Commission shall include in such report its recommendations with respect to a fair and equitable formula for the annual computation of the amount of such contribution for succeeding fiscal years. The Commission is authorized to make such surveys and conduct such investigations as it may deem necessary and advisable for carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

SEC. 3. The Commission is authorized, without regard to the civil-service laws, to employ, and, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of such employees and assistants, and to make such expenditures as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this resolution. The Commission is further authorized to request information from any officer, department, or agency of the United States or the District of Columbia to aid it in carrying out such purposes, and all such officers, departments, and agencies are hereby authorized and directed to supply such information upon request.

SEC. 4. For carrying out the purposes of this resolution there shall be made available immediately out of the amount of the contribution by the Federal Government toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, the sum of $50,000.

SEC. 5. The Budget for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, may be submitted to the Congress without any provision therein as to the amount of the Federal contribution toward the expenses of such District for that fiscal year, but the President, upon receipt of the final report of the Commission, shall transmit the same to the Congress, together with his recommendation as to the amount of such Federal contribution, if any, for that fiscal year.

The preamble was agreed to.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, 10 weeks ago I introduced a resolution—Senate Resolution 243—asking for an impartial investigation of the Works Progress Administration. The resolution was referred to the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. That committee was enlarged by the addition of two very prominent Democratic Members of the Senate, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and it was agreed to ask for an investigation of the F. E. R. A. as well as the W. P. A. The resolution was then referred to the Senate Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. This committee held the authority to report the resolution to the Senate for favorable action but delayed action for many weeks. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has now voted to postpone action indefinitely, thereby preventing the consideration of the resolution on the floor of the Senate. I understand that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] voted against this resolution and that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] voted for it. This partisan action coming at this late date will precipitate the work-relief issue into the campaign as a question of first magnitude. Even though the investigation would have cost $100,000 or more, it would have been worth while to determine constructive and permanent policies of relief, so as to avoid further waste of public funds. Certainly the refusal of the Senate Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report this resolution could not have been determined by a desire to save taxpayers' money; the only other explanation is partisan politics.

Despite numerous requests—private and public—for the names, addresses, and salaries of W. P. A. workers in administrative posts drawing $90 a month or more on pay rolls in Pennsylvania, the information necessary for a public understanding of public business has been withheld.

The integrity, competence, and program of the administrative officials of the W. P. A. in Pennsylvania have been severely criticized. An opportunity now exists for those in question to explain their point of view. I should be most reluctant to close this session without assuring them a hearing for any statement which they may wish to make bearing on this issue so important to public welfare.

Mr. President, I have repeatedly warned against the danger of permitting partisan politics to invade the field of relief. Those who have these matters in charge have agreed that such practices are a violation of the purposes for which relief and work-relief appropriations have been made. Nevertheless, these conditions grow steadily worse and now those to whom the public business of social welfare has been entrusted close the doors of investigation by postponing action on an issue of supreme importance to the American people and in effect say, "the public be damned." The arrogant, high-handed way in which this problem has been arbitrarily settled by a few men will not be forgotten.

Mr. President, the refusal of the Senate to take action on this issue before the adjournment of Congress will project the issue of relief for partisan politics or relief for human welfare as the most hotly contested question of the election campaign. An opportunity has existed for the last 10 weeks for constructive investigation and impartial report to be made upon these matters. Now, by its action to postpone consideration of this matter, the Committee to Audit and Control has placed the Senate majority in a position where many will justly say that the Government has found billions for New Deal activities but not one penny for a study of constructive policies and a long-range program of work relief. If this be the desire of the administration, I am willing to leave the answer with American taxpayers, no matter how deeply I deplore the unleashing of bitter spirit, uninformed by an impartial report, which will now be increasingly in evidence as we move into an election campaign.

Unemployment and work relief are the most important problems before the Nation today. In many ways the problems are now more difficult than in 1932, because we have just as many unemployed now as then and the resources of the Government with which to meet the problem are now limited by the pressure of the unprecedented national debt.

Mr. President, again I wish to state that in the closing days of this session an opportunity now exists for those in Pennsylvania whose administration of the W. P. A. has been called in question to explain the position which they have taken. If they present no evidence to the contrary, it will be assumed by many that they have no defense to offer against the charges of maladministration made against them.

I ask for a favorable consideration of this resolution by the Senate at this time, as this is public business which should be available to reputable newspapers and prominent citizens who have asked for a report upon it.

Is there any just reason why this information should be withheld from the public?

Is this not public business which should be open to the scrutiny of the taxpayers who vote to make it possible?

Is there anything about the operation of W. P. A., aside from the usual run of administrative errors common to all large-scale enterprises, which must be kept secret?

Has the time come when taxpayers no longer have a right to ask for an accounting of public business?

Mr. President, a refusal to entertain this resolution will not be understood by the American public and will call for a sharp criticism of all who seek to oppose it.

I wish at this time to read the resolution, being Senate Resolution 314, submitted by me on the calendar day of June 2, as follows:

Whereas serious charges have been made by Members of this body and by newspapers reflecting upon the administration and operation of the Works Progress Administration in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas all official information on this subject has been denied to the General Assembly of Pennsylvania: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Director of the Works Progress Administration transmit to the Secretary of the Senate within 15 days after the adoption of this resolution all records relating to the personnel of the Works Progress Administration in Pennsylvania, together with all disbursements on Works Progress projects in Pennsylvania, including the names and addresses, amounts of compensation, and personnel employed by the Works Progress Administration in Pennsylvania, and the names and addresses of all persons receiving employment under the Works Progress Administration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

AMERICA MUST CHOOSE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WHEELER

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a radio address entitled "America Must Choose", delivered Friday night, June 5, 1936, by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

On the eve of the two national conventions which are going to formulate the policies of the Government for the next 4 years, I want to discuss a problem which this country must face with a clear understanding and without partisan prejudice. One cannot look around and observe what is happening in all of the important nations of the world, with uprising of labor in many countries and with dictatorships the vogue, without wondering at times where we ourselves are headed. One of our difficulties is that our complacency keeps us feeling that this country is so powerful and so richly endowed, and has such a strong heritage of freedom, that we need not give serious thought to what may seem abstract economic trends; we have felt that our American infallibility will take care of us.

Our American society has been based on competition, but the plain truth about it is that lately we have been rendering lip service to the competitive system, and in fact have been getting farther away from it all the time. Whether or not we are going to have the competitive system, or are going to have price fixing not only by industry but by agriculture and labor and every other section of trade and industry, is something the American people must choose while the choice is still left open to them. At the outset it must be stated that with the present personnel of the Supreme Court we must have a constitutional ammendment before we can do anything toward fixing prices for either agriculture or labor.

Any business history of the United States would have to be devoted largely to the constantly recurring attempts on the part of businessmen to stifle competition not only by merging into such huge companies as Standard Oil and United States Steel but by using certain formulas for fixing prices. From 1890 to 1914 many attempts were made by the people, through the Government, to curb the depredations of the trusts. It was in this period that the so-called antitrust laws were enacted. That these laws did not accomplish their object can be laid to the fact that the Supreme Court, through a process which they termed "judicial interpretation" decided that Congress did not really mean what plainly appeared on the face of the laws. When the Government tried to break up the great Standard Oil Trusts the Supreme Court conceded that the trusts amounted to a restraint on trade, which restraints were made unlawful by the antitrust laws, and went on to say that Standard Oil put a reasonable restraint on trade and that surely Congress didn't mean to make reasonable monopolies unlawful.

Since the trust-busting days the problem has not abated but, on the contrary, has become more acute. Industry after industry has been falling under the domination of a single company or a small group of companies whose economic power is sufficient to eliminate price competition. To illustrate: The law requires the Secretary of the Interior to advertise for competitive bids when articles are purchased for the use of the Government in both the regular and emergency work under his direction. When the bids are submitted from various companies all over the country he is required to accept those which are lowest. During one 9-month period the Secretary received 257 different bids from 48 industries where the price submitted on each article was exactly the same from every company bidding. In other words, 48 of the industries submitting bids have some sort of agreement among themselves whereby they fix the price for their product, making it the same for all producers, regardless of cost of production and regardless of transportation costs to the place of delivery.

One instance will serve to illustrate how the Government was gouged by the Cement Trust. The Secretary of the Interior advertised for competitive bids on a project in Colorado for 365,000 barrels of cement. Four cement companies at varying distances from the site of the project in Colorado submitted prices that were identical to the fourth decimal point, even though one plant was much closer than the others. After paying freight rates on this cement the company farthest away would have received $165,000 less net to itself than the company closest to the project. In a hearing before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee the president of one of the cement companies admitted that the company closest to the project could have made money if it had bid at a price which would have netted itself the same as the farthest mill, or $165,000 less. The Government had no choice between the companies, because the delivered price was the same for all of them.

The company closest to the project was given the contract and received in excess profits $165,000 of the money that we in Congress thought we were appropriating to take care of the unemployed. From 1933 to 1935, 76,000,000 barrels of cement were used on projects financed either wholly or partly from the public-works fund. These purchases were made in order to place at work thousands of the unemployed. I have not had an opportunity to examine the other contracts for cement; but, if this present contract for 365,000 barrels is any criterion of the way the Government has been gouged, the cement industry has penalized the taxpayers of this country an unbelievable sum in excess profits.

The unfortunate result of any system of price fixing is that the price fixed attempts to guarantee to everyone in the industry a return for his product which will enable him to make a profit. If the producer with high costs can make a profit, the necessary result is that the producer with the low cost is making profit out of reason and the public is paying a price that is too high. This system of price fixing inevitably leads to inefficiency in the industries which practice it.

But the fact that price-fixing industries may force the public to pay more for their products is not the most serious problem. In 1929 prices were high and were rapidly going higher. When the crash came, prices in the highly competitive fields came down. The farmer's prices hit a low point that did not permit returning his costs of production. Labor had to take a very general slashing in wages. In fact, all prices which were tied up to supply and demand were reduced to meet reduced purchasing power. This was not true in the price-fixing industries.

But those industries which were able to agree on prices did not reduce those prices to any extent. In steel, cement, and most forms of building materials prices remained on their same high level. Obviously such a policy deprives the public of the opportunity to buy these goods. One result was that building almost ceased during the depression. Contractors, architects, dealers, carpenters, bricklayers, plumbers, and laborers engaged in the building trades were thrown out of work because the public could not afford to pay for the materials and construction. In the cement industry, one of the most notorious offenders, where prices have been kept up unreasonably, sales to industrial users dropped off to such an extent that for a time over half of all the cement produced was being used by agencies of Government. And, although men were working at subsistence wages on these relief projects with money furnished by the taxpayers to relieve unemployment, the cement industry was able to exact every penny of the exorbitant price from the Government.

The theory of a competitive society embraces the proposition that when purchasing power in the hands of the consumer drops off prices must be reduced to a point where people will again be able to buy. It is based on the knowledge that in most commodities lowered prices will stimulate volume of sales. Intelligent selfishness should have pointed this out to the industrial leaders of this Nation. At the present time both the steel and cement industries are not in the best of health, and it can be attributed to a great extent to the fact that they did not reduce prices during the depression. In England prices for building materials have been substantially reduced and this reduction has been followed by a building boom that has aided that country to lift itself out of the depression. In the United States the automobile industry is probably the most notable for its achievements in reemployment and increased volume of sales and this has been the result of reduced prices. Certainly I agree that it is asking a lot of any businessman to reduce his price to a point where he may at first suffer a loss, but many examples can be shown where just that policy is good business. At any rate it is the backbone of a competitive system and must be carried out if capitalism is to survive.

If the price-fixing privilege is to be continued as the policy of the industrialists of this Nation and with no responsibility to the public, sooner or later the people will demand that business be completely policed by the Government. The profit motive cannot be trusted to make private individuals exercise such life-and-death power in the public interest. Also, we cannot allow price fixing in industry without agriculture being placed in the same position. It is unjust, for instance, to keep the farmer on a basis where he must sell for whatever he can get in the market, and to allow the farm-machinery manufacturer to sell him plows and harvesters at a fixed and almost unvarying price. Price fixing must, if continued, permeate the entire body of manufacturing and trade. If the farmers cannot get together and fix their own prices, the Government will have to act as the intermediary for them. If the Supreme Court denies the power of the Government to accomplish this, either the powers of the Court must be curbed or the Constitution changed. Certainly we should never have been so slow in recovering from this depression had all prices been flexible enough to reach the level of demand. If even a very small corner is held high enough, the whole balance upon which the smooth functioning of the system depends is lost, and that balance will remain lost until prices and demand meet.

Consider the implications of ultimate price fixing for trade and industry by either the Government or private groups. It radically changes our form of government.

The Government would be forced into a system of regimentation of industry that would not only be onerous to the people but that might very well be inefficient. Certainly the greatest totalitarian, bureaucratic state the world has ever seen would be the result. Price fixing by private groups will inevitably lead to price fixing by Government. It will be a fascist state in every sense of the word.

I will admit that the competitive system is not gentle and that as we progress under it, as new machinery is invented, as new forms of transportation develop, those plants which formerly made a profit may no longer be able to exist. This is progress—this is change. It is upon this inevitable weeding out that our progress has been built. When the weeding out comes some men will suffer a loss, but no group or individual is responsible for causing this loss; it is caused by progress and the system itself. Improvements come, and the system makes the changes. But through price fixing many industries try to halt this progress by keeping their prices up so high that obsolete and ordinarily unprofitable factories can make a profit. The benefits of new inventions and of labor-saving devices are not passed on to the public in the form of lower prices but are drained off of the new plants in order to pay for overcapitalization and inflation of real values. This is true in the steel industry, in the cement industry, and in many others. It is one of the primary reasons for our present unemployment. Naturally, when a new machine is developed it throws thousands of men out of work. Unless the benefits and savings of the new process are given to the public there is no chance to reemploy the thousands of men whose purchasing power is suddenly cut off. This is the way the competitive system lops off the dead branches from our industrial tree. It would be utterly impossible to give the power to lop these dead branches off to any Government agency, because they would not have the courage nor the wisdom to carry it out. It is doubtful that under the Constitution we could give them this power.

As an illustration, the Interstate Commerce Commission may order a rate to go into effect. One or two roads, being more efficient or better located, can make a profit at the new low rate. The Supreme Court places an interpretation on the Constitution to the effect that if the low rate might be unprofitable to inefficient railroads, then as to the latter the order can be declared illegal as taking property without due process of law. Certainly the Interstate Commerce Commission is as good a regulatory body as the Government has ever set up, and yet if they are compelled to fix rates so high that poorly located, inefficient railroads can make a profit, they are not rendering a very valuable service to the public. Busses and trucks have done more to bring about efficiency and lower rates in railroads than all the years of regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is a clear illustration of the fact that competition is able to accomplish for the public what a Government agency is powerless to do.

If you have followed me with your approval thus far, you must have reached the conclusion that the continuation of our present form of government necessarily calls for a return to price competition as our fundamental economic basis. You will ask, "What should be done about it?"

Within a few days the two national conventions will meet. In one of these conventions will sit the representatives of all the powerful corporations which have been the worst offenders in the matter of price fixing. These men, and I say it without fear of contradiction, have been doing more to change the American form of government than all the soap-box orators and parlor pinks in the country. According to the daily press, I understand that the Republican Party, sponsored by these men, is about to adopt a "vigorous antitrust plank." I suppose that this plank will call for the same sort of enforcement of the antitrust laws which we witnessed during the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover era. But do not be misled by their lip service to competition.

This is not a political speech, but I should like to suggest here a plank for the platform of either party. If it does not become a burning issue in the present campaign, I venture the prediction that in some succeeding campaign the American people will realize that it has already been settled irrevocably without their having the right to consider the real facts.

The suggested plank reads as follows: We believe that there is inherent in all price fixing an economic fallacy. Prices, if fixed, are placed at levels so as to protect producers generally, irrespective of their efficiency. They are fixed at levels higher than would result from the free play of competitive forces under the law of supply and demand.

In our judgment, therefore, price fixing cannot succeed because it creates and fosters the very things which tend toward depression and economic catastrophe.

It tends to destroy the ability of the masses to purchase goods, consume them, and return again to the market for more. It tends constantly to increase the lack of balance between producing power on the one hand and consuming and purchasing power on the other. It is this lack of balance which brought about the depression and which will bring about at an early date a greater catastrophe involving our fundamental conceptions of government if a remedy is not now supplied.

That remedy, we believe, is a return to price competition and a strict enforcement and strengthening of the antitrust laws. Price fixing in this country being largely accomplished at the present time through basing-point systems, we recommend the enactment of a statute which shall outlaw basing-point systems, together with such other amendments of the antitrust laws as shall safeguard competition and prevent price fixing and monopolies.

I should like to close with this thought: Some tell me that the idea of having competition in industry is archaic. Some tell me that we have tried it and found it wanting. The truth is that competition has been nonexistent in many industries because of a lack of courage on the part of those in charge of enforcing the antitrust laws, and because the Supreme Court has emasculated them.

If price fixing is necessary to our economic life, then we should face the facts and know what we are getting into. I am not ready to believe that the American people are willing to abandon their fundamental business privileges so easily. I am not ready to believe that the American people are yet willing to so radically change their form of government. Certainly I will never believe that the people should have their form of government changed in this way without being fully aware of the processes which are bringing about the change.

Thank you.

THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY OF 1936—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BENSON

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Friday, March 20, 1936, by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I shall not attempt tonight to tell you what the Farmer-Labor Party will do in 1936. The party will determine that for itself because it is a movement of the people, and its course of action will be determined not by its officials but by the people who have elected those officials.

For 4 days you have listened with intense interest to your radio, bringing to your homes the news of the ravages of floodwaters that have descended on the Nation's capital.

Has it occurred to you of the West and the South that these waters are what you prayed for a year or two ago when your fields lay parched and yellow under a burning sun? If the floods of today were harnessed, they would have brought fertility and production, and their energy would have lighted the Nation's capital for many months. But they were not harnessed, not distributed, so they brought desolation and disaster.

That, my friends, is what is the matter with America. That is what is wrong with our American abundance. It is unharnessed, improperly distributed. Instead of being spread throughout the length and breadth of the land, bringing happiness to all, it is being concentrated in the hands of a few, causing want and suffering to many, instead of turning the wheels of industry. Wealth is restricting production so that vast undistributed surpluses may be built up in an economy of scarcity, in the name of profits.

The primary purpose of industry is to produce for the needs of the people, not for the profit of a few. Profits should be secondary. Human needs should be first. That, in brief, is what the Farmer-Labor Party stands for.

How was this great Nation built and its abundance made possible? It was accomplished through the labor of the masses, developing and utilizing the land and water resources with which the entire people, not just a few, were endowed.

Misrepresentations have been made deliberately to frighten you, to make you feel that some sinister force of a foreign people threatens control of your Government and your country. There is no such threat in the Farmer-Labor Party.

I want to tell you something about that party. In the first place, let me say that this movement will interest you, whoever you may be, if you are a man or woman who works for a living. It is your movement—your party.

The Farmer-Labor movement is not a dream child, born of the depression. This movement was conceived many years before the depression, and in Minnesota it had won success on the soundness of its principles before the dark days of this inexcusable depression.

In behalf of the Farmer-Labor Party in 1936, I want to address myself to you who sit by your firesides on the farm, and I wish I could speak also to your neighbors whose radios are dead tonight because they cannot afford to buy tubes or batteries. I want to address the toilers in shop and factory and mill and mine, or that large army of unemployed and relief workers. I want to talk to the white-collar man and woman and to the courageous salesman, whether behind the counter or on the road, who sees before him the world's greatest market among a people who need but have no money to buy. These are the people who made America a great nation.

Already I hear cries of a reactionary press, screaming that I am appealing to class. I am appealing only to one class, and that is the great class of all Americans who are interested in the future of this Nation and want to see its people prosperous and happy.

If there is anything wrong with your Government, it is wrong because you let it go wrong. You have in your own hands the power to correct it. The founders of this Nation saw to that when they gave you the ballot. You need no revolution in this country to reclaim your Government to yourselves. You need no revolution except in your own mind and in your own thought. May I say, a new Declaration of Independence in your own hearts. The Farmer-Labor Party does not believe in class hatred. It does not believe in gross and inexcusable barriers set up between desolate poverty and unconscionable opulence.

Who has made this Nation a nation of classes, that certain interests are so fearful may be aroused? Did any of you who are struggling to pay off a mortgage on farm or home, or any of you who have tramped streets looking for a job? Did any of you divide this Nation into the classes of privilege and poverty?

For generations the selfish few have kept the American farmer and the city worker apart that they might exploit both. Subtle propaganda was preached to them. The farmer was told that the city worker was his enemy because he wanted low prices and high wages. The city worker was told the farmer was his foe because he wanted low wages and high prices. The city workers and farmers now know, and that propaganda falls on deaf ears in Farmer-Labor Minnesota.

Every one of you is earnestly seeking a solution of the depression, but what you really want is a way out of a social and economic system that has permitted this depression to occur and to continue into its seventh year. A system so futile that tens of millions live in hunger and want in the midst of overabundance, a system so silly that its only excuse for hunger is that there is too much food; its only excuse for exposure, that there is too much coal and wool and cotton; its only excuse for industrial paralysis, that there are too many men unemployed.

Millions of men and women, young and old, are awakening to the fallacies of our present system. Millions of them are seeking a remedy. If you question my estimate, let me remind you of the millions who followed the share-the-wealth program of the late Senator Long. Let me cite the other millions who are members of Father Coughlin's Union for Social Justice. Let me call your attention to the millions who have turned with fading hopes to the promises of the Townsend plan, and particularly to that movement for a national third party, the American Commonwealth Federation.

To the leaders of these movements I pay my sincere respects, for they have plowed the ground for an American movement in which we may look to a fair share in the happiness that the founding fathers proclaimed for the people.

Yet each of these groups has been built about one thought, or one slogan. Neither of them have proposed a real program. I said these leaders and their honest and sincere followers have plowed the ground of American political thought. Permit me to say that the Farmer-Labor Party awaits only the opportunity to sow that ground with the seeds of a true democracy and reap the harvest of happiness for the people of this Republic.

And here let me warn young men and women that down through the ages it has been the young who have blazed the trail for better things for humanity. You young people in high schools and colleges, or who would like to be in high schools or colleges, you who have tramped the streets looking for jobs, let me direct you for a moment to the aged who have risen in a militant demand for social security. Look upon and admire the courage of the old people of this country in breaking away from false precepts and insincere political promises. Then let me ask you this question: Will the hand of American youth falter in this American crisis until old age must seize the torch and lead the way to social and economic progress and happiness?

The Farmer-Labor movement offers to you a path of action and a program. It was the farmers of Minnesota who were first to organize politically, forming their ranks back of that sterling leader, Charles A. Lindbergh, Minnesota Congressman and father of the famous flying colonel.

Alarmed, the reactionary forces, with the aid of a powerful press, unloosed a flood of red propaganda. But the people were not to be fooled. They saw behind the scene the common foe of the farmer and the worker, the foe who had looted the State of its resources, oppressed its people, and plundered its treasury.

The Minnesota labor movement met the farmers halfway and the two joined hands for a common cause. Now, the Farmer-Labor Party has in office a Governor, a Lieutenant Governor, an attorney general, two members of the railroad and warehouse commission, the clerk of the supreme court, three Congressmen, and two United States Senators. It controls most of the State's administrative offices, but has never gained control of the State legislature.

The Farmer-Labor Party, therefore, is clearly the dominant party of Minnesota, but it is not a reformist party. It holds that the evils of the present economic order, the present economy of scarcity, cannot be remedied by reforms which fail to strike at fundamental defects. It holds that the present capitalistic system has run its course and must be replaced by one which gives the tillers of our soil and the workers in our cities, those who produce, whether by brain or brawn, economic security and a just share in the wealth they produce; proposes a cooperative society, as opposed to a society in which the strong combine to oppress the weak, in which the greedy, the unscrupulous, seize for themselves the great share of all benefits and leave the masses to economic oppression.

We hear the paid agents of the vested interests shout "radicalism" in the face of every liberal movement—in the face of every mass action of the American people to regain the share of freedom and happiness and equality of opportunity which their own Constitution guaranteed them.

We hear the defenders of the capitalistic order assail as impractical any proposed changes. Yet the present system has proved itself to be both impractical and unworkable, as well as vicious and unjust. How can any thoughtful person say that a system is practical which throws 12,000,000 workers on the bread line, permits a large part of the population to live on a bare subsistence standard at a time when wealth production is or can be brought to its highest peak? How can any person excuse a depression caused by an overproduction of wealth?

And how about the youth of this Nation graduating from high schools and colleges, with no place to go? No haven in the economic scheme of things. How about those other millions of young men and women who, at the rate of more than 2,000,000 a year, are attaining the employable age with no jobs?

There may be an excuse for the survival of a system that cannot utilize its aged, but the word "finis" must be applied to a social order which shuts the door of opportunity in the face of its youth.

I am frankly puzzled how any person can defend the economic maladjustment we see all about us, but Mr. Herbert Hoover did in Colorado a few days ago, assure American youth that they have as great a field of opportunity before them as ever before because "the people who run the machines are going to die."

But let me tell you these young men and women know the troubles that lie ahead of them. They know their plight under the present order. They are learning that it all adds up to the silly answer that millions in America are denied the right to work for a decent living, because, in America, there is too much of everything they want. These young people will not long be frightened by cries of radicalism. Millions of Americans have been in the dark so long they are no longer afraid of jack-o'-lanterns.

They demand a program, and what are industrial leaders, and political leaders of this Nation doing about it? They are shouting against taxes to feed the needy, screaming communism at every effort to cure our economic disease, and whining like spoiled children because the President has threatened to take away just a part of their six billions in idle, undistributed surpluses.

The opportunity for an independent career in business is becoming less and less, due to combination of capital.

The small independent businessman cannot survive under this system. His days are numbered. The independent merchants, the farmers, the professional men, and the home owners are being liquidated out of this capitalistic system. Their hope lies in the Farmer-Labor movement.

We have been pouring billions of dollars into relief, and still the living standard of our people is going progressively downward. The Farmer-Labor Party believes that it is the duty of government to see that no man, woman, or child go hungry or poorly clothed, but this movement also contends that the right to a full measure of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness have been superseded by property rights and the mad scramble for profits.

We contend that this is as un-American as was the institution of slavery. We believe in trade unionism and are convinced that American labor can never attain a square deal unless union organizations are recognized by law, the right of collective bargaining strictly upheld. We believe taxation should be based on the ability to pay. We urge higher inheritance, estate, and income taxes, capital taxes, and the abolition of tax-exempt securities. We are opposed to all forms of sales taxes that make the poor bear the burden of government for the rich.

We oppose monopolies of public services. These services have become so vital a part of our lives that they should be classed with water supply, roads, and schools, and be publicly owned and operated for the benefit of all.

Old-age pension, unemployment insurance, sickness insurance, and all such social measures have long been a part of the Farmer-Labor platform. We pioneered for this legislation. The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota has declared itself for public ownership and operation of key industries, and development of cooperative enterprises. In short, the entire system of production should be based on social needs, rather than on the single factor of yielding the greatest profit.

The Farmer-Labor Party believes in drastic means to preserve peace and neutrality. It believes in universal conscription of wealth and industry as well as manpower in the event of war. It believes in taking all profit out of war and war materials, whether in time of war or peace. It believes in an absolute ban on war loans, public and private. Loans and investments in foreign lands, we have been shown only too clearly, provided the motive for our entrance into the last war.

Senator NYE's investigation shows that a vast propaganda machine swayed the people of this Nation into a national hysteria for war. To preserve neutrality we must assure ourselves that no such propaganda machine will ever operate again.

The Farmer-Labor Party does not want to sabotage one constructive, progressive, or liberal thing that has been done by the present national administration, but it believes that efforts to patch up a crumbling system of capitalism are futile.

It believes that no permanent solution to the crisis in this country can be reached by any old political party, a large faction of which walks with the leadership of millionaires and munition makers.

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota does not want to lose the recognition by Government of its responsibility for feeding and clothing and housing the Nation's needy. It does not want to go back to the principles and policies of Herbert Hoover, to the cruel pronouncement that relief is a problem for local charities. We know that in this country there is plenty for all.

In closing I should like to quote from a recent address of Minnesota's great Governor, Floyd B. Olson, who said, "We are Americans, whose faith and political philosophy sprung from the American soil and American experience.

"We enter the American scene to take the place of a system already dead. We offer to the American public an American solution of their ills. We are the true Americans.

"These are the alternatives. We offer you the choice. On one hand is uncontrolled capitalism with its attendant misery and selfishness, its Babylonian palaces in Newport and its bread lines in every city, its bank bulging with money, and thousands of small businessmen going bankrupt, its farmers poor because they are producing food which the hungry city laborer cannot afford to buy. On the other hand, we have a new system, predominantly cooperative, and completely Christian and American."

WHAT DO WE MEAN BY DEFENSE?—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BENSON

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address entitled "What Do We Mean by Defense?" delivered under the auspices of the National Council for Prevention of War, May 21, 1936, by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, war clouds again hang darkly over Europe and Asia. Every radio news broadcast and every daily newspaper brings news of war. Our Western Hemisphere alone is enjoying peace.

I am not so vain as to believe that anything I may be able to do or say can stop what looms ahead as another possible world war.

But I do believe that it is my duty to do everything that lies within my power to prevent the 127,000,000 civilized men, women, and children of the United States from getting into that war when and if it comes. Trusting in the intelligence and growing enlightenment of our people, I do not feel that such an effort can be entirely futile.

I realize the futility of raising one human voice against the madness of war-mad nations, but I do not believe it futile to strive to prove that the greatest contribution we can make to world peace in the next few years will be to set an example for peace by staying out of war.

I believe that all of the efforts toward internationalism, toward world cooperation—forward movements that sprung, in 1919, from the disillusioned minds of blood-drenched people—are now in extreme danger of receiving a set-back that will turn international progress backward 17 years.

As we near the end of the Seventy-fourth Congress our national neutrality still hangs by inadequate, temporary, and makeshift legislation that I am fearful will not stand the strain that is likely to be put upon it.

Tens of millions of mothers throughout this Nation read their newspapers in daily terror of another war. Millions of our young men have reached that perilous maturity that the last world slaughter made known as "the draft age." They stand in wavering and anxious tensity before the bristling display of world armament.

The college boys and girls of the country have contributed their bit. They have brought down on their enlightened heads the bitterness and villification of both the patrioteers and the war lords, but they have torn the mask of glory away from the bloody face of war. They have exposed its gruesome unreality, its sham, its useless devastation, to the clear light of civilized intelligence and Christian reason.

Compulsory military training will be a thing of the past in a few more years. It has been abolished in my State, chiefly through the efforts of my party and the great leader of that party, Gov. Floyd B. Olson. The Christian people of Minnesota will not let the board of regents put it back.

Out of all the turbulence of the l apending world crisis, one clear, cool fact remains. We are in potential peril of being drawn into another war. And the people of this country do not want war. They have no enemy nations that they desire to lay low, nor any foreign people upon which they desire to bring the devastation of international slaughter. But what means are at our command to prevent war?

I have introduced in the United States Senate two measures that I believe merit your attention and your support.

I introduced them both just before this Nation set out to pay tribute to its womanhood on Mothers' Day, May 10. I introduced them on the day that a few of us in the Senate were futilely battling to prevent the passage of the big Navy bill that will bring our annual expenditures for war up to the unbelievable figure of $1,100,000,000 a year—as much money as all of our 2,000,000 overseas soldiers drew all the time they were in France and Germany.

One of these measures (S. 4610) is a bill to make it a criminal offense to deliberately circulate or disseminate false propaganda designed to incite the American people into wars between foreign powers.

The other is a resolution (S. J. Res. 263) intended to create a real and true defense policy for this Nation, a defense policy which will provide an adequate defense but put an end to our mounting expenditures of billions of dollars for an offensive war machine that would be antiquated and obsolete if a defensive war ever should occur.

Four years ago, at its national convention, the Democratic Party deplored the fact that expenditures for national defense were rapidly approaching the billion mark. Today they have passed the billion mark. At that 1932 convention the Democratic Party adopted a plank calling for a survey of all the facts concerning our defense establishment, for a policy under which the people of this country, in time of peace, would not be burdened by the expense of war.

For nearly 4 years the Democratic administration has had almost absolute control of the governmental functions. The resolution that I have introduced simply empowers the President to carry out that plank in his party platform and gives him the pledged support of the Congress in doing it.

My resolution cites that there is still no established policy of national defense. It recalls that our Government, under the Pact of Paris, has renounced war as an instrument of national policy and has declared its neutrality in the event of war between or among foreign nations.

For this situation the resolution seeks to provide a remedy. It provides that a special committee of civilians be appointed by the President. It provides that that committee shall survey all of the facts, hold public hearings, and make recommendations to Congress. I ask permission to read this resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 263:

"Whereas the Democratic Party, in party convention in Chicago, June 1932, submitted this platform:

" 'National defense: A navy and an army adequate for national defense, based on a survey of all facts affecting the existing establishments that the people in time of peace may not be burdened by an expenditure fast approaching $1,000,000,000, annually'; and

"Whereas the appropriations for the Army and the Navy during the 1937 fiscal year total more than $1,000,000,000; and

"Whereas there is no established policy for national defense and, therefore, no guide as to what is needed by way of military or naval establishments to assure such defense; and

"Whereas the Government of the United States under the Pact of Paris renounced war as an instrument of national policy; and

"Whereas the Government of the United States has declared its neutrality in the event of war between or among foreign nations; and

"Whereas a fundamental principle of our democratic Government as embodied in the Constitution is control of the military branches of the Government by the civilian authorities; and

"Whereas the absence of a policy of national defense leads to inefficiency, uncoordinated activities of our Army and Navy, growing demands on the National Treasury to support an Army and Navy for unknown purposes and results in misunderstanding both at home and abroad of the purposes of our Army and Navy: Therefore be it

"Resolved, etc., That a special committee of civilians be appointed by the President of the United States and that the committee is hereby authorized and directed to make a survey of all the facts affecting the existing establishments of the Army and the Navy, to hold public hearings, and to recommend to the Congress of the United States a policy of national defense that shall be—

"In harmony with our agreement to renounce war as an instrument of our national course in international affairs;

"Designed only to defend the boundaries of the Nation against invasion;

"Actually as well as theoretically in keeping with our neutrality laws;

"Instrumental in insuring our peaceful relations with other nations of the world;

"Conducive to the elimination from the defense establishments of all agencies designed, or primarily useful, for aggressive purposes; and

"Determinative of a basic policy to guide expenditures for national defense so that the people in time of peace may not be burdened in the future by war appropriations fast exceeding $1,000,000,000 annually.

"SEC. 2. No member of the committee shall have any financial or economic interest in the production, distribution, or sale of materials used by the Army, Navy, or Air Forces of the United States; nor shall he hold any interest directly or indirectly in the sale, exchange, or transportation of articles, goods, or commodities to foreign nations; nor shall he have any financial or economic interest directly or indirectly in any foreign country.

"SEC. 3. The committee shall be authorized to expend a sum of up to $10,000 and to employ needed clerical help.

"SEC. 4. A report shall be prepared not later than March 1, 1937, and presented to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Vice President of the United States."

My friends, this resolution is sane and it is sensible.

On the same day that this proposal was placed before the Senate, a bill was passed appropriating $529,000,000 for a bigger Navy. We continue, in other words, to spend more and more money in preparation for war on the pretext that this will insure peace. If we mean it when we say to the world that we are a peaceful nation, then as a mark of sincerity let us take inventory of our own house and see how much of our equipment is truly designed for defense.

We have just ratified the London Naval Treaty. We have agreed to tell the other nations in advance just what our plans are—how many ships we will build, how big our ships will be, how many guns they will carry, how thick their armament plate. We must tell them that before we ever lay the keels. How silly we must look to Mars.

If we can agree to build only so many ships, then why agree to build any at all? Our limitation agreements are as futile as our efforts to civilize war—to eliminate by agreement the use of poison gas, fire, and disease germs—to make war "humane."

If we can say we will not kill each other with guns that shoot over 20 miles, then why can't we say we will not kill each other with guns that shoot over half a mile? Then why not cut the range down further, and agree that we will not kill each other with guns that shoot over half a block? Then we can stay in our own yards and we won't get shot, and there won't be any wars.

Let me warn you not to be misled by any of these so-called efforts to civilize war. War is as uncivilized and as insane as any other form of dueling and human slaughter. No treaty, no arms pact, no naval agreement can civilize it. So scrutinize the sources of these moves to make war humane. Who contributes funds for these movements? I do not know, but look carefully and be sure that they do not come in part from the war profiteers, the munitions makers, the foreign investors.

The horrors of war became so revolting, the weapons so devastating that the peoples of the world have risen up against war itself.

I say beware that this movement to humanize war may not secretly be just a move of the warmakers themselves to preserve the institution of war, to postpone the day when enlightened people of the world will abolish it, even if they have to do so by abolishing all who advocate it.

There have been proposed many worthy measures for the prevention of war, neutrality measures, proposals of the war veterans themselves to conscript wealth as well as manpower, the demand to take all profit out of war.

Ray Murphy, of Iowa, national commander of the American Legion, on April 15, said: "I think we may conceive that there is no danger of the United States going looking for a war. If war comes, it will seek us. If we are prepared to defend ourselves, we have little to fear from a foreign aggressor. I doubt very much if we would have ever had to enter the World War if we had enacted neutrality laws and a Universal Service Act prior to 1917. The time has come when we must demand this protection. We want no more experience with other nations' wars."

The Veterans of Foreign Wars have demanded a truly defined defense policy. I quote from a resolution adopted by the V. F. W. in my home State: "We know by actual experience what war means in suffering, dead, mangled, and dying comrades, in broken homes, in the suffering of noncombatants, and the destruction of property. We believe that nearly all wars are caused by greedy individuals and serve no useful purpose. Seventy-two cents out of every tax dollar goes to pay the cost of past and future wars. We respectfully petition Congress to enact legislation establishing the policy that American soldiers, sailors, or marines shall not be used to protect property on foreign soil, and that before Congress can declare war in the future a vote must be taken on the question and must show that a majority of all citizens of voting age, favor the proposed war."

Six months before America plunged into the World War the people of this Nation would have voted overwhelmingly against war. Six months later our people might have voted in favor of that action.

What happened to cause this change in our national sentiment? We were subjected to a systematic and deliberate campaign of false war propaganda. We read false stories and saw fake pictures, which served the purpose of the war makers—the purpose of the house of Morgan and the international bankers.

Our American blood ran hot. We rushed into the war. Seeking to justify our action, we called it a war for democracy; a war to end wars.

Here let me call your attention to the fact that Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Holland kept out of the last war. As my colleague, Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, says, "They stayed out of it even though it was raging all around them." He also said, rightly, "They kept out because they had statesmen loyal to their own people and able to resist efforts of belligerents to involve them."

Let me add that neither their governments nor their public press were crying for war—fanning the flames of war.

We in America now have forgotten our post-war disillusionment. Again we are ripe to become victims of another propaganda campaign financed and inspired by munitions makers.

An unscrupulous and perverted press, in the hands of men like Hearst and Colonel McCormick, again holds its printing presses in readiness. Such publishers await the beck and call of the facist war lords and the munitions makers to fan our passions into a new war.

We fought the last war in the name of democracy and lasting peace. Let us see that we do not fight another one in the name of a national defense that we ourselves can't define. England made her conquests in the name of freedom of the seas. If we listen to the jingo triplets—Hearst, McCormick, and Patterson—we will probably fight the next in the name of freedom of the press.

What happened in the last war after the United States sent 2,000,000 men to fight on foreign land?

Those 2,000,000 men drew wages of just $1,100,000,000.

That is just what we have appropriated in this session of Congress for 1 year of a peacetime Army and Navy. And it is just what one company, the United States Steel Corporation, made in profits during the war period.

While 2,000,000 men fought for $1 a day, Eugene Grace, president of Bethlehem Steel, collected a bonus of $1,386,000 in 1918—for making his company colossal war profits.

The National Council for Prevention of War has shown there were two sides to the World War picture. Death on one hand, wealth on the other. Death for the millions, wealth for the few. On the side of death the nations involved in the World War spent $208,000,000,000 to kill 10,000,000 men, leave 5,000,000 women widows, and saddle on our Nation a debt of $22,000,000,000.

On the side of wealth American munitions companies made profits ranging up to 943 percent; the Du Ponts, of Liberty League fame, paid dividends of 100 percent on their common stock and still had enough money left over to pay $97,000,000 for new holdings that included General Motors, acquire control of 26 other corporations, and build up an industrial empire valued at $202,000,000.

In the face of such a cry as will be set up when new war profits loom, the voices of our noble peace organizations will be but whispers, unheard among the rattling of sabers.

Throughout 56 nations all over the world 45,000,000 women have united for peace and disarmament. The peoples' mandate to governments to end war will raise 90,000,000 hands pitifully, helplessly against the armored machinery of destruction. And after the propaganda mongers have had their day, it will be but months, maybe only days, until these mothers will not dare raise their voices in protest or they will be thrown in jail.

Do not say this is preposterous. Only 18 years ago that very thing happened in the name of democracy and under the Stars and Stripes.

If we really are to prevent war, we must guard not only our shores but our sentiments, our passions, our intelligence from war propaganda. For ages we have imprisoned men and women for truthfully preaching peace in time of war. I propose we shall imprison those who falsely preach war in time of peace.

The bill I have introduced to accomplish this is a brief one, to the point. It will make it a criminal offense to disseminate false information designed to incite participation by the United States in foreign wars. Any person who, knowingly or willfully, writes, publishes, or otherwise disseminates as statement of fact any false, fictitious, or purposely distorted statement, document, or illustration with intent to incite the people of the United States into war shall upon conviction be subject to fine and imprisonment.

I want to call your attention to a specific provision in this bill, that no interpretation that may be placed upon it shall operate in any court in the land to oppress in any way freedom of speech or freedom of the press.

I want you to note that it is directed at those who willfully disseminate false propaganda, with the deliberate intent to incite to war.

I know full well that the perverted press of the Hearsts, the Pattersons, and the McCormicks will attack this bill as a gag law, just as they attack every enlightened thought or movement as "un-American."

But I want to point out that the penalty provided for those who lie and distort in an effort to involve us in bloodshed and murder is the same penalty that our present laws provide for those who talk peace in time of war.

And now I want to show you how insincere, how viciously hypocritical these Hearst publishers are. If they attack this bill as a gag law, then what would you call the two laws that the bankers and the newspaper publishers have succeeded in having placed on the statute books in this country? The National Bankers Association has had enacted in 42 of the 48 States a law which makes it a criminal offense to circulate a false statement about a bank.

The newspaper publishers of my home State of Minnesota have succeeded in having passed by the State legislature a law which makes it a crime to give false information about a person or corporation to an editor or reporter or any employee of a newspaper.

In other words, the bankers already have laws that put men in jail for circulating false information about financial institutions—some of whose foreign loans have done most to involve us in foreign wars.

The newspaper publishers already have laws that put men in jail for giving them false information.

But they call it a gag law and shout "freedom of the press" when the peace-loving people of this country try to make it a criminal offense for these same newspaper publishers, or anyone else, to broadcast false information deliberately intended to lead them into war and bloodshed and slaughter.

What of the mothers of the boys in this Nation? Aren't they just as interested in seeing that their sons are not propagandized into another foreign war as the newspaper publishers are in seeing that their sheets get correct information about the latest town scandal?

And let me give you another assurance that nothing in this bill will offend in any way our sacred rights of free speech and free press. Let me cite the fact that several years ago the League of Nations recognized officially that propaganda for war is the root of the causes of wars.

And nearly 3 years ago the League of Nations conference at Geneva urged all nations to enact laws just like this Senate bill 4610. Three nations, led by progressive Poland, have already enacted laws to carry out this world peace mandate. But in this country, until this session of Congress, no one has taken the necessary step to incorporate into the laws of the United States.

Freedom of speech and press need have no fear of the liberals of this Nation. Let fear of oppression be directed where it belongs—toward reactionary servants of entrenched interests and militarists.

Only a few weeks ago our Secretary of War, Mr. Dern, was quoted in the newspapers as saying, "Anything and everything containing implications unfavorable to compulsory military training in schools and colleges is seditious propaganda."

On top of this liberty-loving utterance of our Nation's war chief, Assistant Secretary Woodring launched an attack against what he chose to call "radical" groups and bitterly assailed 8,900 clergymen and professors who pledged themselves to peace.

At the moment I believe we need more defense against a jingo press within our gates than we do against any potential foreign enemy from without. So let us stop this mad spending for war until we know what we mean by defense. And let us, once and for all, put a stop to the greed and lust of the paid propagandists who infuriate us to war.

And, finally, I ask you who are interested in peace to do this: Write to your Senators and Congressmen. Urge that, even though efforts for a permanent neutrality have failed, they take at least these steps before adjournment to preserve the peace of the United States.

THE SOUTH'S CHALLENGE TO YOUTH—ADDRESS BY DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD an address delivered by the Honorable David E. Lilienthal, Director, Tennessee Valley Authority, at the commencement exercises of the University of Alabama on May 25, 1936. The subject of the address is The South's Challenge to Youth.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The next 10 years give promise of profound changes for the South—broad and fundamental changes which will be felt in the life of every one of us and which will affect the course of national destiny. At few times in history has an entire region looked forward to such a transition. To no one is this decade of development more important than to you young men and young women who are being honored here today and to the youth throughout this region.

For the past 3 years it has been my good fortune to have my life and my work in the South, to participate in many phases of the manifold activities of this region, and to come to know many of the South's finest spirits in every walk of life. Because of my intense interest and pride in the South—although myself a midwesterner by birth and rearing, just as many of you are—I welcome this chance to talk to you of the problems of the South in this period of transition and development.

My experience with your fellow citizens of the Southern States convinces me that nowhere are people more willing to face realities, even to face those facts which are disagreeable and unflattering. I am sure that if in my remarks tonight I evaded the unpleasant and ignored the great difficulties of which we are all aware, if I simply orated upon the genuine glories of your climate and justly famous cordiality, you would regard such a display as a waste of the time of earnest people. The tense and critical period of transition in which we are living makes it imperative that we discuss the ugly as well as the pleasant facts, and then resolutely, intelligently set our faces toward the course that we must follow.

The central problem of Alabama, as, indeed, of all the South, is economic. It is to those economic problems that I think our attention should be first directed. And I assure you I fully realize that the problems of the South cannot be solved by seeking to impose ideas developed in other regions of the United States, ideas based upon wholly different conditions that exist in other areas.

What are the focal points of the economic problems in the South? You might choose one set of factors, another person still another. To me, the most significant points are two:

(1) That the income which stays in the hands of our people in this region is too low for an adequate standard of living for all.

(2) That the South is being drained—steadily and persistently—of its wealth, of its resources, and of many of the best of its trained young men and women.

It must be clear to everyone that unless the level of spendable income can be raised, and unless our wealth and your youth and energy are kept at home for the building of the South, ultimate bankruptcy and disaster are inevitable, and that not far distant.

The unhappy circumstances are well known to you. Alabama is the forty-seventh State in the Nation in spendable income per person. For the year 1934 the spendable income per capita in Alabama was $207, and for the seven States of the Tennessee Valley region $259, to be compared with an average for the United States of $486, and $866 for New York State, $702 for California, and $664 for Massachusetts. Those figures need no elaboration. They tell the story.

The grave crisis in education and in public health services with which your State officials are faced simply reflects the impact of these figures. These are the inevitable consequences when the income remaining in the hands of the people of this potentially wealthy State is too small to permit of that support of public functions which all Alabamians desire.

How to use your rich heritage of natural wealth so that you will retain a fair share, is the crucial problem of Alabama and of the South. You may well ask, Can this be done? Is there a way out?

I think there is a way, one that is becoming more and more clearly recognized. It is a subject appropriate to discuss with this group, because to a large extent the outcome depends upon the driving force of young men and young women.

For more than a century, the South has produced cotton as its chief crop, unquestionably the world's greatest raw product. And during that century, cotton has been a cornerstone in the building of the prosperity of the whole country, and notably the manufacturing areas of the northeast. Your major product, cotton, was the basis of our export trade which gave this country a drawing account, a national surplus, so that we could build transcontinental railroads, new factories, and great industrial cities. Cotton gave this Nation its standing in world markets and made possible the rapid industrial expansion of our country.

Other sections produced vast quantities of raw products such as lumber and copper, but these raw products, for the most part, were used internally; they gave us little international trade balance. But cotton has had a world demand, and it was that world demand for the cotton you supplied that gave us the drawing account with which industrial America was built.

Such is the role cotton has played in the making of the United States. But cotton has cost you heavily. As everyone knows, you have been forced to sell cotton on the competitive world market, while things that you use you had to buy on a protected and artificial market. That produced a deficit. The deficit has not always been apparent, but it has been very real and has been mounting steadily. You have not only exported cotton; you have exported, in the cottonseed, the wealth of your soil fertility. You have had to meet the deficit out of your capital—the soil—the very basis of your life.

In the South, of your time, we can no longer build exclusively on cotton. To this, most observers are now about ready to agree. The inevitable adjustment of agriculture is rapidly on the way. Steady loss of soil fertility and the reliance on a single-crop agriculture are giving way to a different kind of farm management. In this development your universities and your State and National Governments are beginning to meet the responsibilities of leadership.

Such an adjustment of agriculture will aid in increasing our income in the only way income can be increased, by the proper utilization of our natural resources. This changed agriculture will help to stop that merciless draining of the fertility of the soil. But this is not the whole story. Perhaps the most important factor in increasing our income will not be agricultural diversification alone, but the development of industry—industry integrated with agriculture.

In this direction, a beginning has been made; but the crucial test lies just ahead. The outcome will depend upon the quality of young men and women like yourselves, upon the leaders of businessmen in the South, and upon the educational institutions of the region. The vision, the enthusiasm, the aggressive spirit—they are all here. Salvation will not come from afar. Only men and women thoroughly familiar with the region, sensitive to its problems, are likely to reach sound conclusions and develop a practical working program.

The development of industry in the South, as everyone will recognize, will benefit rather than injure other sections of the country. For when the income and purchasing power of the people of the South have been increased by industrial development, a new frontier of demand for goods will be opened. A higher income for our people means more goods purchased. A substantial part of these new goods will, of course, be produced in this area, but an equally important effect will be the strengthening of the capacity of our people to buy automobiles from Detroit, radios from Chicago, electric equipment from New York, and so on.

This is just common sense, as long-sighted businessmen are now recognizing. For example, a leading mail-order company, which sells its products in every nook and corner of the United States, has now adopted this policy: If it sells a million dollars' worth of goods in the State of Alabama, it proceeds to purchase a certain proportion of a million dollars in products manufactured in the State of Alabama. This is a clear recognition that, unless income is poured back into the sections from which that income must be drawn as a part of carrying on business, the business itself will soon run dry for lack of customers able to buy.

There has never been less than 70 percent of the Nation's manufacturing carried on in the northeastern part of the country, although only about 51 percent of the population lives there. Income follows manufacturing and commerce. Industrial research is supported by this income; there has been a continuous flow of money into technical research in the already industrialized areas of the country. This research, both public and private, has naturally and inevitably concentrated on the industrial opportunities of the Northeast. The need, therefore, is for business and the technical-research institutions of the South to find means of focusing brains and technical facilities on the South's industrial opportunities.

Many of the these large-scale industrial developments will, of course, come as a result of the industrial investigations which business itself carries out—the utilization of southern pine for the manufacture of newsprint, for example, or the development of future sources of tung oil for the paint industry. But there are also great fields in which already established industry may have no immediate business motive for concentrating its magnificent research facilities. The smaller units in the cottonseed-oil industry furnish an illustration of what I have in mind. There are in the South hundreds of small mills, no one of which can afford to maintain a technical staff. These mills operate ordinarily during only a few months of the year. They are, therefore, urgently in need of new products whereby they can double the period of operation and thereby increase their profits. Here is an opportunity for public research in the public laboratories of the area.

Here is another such opportunity: Agriculturists tell us that soybeans are likely to be one of the important crops in helping the Cotton Belt to sustain its position, as income from cotton itself decreases.

Further, the engineering colleges through the South could make an invaluable contribution by determining in detail what type of manufacturing is technically and economically adapted to each subarea, particularly those operations closely related to the raw products of the soil. Studies ought to be made to determine upon how small a scale economic operation could be conducted, and what is the economic radius of distribution.

And there are other types of essential fact-finding research for the universities of the region to be carrying on. These relate to some of the special economic problems which hold back sound regional development—such as discriminatory freight rates, the stifling effect of rising farm tenancy, relations between labor and employer, economic issues involved in relations between the races, and a host of similar matters. These are the very stuff of which business and professional and governmental life in the South will be made in the coming decade. These are the problems which the universities are fitted to deal with, and that you are trained here to wrestle with when you take your place in the community.

But industry alone is not enough. We could have industrial development in this area and still be hardly better off, from the point of view of income, than we are today. It is not enough that factories be established and industrial pay rolls created, combining the resources of nature with the skill of men to produce goods. If the wealth resulting from this is drained out of the area, we may find ourselves industrialized but still impoverished. And this situation is not peculiar to the South. It exists, for example, in the Middle West, as well as in other sections.

As I have stated on another occasion, many of the large-scale industries of Alabama are directed and controlled from other points in the country. To these great concerns the State of Alabama is in the nature of a colonial possession. The policies of these industries are determined elsewhere and are often at direct cross-purposes with the best interests of this State and the South. The bulk of the revenues from them are sluiced out of the section. We do not find that increase in purchasing power which industry should bring. In short, the South has not had a fair share in its own economic advantages.

The figures dramatically demonstrate this inescapable fact. Remember, first, that the per capita spendable income in Alabama is about the lowest of any State in the country. And yet Alabama ranks high among the States of the country in industrial production. Figures for 1933, the most recent available, show that only four States in the country produced more cotton goods than Alabama. Only five States surpassed Alabama in the value of blast-furnace production. Taking into account all industrial products, Alabama, which stands fifteenth in population, is the twenty-ninth State in the Union in the value of industrial products. In the face of this relatively high rank in industrial production, we find that in per capita spendable income Alabama is the forty-seventh State in the Union, an average of about $200 a person a year. Let me repeat: The further industrialization of Alabama, without other fundamental changes in our course, may still leave us but little better off, judged by the real test—the amount of income in the hands of our people.

For a generation or more we have thought of industrial development as consisting of large-scale factories. That is part of the program, necessarily. But it may prove to be the least significant part. Here again we have looked to distant points for the answer to our problems. It is the view of many of us that more and more a permanent industrial development for a great region of this kind lies in our own front yard, in developing our own resources to as great an extent as possible with our own capital and our own brain power. This is not a provincial point of view. It is simply a frank facing of the facts. We simply must stem the tide of this draining process that has impoverished not only the South but other sections of the country, a draining that has left us with an unbalance in the geographical and individual distribution of income in this country injurious to the national welfare.

Any adequate industrial development must produce profits for those who invest their property, their skill, and their labor. More must come out of industry than goes in. But there are different kinds of profits. A profit to industry that unduly enriches one section of the country while it impoverishes and prostrates another is not a real profit. A profit that greatly enriches a few men for a few years but exhausts and sterilizes the earning power of a whole section and its people is not a genuine profit. A profit paid out of an area's capital is no more a profit than a dividend paid out of capital—both lead straight to bankruptcy. Profit? Yes. But it must be a long-time profit based on true regional and national bookkeeping.

Now, there is no magic formula for the kind of regional industrial development that I have been talking to you about—at least if there is, I certainly don't have it, and I have not yet met anyone who has. But a beginning can be made. The objectives can be thought through and we can get some clear idea of direction. Perhaps as important as anything is a change in point of view. We have got to begin to think about industry and industrial development, to become conscious of the need and to explore every possibility. A good deal depends upon our resourcefulness in seeing opportunities that lie around us.

The beginnings of this program may not be as spectacular as the location of large-scale industries—which, of course, are essential—but I venture to say that in the last analysis it will be more far-reaching and of greater permanent benefit. In some communities there have begun small-scale industrial operations which hold the seeds of that kind of integrated industrial development that I think will profoundly change your life and the life of your State.

Just one illustration of a good many that I might cite you: In a rural town in north Alabama there is a small cotton-oil-extraction mill. It operates under a plan by which practically all the cottonseed meal that the mill produces stays in the area. The operators of the mill trade the cottonseed meal back to the farmers in exchange for more cottonseed, and the farmers then use the meal to maintain the fertility of the soil. The company receives its money return and its profit from the sale of the oil. Bear in mind that in the industrial process of producing a ton of cottonseed meal the soil contributes $13 worth of plant food, and if that ton of cottonseed meal is sent to a distant market, with it goes $13 worth of capital resources. Thus this small industrial operation in this town—and I have deliberately selected a very small and unpretentious example—is improving the long-time prosperity of that area by maintaining its real basis—the soil.

I wish there were time to cite other illustrations of industrial operations which are more or less spontaneously springing up in various parts of the South. The capital required is relatively small and is available locally. The management is local. The products which are processed come from nearby. These small operations are soundly conceived, and their effect is to retain in the community and in the State the wealth and the income which they produce. Under proper direction they will grow, and in growing provide not only jobs for you and our fellow citizens, but opportunities for a more attractive way of living.

You have in Alabama an outstanding example, in the Comer family, of what men steeped in the traditions of a purely agricultural economy may do when they turn their talents into industrial channels. Starting out in life as a planter in your great Black Belt section, the elder Comer decided that manufacturing offered better opportunities. He turned his attention to the manufacture of cotton fabrics, using as a raw material one of the products of your soil. The results are known to all Alabamians. Mr. Comer was a conspicuous success as a manufacturer. His sons followed in his footsteps, and now Mr. Donald Comer heads one of your greatest industries.

There is another value that has flowed from this redirection of southern genius, entirely apart from the building of a great industrial enterprise in your midst. The members of this family know your traditions and your problems; they know your aspirations as a people; and they have made very important contributions to the advancement of the State's welfare outside the routine conduct of their manufacturing business.

We often fail to realize how great are the industrial possibilities in the South. The 10 States which we usually refer to as the South—Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia, Florida, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Kentucky, Mississippi, and Louisiana—contain about 20 percent of the population of the country. In this area is about 11 percent of the national purchasing power as measured by retail sales in 1929. Yet the South has only one-tenth of the total industrial production of the Nation. With 20 percent of the population and 11 percent of the purchasing power, it packs only 2 percent of the Nation's meat, it makes about 8 percent of the food products, only about 2 percent of the Nation's clothing, and only about 3 percent of its agricultural machinery. If you will compare these low percentages with the 11 percent of purchasing power and the 20 percent of national population in the area, you get something of an idea of the opportunity for industrial growth simply by the process of the South supplying a reasonable percentage of some of its own needs.

The South has not only been losing its wealth but has sustained an ever more critical loss. I refer to the steady migration out of the South of the young men and women trained in your universities. For many years it was a matter of pride on the part of universities in the South and in the Midwest, where I have personal knowledge, that they could place a large percentage of their most able and aggressive young graduates in industrial and professional positions in the large cities of the North and Northeast. University presidents and deans felt that it was a measure of their success that a large percentage of their graduates were "snapped up" and left their home areas, usually permanently.

Was that a good policy? A good many people now feel that it is a serious barrier to the industrial and business development of the South that so many of its able graduates are not devoting themselves to building up their State and region.

You may be interested in some of the figures showing the extent of the migration from the South of trained men and women who have assumed leadership in other parts of the United States. The loss of leaders in natural sciences, for example, has been very severe. Of the men listed in American Men of Science as having been born in the South, 60 percent have left this region. Professor Odum has calculated that there has been a net loss of 25 percent from the South of the men listed in Who's Who; and Professor Gee points out that of the 200 leading social scientists born in the South 45 percent are now working in some other section. Other figures indicate a similar result.

This draining of youth and energy and trained minds is perhaps more serious than the other forms of economic draining that I have been talking to you about. But it is not a matter over which you, as individuals, have complete control. It would be foolish of me to urge you to stay in the South simply as a matter of loyalty and sentiment, for, as individuals, obviously you have a career to carve out. Unless you can find or create opportunities here, it is difficult to urge you to renounce opportunities elsewhere. And yet, if your heart is in the area, is that not the course that must be followed? Where shall we look for the brains and the determination to build a great region unless in the South's own young men and women?

Whatever may be the case today, and whatever may be your individual situation, it seems to me clear that opportunities for young trained minds in the South are as great, perhaps greater, than in any other part of the country.

And this is not the unfounded optimism so traditional among commencement-day speakers. All over the country there is a feeling among well-informed businessmen that the South presents fresh opportunities for youth trained as you have been trained. Let me read to you from an editorial from the Manufacturers Record, a magazine widely read by businessmen. The editorial is entitled "New Frontiers", and this is the closing paragraph:

"There is more reason today for young men in the South to remain at home to help in the development of their own section, where opportunities abound, than there is to let their fancy roam elsewhere in the belief that other pastures are greener and greater achievement is possible in other fields. It may be said very definitely to the young men of the Southern States, while it was estimated a few years ago that 5,000,000 men left the South to make their way in other parts of the world, there can no longer be a justifiable urge of this kind. There are opportunities at home which the scientist has uncovered of a variety and of such promise as were never before dreamed."

The responsibility to develop opportunities is obviously not entirely yours as young graduates. That responsibility in part is on the older men and women here and the business and governmental leadership of Alabama. Unless that leadership sets about at once to develop a kind of regional industrial development which will absorb the energies and provide the opportunities for you and your contemporaries, you may have no alternative but to join the migration elsewhere and to leave the South weakened by your absence.

The picture of the South at the end of the next decade seems to me a bright one. Not bright to those who are afraid of a fight—those who do not respond to a challenging situation or who shrink from a new experience. But one of the frontiers of the United States is in the South, and it is, I believe, not presumptuous of me to say of this new frontier, "Stay South, young man." A frontier calls for youth, whether the frontier is moving into new and unexplored land or moving into new and unexplored problems of economic life.

The development of the South is, first of all, of course, important to those who live here. But the building of the new South is not a local or sectional matter. The interest of the whole Nation is at stake. Obviously, a nation cannot be genuinely prosperous or genuinely successful if any part of its people are being bled of their resources and are living on inadequate income. Furthermore, an increase in the spendable income of the people of the South clearly means new markets for businessmen in other sections, which will supply much of the goods that will be bought with the added southern income.

A period of transition is youth's opportunity. In the dark days from which we are emerging, despair has often lodged in the hearts of young men and women. Finding employment and finding attractive and interesting work to do has been very difficult and disheartening to many fine young people. I may, of course, be unduly optimistic. But I have a sincere conviction that for those of you who stay in the South, the future is hopeful—hopeful for you as individuals and hopeful for the section you call home. Changes are taking place so rapidly in these days that older people have difficulty in adjusting themselves. You young people here today, whose minds are trained, who step out into the community with a fresh point of view, can take these rapid changes in your stride.

WHY BUSINESS IS WORRIED—ARTICLE BY MERLE THORPE

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Merle Thorpe, entitled "Why Business Is Worried." The article was printed in the Saturday Evening Post under date of May 23, 1936.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of May 23, 1936]

WHY BUSINESS IS WORRIED—ARE WE BUILDING WITH PAINTED PASTEBOARD?

By Merle Thorpe

A half dozen young Government officials were discussing, as they frequently do in Washington, the destiny of the Nation, when one of them asked, with an air of futility: "Why are businessmen so blind?"

To them the answer was probably obvious. Nevertheless, all eyes turned toward me.

"Meaning what?" I asked.

"Well, here are the heads of a big automobile company, a steel company, a mail-order house, a milling concern. All of them report to their stockholders that trade is picking up and earnings are increasing. They are better off than they have been for 5 years. Yet, in the same reports, they say they are apprehensive, that the country is going to the dogs. Are they just unregenerate Tories, shutting their eyes to plain facts, or are they allowing politics to warp their judgment? That attitude seems to be fairly typical of business leaders. They are enjoying better times, if news accounts are correct, but they talk about approaching disaster."

"That," I suggested mildly, "hardly seems consistent. If they are swayed by partisan politics and are proposing a change of policy, they are advocating something that will deprive them of profits. That doesn't square with your charge that they are the personification of greed. They may be stupid or blind, but neither does that square with your charge that they are so clever that they must be watched."

What, then, is the answer?

Business is better. For one thing, intensified by 5 years of self-denial, demands for goods have become insistently clamorous. For another, the Federal Government, in the 3 fiscal years, 1934, 1935, and 1936, will have distributed to the people $10,000,000,000 in cash and extended $9,000,000,000 more in credit. It would be a miracle if this money had not shown up in the market place. But the businessman asks, Is the country going back to work? Or is it like the man who turns in his life-insurance policy, takes its cash value, and goes out and spends it?

Are we looking to the form rather than the substance? Are we setting tomorrow's debts off against today's credits? Are we building with stone and steel or with painted pasteboard?

To get at this seeming paradox—skepticism going hand in hand with profit—it is necessary, first, to determine just what business is. The approach is not by way of the smooth road of economic transcendentalism or theoretical abstractions. It is not a matter of juggling with imposing aggregates or walking a statistical tight rope—of billions in bank clearances, of millions in carloadings, pig-iron production, and kilowatt consumption.

WHAT REAL RECOVERY DEPENDS ON

The businessman gets down to earth, takes a look at business in its working clothes, and this is what he sees:

For more than 5 years we have been praying for recovery. That indicates that we have lost something. What is it that has been lost? Business activity. What is business activity? An exchange between two persons, like you and me, of goods, services, and labor. Before we went astray in the enchanted forest of economic generalizations, we called it trade; barter; swapping. When we read today that United States Steel has had a 2-percent increase in orders, it means that 100 individuals in 100 localities decided yesterday to use steel in the form of an automobile, or a bridge, or a building, or what not.

This is elementary; even rudimentary. Recovery, the more active exchange of things, depends upon the decisions of millions of people. Along with our prayers we have made plans for recovery—literally thousands of them. Departmental files in Washington are bulging with them. All leave out of account we, the people. They might have been honestly conceived and patriotically brought forth, but they hang upon the premise that a more active exchange between individuals is to be stimulated, not by working for it but by voting for it; not by doing something but by not doing something. Our prayers are not to be answered in the "sweat of the face" but by political magic. Regeneration, they say, must come, not from the bottom up, as in the past, but from the top down.

It is estimated that there are 100,000,000 transactions in the United States every normal working day. These are business in the concrete. These exchanges take place in two areas—one, a comparatively small area, which has to do with meeting the demands for the bare necessities of life. For centuries this area encompassed most of the activities of mankind, and still does among backward peoples.

Above and beyond this is a larger area. Seventy-five percent or more of all business activity is expended in providing things that are not necessary or indispensable, the conveniences and luxuries which we can do without. In this larger field, the exchange depends wholly upon the inclination or the voluntary decisions of individuals.

The emphasis is upon the word "voluntary." The distinction is important. In this larger field business is not impelled by the hard, driving force of necessity. One must have bread, but one can do without fine raiment. In the 4 years from 1929 to 1933 the production of essential foodstuffs had a small decline, but the manufacture of silks dropped 80 percent. The best statistics available do not reflect this prime distinction between the kind of business activity that must go on and the kind that may or may not go on, as we, the people, choose.

In this voluntary area is the key to prosperity and depression. In it is to be found the practical answer to most of our economic problems. In it lies the controlling factor which determines business activity—the factor that is missing in all our political and academic planning, and which the businessman most anxiously weighs.

We condemn business in the abstract and denounce it for its derelictions in discharging its social responsibilities. We challenge it to restore employment, or ——! We exhort it to take up the burdens of society, but the fact remains that it does not speed up because the individual, multiplied a millionfold, is not inclined, or is afraid, to exchange something he has for something somebody else has, or, what amounts to the same thing, commit himself to obligations in the future.

The difference between this disposition to trade or not to trade is the difference between good times and bad.

Since the beginning of time man has been hesitant to give up something he has, or an advantage he enjoys, for something else. He wants to be shown to his satisfaction that the exchange will be profitable. Not necessarily a money profit. It may be a convenience profit—an electric refrigerator; a health profit—a vacation trip; a cultural profit—books or music. But if the assurance of profit is not there, why take the hazard of replacing present resources with others unknown?

To that extent every exchange is a speculation. If we have faith in ourselves and in the future, we have the speculative spirit, which today is oftentimes denounced as reprehensible. But as the late President Hadley, of Yale, once said, the Nation has grown great because of the speculative spirit no other nation dared have. The farmer, when he puts the seed in the ground, speculates upon sunshine and rain. The merchant who puts $100 worth of goods on his shelves takes the chance that customers will want them.

If, in looking ahead, you feel that the time is ripe for a speculation of this kind, the exchange will be made. That, with 100,000,000 other transactions in the United States, makes up the Nation's business for the day. If we hesitate, if we are uncertain of the future and have fears, be they groundless or real, and decide to delay the transaction, business activity slows down.

LOOKING BACK OF THE STATISTICS

The business leader looks back of statistics to see if they mean a revival of the speculative spirit on the part of millions of people manifesting itself in quickened trade, or if they indicate an artificial stimulation. If it is the voluntary exchange of goods, services, and labor it is real recovery, not forced revival. It is not merely pumping water uphill to see it flow down again—the characteristic feature of the Townsend and countless other plans looking to economic restoration. To take from one and give to another is not exchange. Nor is taking something for which nothing is given in return. Real recovery is the urge to produce more in order to have more to exchange, not to pass what we have from hand to hand under compulsion in order to maintain a semblance of business activity.

So business leaders are alarmed at our willingness to cure our ills by redistributing our income, instead of adding to our income by stimulating production and exchange. They realize this stimulation comes from two sources: First, a more active exchange of things already known; and, second, the creation of new things for which there is a potential desire. They realize that political agencies, by their inherent nature, can do neither.

This present-day faith in political agencies must be explored not in a partisan spirit, nor in terms of this or that political party, nor in terms of the policies of one or another administration. It is the new thought, the New Deal, the new day, the new jurisprudence with which we have been bombarded in books, tracts, radio speeches, pamphlets, and magazine articles. For one thing, it is not new. It is a venerable idea that has long passed current in theoretical speculation here and practice abroad. It is the great expectation based upon the assumption that we are to be the great exception, the first of all nations and of all time to bring new wine out of old bottles.

Is it a weak reed, or a pillar of strength as advertised?

Businessmen must move cautiously. They blueprint the future from the past. They are realists. They know that political theorizing cannot be substituted for hard work. They know that 126,000,000 people can maintain a government, but that no government, without resorting to compulsion, can actuate and guide 126,000,000 people. And they know only too well that the fate of business is determined at the grass roots and not at the conference table in the board room. So when they see politics moving in to do the job of business they consider:

Political agencies since the world began have never created a wealth-producing enterprise which has provided continuous employment for men. Look about as you walk down the street. Telegraph and telephone, railways, department stores, motion-picture theaters, that truck delivering coal, the airplane overhead, the radio aerial, the automobile all owe their origin to individuals and their development to the voluntary cooperation of individuals.

CHANCES GOVERNMENT CAN'T TAKE

The bank is the development of the medieval jeweler who held his client's cash for safekeeping. The insurance company grew out of the pooling of risks by traders. The city waterworks, at first glance, might be an exception, but, as Herbert Spencer pointed out, only after 50 years of development by private individuals were municipal waterworks taken over by political management. Even the post office, in Great Britain and the United States, began with the private collection and distribution of mail.

No; political capitalism engages in nothing new. It simply takes over what has already been pioneered.

This is no disparagement of government or the men and women who operate it. It is inherent in the nature of government itself. Government is the balance wheel, not the source of power. It can retard, but it cannot advance.

A political administration would commit suicide if it attempted to develop the thousand new ideas necessary to find one that is practicable. A great New York newspaper, forty-odd years ago, reflecting the popular feeling of the day, ridiculed the idea of a man in South Orange, named Edison, who professed to have found something that would take the place of gas for lighting homes. In Washington they will tell you of a man who haunted the corridors of the Patent Office with the weird idea of "riding on air." They tapped their heads when they spoke of him. He was the inventor of the pneumatic tire.

In England Parliament passed a law against the laying of track on which Stephenson's locomotive was to run. Ministers of all denominations declared it to be "in direct opposition both to the law of God and to the most enduring interests of society." In the United States the people laughed at a queer scientist who made himself ridiculous by trying to fly in a machine. At the same time two men, working in a bicycle shop, were on their way to prove to a startled world that it was possible.

Even the humble bathtub aroused popular derision. England passed a law prohibiting its use during the winter months. Virginia put a prohibitive tax on it, and erudite Boston required a physician's license to permit one to take a bath.

Could politics invite the derision and the scorn that the inventor and the industrial pioneer must encounter?

Here, then, is the first cause of apprehension on the part of businessmen. In the past forty-odd years 18 great new industries have been created and developed in the United States.

Today they employ directly 1,200,000 workers. At secondary sources—such as service stations, in the case of the automobile—they employ between five and six millions, to which must be added between two and three million men and women in clerical positions—a total of nearly 10,000,000 jobs—nearly one-fourth of the total number of men and women gainfully employed today.

It is no coincidence that during this same period not 1 of the other 59 countries on the globe has developed a single great industry. America has had no monopoly on raw materials, methods, or ideas. As a matter of fact, ideas, such as radio and rayon, were picked up from foreign countries which, for some reason, could not develop them.

What was the reason? At the beginning of this period, in the United States, about 5 cents was taken from the income dollar for all governmental expenses, State, local, and Federal. (In 1850 it was 1 cent.) This left 95 cents for food, clothing, shelter, and the wherewithal to risk savings upon the thousands of new things in the hope that one would be a winner. With the least government on the face of the earth, leagues behind our closest rival, we had less governmental expense and more capital for private enterprise with which to experiment.

Today we are taking 35 cents out of each income dollar for governmental purposes, leaving only 65 cents, as against 95 for living expenses and new capital investments of 50 years ago.

Businessmen see business as it is. They know that if you have $10,000 saved up after years of work, and you are approached with the proposal "to go into something" which may be "another automobile success", and you are convinced it is a good hazard, you will not put up your entire $10,000. One thousand, perhaps, and with a secret hope that the enterpriser won't be able to find the rest. Dollars are so reluctant to put on overalls. Query the one in your pocket.

So with the Nation of individuals. It can take big chances only when it has a comfortable backlog, only when there is a generous remainder from one's earnings after living and Government expenses are paid.

WASHINGTON OVERHEAD

Farsighted men, whose judgment I respect, tell me they fear we shall have fewer and fewer new things brought to full fruition, new industries which of themselves provide for the continuous employment of men and women, because of excessive Government spendings from which there seems to be no practical relief. These enormous spendings are what businessmen call overhead, not productive expense. They are dollars representing the productive effort of someone, but once spent by political agencies, gone forever.

Thousands of new ideas are crying to get out of industrial laboratories, awaiting the practical test of business experiment. In some of them might exist the germs of industries, as yet unknown, which may provide millions of jobs and push up another notch the standard of American living. Capital must take the risk, if it is to be taken. Money must be available for purchasing the new products. Money, we are glibly told, is available. "The banks are filled with it." But the businessman is much too practical to overlook the fact that this money is already earmarked; that whereas 3 years ago 10 percent of the deposits in all the banks of the country were invested in Government I O U's, the proportion today is nearly 55 percent.

A businessman rode with me the other day through Washington. We saw a new Government building, a monumental structure, costing millions. Later, across the river in Alexandria, we passed a little frame factory building, costing a few thousand dollars, in which 8 or 10 men were employed. The businessman said:

"That factory means more to the national welfare than the marble structure. Charwomen and filing clerks do not produce anything that may be bartered or traded. The laborers in the factory do. The pity of it is that the laborers will be called upon to pay from their productive wages the unproductive wages of excessive governmental activities. A great tire and rubber company, employing 40,000 workers, including coolies on plantations, paid them last year an average of $1,089; it paid for each worker $453 in taxes."

PUMP PRIMERS OF THE PAST

How was the job of stimulating done in the past, before it was assigned to political agencies? Who were the pump primers of that business activity which we are trying to recover?

There is one class of people who make it their vocation to anticipate, develop, and meet the desires for goods and services which are the basis of exchange. They are the manufacturers, the bankers, the storekeepers, who act as go-betweens, bringing the bargainers together and encouraging them to trade. It might be the manager of the simple roadside exchange, who receives the goods of one group to be traded for the goods of another. It may be the guiding spirit of the great corporation who brings together the savings of thousands of investors and the labor of thousands of workers to produce shoes or automobiles which are to be exchanged for countless other things represented by the wages and the dividends they receive. The swapping may have become a long and involved process of inventing, financing, manufacturing, transporting, and distributing, but it remains swapping.

These go-betweens are the business men and women of America. They are the enterprisers of the Nation. They arouse the desire for the comforts and conveniences which we vaguely designate as the "standard of living." They encourage dissatisfaction with things as they are and are constantly holding up before our eyes new things and urging us forward to a better and more comfortable order of existence. They combat stagnation, speed obsolescence, and accelerate turn-over. They fight the stubbornness of nature and the natural indolence of man. Their dominant purpose is to keep the currents of trade flowing, for upon this their own well-being depends.

This group of enterprisers—a comparatively small group, as population goes— is our most important national asset. But, curiously enough, they are most often subjected to denunciation and disparagement. Their motives are questioned, "intrenched greed" inspires them. Their attainments are made the occasion for public castigation. The better they have succeeded in advancing business progress the more they are penalized. Their efforts are circumscribed by bureaucratic regulation and political control. We put a premium upon the aptitude that expresses itself in painting, music, and literature, but the aptitude which launches and builds new industries, widens the area of business and employment, and develops new sources of wealth is publicly branded as undesirable. In no other field of activity is success deprecated and failure extolled.

For this business aptitude we have substituted political aptitude. Vote-getting has taken the place of industry-building. Lawmaking has replaced hard work. Instead of drafting the enterprisers, as we did when the shadows of war deepened, we turned to the politician.

Three years ago we were called upon to unite in war against depression. It was, we were told, no less real than a war against a foreign enemy. We campaigned in military fashion. There were parades, hundreds of them, 100,000 men marching down the street in New York City alone, with banners and flags flying—a new flag, with an eagle, distributed by the millions.

During the World War we set up a propaganda bureau. We resorted to every possible device to keep up the spirit of the men on the battle front, inspire confidence in their generals, and maintain the morale of the civilian forces at home. In the war against depression we also set up a propaganda bureau—to the same end, but not in the same way.

POLITICAL GENERALSHIP

We resorted to political generalship and not to business generalship. Reviewing the industrial and business army, drawn up regiment by regiment, the political general staff checked off its fighting resources.

There was, first, the division of bankers—22,000 of them in the United States. They had always, as a body, been loyal. If they were at fault, it was because they had cooperated too generously with industry. Foreign commissions, sent over to study their methods, attributed the vitality of American enterprise to the fact that the bank president was ready to take chances with business in launching new ventures. In the course of 11 years, with $50,000,000,000 in trust, less than 1 percent was in actual jeopardy. But the soldiers, the men who were to do the fighting, were told that the bankers were not to be trusted. They were "nonsocial money changers."

The next division—the manufacturers. They had been our economic backbone. They had produced more goods, sold them at a lower price, and paid more in wages than any similar group in the world. They had the best labor relations that obtain in any country, the most sanitary working conditions. Millions of their employees were on group insurance, and many of them had set aside large sums to pay old-age pension and sick benefits. (One would think that social security had only been discovered in the past 12 months!) But, according to the propaganda bureau, the industrial commanding officers were likewise not to be trusted. They were "chiselers" and "rebaters." They exploited child labor. They ground down their workers and amassed huge surpluses. Something had to be done about that, through N. R. A.'s and national labor boards, and tax measures that penalized.

G. H. Q. GETS BUSY

And the next division—the power and light industry. Starting with an incandescent bulb, which excited derision at the time, it built up a vast system, with thousands of employees and $15,000,000,000 of investment, which now lights 21,288,729 homes and which sold and installed 65,000,000 household appliances to lift the burden of household drudgery. For this service they are charging $702,682,000 a year—less than the men in those homes pay for cigarettes, less than the women pay for cosmetics. But that division, too, was accused of antisocial treason. It was in the hands of the unconscionable "Power Trust, bleeding the people white." That also had to be looked into; yardsticks must be set up to show it how to do the job.

And so on down the long industrial and business battle line. The commercial-aviation regiment, the newest of the lot, had to be watched. It was tricky and unreliable; its contracts must be broken. The merchant-marine regiment was untrustworthy. It was in the habit of stealing out of the public pay chest if it were not kept under surveillance. The retailers were gougers and the consumer had to be protected against them by Federal committees. The advertisers were simply hangers-on. They served no useful purpose and they spread false reports.

The chemical and steel regiments were also in bad shape. They were exploiters. They incited war to promote their own ends. The communications division was thoroughly bad. It had to be investigated and kept under the thumb of a commission.

All this we were told, and more.

With this sorry army, the political general staff opened the war on depression.

Charges against the brigadier and major generals, with their attendant court-martial investigations and legislative red tape, added little to their morale. The attack was launched by denouncing the generals, hitherto acclaimed for the many victories they had won, and charging them with corruption, inefficiency, and greed. Such a course did not inspire confidence in the privates in the line nor induce a spirited prosecution of the war. This attitude of our war-propaganda bureau raised the strong presumption—in the minds of the real enterprisers, at least—that the Nation was less interested in winning the war against depression than it was in reorganizing the Army, deposing its old leaders, and substituting for them political and academic generals who had never seen an industrial West Point or Annapolis.

Laws were passed, bureaus and commissions were created, swivel-chair officers were placed in high command to direct the conflict. A flood of statutes and regulations—war, or emergency, orders they were called—was poured out to limit the authority and direct the activities of the officers on the fighting line.

Countless orders, issued by numerous political bureaus, came out in an endless stream, only to confuse and confound those who were directing the fighting. Six new commissions have been set up since July. These are now working on regulations, violation of which may carry the threat of court martial.

These regulations, which have the force of law, have become so numerous that Congress, last July, authorized the publication of a Federal Register, so that those on the fighting front would know what they were permitted and what they were not permitted to do. The new Director of the Register states that the publication of the various orders, regulations, and what not of the various departments and governmental agencies in an average month would make a book of 350 pages. There have been issued thousands of Executive orders covering thousands of pages.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue has issued thousands of rules to govern the payment of taxes alone. The Couzens committee investigation revealed that more than 17,000 such regulations were actually secret and unknown outside the Treasury Department. The Social Security Board, the Labor Relations Board, the Securities and Exchange Commission—not to mention many others—are constantly adding to the formidable bulk of administrative laws, which are just as binding as if they had been issued by Congress itself in the form of a statute.

These harassing impediments to individual endeavor are the bitter fruit of the "new jurisprudence", or "administrative law", which our academic sponsors have grafted on the stem of our democratic Government. They are offshoots of the Old World political theory that the state is omniscient and omnipotent, the source of all wisdom, and the arbiter of our destinies—a theory that has been shocking to the American people up to now. The Lord Chief Justice of England wrote a book dealing with this new method of administrative law by regulation. The conclusion of his study can be summed up in the title of the book, which he called "The New Despotism."

BETTER BUSINESS WITHIN REACH

Furthermore, government itself has undertaken to step in and shoulder out the men who are directing this war on depression. It is operating in 250 fields of private business. The business commander does not know when his head may be laid upon the block.

Political activities thus cripple and hamstring enterprise, but, worse than that, they destroy the spirit, the most important factor in management.

If we really want more active business—and there seems to be some doubt about it—we can have it.

The stage is set. All the elements or factors of trade, as the political economists would designate them, are present. First, there is the need or desire for things. Five years of self-denial and depression have depleted our material supplies. America has been "growing out at the elbow." It will need around 400,000 dwelling places a year for the next decade to bring it back to normal in housing. It will need some $19,000,000,000 worth of machinery to reequip and modernize its industrial plants. It will need vast quantities of furniture, rugs, and other household equipment that has been wearing out.

Second. If human nature has not changed, there are a multitude of things not actually necessary to existence, but none the less desirable, which we would like to have if we could get them—new products, new facilities, new conveniences—eager to get out among us and grow to maturity. In the files of the Patent Office in Washington new devices and processes have been registered by the thousands—to be exact, 56,832 applications in 1935. Within them may be great industries yet unborn.

Third. If we may believe current statistics, an abundance of labor is awaiting employment. In other words, there are millions of men and women eager to exchange their labor for goods if given the chance.

Businessmen think we can recover this business activity we once had and move on to still higher levels, higher standards of living, if we bring common sense to the rescue and revise our beliefs that political agencies can either create new enterprises and new jobs or stimulate trade in present fields.

There is no desire to intensify the mists of doubt and misunderstanding which already obscure the fundamental issues. No man who has observed government and business at first hand, as I have for 20 years, can blink at the fact that the two are basically different in their fundamental usefulness. Each fails miserably when it enters the other's field. The few exceptions prove this. Politics has its job, a tremendous one—the protection of life and property, and adjudication of disagreements between citizens and, greatest of all, perhaps, the negotiations with foreign countries, which, if properly carried out, would prevent calling out 1,000,000 young men with guns to settle matters which it is the province of Government officials to settle by negotiation.

The choice we are put to is not that of following the philosophy of Adam Smith in economics, or of Jefferson in political theory. Rather, we must decide whether we shall set out arbitrarily to create a social order and then mold the individuals into subordination to it, or whether we shall center our efforts on the making of men and women who are themselves competent and are disposed to do what should be done.

LET US LOOK AT THE RECORD

In justification of the supplanting of private enterprise by political agencies, we are warned that our industrial buccaneers will take us around the same old corner and down the same old dreary road. And there seems to be none so poor to do reverence to the road we have come. Memories are so short. It was only 8 or 10 years ago that foreign commissions were flocking to this country to learn why its industrial taillights were showing themselves to the rest of the world. It might be well to recall the substance of their findings as a sort of reminder, bringing the figures up to date.

They found, with about 6 percent of the world's population, the United States has more purchasing power than all Europe combined. This little group has created and owns more than half of the world's wealth, and has distributed it so widely that the condition of the average man is a magnet to attract the nationals of all other countries. So insistent has been their appeal that we have had to build our immigration walls higher and higher to prevent a flood of them from swamping the boat.

[The trouble is that these barriers were not built high enough. While they have kept out individuals, over the top have come alien ideas which we, with eager hands, in our hour of temporary distress, are grasping to implement into the American way of life. These ideas, without exception, give more and more power to political agencies. They are panaceas in extremis, only resorted to when nations have passed over the top and are on the decline.]

Sixty percent of the world's minerals are extracted in America. Half the communication facilities, nearly half the railways and electrical energy, have been developed and are in use here. Individual transportation is triumphantly interpreted in the production of 75 percent of the world's automobile output, about 90 percent of which is kept at home to travel upon 271,845 miles of hard-surfaced highways.

This 6 percent maintains a standard of living which consumes half the world's coffee, half of its tin, half of its rubber, one-fourth of its sugar, three-fourths of its silk, one-third of its coal, two-thirds of its crude petroleum.

It expends more than $3,000,000,000 on education—an amount that tops the total spent by all other countries. Nowhere are there such luxurious buildings, such a wealth of educational facilities. European schools enroll only a small percentage of the number of children attending American schools.

Real and practical independence for women, political and economic; along the old road 11,000,000 women found gainful occupations, 7,000,000 since 1900.

What the common man was able to do for himself in this land of opportunity is eloquently suggested by the millions of depositors in savings banks and building-and-loan associations, by the 65,000,000 life-insurance policyholders, by the millions of security holders, by the 52 percent of farms unencumbered and the 55 percent of freeholders of urban homes.

Our foreign visitors ascribed the phenomenal progress they found to various causes. Natural resources was a favorite. But other countries have, and have had, resources equal to ours. The Indian had had them for thousands of years when Capt. John Smith stepped off the ship at Jamestown. Mass production, they said. But there is no patent on mass production. Other countries have tried it, but without much success because of something lacking—the spirit, the incentive, cooperation of labor, which was present here and which even immigrants are quick to catch. That should have been a cue for the commissions to seek the real causes. It would have sent them back to the cross roads of 1776. From there came the resolution to change the Old World concept, the relation of the individual to his political masters. The politicians were to be the servants, the individuals the masters. The rulers were to be restricted within narrow bounds. While political freedom was the slogan, back of it was economic freedom, a freedom the New World yearned for, demanded, and has practiced for 150 years. The individual was not to be frozen in any caste or held to the trade of his father. If he saw something he felt he could do better than it was being done, his was the right to try his hand. And for whatever success came from his resourcefulness, energy, and talent, individual reward for individual merit, to have and to hold—an incentive for the lowliest worker.

BUSINESS STATESMANSHIP

We were talking about the blindness of the businessman. Some see clearly the larger issues before the Nation; others see them with a sixth sense developed by intensive work in one field of endeavor. The businessman, almost without exception, is inarticulate. His forte has not been rhetoric or the platform manner. If, however, he had the silver tongue of the demagogue and could take time off his job of production and distribution, he would express his business statesmanship something like this:

"Fellow Americans, to all who are stockholders in these United States, young and old, men and women, native born, and the 14,000,000 who have joined us from overseas since 1900:

"Keep an eye on your premises. As a matter of logic, if they are faulty, your conclusions will be wrong. Consider what trade is, what motivates it, who stimulates it, who creates new enterprises, under what conditions do enterprisers best work and under what conditions have they the wherewithal to search out and develop new job-making activities. Consider whether the frontiers are gone; whether this capitalistic system is a thing of evil; whether the American way of life is bankrupt; whether our churches and schools have failed in their job of character building.

"Keep an eye on your premises; as a matter of substance, the things which contribute to your daily life and well-being are in danger. They did not just happen. They are the result of sacrificial thought and toil. They are the house you live in. At the lowest point of distress and depression your living standards in that house were higher than at any time in the history of the world and on any part of the globe.

"Set up a sign, 'Keep off the premises', warning those who would trespass with strange and alien plans lest American institutions be dispossessed and the American tradition be left homeless—a tradition without a country."

SILVER AND THE MONETARY QUESTION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Salt Lake Tribune of May 29 entitled "The Assault on Silver."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Salt Lake Tribune of May 29, 1936]

THE ASSAULT ON SILVER

Once more the monetary question presents itself to the American public as a commanding issue in American politics. Former President Herbert Hoover iterates and reiterates a demand for a return to the gold standard, indifferent to the hopeless inadequacy of gold alone for existing credit needs. Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH challenges the philosophy of Mr. Hoover and other Republicans seeking to attack the Democratic administration in its strongest position—its partial recognition of the monetary serviceability of silver.

Eighty-two professors banded together, as the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy, settle the American monetary problem to their own satisfaction, in one bold statement, demanding repudiation of all that has been done in respect to silver legislation. Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, one of silver's able champions, immediately challenges the views, the reasoning, and the conclusions of these economists, who, in the credulous faith of little children who still believe in Santa Claus, think that the Government can declare itself free of inadequacy and, by declaration alone, return to economic days that are no more.

This particular group is satisfied with a general assumption that silver has failed, that a repeal of the silver legislation alone will put monetary conditions back where they were before the trouble started. They forget that whatever recognition has been accorded silver was precipitated by the failure of gold to meet credit and economic demands. They ignore the fact that gold today is less likely to carry the load, alone and unaided, than it was then.

Whether this is a forerunner of what might be seriously suggested to the platform committee of the Republican national convention cannot yet be determined. In the interest of the West and the ultimate solution of our monetary ills, it is to be hoped that no such silly notion will be entertained.

No more important issue can be presented to the national conventions than that which pertains to money. While the Democratic position on monetary policy is far from perfect, it at least is a gesture in the right direction, aside from its recognition of the needs of a basic western industry. Administration labors in behalf of silver have been measured, if not restrictive or reluctant. There is plenty of room for improvement. One thing is certain and that is that hope of any return to a stable standard of exchange in international trade must look to both silver and gold for fulfillment.

As Senator PITTMAN pertinently reminds this committee, the administration's silver policy is one activity which definitely shows a profit to the Government. He reminds the committee that silver transactions to date show a profit of $500,000,000. On the silver purchased the Government has issued $685,972,458.39 in new silver certificates, at a profit of 45 cents on each dollar issued. He asks if there could be a fairer, a more sensible inflation than that of this country under this policy.

Senator PITTMAN says he is afraid of fiat money and fears managed currency which is not managed on a metallic base. He challenges the professors to show a more stable measure of value than is to be found in silver and gold.

Nevertheless, the argument persists, will persist until after the elections. There can be no doubt but what many of our economic ills are rooted in monetary faults. There is no place where safe and sane remedies, intelligently applied, can do more good for the people, the Nation, and the world. Hence, the time is ripe for party leadership, both Republican and Democratic, to give measured thought and deliberation to the monetary problem.

A mere declaration that a policy, which has paid its own way to a point of recognition, is a failure will not suffice. Notwithstanding the fact that the current policies with respect to silver justify themselves, the service of the white metal still is restricted and controlled. Nationalization of the white metal defeats many of its ambitions in the public service. Until it becomes a convertible medium, available to the people, it will be handicapped. If ever a convertible medium of exchange is reestablished, it will be on the basis of silver and gold and not on either one alone. This should be a good thing for the leadership in both parties to remember. They will do well to scan the remarks of Senator PITTMAN in the Senate, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The reading will provide expert and helpful counsel for all who are inclined to make light of the part silver is to take in the restabilization of world currencies. The Nevada solon has made an enlightening reply to silver critics, one that should be appreciated by his many friends in the West.

FEELERS FROM ABROAD—ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the New York Herald Tribune entitled "Feelers From Abroad", by Walter Lippmann.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

TODAY AND TOMORROW

By Walter Lippmann

FEELERS FROM ABROAD

Two ghosts from the past walked again last week. Mr. Baldwin, the British Prime Minister, raised the question whether by any changes of the Covenant the United States might be induced to join the League of Nations. M. Blum, the next Prime Minister of France, came forward to say that he was not satisfied with the French default on the war debt to America and that he hoped to make some settlement. Since most Americans had supposed that both of these questions were dead and buried, their resurrection at the moment is somewhat puzzling.

It is not easy to make out from Mr. Baldwin's speech what conceivable changes in the Covenant he has in mind. He knows, of course, that there is no possibility whatever that the United States will assume the obligation to judge the aggressor in Europe or in Africa or the obligation to use force of any kind. This is so plainly the overwhelming decision of the American people that no one can be misinformed about it.

It must be, then, that Mr. Baldwin is considering the complete abandonment by the League of any attempt to judge the aggressor or to impose sanctions. Fifteen years ago even the most irreconcilable opponents of the League would have been tempted. But much water has flowed over the dam and today there would be little point in making such a proposal to the American people. They would say that if the League gives up its attempt to prohibit war, what would be gained by the United States joining it? The time has gone by when we flatter ourselves with the thought that a determined aggressor will hold back because he may outrage American opinion and have inflicted upon him some disapproving speeches and newspaper editorials. The American people would, therefore, say to themselves that if the League is emasculated, it can mean only one thing, namely that the European powers are turning to old-fashioned military alliances as a substitute. And they would probably shrink even more from a League which had no substance, but had concealed behind it a series of military alliances, than they would from the Covenant itself. Certainly the risks of entanglement would be greater.

The feeling is very firmly fixed in America that if the European powers cannot keep peace in Europe no one can keep it for them. The argument that the League is not universal enough is singularly unimpressive. For in the Ethiopian affair, surely it was not the absence of America, Japan, and Germany but the cross-purposes and indecision of Britain and France which produced the fiasco. There is no reason to think that if we had joined in the ineffective sanctions that they would have been much more effective, and nothing we could possibly have contributed would have made it any safer for the British Navy to close the highways to the Italian conqueror.

No matter how universal the League becomes, the test will always be whether the powers nearest the aggressor are willing to fight him. If they are not, the distant nations can add nothing of substance to the League; if they are willing to fight him, there will be in that part of the world the substance of collective security.

The problem, therefore, is not whether the United States will come to Europe armed with oratory and resolutions but whether the pacific nations, particularly Britain and France, mean to hang together or eventually to be hanged separately. The problem of collective security in Europe is an Anglo-French problem, not a world problem, and all proposals which look elsewhere are a flight from the realities.

M. Blum's feeler about the war debts is presumably to be regarded not only as a handsome and honorable gesture but as a move in the difficult financial problem with which his Government must deal. In some form or other he must stop the French deflation and very probably he must readjust the international value of the franc.

Almost surely he has no appetite for a straight devaluation on the American or Belgian model, because on these matters French opinion is as full of prejudice as the most orthodox Republican here. Moreover, it is probable that France has no aptitude for a managed currency on the British or Scandinavian model, and would be too proud to join the sterling bloc. Therefore, what France needs is an international stabilization on gold by Britain, the United States, and herself.

The United States is willing. Britain is not. For the British think rather well of their managed currency and, moreover, they have it firmly fixed in their minds that they must not stabilize unless the war debts are settled and the American capital market is reopened for foreign lending. They may be right in thinking that if we refuse to lend abroad and continue to hold them in default, they might not be able to maintain their currency on gold. In any event, M. Blum no doubt understands that he would be able to deal more successfully with Mr. Neville Chamberlain if London saw the chance to settle the war debts honorably and practically.

It would be a tragic error to discourage the idea for it is to our interest, no less than to Europe's, to reach a settlement. But, of course, neither the French franc, nor the French people, nor M. Blum's government can afford to wait until the complicated business of settling the war debts is carried through. That cannot be done short of 8 months—that is, before the next Congress at the earliest. It will be done the more readily if before that time the French have solved their altogether unnecessary crisis.

ACCEPTANCE SPEECH OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT—ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by John Jay Daly, appearing in the Washington Evening Star of June 4, entitled "Labor to Sell Rally Tickets to Raise Democratic Fund."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of June 4, 1936]

LABOR TO SELL RALLY TICKETS TO RAISE DEMOCRATIC FUND

By John Jay Daly

In one of the greatest political rallies ever staged in America, organized labor plans to mass wage earners in every stadium, baseball park, music hall, and auditorium available on the night of June 27 to hear over radio amplifiers the acceptance speech of President Roosevelt—at $1 admission fee.

Thus it is hoped to raise a huge campaign fund to help reelect the President and to fight "predatory interests" and all those opposed to social legislation as embodied in the New Deal.

Red, white, and blue tickets, split in two parts, one half to be used as admission to the stadia and the other to be held as a souvenir, are being sold throughout America, it was learned today.

George M. Harrison, chairman of the Railroad Labor Executives Association and national chairman of the labor finance division, Democratic National Committee, is staging Washington's end of the show, with Joseph Davies, general chairman, and John Locher, president of the Central Labor Union, acting as chairman for the Washington area.

"We are getting enthusiastic response to this appeal", Mr. Harrison said today.

Chester M. Wright, handling publicity for the Washington end, said that labor is not attempting to run a separate show in staging this mammoth get-together of wage earners, but is acting hand-in-hand with the Democratic National Committee.

At the same time it was learned that Carl Boyer is really father of the idea to gather millions of laboring men in outdoor enclosures on the night President Roosevelt broadcasts his speech to the Nation.

In labor circles today it was estimated that this one move alone will reap a harvest of at least $2,500,000. That money will come from the organized sale of tickets. Paid admissions at gates of meeting places may run the total over the $3,000,000 mark.

As explained by Wright, the raising of funds in this manner is based on the fundamental idea of the President's birthday balls—started in 1934.

COMMITTEES BEING ORGANIZED

For the past 2 weeks Boyer has been flying the length and breadth of the land organizing local committees—similar to the one in Washington. The committees, in turn, are selling tickets and arranging for the mass meetings, renting parks, and having installed radio equipment. One of the features will be the introduction of the President in each locality by the leading Democrat of that city or town—even hamlet. To do this requires the installation of telephone wires, quite a complicated engineering feat; but the leading radio engineers of the Nation have been called upon and are now working out details.

Aside from the President's address, it is planned to have music and entertainment, even old-fashioned torchlight processions.

At present the local site has not been selected, but it undoubtedly will be Griffith Stadium or one of the larger football fields—probably the stadium in Brookland, at Catholic University, with a seating capacity of 20,000 and standing room for 10,000 more.

While local groups are assembled all over the country, the mammoth demonstration will be at Franklin Field in Philadelphia, when the entire Democratic convention moves out to that stadium to hear the President in person.

HARRISON'S LETTER

First formal move to make this plan a success was broached in a letter sent out from Washington by Harrison. That letter was addressed to all leading labor men in the United States. It said, in part:

"DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have agreed to undertake a task in which I hope for the help of all wage earners. Our task is to raise campaign funds to reelect the President. We have no other task. The plan is simplicity itself. * * *

"It is the plan this year to have the entire national campaign fund raised by the time the Democratic national convention closes. After that the decks will be cleared for actual campaigning.

PLAN UNFOLDED

"Here is the plan, worked out by the Democratic National Committee, and in which we are helping:

"The President will accept the nomination on the night of June 27. On that night the Democratic national convention will be moved to Franklin Field. The entire stadium will be filled with guests—70,000 of them. In every stadium in the country and in thousands of halls and other meeting places similar gatherings will be held. The ceremonies in Franklin Field will be broadcast to all of the meetings throughout the country. Each person attending one of these meetings will pay $1 admission. Each person attending will receive a card certifying that he is a Roosevelt nominator, and this he may keep permanently. And through this simple but united effort the campaign fund will be raised."

SPECIAL TICKET FOR UNIONS

It is pointed out that organized labor will have a separate and distinctive ticket—and this ticket will be embossed. Some of them, already out, look like fine engraving. One of the features of this ticket is that it will be good for admission to any field, anywhere in the country. The Jim Farley tickets, so called, are good only for local fields where issued.

As Harrison explains it, "a special ticket is being issued for our use so that definite credit will come to every participant and so that there will be definite identification of labor's participation down to the last man."

That part of the admission ticket held out as a certificate will bear the name of the individual purchaser, inscribed by the local chairman. So labor girds its loins for the coming campaign; and in local labor circles today it was implied that the last decision of the Supreme Court, knocking out the New York minimum-wage scale, will be used as a spur to further sale of these tickets.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. The first three pages of the calendar have been called perhaps 8 or 10 times and objections have been made to all the measures on those pages. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the call of the calendar, commencing at the top of page 8. Of course, I do not wish to take time discussing the suggestion. If there is objection, we may proceed under the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, the reason for the request is due to the fact that on each call of the calendar the measures referred to have been objected to repeatedly, and to expedite consideration of the call of the calendar the Senator submits the request without regard to the merits of the measures.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. I anticipate they would all be objected to again.

Mr. MCNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Arkansas is granted. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar, beginning at the top of page 8.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EMPLOYMENT OF LABOR UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD a telegram sent a few days ago to a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. My understanding is that a like telegram was sent to all the members of the committee:

Chairman SUMNERS advises that a meeting of the House Judiciary Committee will be held tomorrow morning 10 o'clock for the purpose of taking action upon Healey-Walsh bill. Lack of a quorum at today's meeting prevented action upon this measure. Labor is tremendously interested in this bill and firmly expects it to be enacted into law before Congress adjourns. For this reason I respectfully urge you to be present at meeting of the Judiciary Committee tomorrow morning as herein stated. Your absence from this meeting will be construed as opposition to the measure and as being unfriendly to labor. Our representative will be present at tomorrow morning's meeting. Do not fail us. Be present.

(Signed) WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

The meeting was held and Mr. Green's representatives were standing outside the committee door. I thought this telegram might interest the Lobby Committee, which is investigating activities of this sort.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I doubt the propriety of the Senate questioning the proceedings of a committee of the body at the other end of the Capitol. That is all I have to say on the subject at this time.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next bill in order on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 4886) providing for the employment of skilled shorthand reporters in the executive branch of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON (and other Senators). Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The bill (S. 3500) to develop a strong American merchant marine to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALSH subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] what became of the merchant-marine bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was passed over.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in connection with that bill, a letter from the ex-mayor of Boston.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON PORT AUTHORITY,
Boston, Mass., May 29, 1936.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I sincerely hope that Congress will not adjourn without the passage of the subsidy bill, reported in the Senate, or the House bill. As you know, I have been interested in the merchant marine since I went to Congress over 40 years ago, having written the minority report in 1899, and I was very much in touch with the situation during the World War, in which the position that we found ourselves, from a shipping standpoint, was lamentable. As far as I can judge the news from across the water, while the probabilities are that we will not have a conflict for a couple of years, the situation is most tense.

A merchant marine is the right arm of the Navy. Congress has just appropriated more than $500,000,000 for a navy, and without an adequate merchant marine it would be the height of futility for the United States to be called upon to go into a world conflict.

As you know, I am a member of the Boston Port Authority, and we are all very keen about this matter. At least the provisions for regular payments, which I think were contained in the House bill, ought to be passed by the Senate. I have spoken twice within the last few days over the radio on this subject and I am prepared to telegraph at once to the White House to make an appointment and urge the President not to think of letting Congress adjourn without at least meeting the obligations of the Government at the present time. I think the President owes it to us, who have been fighting for Democratic success in this State for half a century, to be able to say that a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President did not abandon its plain duty in the matter of righteous support of the present merchant marine.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN F. FITZGERALD.

Please wire me what Senator COPELAND has to say on the matter.

AMENDMENT OF CANAL ZONE CODE

The bill (H. R. 6719) to amend the Canal Zone Code was announced as next in order.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill has no relation to tolls. It merely makes minor changes in the Canal Zone Code, which was passed by the Congress in 1934; and the bill is confined in its application to the Canal Zone. It clarifies existing provisions of local law, and restores provisions which were inadvertently omitted from the code.

I do not believe there is any valid objection to the bill. Its enactment is urged by the Governor of the Canal Zone and is recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I may state for the information of the Senator that on several occasions I have been in conference with representatives of labor in the Canal Zone, and they are objecting very strenuously to the passage of the bill; but in view of the fact that the Senator from Arkansas has made this explanation pertaining to the proposed legislation embodied in the bill, I shall be very happy indeed to confer with the representatives of labor who are here from the Canal Zone, and perhaps we shall be able to iron out the differences.

I see in the Chamber at this time my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], who is thoroughly familiar with the provisions of the bill; and I suggest that we get together sometime during the coming week, if the Senator from Oklahoma thinks proper, and see what we can do.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in the last Congress an act was passed giving labor in the Canal Zone some little benefits. It is held by labor in the Canal Zone that this bill will interfere with the law that now exists; and because of such interference they are very much opposed to the bill. If that objection could be eradicated, I am certain there would be no objection from that source; but, so far, the bill in its present form would be prejudicial to existing law which was passed in the last Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection having been made, the bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3075) for the relief of John L. Summers, former disbursing clerk, Treasury Department, and various former Treasurers of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of the bill. [A pause.] Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JAMES W. GRIST

The bill (S. 3879) for the relief of James W. Grist was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions and limitations of sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and directed to receive and consider, when filed, the claim of James W. Grist for disability alleged to have been incurred by him in the course of his employment at the Government Printing Office between September 1928 and June 1929 and to determine said claim upon its merits under the provisions of said act: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

CAPT. JAMES W. DARR

The bill (S. 3405) for the relief of Capt. James W. Darr was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint James W. Darr, formerly a captain, Infantry,

United States Army, a captain of Infantry, United States Army, and to place him upon the retired list of the Army as a captain, with the retired pay of that grade: Provided, That no back pay, allowance, or emoluments shall become due because of the passage of this act.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 11690) relating to the admissibility in evidence of certain writings and records made in the regular course of business was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, OMAHA, NEBR.

The bill (S. 4376) authorizing the State of Iowa, acting through its State highway commission, and the State of Nebraska, acting through its department of roads and irrigation, to construct, maintain, and operate a free or toll bridge across the Missouri River at or near Dodge Street in the city of Omaha, Nebr., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the State of Iowa, acting through its State highway commission, and the State of Nebraska, acting through its department of roads and irrigation, are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the east end of Dodge Street in the city of Omaha, Nebr., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the said States all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said States are hereby authorized to operate such bridge free of tolls, or, at their discretion, to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and in case rates of toll are so fixed, such rates shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to liquidate, within a period of not to exceed 10 years from the date of completion of such bridge, all or any part of the bonds held by the United States and outstanding against the bridge constructed in accordance with section 4 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States", approved June 10, 1930. The said States may enter into an agreement or agreements with the United States or other interested parties for the liquidation of all or any part of such bonds held by the United States and the tolls authorized to be charged by this act shall be used only for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of any such agreement or agreements. When a fund sufficient to meet the requirements of any such agreement or agreements shall have been provided, the bridge authorized to be constructed by this act shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls. Said States may construct such bridge with the aid of any Federal funds appropriated and apportioned to said States for expenditure under the Federal Highway Act, as amended and supplemented, and the limitations of such act, as amended and supplemented, relating to the construction of toll bridges with Federal funds, and the use of tolls collected for transit over bridges so constructed and operated shall not be applicable to the tolls authorized to be charged under the provisions of this act. If tolls are charged, an accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches; the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same; and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

RECALCITRANCY OF WITNESSES BEFORE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8875) to clarify section 104 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title II, sec. 194), which was read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill which is recommended by those who sponsor it and to which I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, between lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to insert the following:

That section 102 (U. S. C., title II, sec. 192) of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 102. Every person who (a) having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony upon any matter which is under inquiry by either House or by any committee or subcommittee of either House of Congress wilfully makes default or (b) having appeared refuses to answer any question pertinent to the matter under inquiry or (c) after service upon him of a subpena issued by authority of either House in connection with such inquiry (1) fails to permit examination as requested by such subpena by either House or by any committee or subcommittee of either House, or by a duly authorized agent of such House, committee, or subcommittee, of such books, records, papers, documents, or correspondence in his possession, custody, or control as such House, committee, or subcommittee has reason to believe may be pertinent to the inquiry, or (2) fails to produce and deliver to, or fails to permit to be copied by such House, committee, subcommittee, or agent any books, records, papers, documents, or correspondence in his possession, custody, or control which are pertinent to such inquiry, as required by such subpena, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than 1 month nor more than 12 months."

On page 1, it is proposed to strike out the matter beginning with the word "Whenever" in line 5, through and including the word "Congress" in line 11, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whenever any person fails to comply with the provisions of section 102 of the Revised Statutes.

It is also proposed to amend the title so as to read: "An act to clarify sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title II, secs. 192 and 194)."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. At the last call of the calendar this bill was under consideration, and was passed by the Senate. I happened to be chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill. After the bill had been passed I was called from the Chamber and informed that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee desired to offer an amendment to the bill. Therefore I asked that the votes by which it had been ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered, and the bill returned to the calendar. I think the Senator from Florida has now offered the amendment which it was desired at that time to have offered. Is that correct?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is precisely the case.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, with all the confusion attendant on the call of the calendar I was unable to hear what was said about this measure, and am now unadvised as to the purport of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. It seems to be an imposing document, and I doubt whether it is practicable at this call of the calendar to consider a bill with such an amendment as has been offered by the Senator, and for that reason I shall now object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a brief statement?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. This amendment is important because at the present time there is no law applying to recalcitrancy of witnesses at the first stage of a congressional hearing.

Section 102 of the Revised Statutes, as it now stands, provides penalties for persons who improperly delay or obstruct congressional investigations by being recalcitrant at the second stage of investigations, namely, in the course of committee hearings. There has recently developed considerable obstruction to the work of congressional investigating committees by delays and refusals in the first stage of committee work, namely, during the highly essential preliminary inspection of files by investigating committees prior to hearings. The amendment now proposed makes the penalty provision of section 102, which is now applicable to persons who obstruct committee investigations in the second stage of an investigation, applicable also to persons who obstruct in the first stage. Without this, investigations can be seriously slowed up and defeated at least in part, and data essential for adoption of effective legislation are as a practical matter withheld from Congress. Further, the slowing up of investigations through such obstruction adds materially to the cost of conducting investigations by the respective Houses of Congress.

The necessity for this proposed legislation grows out of our experience in connection with stock exchange and bank investigations, where people were obstructing the hearings before the committee. Such conduct is covered by the section as it now exists. But where investigations are obstructed by persons who oppose the field operations, examiners' activities, and that sort of thing, in the preliminary stage of an investigation, no penalty is provided. This bill simply extends the penalty to that stage of the investigation.

For instance, we had occasion to summon a witness to produce his files. He did not desire to give access to them to the investigators and the accountants, and we subpenaed him to produce them. He produced them before the committee. The committee had not time or opportunity to investigate files and records itself. It must have people who do that kind of work, accountants, and other investigators. It is not sufficient that the records be produced before the committee. The thing is to make them available to the representatives and agents of the committee, the accountants who are making the investigation. This measure simply provides for penalties for obstructing investigations at the beginning.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, was the matter submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; and all members of the committee are in favor of it.

Mr. McNARY. Is the Senator offering it as a committee amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am offering it with the consent of those who have reported the bill. The Senator from New Mexico is agreeable to the amendment, and there is no objection to it from any source so far as I know.

Mr. McNARY. It has not, in fact, been submitted to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary? The chairman of the subcommittee told the Senator that he favored it, but there has been no action of the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know as to that, but I know this amendment was in contemplation when the Senator from New Mexico moved that the vote be reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I can answer the question of the Senator from Oregon. It was not physically submitted to the committee after the report was made, but the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], if he had been present, would have offered this amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, may we have order? I am trying to hear what is going on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please cease conversation so that business may be transacted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if we are to have orderly procedure, and give investigating committees authority properly to develop their cases, it seems to me this amendment of the law is absolutely necessary. I do not see any possible objection to it. Someone must decide whether files or letter or other documents are proper to be introduced before a committee as evidence. This measure will give the representatives of a committee authority to present such a matter to the committee and to sort the evidence.

Just as the Senator from Florida has said, a committee cannot do all the mechanical work. Someone must decide about such questions. But such a matter would come before the committee, and the committee would make a decision, instead of the person who has the evidence making it. If that person decides that something is immaterial, he merely says so, and the committee does not get anywhere. Work of committees has often been blocked, as those who have had any experience along those lines will be able to testify.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. This is a matter of such moment it has attracted national attention in some phases of our committee investigations, so I think the legislation proposed to be enacted should not be brought up at a time like this, when it involves a matter of so much importance. I therefore ask that the bill go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only importance of it is that in all hearings and investigations by committees there must be a starting point. The penalties now apply to obstructions before the committees themselves. This applies to obstructions to accountants and agents and other representatives of a committee in the field. It is very important to begin with. Without this, investigations cannot be made complete.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think very much harm could be done between now and the time when Congress will convene again, and I insist that this is a matter of such importance that the bill should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

UMATILLA AND WHITMAN NATIONAL FORESTS

The bill (H. R. 9483) to extend the provisions of the Forest Exchange Act, as amended, to certain lands, so that they may become part of the Umatilla and Whitman National Forests was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have not read the bill which was reported by my colleague [Mr. STEIWER], but it carries out the general purpose of an exchange bill, which is designed to permit the Forest Service to exchange lands so that they can solidify and better control and administer the forests. I think it is merely one of the consolidation exchange bills. I do not know that it is different from any other such measure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will it involve any loss of land by the Government, or will it bring within the Forest Service lands which ought to be part of the public domain?

Mr. McNARY. As I tried to state, I could not answer that question; but nearly all exchange bills involve the blocking or the solidifying within the national forests of timber lands which are privately owned. I am willing, if there is any objection, that the bill may go over, so that I may look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

STRUCTURES ALONG RIVERS AND HARBORS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire, at this time, to file a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on Senate bill 3071, providing for the placing of improvements on the areas between the shore and bulkhead lines in rivers and harbors, was agreed to yesterday.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The bill relates to the Government paying for structures which have been erected on Government property below the high-water mark on rivers and harbors. An amendment was adopted which eliminated the rivers. When the time comes to make the motion, I expect to address the Senate, because I desire to give the Senate my views on the matter, and the Senate will be at liberty, of course, to take such action as it sees fit to take.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is a Senate bill, is it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I did not understand the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we not have order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I filed a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on Senate bill 3071 was agreed to yesterday.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, that is perfectly proper, but I hope the Senator will sometime today or very soon give us an opportunity to make an explanation of the bill and the reasons for its enactment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I shall be very glad to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota enters a motion that the vote by which the conference report on Senate bill 3071 was agreed to to be reconsidered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, to what bill does the Senator make reference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps the Senator from Minnesota will again state the nature of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the bill provides that where the Government has given a permit to a private individual to erect buildings or structures of any kind upon Government property below the high-water mark, when the Government shall use such property for navigation purposes, for the development of navigation, such structures, under the permit under which they are built, must be moved. The bill provides that the Government shall pay for the structures built under a revocable permit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered, and the clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 11688) providing for a change in the design of the 50-cent pieces authorized to be coined in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 266) for the appointment of boards to study and report upon the Atlantic-Gulf Ship Canal project, Florida, and the Passamaquoddy tidal power project, Maine, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4552) to extend the retirement privilege to the Director, Assistant Directors, inspectors, and special agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the request of an absent Senator, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], I ask that this bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR PENNSYLVANIA

The bill (S. 4664) authorizing the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Pennsylvania ask unanimous consent to have the House bill substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 11072, being Calendar No. 2415, be substituted for Senate bill 4664, Calendar No. 2216, and that the House bill be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11072) authorizing the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 4664 will be indefinitely postponed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4673) to authorize the Attorney General to provide instruction and information on the subject of crime control was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4370) to repeal a proviso relating to teaching or advocating communism in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and appearing in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. CONNALLY asked that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FORT MARION NATIONAL MONUMENT, FLORIDA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12220) to authorize the adjustment of the boundary of the Fort Marion National Monument, Florida, in the vicinity of Fort Marion Circle, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment to insert at the end of the bill two new paragraphs, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to adjust the boundary of the Fort Marion National Monument, Florida, in the vicinity of Fort Marion Circle, and for said purpose is authorized to convey to adjacent property owners, upon such terms and conditions as may be deemed satisfactory to him, title to such portions of monument land as he may determine to be no longer necessary for said monument, or he may accept in consideration therefor title to such portion of any adjacent property as he may deem desirable to satisfactorily adjust the boundary of said monument.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept donations of land, interests in land or buildings, structures, and other property adjacent to and within a distance of 1,500 feet of the boundary of the Fort Marion National Monument in the vicinity of Fort Marion Circle and the Old City Gates, and donations of funds for the purchase and maintenance thereof, the title and evidence of title to lands acquired to be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That he may acquire on behalf of the United States out of any donated funds, by purchase at prices deemed by him reasonable or by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888, such tracts of land adjacent to the boundary of the Fort Marion National Monument in the vicinity of Fort Marion Circle and the Old City Gates as may be deemed desirable by him for addition to the monument.

SEC. 3. That any lands acquired on behalf of the United States under the provisions of this act shall be, and the same are hereby, added to the Fort Marion National Monument and shall be subject to the laws, rules, and regulations applicable to said monument.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with the bill relative to the Fort Marion National Monument, Florida, House bill 12220, I wish to say for the RECORD that I objected to the bill the last time the calendar was called; but after consultation with my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] I find that he has added an amendment which answers the criticism I had in mind. Mrs. ROGERS, of the House, also spoke to me about the bill. I am quite satisfied that all interests are duly protected. I have been approached by citizens of Florida in behalf of the bill.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 415) to carry out the intention of Congress with reference to the claims of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota against the United States, which was read.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] should explain the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on a former occasion the Congress passed a jurisdictional bill with respect to the Chippewa Indians. Under that bill, claims were filed in the Court of Claims and the issue determined. After the Court of Claims had determined the matter, it developed that the provisions of the original bill were not broad enough to do what the Indians needed done for them. The present bill seeks to broaden the claims or the basis of the suit, and it provides for an appeal to the Supreme Court from the Court of Claims. The Bureau of the Budget, of course, is against all of these bills and makes an adverse report on this one.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether there is involved in the bill a matter which was brought to my attention; namely, that in an action brought in behalf of the Chippewa Indians some time ago the attorneys received a large fee; then, later on, another bill was passed giving them an additional or supplementary fee to the one they got in the beginning, so there was a double fee?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am not advised about that matter. The Secretary of the Interior approves all the fees, and as a rule in jurisdictional bills the fees are limited to 10 percent. In this particular case I cannot answer the question.

Mr. KING. Why was not the claim, when it was brought into the court in the beginning, broad enough to include all the questions at issue? The Senator, as a lawyer, knows that it is quite improper to divide a cause of action into two or three suits. All the controversies should be brought into court at one time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. When these jurisdictional bills are passed, a request goes to the Comptroller General to make an audit of all claims which have been paid to the Indians from the beginning. Until that review and search is made, of course, attorneys are unable properly to prepare their cases. I suppose when this report was made, the attorneys inadvertently overlooked some of the other rights of the Indians. At any rate, the original bill was not broad enough to meet all the rights which the Indians asserted. The bill now before the Senate is for the purpose of correcting that defect.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CROW TRIBE OF INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to amend the act of July 3, 1926, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Crow Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes" (44 Stat. L. 807), which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment at the end of the joint resolution to add two additional sections, so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That section 1 of the act of July 3, 1926, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Crow Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes" (44 Stat. L. 807), be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal (not by writ of certiorari) to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitations, to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment on the merits in any and all claims arising under or growing out of the treaty of Fort Laramie, dated September 17, 1851 (Fourth Kappler, p. 1065), between the United States and the Crow Indian Nation, and the treaty dated May 7, 1868 (15 Stat. 649), between the United States and the Crow Indians of Montana, or arising under or growing out of the Executive order dated July 2, 1873 (First Kappler, p. 855), or any subsequent Executive order; the act of Congress approved April 15, 1874 (18 Stat. 28), or any subsequent act of Congress or agreement with said Crow Indian Nation, including claims growing out of any cessions of land by said Indians to the United States for an inadequate consideration under mistake of fact, irrespective of any treaty stipulation entered into under such mistake of fact, which said Crow Indian Nation or any branch thereof may have against the United States, which claims have not heretofore been determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States. Jurisdiction also is hereby conferred upon the said courts to determine whether or not any provision in any such treaty, Executive order, or act of Congress above set forth has been violated or breached by any act or acts of Congress or by any treaty made by the United States with any other Indian tribe or nation, and, if so, to render judgment for the damages resulting therefrom."

SEC. 2. For complying with the terms of this joint resolution case no. H-248, in the Court of Claims, entitled "The Crow Nation or Tribe of Indians of Montana against the United States", decided on March 4, 1935, is hereby reinstated.

SEC. 3. Joint resolution of August 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 655), "to carry out the intention of Congress with reference to the claims of the Crow Tribe of Indians of Montana, and any band thereof, against the United States", is hereby repealed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] whether the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs have approved this bill?

Mr. WHEELER. They have approved the bill and asked that it be passed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I objected to the bill the last time it was called on the calendar. I raised certain criticisms regarding it. However, since talking with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I feel there is no reason why it should not be passed at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8940) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States" approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CABINET GORGE, CLARK FORK OF COLUMBIA RIVER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4062) to provide for the development of hydroelectric power at Cabinet Gorge on the Clark Fork of the Columbia River in the proximity of the Montana-Idaho State line, and for the rehabilitation of irrigation districts, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That (a) in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L. 388), known as the reclamation law, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to make surveys and investigations to (1) determine the power markets that might be served from a suitable hydroelectric power project at the Cabinet Gorge site on the Clark Fork of the Columbia River in the proximity of the Montana-Idaho State line; and (2), provided such markets can be developed, to make further investigations to determine the design and cost of a dam to be constructed at said site.

(b) The Secretary of the Interior shall submit to the President and Congress a report, together with his recommendations on the investigations herein authorized, not later than 8 months from the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the reclamation fund, not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of this measure.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, the title of the bill, in view of the amendment, does not now correctly reflect the contents of the bill. With the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, the bill merely provides that a survey may be made of the project with funds contained in the revolving fund of the Reclamation Bureau. Surveys are being made in many places and are paid for from that fund.

The matter involved in the bill is a very important one. The bill involves the interests of a considerable number of persons in my State. Certain preliminary surveys have been made, and the Secretary of the Interior and the Reclamation Bureau feel that the people in that section of my State are entitled to a survey. No appropriation is to be made under the bill, except that there is an authorization to the Reclamation Bureau to use certain funds in their perpetual fund or revolving fund for this purpose. I think it is an important matter and a desirable one.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that the reclamation fund was established for a given and specific purpose. Does the purpose of the bill transcend the purpose that was back of and is the basis of the reclamation appropriation fund?

Mr. POPE. I will say to the Senator that it does not. Portions of that fund are used for surveys and investigations. It is not limited strictly to construction purposes.

Mr. KING. Portions of the fund are used for reclamation purposes?

Mr. POPE. Reclamation and power, combined.

Mr. KING. For the reclamation of the land belonging to the Government?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that this bill simply authorizes a survey and investigation, and then the matter is to be reported back for the action of the Congress.

Mr. POPE. The Senator is entirely correct. The bill provides purely for a survey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for a survey of the Cabinet Gorge, on the Clark Fork of the Columbia River."

ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE OF CERTAIN WRITINGS AND RECORDS

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 2060, being House bill 11690, relating to the admissibility in evidence of certain writings and records made in the regular course of business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when the calendar was called I objected to the consideration of that bill. After further consideration and brief study, I am willing to withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], who is necessarily absent, I offer the amendment proposed by him to the bill; and by way of brief explanation I should like to state that the bill relates only to the admissibility of evidence in criminal cases.

The original act permitted, upon certain proof, the admission of certain documents located in the United States with respect to the United States. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would extend a similar privilege to documents without the United States. The Department of Justice, the Treasury Department, and the State Department have approved the bill and the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from Nebraska has stated that he is advised that the bill and his amendment accord with the program of the President.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that the bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. AUSTIN. It has. The amendment, however, has not. The amendment is now offered in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 2. Any book, paper, statement, record, account, writing, or other document, or any portion thereof, of whatever character and in whatever form, as well as any copy thereof equally with the original, which is not in the United States (hereinafter referred to as a foreign document) shall, when duly certified as hereinafter provided, be admissible in evidence in any criminal action or proceeding in any court of the United States if the court shall find, from all the testimony taken with respect to such foreign document pursuant to a commission executed under the provisions of this act, that such document (or the original thereof in case such document is a copy) satisfies the requirements of section 1 of this act, unless in the event that the genuineness of such document is denied, any party to such criminal action or proceeding making such denial shall establish to the satisfaction of the court that such document is not genuine. Nothing contained herein shall be deemed to require authentication under the provisions of this act of any foreign documents which may otherwise be properly authenticated by law.

SEC. 3. (a) The testimony of any witness in a foreign country may be taken either on oral or written interrogatories, or on interrogatories partly oral and partly written, pursuant to a commission issued, as hereinafter provided, for the purpose of determining whether any foreign documents sought to be used in any criminal action or proceeding in any court of the United States are genuine, and whether the requirements of section 1 of this act are satisfied with respect to any such document (or the original thereof in case such document is a copy). Application for the issuance of a commission for such purpose may be made to the court in which such action or proceeding is pending by the United States or any other party thereto, after 5 days' notice in writing by the applicant party, or his attorney, to the opposite party, or his attorney of record, which notice shall state the names and addresses of witnesses whose testimony is to be taken and the time when it is desired to take such testimony. In granting such application the court shall issue a commission for the purpose of taking the testimony sought by the applicant, addressed to any consular officer of the United States conveniently located for the purpose. In cases of testimony taken on oral or partly oral interrogatories, the court shall make provisions in the commission for the selection as hereinafter provided of foreign counsel to represent each party (except the United States) to the criminal action or proceeding in which the foreign documents in question are to be used, unless such party has, prior to the issuance of the commission, notified the court that he does not desire the selection of foreign counsel to represent him at the time of taking of such testimony. In cases of testimony taken on written interrogatories, such provision shall be made only upon the request of any such party prior to the issuance of such commission. Selection of foreign counsel shall be made by the party whom such foreign counsel is to represent within 10 days prior to the taking of testimony or by the court from which the commission issued, upon the request of such party made within such time.

(b) Any consular officer to whom a commission is addressed to take testimony, who is interested in the outcome of the criminal action or proceeding in which the foreign documents in question are to be used or has participated in the prosecution of such action or proceeding, whether by investigations, preparation of evidence, or otherwise, may be disqualified on his own motion or on that of the United States or any other party to such criminal action or proceeding made to the court from which the commission issued at any time prior to the execution thereof. If, after notice and hearing, the court grants the motion, it shall instruct the consular officer thus disqualified to send the commission to any other consular officer of the United States named by the court, and such other officer shall execute the commission according to its terms and shall for all purposes be deemed the officer to whom the commission is addressed.

(c) The provisions of this act applicable to consular officers shall be applicable to diplomatic officers pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the President.

SEC. 4. The consular officer to whom any commission authorized under this act is addressed shall take testimony in accordance with its terms. Every person whose testimony is taken shall be cautioned and sworn to testify the whole truth and carefully examined. His testimony shall be reduced to writing or typewriting by the consular officer taking the testimony, or by some person under his personal supervision, or by the witness himself, in the presence of the consular officer and by no other person, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing or typewriting, be subscribed by the witness. Every foreign document, with respect to which testimony is taken, shall be annexed to such testimony and subscribed by each witness who appears for the purpose of establishing the genuineness of such document. When counsel for all the parties attend the examination of any witness whose testimony is to be taken on written interrogatories, they may consent that oral interrogatories in addition to those accompanying the commission may be put to the witness. The consular officer taking any testimony shall require an interpreter to be present when his services are needed or are requested by any party or his attorney.

SEC. 5. If the consular officer executing any commission authorized under this act shall be satisfied, upon all the testimony taken, that a foreign document is genuine, he shall certify such document to be genuine under the seal of his office. Such certification shall include a statement that he is not subject to disqualification under the provisions of section 3 (b) of this act. He shall thereupon transmit, by mail, such foreign documents, together with the record of all testimony taken and the commission which has been executed, to the clerk of the court from which such commission issued, in the manner in which his official dispatches are transmitted to the Government. The clerk receiving any executed commission shall open it and shall make any foreign documents and record of testimony, transmitted with such commission, available for inspection by the parties to the criminal action or proceeding in which such documents are to be used, and said parties shall be furnished copies of such documents free of charge.

SEC. 6. A copy of any foreign document of record or on file in a public office of a foreign country, or political subdivision thereof, certified by the lawful custodian of such document, shall be admissible in evidence in any court of the United States when authenticated by a certificate of a consular officer of the United States resident in such foreign country, under the seal of his office, certifying that the copy of such foreign document has been certified by the lawful custodian thereof. Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to alter, amend, or repeal section 907 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 689).

SEC. 7. (a) The consular fees prescribed under section 1745 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 22, sec. 127), for official services in connection with the taking of testimony under this act, and the fees of any witness whose testimony is taken shall be paid by the party who applied for the commission pursuant to which such testimony was taken. Every witness under this act shall be entitled to receive, for each day's attendance, fees prescribed under section 8 of this act. Every foreign counsel selected pursuant to a commission issued on application of the United States, and every interpreter whose services are required by a consular officer under the provisions of this act, shall be paid by the United States, such compensation, together with such personal and incidental expense upon verified statements filed with the consular officer, as he may allow. Compensation and expenses of foreign counsel selected pursuant to a commission issued on application of any party other than the United States shall be paid by the party whom such counsel represents and shall be allowed in the same manner.

(b) Whenever any party makes affidavit, prior to the issuance of a commission for the purpose of taking testimony, that he is not possessed of sufficient means and is actually unable to pay any fees and costs incurred under this section, such fees and costs shall, upon order of the court, be paid in the same manner as fees and costs are paid which are chargeable to the United States.

(c) Any appropriation available for the payment of fees and costs in the case of witnesses subpenaed in behalf of the United States in criminal cases shall be available for any fees or costs which the United States is required to pay under this section.

SEC. 8. The President is authorized to prescribe regulations governing the manner of executing and returning commissions by consular officers under the provisions of this act and schedules of fees allowable to witnesses, foreign counsel, and interpreters under section 7 of this act.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment relates solely to the use of foreign documents as evidence in criminal proceedings?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment which the Senator from Vermont offers for the Senator from Nebraska has been considered and incorporated in the bill by the body at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What opportunity is afforded the defendant to challenge the authenticity of the documents that may be adduced against him?

Mr. AUSTIN. In order to answer the question I shall have to consult the amendment.

Mr. KING. Manifestly it would be unfair to deny to a defendant the right and the opportunity to examine the documents which are introduced. If it is the intention to introduce foreign documents, he ought to be notified of that fact, so that he might have an opportunity if he desires to have an attorney present or to be present himself, in order to view the documents introduced against him, perhaps, of an incriminating character.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, which has been suggested to me by the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Vermont stated, in answer to a question asked by me, that this amendment has been incorporated by the other House.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was informed by the clerk of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate just now that this amendment had been adopted by the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. What I wish to inquire is why it is not in the bill; why it is necessary to incorporate it as a Senate amendment if the House has approved the amendment?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am informed now by the clerk of the committee that this amendment has been approved by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, something of which I was unaware. I cannot explain the fact that the amendment is not incorporated in the bill, but this is the way I understand it from this statement which apparently is a statement prepared by the Senator from Nebraska. With the permission of the Senate, I will read the statement, which is as follows:

The amendments which I intend to propose are designed to extend the benefits which H. R. 11690 will accomplish. They deal specifically with public and business records located outside the United States.

The Government has been confronted with unnecessary, and yet serious, difficulties in proving ordinary business transactions, especially where documents located outside the United States are necessary for such proof. Under existing law, the Government is obliged to obtain the documents from abroad, and then to persuade residents of foreign countries to come here to testify at the trial that the documents are authentic. Even when the Government is successful in obtaining the assistance of such witnesses, the cost involved is beyond all reason. For example, the Government recently expended over $1,400 to obtain one foreign witness to appear in one case—and then the case ended in a disagreement.

These handicaps have had a serious effect upon proper enforcement of our criminal laws—particularly those involving frauds upon the revenue. The Government is placed at the mercy of foreign witnesses, and in all too many cases, prosecutions have been prevented completely, or have been dropped, because of the difficulty of obtaining sufficient evidence to make out a case. Importers who are so inclined have felt relatively safe in defrauding the Government of customs duties and in conspiring with foreign exporters to file false invoices.

The amendments about to be proposed will make the successful prosecution of criminal cases more certain and less expensive, where foreign documentary evidence is involved. A procedure is provided for making admissible copies of the foreign records when certified by American consular or diplomatic officers. In the case of certification of business records, certain necessary changes in procedure are provided, such as representation of the defendant by counsel before the consular officer, and making the consul's certificate prima facie evidence only. Every effort is made to safeguard the rights of a criminal defendant, and the simplicity and reasonableness of the procedure provided contrast sharply with the intricacy of existing law.

I will not read the remainder of the statement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the passage of the bill, but, after examining it during the day, I desire to reserve the right to offer a motion to reconsider. I think, while we are interested, of course, in the protection of the rights of the Government, we cannot be too tender of the rights of defendants who are charged with offenses.

Mr. AUSTIN. I agree with that idea, and I think that would be a satisfactory disposition of the matter, for, indeed, I act only as an accommodation to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments reported by the committee were, on page 1, line 3, after the word "that", to insert "in any court of the United States and any court established by act of Congress"; on line 7, after the word "admissible", to strike out "in evidence in proof" and insert "as evidence"; and at the end of the bill to add a new section, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any court of the United States and any court established by act of Congress, any writing or record, whether in the form of an entry in a book or otherwise, made as a memorandum or record of any act, transaction, occurrence, or event, shall be admissible as evidence of said act, transaction, occurrence, or event, if it shall appear that it was made in the regular course of any business, and that it was the regular course of such business to make such memorandum or record at the time of such act, transaction, occurrence, or event or within a reasonable time thereafter. All other circumstances of the making of such writing or record, including lack of personal knowledge by the entrant or maker, may be shown to affect its weight, but they shall not affect its admissibility. The term "business" shall include business, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind.

SEC. 2. This act shall be prospective only and not retroactive.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PROPERTY DAMAGE BY WATERS IN BLACKFOOT RESERVOIR

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4142) for the relief of owners of property damaged by high waters in the

Blackfoot Reservoir, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause an investigation to be made promptly of all pending damage claims on the Fort Hall Indian irrigation project, Idaho, covering damages to crops, real estate, or any other legal or beneficial interest in real or personal property, with a view to determining the validity and proper amounts thereof: Provided, That upon completion of such investigation a report shall be submitted to Congress, together with recommendations.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 to effect the purpose of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask why should not this appropriation be paid out of any appropriations that may be made for the Indians, because it is an Indian project, as I understand, although perhaps there may be some liability attaching to the Government? But as to that I am not certain.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the Secretary of the Interior in a report submitted made a statement which I think will in part answer the question of the Senator from Utah. He says:

Estimates prepared within recent years providing for the completion of the Fort Hall project always included items covering lump-sum tentative estimates of the cost of settlement of the various damage claims.

Here I may say that those who have been damaged are a considerable number, but the amount of damage is small. However, their crops have been destroyed for several years, and to them it is a very important matter.

Proceeding with the letter of the Secretary—

In the pending Interior Department appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1937 provision is made for appropriating funds for a number of Indian irrigation projects to initiate a 5-year program for completion of existing or proposed projects with two exceptions which do not include Fort Hall.

Then at the conclusion of the Secretary's letter he says:

These amounts—

Contemplated in connection with the completion of this project—

These amounts include estimates of the cost required to settle the pending damage claims. In view of this and in the event Congress adopts this projected program it would seem unnecessary that special legislation such as is now contemplated need be enacted.

Then he concludes by suggesting that an investigation of the claims be made.

Mr. KING. Do these actions sound in tort or in contract, and, if in the former, is the Government liable or are the Indians liable? Is it an obligation of the Federal Government or is it an obligation of the Indians or of private persons?

Mr. POPE. I think it would be an obligation of the Federal Government, because it is a Federal Government project. The overflow of the waters by reason of the construction would be due to an act of the Government. The injury resulting has been recognized in all the cases of this kind; but it is not possible as yet to settle the claims. We are merely asking for an investigation as to whom the persons are and the amount of damages.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 4900) to amend the naturalization laws in respect of residence requirements, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LOW-COST HOUSING PROGRAM

The bill (S. 4424) to provide financial assistance to the States and political subdivisions thereof for the elimination of unsafe and insanitary housing conditions; for the development of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income; and for the reduction of unemployment and the stimulation of business activity; to create a United States Housing Authority; and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that is too important a bill to take up at this time. Let it go over.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I appreciate that this is, perhaps, too important a measure and involves too much to be considered now, but I will say that if the bill can be taken up for consideration I do not think that any Member of the Senate will oppose the objectives, both social and economic, of this proposed legislation. I regard it as the most important piece of legislation pending before the Congress this year. The purpose, from a social standpoint, is to aid a class of people who have been neglected too long already, and that is those who are classified as the low-income group. The bill represents an effort to provide decent quarters for them and to clear the slums. The committee reported the bill unanimously. The hearings before the committee were most impressive. People from all walks of life—employers and employees—came before the committee, urging the passage of this proposed legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee accompanying the bill, which I think is an excellent report, covering the whole subject, be printed in the RECORD; and I am going to urge upon the leadership of the Senate that this measure may be made the business of the Senate for consideration just as soon as the call of the calendar shall have been completed. I am sure the Senator from Utah will favor this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from New York, and without objection, the report on the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (No. 2160) is as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4424) to provide financial assistance to the States and political subdivisions thereof for the elimination of unsafe and insanitary housing conditions, for the development of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings for families of low income, and for the reduction of unemployment and the stimulation of business activity, to create a United States Housing Authority, and for other purposes, after holding hearings and giving consideration to the bill, report the same with amendments and recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

During the past 3 years the Federal Government has been committed to the policy of encouraging the development of safe and sanitary homes for persons of low income. General agreement has been reached that this line of activity promotes the creation of useful employment opportunities for capital and labor and, at the same time, meliorates living conditions that are conducive to ill health, crime, and other social evils. But while these objectives have been agreed upon, the undertakings designed to effectuate them have thus far been confused with extraneous matters, such as the administration of unemployment relief and the extension of credit assistance to persons who normally can supply themselves with decent living quarters. This confusion has worked to the disadvantage of those sections of our population who are dependent upon more or less permanent public aid for the improvement of their living conditions; and it has also been unfair to private enterprise, which is entitled to preempt the field which it can serve well and to know the exact limitations of the field which the Government is directly touching upon.

The object of the present bill is to implement policies already agreed upon by giving them a firmer statutory base and by divorcing their execution from hampering allegiances with essentially different activities of the Government.

The bill represents a clarification and simplification of governmental procedure rather than an innovation.

ECONOMIC OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

(1) Unemployment today: The first objective of the bill is to provide opportunities for reemployment in a preeminently useful type of enterprise. While the estimate of a competent research agency that there are over 12,500,000 people unemployed today may well be overly pessimistic, it is widely conceded that there are hardly less than 10,000,000 jobless people in the country, and that the inroads upon this paramount problem have not been commensurate with the gains achieved in other phases of industrial recovery.

This relative lag in employment is well illustrated by the following table, adapted from the Department of Commerce's survey of current business:

Table 1.—Indexes of industrial production and factory employment (1923–25=100)

First quarter average	Production	Employment
1934	82	77
1936	96	83

This coincidence of industrial advance with persistent unemployment is doubly significant because it reveals a permanent trend, the explanation of which is to be found largely in technological factors that have increased the per-hour productivity of the average worker 90 percent between 1899 and 1929, and 73 percent between the end of 1929 and the end of 1934.

The committee does not believe that the solution of this national problem rests in the permanent assumption by the Government of a relief burden of almost $2,000,000,000 per year. On the other hand, it recognizes that relief cannot be put aside until employment opportunities are substituted, to the mutual benefit of the taxpayer, the worker, and the business community.

(2) Lag in residential construction: There are two reasons why the most fertile area for the cultivation of employment opportunities at the present time is in the field of construction, and above all residential construction. In the first place, this is the economic activity which has straggled the farthest behind in the recovery march. In 1929 there were somewhat less than 2,500,000 workers attached to the building industry. During 1935, with employment returning to 80 or 90 percent of normal in other lines, there remained 1,732,000 unemployed building-trades men, or about 74 percent of all those attached to the industry. When there is added to this the vastly larger number of men who are tied to allied occupations, the fact emerges that fully half of the total unemployment today is due to the lag in the durable goods industries.

The following table, adapted from the Department of Commerce's Survey of Current Business, shows the relatively depressed state of the construction industry.

TABLE 2.—Contrast between industrial recovery and construction activity (1923–25=100)

(3) Housing needs: In addition to the present lag in home construction, there is a second reason why building activity offers such enticing opportunities for the employment of both capital and labor. This reason is to be found in the genuine housing needs of the country during the next 10 years. Naturally, there are varying estimates as to what these requirements may be. The lowest figures presented to the committee by a reliable authority was about 7,500,000 family units. Other competent sources arrived at a total of 16,000,000 family units. The following table impresses the committee as a well-conceived prognosis:

TABLE 3.—Additional dwellings needed, 1935–45

[Estimate made by Catherine Bauer, executive secretary, Labor Housing Conference, and Coleman Woodbury, director, National Association of Housing Officials]

Purely quantitative needs:
Estimated net increase in households, 1930–45	7,328,000
Extra dwellings, to allow 5-percent vacancies	386,000
Total dwelling units needed to house additional families, 1930–45	7,714,000
Surplus dwellings, 1930	650,000
Total additional dwelling units needed to house increase in families, 1930–45	7,064,000
New dwellings built, 1930–35	500,000
Dwellings demolished, 1930–35	200,000
Net increase in dwellings, 1930–35	300,000
Total additional dwelling units needed, 1935–45, to meet occupancy standards of 1930	6,764,000
To achieve and maintain minimum physical standards:
Immediate replacement of unfit dwellings, at 10 percent of total dwellings, 1930	3,216,000
Annual replacement at 1 percent per annum of total dwellings, 1930, to allow for obsolescence	3,216,000
Total additional dwelling units needed to meet minimum physical standards and maintain family occupancy standards as of 1930	13,196,000

NOTES.—(1) A certain proportion of these additional dwelling units needed will doubtless be provided by the subdivision of existing larger dwellings. Certainly not more than 2,000,000 units, most of them unsatisfactory, could be provided in this way, however.

(2) On the other hand, there was a certain proportion of "doubling up" even in 1930, not recorded in the census. If we were to establish and maintain a real family occupancy standard (one decent dwelling for each distinct family unit), we would have to allow at least an additional million new dwellings.

(4) The Government's role in low-rent housing: The committee is convinced that a housing program of this magnitude cannot be undertaken by the Government. The task is predominantly one for private enterprise. However, the evidence is well-nigh overwhelming that a substantial and even-tempered building revival depends upon the inclusion in any new housing development of those vast segments of our population who have very low incomes, and that these groups will be overlooked if the Government does not play a reasonable part in their inclusion.

The reasons for this are twofold. First of all, while the man of low income can start feeding and clothing himself as soon as he regains his job, he cannot improve his housing conditions until his savings have been restored by a sustained period of prosperity. But every sign indicates that there can be no sustained period of prosperity without a concomitant revival of the building industry. This vicious cycle can be broken only with governmental assistance.

Secondly, and from the long-range point of view, some sustained public assistance is necessary to provide for those in the very low income groups. Taking the country as a whole, respectable living quarters cost about $7.50 per room per month, which means that a normal family of five, in order to obtain three and one-half rooms in which to live, must spend about $315 each year for rent. By and large, this is impossible with a family income of less than $1,500 per year.

The following table shows the very large percentage of families in the United States whose incomes are below this minimum health and decency level, and who therefore require some public assistance in order to obtain safe and sanitary dwellings:

(5) Effect upon private enterprise: The committee is aware that the very modest public assistance provided by the bill, if taken alone, would neither make a real dent upon slum conditions nor stimulate general construction. But a vast amount of testimony, including the measured judgment of men experienced in business and finance, has convinced the committee that the public action here contemplated will help to release the springs of private action.

Corroboration is supplied by the experience of the British Government, which has maintained a fairly level rate of employment and industrial activity, in the stormy period since 1929, by a rapid expansion of building activity to take up the slack that was developing as a result of depressive influences throughout the world.

The following table shows clearly what Great Britain has accomplished:

TABLE 5.—Economic activity in Great Britain, 1928–34 (1928=100)

The committee believes, in short, that the genuine development of living quarters for people of low income, with the Government supplying the necessary spark, will tend to ignite the building industry generally, will remove the most serious forces now operating against complete economic recovery, and will introduce into that economic recovery a truly stabilizing influence.

SOCIAL OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

In addition to providing for the reemployment of capital and labor, the bill is designed to mitigate some of the deplorable housing conditions that affect so large a portion of our population.

(1) Widespread nature of bad housing: It is now a matter of general agreement that even before the depression commenced, over 10,000,000 families in America, or more than 40,000,000 people, were subjected to housing conditions that did not adequately protect their health and safety. These unfortunate circumstances have been neither exclusively urban or exclusively rural. The Department of Commerce Real Property Inventory of 1934, covering 2,400,000 family dwelling units in 64 representative cities, found that almost one-fifth of them were either definitely bad, though not beyond repair, or totally unfit for human occupation. In a governmental survey of rural housing made last year, it was discovered that in over half of the American States, four out of five of the rural homes had no running water and three out of four neither gas nor electricity.

As evidence that bad housing conditions are by no means confined to metropolitan or large-city areas, the committee was impressed by the testimony of Mr. Howard Johnson, social-service representative of the New Jersey Housing Authority. Mr. Johnson said:

"In order to determine housing conditions existing in New Jersey, we made a real-property inventory covering approximately 91 percent of the urban population of the State. This included the complete enumeration of 175 municipalities and a survey of the substandard areas in 44 additional towns. The territory included in the inventory varied from blighted areas to wealthy suburbs and from 6 cities of over 100,000 population to 73 communities of less than 5,000 persons. Consequently, this real-property inventory is an accurate gage of housing conditions in the nonfarm areas of the State. In it are enumerated the character and condition of 499,734 structures containing 872,852 dwelling units. We found that approximately 30,000 families in the State are housed in buildings which should be demolished. We have made a special study of dwelling units renting for less than $24 per month, which is the income group to be benefited by the Wagner bill. This study reveals the fact that approximately 52 percent of these accommodations are in very poor condition and that there is an alarming lack of sanitary facilities in these quarters."

(2) Effect of bad housing upon health: The committee does not believe it necessary to labor the universally accepted truth that substandard housing conditions aggravate disease, crime, and immorality. The following selected statements, made before the committee, are typical of testimony from all parts of the country:

Mr. Langon Post, chairman of the New York City Housing Authority, said:

"Death from tuberculosis in the old-law tenements is 220 percent higher than it is in the new; at the same time death from spinal meningitis is 247 percent higher in the old-law tenements than in the new; deaths from all causes are 87 percent higher in the old-law tenements than in the new. From these figures it can readily be seen that it is not just poverty which causes this, but it is the conditions in which the people live."

The Honorable Neville Miller, mayor of Louisville, Ky., said:

"In studying it (the slum problem) from the question of tuberculosis, there is in the city as a whole 1 case to every 463 people; in district no. 1 (one of the four slum districts) there is 1 case to every 226; and in the four (slum) districts as a whole there is 1 case to every 156 people as compared to 1 case for every 463 in the city as a whole."

Mr. John C. De Holl, chairman of the Housing Authority of Birmingham, Ala., said:

"Tuberculosis has spread over the entire city, but it is heavily congested in the 22 blighted areas. Typhoid fever, enteritis, and diphtheria exist throughout the city, but from our study we find these contagious diseases exist the heaviest in our blighted areas. The social diseases, regardless of race, class, or social status, are located in every section of the city, but are heaviest in our blighted areas."

(3) Effect of bad housing upon crime: Upon the relationship between bad housing and crime, Mr. Ernest J. Bohn, member of the Cleveland City Council, said:

"I think all of us recognize the great social loss, the great social cost of the maintenance of our slums; but let me point out these figures in this area (of Cleveland) where only 2½ percent of our people live, that that is where 21 percent of our murders are committed; 26 percent of our houses of prostitution are in this area; 6.8 percent of all boy delinquency arises in this area; 2½ percent of the people furnish 6.8 percent of the delinquency."

Mr. Post testified on this point:

"Juvenile delinquency is 100 percent higher in the slum areas than in the nonslum areas, and those figures would be much higher if we could confine them to the old-law tenements, but in those figures we only have the general area, and any area has a certain amount of good housing which would offset to some extent the figures in the old-law tenements."

If most of this testimony comes from the larger cities, it is only because they alone have the means to conduct formal investigations. Evidence is plentiful, however, that their experience is typical of experience everywhere.

(4) Public cost of bad housing: It is clear that disease and crime entail a cost to the Federal and local governments, infinitely more wasteful and infinitely more undesirable than would be a businesslike expenditure of funds to remedy these evil conditions at their source.

Mr. A. R. Clas, Director of the Housing Division of the Public Works Administration, testified as follows, upon the basis of his organization's experience throughout the country:

"During 1932, in a certain slum area in Cleveland, where 2.47 percent of the population of the city dwelt on 0.73 percent of the land area, the tax income was $225,035, whereas the total cost of maintaining the section was $1,972,437, or a net loss of $1,747,402. Likewise in Indianapolis, in those areas of greatest economic drain, it has been found that the taxpayers are spending every year for each person $27.29 as against $4 per person in other areas; 26 percent of the taxes spent for police, fire, health, and sanitary services are maintaining only 10 percent of the city's population. Thirty percent of the city hospital service in 1932 went into this area of 10 percent of the population. More than 33 percent of the public relief and 36 percent of the city expenditure for arrests, trials, and imprisonments were likewise absorbed by these 11 census tracts. Again during 1933, a study of a substandard area in South Boston of 769 families indicated an income of $27,093.23 and expenses of $275,113.74, or an excess of expenses over income of $248,020.51. Astounding as these figures may be, they are typical in a general way of every city of America where there are slums and this means practically every one."

Mr. Clas' testimony was amply confirmed by witnesses appearing from every section of the country.

The committee is convinced that in dealing with the housing of families of low income, systematic low-rent housing should be substituted for relief. This procedure will be cheaper for the Government, more beneficial to business, and infinitely more desirable to those of our citizens who are now living in slums and blighted areas, both in urban and rural parts of the country.

SHORTCOMINGS IN EXISTING FACILITIES

The shortcomings in the present approach of the Government toward low-rent housing may be summarized as follows:

(1) Agencies not shaped to serve this need: The Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Federal Housing Administration were created to salvage existing values from the dangers of the depression. They have checked evictions; they have improved mortgage practices; and they have promoted credit liquidity. However, their assistance has been limited to people who had credit standing, or who were expected to acquire credit standing upon the return of normal times. They have not been attuned to the needs of families in the very low income group, who need public aid that is permanent rather than temporary, and that is substantive rather than merely procedural.

The best evidence that the organizations now concerned with problems of home ownership cannot deal with the specialized task of low-rent housing, was presented to the committee by the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Mr. John H. Fahey. Mr. Fahey said:

"I am heartily in favor of this type of a public-housing program. * * * You will not begin to make progress on this program unless the Federal Government itself assumes the leadership and keeps at it persistently. * * * I have no reservation on the statement that we are so far behind the advanced countries of the old world that it simply is a disgrace to our institutions."

(2) Low-rent housing agencies inadequate: The Public Works Administration, which has been devoting itself more particularly than other agencies to the problem of low-rent housing, has also been held back by severe difficulties. One of these draw-backs has been that housing has been tested, at least in the public mind, in terms of emergency relief, thus impairing the expeditious accomplishment of either, and giving to low-cost housing an air of expediency that is fundamentally injurious to its successful operation. Housing is a long-range venture.

Another difficulty has been that the Public Works Administration has not had legal authority to extend aid of the type or scope that would bring its housing projects within the reach of families of very low income. As a result, with a few notable exceptions, the housing projects thus far completed with governmental aid have necessarily been rented to people of the middle income group. This has not only dragged the Government into a field where there is no legitimate excuse for the expenditure of public funds, but in addition it has been unfair to private industry by providing competition in an area that private industry can and should occupy. The highly desirable purposes of low-rent housing for those who really need it have thus become involved in misunderstandings that must be quickly cleared away if the good is not to be destroyed along with the bad.

(3) Excessive centralization: Due to the absence of legal mechanisms providing for cooperation between the Federal Government and the States upon this subject, there has been an excessive centralization of housing activities in Washington. Thus housing, which as much as anything else should spring from local initiative and the voluntary wishes of the people in their respective communities, has taken on a completely distorted aspect.

(4) Inadequate statutory framework: Since housing to date has received its nourishment only from omnibus relief statutes, housing policies have developed solely by administrative action without the guidance of law. It is not a healthy permanent policy for one of the most significant activities of the Federal Government to flow along without being kept within channels marked out by Congress itself.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

The present bill seeks to cure, in the light of experience, the revealed defects in Federal housing policy.

Section 1. Findings and declarations of policy: This section states the dual objective of Congress to provide safer and more sanitary dwellings for families in the very low income groups and to encourage the reemployment of capital and labor in a growing building program. It is clearly indicated that the activities of the Federal Government will be devoted for the most part to extending financial aid to States, municipalities, and other local authorities for the development by them of low-rent housing and slum clearance.

Section 2. Definitions: It will be sufficient to discuss the more important definitions.

The definitions of "low-rent housing" and of "families of low income" make it clear that whatever housing is assisted by this bill will compete only with the sordid conditions of urban and rural slums, and not with any private enterprise that is supplying decent, safe, and sanitary homes for families of moderate means. Housing projects under this bill will be "within the financial reach of, and available solely for" poor people who do not induce private enterprise to furnish safe and sanitary dwellings within their means, and whose aggregate incomes are not more than six times the rentals charged to them.

The definitions of "slum clearance" and of "development" make it clear that Federal aid will not be extended to local agencies merely for tearing down old buildings and clearing away areas. So restricted a type of slum clearance benefits only the owners of the old tenements and of adjacent property; or, if the land is used by the locality for public playgrounds, it means at best that the Federal Government is indulging in a worth-while but secondary purpose. Mere wrecking should be done by the localities alone. More important yet, merely tearing down the old either drives the inhabitants of the buildings into other slums, or it accentuates the housing shortage and forces all rentals upward.

The kind of slum clearance embraced in this bill does not include pure destruction. Slum clearance with Federal aid can occur merely as an adjunct to improving housing conditions. There may be the repair and renovation of existing buildings upon slum sites. There may be the clearing away of a slum site as part of a formulated plan to erect low-rent housing on the spot. There may be in some cases the construction of low-rent houses upon cheaper and economically more desirable land than present slum sites. But in all cases the incentive to Federal aid must be basically the stimulation of the building industry, the reemployment of labor, and the creation of safer and more sanitary homes for families of very low income.

However, the Federal Government itself, as distinguished from local agencies with Federal aid, is authorized to do pure slum clearance when necessary to effect the objectives of the bill. It is thought that in such cases there will be sufficient safeguards against deviation from the main objectives of the bill.

Section 3. United States Housing Authority: This section creates a corporation of perpetual duration, to be known as the United States Housing Authority, and to consist of a board of five directors, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It further provides for the designation of one of the directors as an executive officer to act for the board in an administrative capacity.

Section 4. Salaries and employees: This section fixes the salaries of members of the board, and outlines the Authority's power to employ lawyers, technical experts, and skilled and unskilled labor. It also authorizes the President, in his discretion, to transfer to the Authority other agencies, projects, and funds of the Government relating to low-cost housing and slum clearance.

Section 5. Powers of the Authority: This section specifies the powers of the Authority, including the right to sue and be sued, to foreclose on property, to protect its interests by insurance, and to be free from local taxes of all kinds.

Section 6. Expenditures: This section provides for the manner of expenditure by the Authority, and also exacts conformance with the statutes requiring advertisements for bids and the purchase of American materials on all projects.

Section 7. Research: This section sanctions research and experimentation relative to housing problems.

Section 8. Rules and regulations: This section empowers the Authority to draw up and put into effect rules and regulations.

Section 9. Federal aid to local public agencies: This section prescribes the terms of Federal grants and loans to public-housing agencies for the development, acquisition, or administration of low-rent housing projects by such agencies.

The value of the grant for any low-rent housing project is fixed at not more than 45 percent of its development or acquisition cost. Any such grant may be paid in whole or in part in a lump sum, and any balance of the grant not so paid shall be spread equally over a fixed period (not exceeding 60 years) upon a yearly annuity basis. The requirement that all annuities shall be fixed and determined at the outset is imperative in order that the local authority may formulate its plans with certainty and precision, and in order that the Federal Authority may be saved from constant importunities.

In addition to these grants, the bill provides that loans may be made for low-rent housing projects, in an amount not greater than the development or acquisition cost of the project so assisted minus the value of the portion of grant that has been paid to it. Leaving to the discretion of the Authority the terms of interest and of repayment of such loans, while strictly in accord with general practice in recent housing legislation, is important enough to justify citation here. It will give the Authority an election to render financial assistance through low or nominal interest rates instead of by grants, where the former policy is the more desirable one. It will enable the Authority to use these two methods of assistance either alternatively or conjunctively, in order that housing projects shall be made available to persons of low income. Subsequently provisions of the bill, as will be pointed out later in this report, place a governor upon the discretion of the Authority that will keep its extension of financial assistance, in whatever forms it may take, strictly within the bounds of what is really necessary to make projects available for families of low income.

Section 10. Demonstration projects: This section provides in a very circumscribed way for low-rent housing and slum clearance demonstration projects by the Authority. The committee recognizes that such projects are carved out as exceptions to the general intent of the bill to promote action through local agencies. None the less, the committee has been led to believe that, under appropriate safeguards, an authorization for some demonstration projects should be written into the bill.

The considerations prompting this conclusion have been well expressed in a report of a subcommittee on low-rent housing and slum clearance of the National Emergency Council. This report states:

"Moreover, at this time local political entities are unable to cope with the problem because:

"1. State legislation is inadequate, and exists, untried, in only 20 States.

"2. A long period is necessary to establish effective local agencies, particularly because State legislatures meet only once every 2 years.

"3. Local housing authorities set up under existing legislation have not the power to issue general obligation bonds nor to offer other collateral.

"4. State and municipal bodies have neither the credit ranking nor the low-interest rates of the Federal Government.

"5. Even excluding housing, the municipalities have demonstrated their inability to take care of their ordinary relief problems.

"Local communities need further education and stimulation to obtain adequate powers. There must be no break in Federal activity if the experience and progress made in the last 3 years is to be crystallized and made available to them. The transfer of responsibility to local agencies must be progressive shifting and not a destructive broadside. It is unreasonable to assume that local bodies will be uniformly able to offer any subsidy beyond tax exemption for some years to come. A Federal agency must, therefore, continue to bear most of the burden until local agencies become strong enough to carry it."

With this "progressive shifting" to the localities in mind, the bill provides that no demonstration project shall be commenced without the advice and request of some responsible local agency; that as soon as practicable the Authority shall sell its demonstration projects to local agencies; that pending sale the Authority may lease such projects to public-housing agencies or public-housing societies or enter into contracts for the administration of any such projects in whole or in part by any such agency.

The other provisions of this section (10) cover the necessary powers that the Authority must have in connection with its undertakings, such as selling and exchanging property, acquiring property by purchase, eminent domain, gift, or otherwise, and dedicating lands for parks, playgrounds, and other recreational facilities.

Subsection (h) of this section (10) is noteworthy. It enables the Authority, whose properties, like other Federal holdings, are exempt from all local taxation, to pay, in its discretion, annual sums in lieu of taxes. This may be necessary at times to insure only an equitable tax burden upon other property owners in the vicinity of publicly owned projects. In other instances the Authority will be able to refrain from paying these sums in lieu of local taxes, thus in effect exacting from the local community a tax exemption as the price for benefiting by the project involved.

Section 11. Contracts and agreements: This section provides that the Authority may, by mutual agreement, consent to the modification of any contract or agreement to which it is a party. This provision merely enables the Authority to do what any business corporation is allowed to do; i. e., make necessary readjustments in view of changing circumstances.

SECTION 12. Appropriate limitations upon discretion of the Authority: This section sets up legislative canons to guide the Authority. In essence these are: That the Authority shall not invade the field of useful private enterprise, but rather shall act only where there is a shortage of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings within the financial reach of families of very low income; that any action taken by the Authority shall always be influenced primarily by consideration for the well-being of low-income inhabitants of dwellings affected by the Authority's action; that any particular action of the Authority shall be, insofar as possible, in harmony with a coherent and consistent national program formulated by the Authority; that the amount of Federal financial assistance given to any project shall not be in excess of the amount desirable to bring safe and sanitary dwellings within the financial reach of families of very low income; and that there shall be neither excesses nor speculation in connection with land acquisition.

The committee wishes to emphasize that the bill vests the Authority with the exclusive duty and power to conform its activities to these standards; except insofar as such standards may be deemed by the courts to be necessary prerequisites to the valid delegation of power. Aside from this exception it is not intended that the factual determination of whether or not the Authority has so conformed shall be subject to judicial review or interruption by injunction. To have another agency determine whether or not the Authority observes these standards disperses responsibility without serving any useful purpose. If the Authority slights the instructions which Congress has given it remains within the power of Congress to change the law.

Section 13. Safeguards against competition with private enterprise: This section draws up such control over low-rent housing projects, assisted by Federal funds, as may be necessary to insure the dedication of such projects to families of low income. The committee regards this section as an adequate safeguard against competition with useful private industry, and against the expenditure of Federal funds for the benefit of people whose incomes should enable them to take care of themselves.

Section 14. Financial limitations: This section is designed to keep the financial aid extended by the Authority within the bounds of the specific provisions set forth by law, i. e., that no grant shall be more than 45 percent of the total development or acquisition cost of a project, and that no loan shall be more than the difference between such cost and the portion of it that is covered by a grant.

Section 15. Labor standards: This section fixes the labor standards applying to contracts in connection with low-rent housing and slum-clearance projects owned by the Authority, and to the purchasing of materials and labor for such projects. And every contract of the Authority with a housing agency must contain a provision that the wages prevailing in the locality, as determined by the Authority, will be paid to all laborers and mechanics employed. In addition, this section extends the provisions of the 8-hour law to contracts of the Authority for work upon its demonstration projects, and the kick-back law is made to apply to all projects financed in whole or in part by the Authority. The compensation act is extended to officers and employees of the Authority.

Section 16. Capital stock: This section provides that the Authority shall have a capital stock of $1,000,000, subscribed by the United States.

Section 17. Appropriations: This section authorizes the initial appropriation of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937.

Section 18. Allocations: This section authorizes the President to allocate to the Authority any funds available under any act of Congress for low-rent housing or slum clearance.

Section 19. Bond issue: This section authorizes the sale of bonds by the Authority to raise money for the purposes of the act. Such bonds, guaranteed, as to principal and interest by the United States, are to be issued in an amount not more than $150,000,000 for the first year, and not more than $150,000,000 for each of the succeeding 2 years.

While neither the money available to the Authority through the sale of bonds nor the money available to the Authority through appropriations is earmarked for any specific purposes aside from the general purposes of the bill, it is contemplated that the general practice, in the absence of contingencies making it desirable for the Authority in its discretion to act otherwise, will be that the appropriations will be used for grants and that the money raised through the sale of bonds will be used for loans.

Section 20. Deposits: This section merely governs the safekeeping of idle funds of the Authority.

Sections 21–25. These sections prescribe the penalties for dealing illegally or criminally with the Authority.

Section 26. Separability: This section contains the customary separability provision.

Section 27. Title: This section sets forth the title of the bill.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2293) for the retirement of employees of the Alaska Railroad, Territory of Alaska, who are citizens of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LOANS TO SHIPOWNERS

The bill (S. 4187) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act for the purpose of making loans to shipowners for increasing safety of life at sea on existing vessels was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, that bill escaped my attention. It seems to have been reported by "Mr. Thatcher." I am not acquainted with "Mr. Thatcher", and I could not identify the measure at first, but I see the bill has been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency and introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. I remember the committee having the bill under consideration, and the committee decided it was well to authorize loans for ships in order that they might be made safe.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I suggest that probably it is a typographical error? Mr. Thatcher used to be a member of the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me say to whomever it was that objected that a subcommittee of the Commerce Committee, in conference with the Commerce Department, has determined upon certain changes which must be made in ships now upon the seas in order to make them safe. For instance, the accident involving the Mohawk, which it will be remembered was sunk at sea a year ago, was due to the fact that the watertight compartment ended a deck too low to afford safety, so when the ship listed the water came to the deck immediately above the watertight compartment and filled it, and the boat, of course, went down.

The regulations are mandatory. The owners of a sister ship of the Mohawk, for instance, are forced to conform to the regulations in order to operate the ship. On that particular vessel they must increase the height of the compartment another deck. Since the changes are mandatory we do not wish the owners to have the slightest excuse on the ground that they cannot get banking accommodations or cannot otherwise get funds with which to make the improvements. Therefore we made an appeal to the Banking and Currency Committee that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act might be amended in order that loans which the R. F. C. would approve might be made for the purpose of making ships safe. I hope the bill may be passed and become a law.

Mr. COUZENS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FEDERAL CREDIT UNION

The bill (S. 4686) to amend the act known as the Federal Credit Union Act, approved June 26, 1934, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, no printed report apparently accompanies the bill. I am interested to know why that is and to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee and exhibited a letter addressed to me from Governor Myers, of the Farm Credit Administration, stating that he favored the bill and would send to the committee a favorable letter. After the committee authorized the report, the letter came, and I now have it. The bill authorizes one credit union to lend surplus funds to another credit union on proper security and to an extent not above 25 percent of its paid-in resources.

Mr. KING. What has the Department of Agriculture to do with it? It seems to me to be a matter for the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Banking and Currency Committee reported it, and the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration has submitted a favorable report.

Mr. KING. Whence would the funds come which are to be loaned?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The surplus of any particular credit union may be loaned to another credit union desiring funds. It is a method by which a credit union may raise funds.

I ask that a letter from Governor Myers, of the Farm Credit Administration, to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1936.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: We have received the letter dated May 26, 1936, signed by Mr. R. H. Sparkman, requesting a report upon Senate bill 4686 to amend the Federal Credit Union Act approved June 26, 1934.

The bill S. 4686, amends paragraph (7) of section 7 of the Federal Credit Union Act by adding a subparagraph (c) to permit Federal credit unions to invest not exceeding 25 percent of their paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus in loans to other credit unions.

In our letter to you dated May 7, 1936, which was a report on bills S. 4101, S. 4102, and S. 4103, it was stated as follows:

"It is our opinion that an amendment to the Federal Credit Union Act giving Federal credit unions the power to lend money to other credit unions would be desirable providing a limitation is placed upon the total amount that may be loaned in this manner by any Federal credit union to approximately 25 percent of its paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus and that such loans shall be made in accordance with rules and regulations of the Governor. If the Federal Credit Union Act is amended so as to permit Federal credit unions to lend to other credit unions, it is believed that the borrowing needs of Federal credit unions can be met in this manner and through loans from commercial banks."

The bill S. 4686, if enacted into law, will provide for loans among credit unions within the limits previously suggested by us. Therefore, this bill is favorably recommended for your consideration.

Very truly yours,

W. I. MYERS, Governor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection the bill (S. 4686) to amend the act known as the Federal Credit Union Act, approved June 26, 1934, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act known as the Federal Credit Union Act, approved June 26, 1934, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting as subdivision (c) of paragraph (7) of section 7 the following:

"(c) and, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Governor, in loans to other credit unions in the total amount not exceeding 25 percent of its paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus", so that paragraph (7) of section (7) will read as follows:

"To invest its funds (a) in loans exclusively to members; (b) in obligations of the United States of America, or securities fully guaranteed as to principal and interest thereby; (c) and, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Governor, in loans to other credit unions in the total amount not exceeding 25 percent of its paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus."

SALE OF TRACT, PUBLIC DOMAIN, OREGON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4241) to provide for sale of a certain isolated tract of the public domain in the State of Oregon, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment on page 1, line 4, after the word "order", to strike out "the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized and directed to order into market and sell at public auction for not less than their appraised value the following described lands, located in Clackamas County, Oreg.: Lot 5, section 21, township 2 south, range 3 east, Willamette meridian", and to insert in lieu thereof, "the Secretary of the Interior is authorized upon application filed within 6 months from the date of this act to order into the market and sell at public auction for not less than the appraised value lot 5, section 21, township 2 south, range 3 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon, subject to the provisions and reservations of section 24 of the Federal Power Act of June 10, 1920 (41 Stat. 1063), as amended by the Act of August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 846): Provided, That any money paid in connection with such sale shall be deposited in the Oregon and California land-grant fund in the United States Treasury", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law or any Executive order, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized upon application filed within 6 months from the date of this act to order into the market and sell at public auction for not less than the appraised value lot 5, section 21, township 2 south, range 3 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon, subject to the provisions and reservations of section 24 of the Federal Power Act of June 10, 1920 (41 Stat. 1063), as amended by the act of August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 846): Provided, That any money paid in connection with such sale shall be deposited in the Oregon and California land-grant fund in the United States Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] whether the public land so isolated might come within the Grazing Act?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in this particular instance the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] appeared before the committee and made a very satisfactory explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize additional coinage in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the independence of the State of Texas."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MALONEY, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1937, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the Roanoke Colony Memorial Association of Manteo, N. C., upon payment by it of the par value of such coins, but not less than 25,000 such coins shall be issued to it at any one time, and no such coins shall be issued after July 1, 1937. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by the Roanoke Colony Memorial Association of Manteo, N. SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

RELIEF OF INDIAN LANDS FROM TAXATION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7764) to relieve restricted Indians whose lands have been taxed or have been lost by failure to pay taxes, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this bill seeks to accomplish certain purposes, which I will explain. Formerly the Congress authorized the Secretary of the Interior to buy land for landless Indians. The Secretary proceeded to buy the lands and assigned the Indians to reside upon such lands. The recommendation or assertion was made to the Indians that the land would be theirs and they would have no taxes to pay. Some lands were taken from private ownership and assessing authorities proceeded to assess the land for taxes. The taxes were assessed and stand against the lands.

In some cases tax warrants have been issued and the Indians have been threatened with dispossession. The Department believes that, in order to keep faith with the Indians, the tax warrants and tax assessments should be paid and the title to the lands cleared. The bill authorizes the appropriation of money for that purpose.

Section 2 provides that the lands so secured shall hereafter be nontaxable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, for payment of taxes, including penalties and interest, assessed against individually owned Indian land the title to which is held subject to restrictions against alienation or encumbrance except with the consent or approval of the Secretary of the Interior, heretofore purchased out of trust or restricted funds of an Indian, where the Secretary finds that such land was purchased with the understanding and belief on the part of said Indian that after purchase it would be nontaxable, and for redemption or reacquisition of any such land heretofore or hereafter sold for nonpayment of taxes.

SEC. 2. All lands the title to which is now held by an Indian subject to restrictions against alienation or encumbrance except with the consent or approval of the Secretary of the Interior, heretofore purchased out of trust or restricted funds of said Indian, are hereby declared to be instrumentalities of the Federal Government and shall be nontaxable until otherwise directed by Congress.

ROBERT D. BALDWIN

The bill (H. R. 12408) for the relief of Robert D. Baldwin was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAC AND FOX INDIANS, OKLAHOMA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3930) authorizing an appropriation for payment to Sac and Fox

Tribe of Indians in the State of Oklahoma, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to reimburse the Sac and Fox Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma for the amount of tribal funds expended for general administrative purposes of the Indian Service. The amount finally to be appropriated, as certified to the Secretary of the Interior by the Comptroller General of the United States, shall be placed in the Treasury to the credit of the Sac and Fox Indians of Oklahoma as a trust fund to draw interest in accordance with existing law and shall be available for expenditure in such manner as Congress may direct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the Sac and Fox Indian Tribe is a very small tribe in Oklahoma. Formerly they had an agency maintained for them. During that time, money was appropriated from their tribal funds to maintain the agency. Years ago the agency was abolished, but the Government continued to appropriate money from their tribal funds to maintain an agency which no longer existed. These few Indians have no supervision and have no benefits from the money. The Indians have contended always that the moneys were taken from them unjustly and therefore asked that the small sum appropriated from year to year from their tribal funds to maintain an agency which did not exist should be returned to the tribal funds for their benefit.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, how much is the total amount to be appropriated?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is less than $40,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDINGS, UINTAH COUNTY, UTAH

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4493) to provide for the construction, extension, and improvement of public-school buildings in Uintah County, Utah, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the Uintah County school district, Utah, for extension and improvement of school buildings: Provided, That the expenditure of any moneys so appropriated shall be subject to the condition that the schools maintained by said district shall be available to all the Indian children of the district on the same terms, except as to payment of tuition, as other children of said school district: Provided further, That plans and specifications for construction, enlargement, or improvement of structures shall be furnished by local or State authorities, without cost to the United States, and upon approval thereof by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs actual work shall proceed under the direction of such local or State officials. Payment for work in place shall be made monthly on vouchers properly certified by local officials of the Indian Service: Provided further, That any amount expended on any project hereunder shall be recouped by the United States within a period of 30 years, commencing with the date of occupancy of the project, through reducing the annual Federal tuition payments for the eduction of Indian pupils enrolled in public or high schools of the district involved, or by the acceptance of Indian pupils in such schools without cost to the United States, and in computing the amount of recoupment for each project interest at 3 percent per annum shall be included on unrecouped balances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. HAROLD W. FOGHT

The bill (S. 4598) for the relief of Dr. Harold W. Foght was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill provides for the payment of a claim to Dr. Foght, who was in the Indian Service and was ordered transferred. Under the rules and regulations, he should have had the freight on his household goods paid. The freight never was paid, and this is merely to cover the deficiency.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there is an identical House bill, Calendar 2171. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill and put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 12622) for the relief of Dr. Harold W. Foght was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit to Harold W. Foght, superintendent of the Cherokee Indian Agency, N. C., for the sum of $377.40, which amount was expended from appropriated funds for the transportation of the household effects of Dr. Foght to his new post of duty at Cherokee, N. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 4598 will be indefinitely postponed.

FUNDS HELD IN TRUST FOR INDIVIDUAL INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8316) to exempt the Indian Service from the requirements of section 4 of the Executive Order No. 6166, dated June 10, 1933, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 20 of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act, approved June 26, 1934 (48 Stat. 1233), shall not be applicable to funds held in trust for individual Indians, associations, or individual Indians, or for Indian corporations chartered under the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984).

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the reasons which would justify this exemption.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, 2 years ago, in 1934, the Congress passed an act relating to the disposition of trust funds. The Comptroller General held that the definition of trust funds in that act included the funds of individual Indians, and even included the funds in the Treasury that were provided by a subsequent act for the benefit of Indian corporations. The Bureau of Indian Affairs, of course, would be unable to handle such funds if that interpretation should be allowed to stand, so this bill is to exempt those individual funds and the funds belonging to Indian corporations from the trust-fund provision.

I suggest an amendment on page 2 to correct a typographical error. In line 1, I move that the first comma be stricken out and the first word "or" be changed to "of", making the line read: "associations of individual Indians, or for Indian corporations."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "An act to modify section 20 of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act, 1934, with reference to the individual Indian money."

BLACKFEET INDIANS OF MONTANA

The bill (S. 4551) to authorize the addition of certain names to the final rolls of the Blackfeet Tribe of Indians in the State of Montana was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the final roll of the Blackfeet Indians, approved January 20, 1920, under the act of June 30, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 16), the names of the following persons, entitled to enrollment under the act but who were omitted from the roll through inadvertence: Dick Aloysius Afterbuffalo, Joseph Redfox, Richard Ridesatthedoor, Jr., and Mary Yellowowl.

And the said Secretary is also authorized to place on the supplemental roll of the Blackfeet Tribe approved on September 9,

CROW INDIANS OF MONTANA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11218) to provide for the disposition of tribal funds now on deposit, or later placed to the credit of the Crow Tribe of Indians, Montana, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That tribal funds now on deposit or later placed to the credit of the Crow Tribe of Indians, Montana, may be used for per-capita payments, or such other purposes as may be designated by the tribal council and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and section 11 of the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 751), is hereby modified accordingly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] the reason for the disposition of the funds at the present time? Are they not needed for the support of the Indians?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the bill provides only that tribal funds now on deposit, or later placed to the credit of the Crow Indians, may be used for per-capita payments. It is simply to provide that the Secretary of the Interior may make per-capita payments out of money that belongs to the tribe itself.

Mr. KING. Has the Commissioner of Indian Affairs approved the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. The Secretary of the Interior has approved it.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUEBLOS OF JEMEZ AND PECOS, NEW MEXICO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12074) to consolidate the Indian pueblos of Jemez and Pecos, New Mexico, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Pueblo Indian Tribes of New Mexico, commonly known and referred to as the pueblo de Jemez and pueblo de Pecos, be, and they are hereby, consolidated and merged into one tribe, hereafter to be known as the pueblo de Jemez.

SEC. 2. That all property, real or personal, rights, titles, interests, claims, or demands of whatsoever kind or nature, now held or claimed by either of said tribes, or communities shall be, and hereby are, vested in the consolidated tribe.

SEC. 3. That the unexpended balance of any funds heretofore awarded to, appropriated for, or hereafter to be appropriated by Congress for the use or benefit of either of said tribes or pueblos referred to shall be held for and applied to the use and benefit of said consolidated and merged tribe or pueblo, known as pueblo de Jemez, subject to all limitations or restrictions now applicable to said funds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] whether this bill involves any expense upon the Federal Government.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It does not. As a matter of fact, the Pecos Indians are now residents of the Jemez pueblo. There are only seven or eight of them, and the bill does not involve any expense to the Federal Government.

Mr. KING. And it will work no injustice to the smaller and feebler portions of the tribe?

Mr. CHAVEZ. No. What the bill does, in effect, is to put them officially in the condition in which they have actually been for the past 100 years.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4028) for the relief of certain officers of the United States Navy and the United States Marine Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

TRANSPORTATION OF BONDED MERCHANDISE

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 589) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the transportation of bonded merchandise by other than common carriers under certain conditions, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, when it appears to him to be in the interest of commerce, and notwithstanding any provision of law or regulation requiring that the transportation of imported merchandise be by a bonded common carrier, to permit such merchandise which has been entered and examined for customs purposes to be transported by bonded cartmen or bonded lightermen between the ports of New York, Newark, and Perth Amboy, which are all included in customs collection district no. 10 (New York): Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to deprive any of the ports affected of its rights and privileges as a port of entry.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, this joint resolution affects only the three ports of New York, Newark, and Perth Amboy. They are ports of entry; and under the law, imported merchandise such as oil and lumber can be transported in bond between the ports only in bonded common carriers, and there are none available. As I say, the joint resolution affects only those three ports. The three ports are willing to have the measure passed, and it will help out the condition very greatly.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT, NEW MEXICO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3438) to provide for the establishment of an agricultural experiment station within the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District in the State of New Mexico, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish and maintain an experiment station at such place as he may select within the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District in the State of New Mexico; to conduct experiments, investigations, and demonstrations relating to the production of agricultural commodities within such district; and to publish and make available to farmers the results of such experiments, investigations, and demonstrations.

SEC. 2. For such purpose the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, such suitable lands as he deems necessary; to erect buildings; and to acquire equipment and apparatus at a total cost not in excess of $50,000; and to cooperate with any State, person, agency, or organization in such manner as he deems advisable.

SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, upon examining the report, I find that there is no recommendation of the bill by the Department of Agriculture; and in view of the great liberality which has been exhibited by the Government toward the conservancy district and the Indians there, I inquire as to the justification for this appropriation.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I believe I can justify the bill satisfactorily to the Senator from Utah.

While it is true that the Department of Agriculture has made an adverse report on the bill, nevertheless my colleague [Mr. HATCH] and I have come to the conclusion, due to the local circumstances, that this measure is an insurance on behalf of the Government of the United States.

Some 2 years past, the local authorities in New Mexico organized the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District, and spent some 12 or 14 million dollars in doing so. The district had for its purpose three phases—protecting the water for irrigation, draining the water from the lowlands, and flood protection. Since that time it became necessary for the district to borrow from Uncle Sam, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, some $6,500,000. We in New Mexico desire to pay every penny we borrow from Uncle Sam; and we feel that this expenditure of $50,000 in order to create an experimental station that will teach us how to get the kind of crops that will produce a revenue in order to enable us to meet our obligations to Uncle Sam is fully justifiable.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that we are making such liberal and extravagant appropriations in other directions, I shall not oppose the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT

The bill (S. 4702) to amend the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act was announced as next in order.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this bill relates to the public domain. The Department of the Interior has a great responsibility for the public domain. A representative of the Department came to me yesterday and desired an opportunity to work out an amendment to the bill, which the Department believes will be helpful. I told the representative that I would personally see that the bill should go over until the Department of the Interior could have an opportunity to consult with the Department of Agriculture and try to work out the amendment. Therefore, I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HATCH subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day I made a statement with reference to Senate bill 4702, and said the Department of the Interior desired to suggest an amendment to the bill. I have just been informed as to the amendment desired by the Department. I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. HATCH. I ask that a letter from the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the measure may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 6, 1936.

Hon. CARL A. HATCH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HATCH: My attention has been called to an amendment which your bill, S. 4702, proposes to make to subsection (d) of section 2 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. I am opposed to the passage of this amendment in its present form.

Under its broad language the amendment would authorize benefit payments, not only to livestock producers operating on regulated public lands, such as permittees and licensees of forest reserves and grazing districts, but also to livestock operators on many millions of acres of unregulated public domain, the use of which cannot be controlled in the absence of authorizing legislation. Benefit payments to this latter class, in my judgment, would not be in the public interest, as they would serve to entrench livestock operators who have appropriated a large part of these unregulated public lands as against small homesteaders and others who are entitled to a more equitable disposition of the public range than now exists. In other words, it would freeze the present situation which favors the larger interests and make it immeasurably more difficult to secure legislation which should provide for a distribution of range privileges on a basis that would permit small and large livestock operators to share in the use of the lands in fairer proportions. It does not appear that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration would have authority under any powers which they now possess to fix standards or make regulations which might remedy this situation.

In my judgment, the following amendments should be made to S. 4702 to prevent the condition which may result from the present wording of the amendment:

On page 2, line 23, strike out the words "owned, controlled, or supervised" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the use of which is subject to regulation."

On page 2, line 24, after the word "or" and before the word "by", insert the words "upon lands owned."

If the foregoing amendments are adopted, I would have no objection to the passage of this bill.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire whether the bill just passed has not been barred by the statute of limitations for many, many years. I ask to have the action on it reconsidered and to have the bill passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill will be returned to the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am informed by the clerks at the desk that House bill 8525, Calendar No. 2207, was not called. For some reason or other it was skipped over. I desire to know whether I have been correctly informed as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the title of the bill.

Moore the sum of $829.33 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the difference between the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, on foreign service, and the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, on foreign service, for the period between February 20, 1919, and November 19, 1920: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. KING. Mr. President, let this bill go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I explain the bill to the Senator?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill proposes to pay an officer the difference between the salary of a first lieutenant and the salary of a second lieutenant for several months. The immediate commanding officers of the lieutenant would not permit him to accept the promotion given him on account of a misunderstanding of his conduct. Afterward the War Department insisted on the promotion and it went through.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that the vote by which House bill 4565 was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to calendar 2312, the bill (H. R. 4565) for the relief of Lucile Smith, to which I objected a few moments ago. I withdraw my objection and ask that the bill may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 4565) for the relief of Lucile Smith was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and instructed to receive and determine the claim of Lucile Smith, a former employee of the Veterans' Administration, who, it is alleged, because of her working conditions during the years 1922, 1923, and 1924 developed acute pleurisy, resulting in tuberculosis, without regard to the limitation of time within which such claims are to be filed under the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue thereunder prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I notice that the Senate is passing a number of House bills. We see in the RECORD from time to time that the Senate passes bills which go to the House but which very seldom receive prompt consideration there, and sometimes no consideration. They may be reported by the committees of the House, but one objection will send a bill back to the committee, and that is the end of it. I merely mention this to call attention to the fact that we are very generous in treating our friends in the House, but they are not so generous with us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree with what has been stated by the Senator from Florida.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7818) for the relief of Caroline M. Hyde was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that this bill go over. There is an adverse report by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HURRICANE PATROL, GULF OF MEXICO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4734) to provide for hurricane patrol in the Gulf of Mexico and environs during the hurricane season, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to the extent facilities of the Coast Guard will permit and within the limits of such appropriations as may be made for such purpose, which are hereby authorized, the Secretary of the Treasury when the Coast Guard is under the Treasury Department and the Secretary of the Navy when the Coast Guard is a part of the Navy are requested to patrol the Gulf of Mexico and environs for the purpose of cooperating with the Secretary of Agriculture in furnishing the Weather Bureau data to better enable such Bureau to forecast the size and course of tropical hurricanes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for an explanation of this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the bill authorizes the Coast Guard authorities, to the extent that subsequent appropriations may permit, to have Coast Guard vessels in the Gulf of Mexico during the stormy season, and to aid the Weather Bureau in its work of warning against coming storms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4627) to create a Division of Stream Pollution Control in the Bureau of the Public Health Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

STUDIES OF THE FISHERY INDUSTRY

The bill (H. R. 8055) to provide for economic studies of the fishery industry, market-news service, and orderly marketing of fishery products, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his objection, I should like to make a statement regarding the bill. We will have to depend upon the waters of the earth more and more for protein food, and it has been impressed upon the Committee on Commerce that it is very essential that there should be an organization of the character provided for in the bill. It is a matter of no concern to me, but the measure was sent to us by the Department of Commerce. There were hearings in the House, and we had hearings before the Senate committee, and reached the conclusion that this was a proper bill and one that should be passed. Then, in making up its plans in the future relative to fishing and the preservation and culture of fish, the Department of Commerce may consider the questions involved.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, this bill is similar to if not identical with a Senate bill upon which the Senate committee has held hearings.

Mr. COPELAND. It is identical with that bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Department of Commerce has received annually very large appropriations, amounting to millions of dollars. We have established a Bureau of Fisheries; we have provided very large appropriations annually for that organization. We have made provision for the establishment of fish hatcheries in every State of the Union, and in some States a large number. The Department of Commerce, with the large appropriations which it receives, is competent to deal with this subject if it has energy enough to do so.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me say that I am in fullest sympathy with what the Senator says about the past history of the Department of Commerce. I think it was overmagnified in the old days, when the "great engineer" was in charge; but an honest effort is now being made in the Department. They got rid of many surplus bureaus, and there is no question about this being a good measure. It has nothing to do with the sport of fishing, it has to do with the preservation of food fishes and their orderly marketing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that upon the Pacific coast, away up into the waters of Alaska and in the sounds along the coast, millions of dollars have been expended. We have had ships engaged there, and every effort has been made to study the fishing conditions. The same thing is true in various parts of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

I marvel that we are now asked for further appropriations, in view of the millions which have been appropriated which might have been used for these purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator that after we have done all that, we have not put the fish on the table of the consumer, and the aim of this measure is to make it possible to market fish, to let the housewife know how she can get fish and where she can get them, and to help people to get more fish for consumption as food.

Pardon me for speaking technically, but protein food is the most necessary food and the most expensive food; and whenever we can find a way to make fish available to the people, we have done a great kindness to the home budget makers. I am sure the bill ought to receive our favorable attention.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, is it not true that, notwithstanding the studies and researches which have been made in the past, there has been a constantly diminishing supply of the important food fishes of America? Some species have become so depleted as to reach almost to the point of extinction, and with the passing of the years the problem has become increasingly acute. Is not that true?

Mr. COPELAND. That is true. It was brought out in the hearings.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may suggest to the Senators that the fish industry has been declining largely because those who catch the fish get hardly anything for them. People buy fish and consume fish to a sufficient extent, but those who catch the fish are not making a living. This bill would help to resolve the problem of distribution, assist in proper marketing and distribution, and that is a great factor in the fishing industry.

Mr. KING. Complaints have come to us in the last few years, particularly with respect to conditions in Alaskan waters, that instead of there being a shortage of fish, there was a surplus of fish; instead of there being a diminution of fish, there was an increase of fish. It seems to me that with the facilities of transportation so greatly improved as they are now, fish can be brought from the sea to the land and very rapidly transported to the markets, where they would be consumed.

Let the bill be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I beg the Senator to permit the passage of the bill. It is discouraging to those of us who go through the agony of long hearings and studies of problems of the kind involved in this bill, when we bring our conclusions to the Senate to have them slipped aside. We did not report this bill to the Senate just for fun. It was thoroughly discussed and considered by the committees of both Houses.

Mr. KING. The Department of Commerce proposed the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. They brought it to our attention in the first place, but they bring to our attention many things that go out of the window.

Mr. KING. As they ought to do.

Mr. COPELAND. As they ought to do, in many instances, but not in this one.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has referred to the situation in Alaska. I think he has spoken with substantial accuracy, as he usually does; but the fact remains that the situation in Alaska became so acute that within very recent years we passed far-reaching legislation dealing with the salmon and other fisheries in Alaska, and I believe that by reason of the attention which Congress gave to that situation there has probably been preserved to future generations that great source of food supply in Alaska. The bill under discussion presents an instance, not of the precise remedies which have been proposed but of our continued interest in the fishermen of the United States.

Mr. KING. I shall waive my objection to the bill for the moment; but I shall look into it during the day, and if I fail to obtain satisfactory information I shall ask that the vote passing the bill be reconsidered. I have in mind the fact that the Department of Commerce has received appropriations of millions of dollars without any adequate showing for the expenditures which have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSFER OF LIGHTSHIP TO VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

The bill (H. R. 12896) to provide for the transfer of the surplus decommissioned lightship No. 82 to United States Ship Constitution Post, No. 3339, Veterans of Foreign Wars, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANASTASIA ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, FLA.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain portions of Anastasia Island Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., and for other purposes", approved August 27, 1935, is amended (1) by inserting immediately after the words "holders of record title thereto" a comma and the following: "their heirs or assigns,"; and (2) by striking out "to Southern Real Estate Corporation, lots 4 to 7, block B, 3 to 7, block C, all of blocks D and E, Seaside Heights;".

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey by quitclaim deed to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., that property authorized to be conveyed by such act of August 27, 1935, to such Southern Real Estate Corporation.

AMENDMENT OF NAVIGATION LAWS

The bill (S. 4495) to amend certain of the navigation laws of the United States, to remove inconsistencies and inequalities therein, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 (b) of the act of June 9, 1910 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 514), covering the equipment of small motor boats, is hereby amended by striking out the words "every motor boat of class 2 or 3 shall carry an efficient fog horn." That section 8 of the act of June 9, 1910 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 518), is amended by striking out the words "except for failure to observe the provision of section 6 of this act."

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act no foreign-built yacht, mechanically propelled or so designed so to be adaptable to mechanical propulsion, shall be admitted to documentation under the laws of the United States: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any foreign-built yacht documented under the laws of the United States at the time of the passage of this act: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to yachts under contract of construction or purchase for the account of a citizen of the United States at the time of the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That section 4311 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 251) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any vessel other than as defined above found engaged in the fisheries shall be subject to forfeiture: Provided, That this forfeiture shall not apply to vessels registered for the whale fishery as provided in section 4339 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 280)."

SEC. 4. That the act of May 28, 1906 (ch. 2566, sec. 1; 34 Stat. 204; 46 U. S. C., sec 292), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"And dredge other than a dredge built in the United States and owned by a citizen thereof found engaged in dredging in the United States shall be subject to forfeiture."

SEC. 5. That section 4370 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 316) is hereby amended to read:

SEC. 6. That the requirements in article 31 of the act of June 7, 1897 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 157); section 3 of the act of February 8, 1895 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 243); and section 4412 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 381) that two printed copies of the regulations to be observed by all vessels in passing each other shall be furnished to each vessel propelled by machinery and kept posted in a conspicuous place in such vessel shall not apply to vessels propelled in whole or in part by machinery 65 feet or less in length over all.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 1391) to authorize and direct the United States Commissioner of Fisheries to undertake fish culture and related activities in Puerto Rico, authorizing appropriations therefor, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Mr. President, I find the Senator from Montana in a yielding mood. I ask him to permit me to say a word about House bill 1391, to which he objected a few moments ago.

The bill has to do with the improvement of the food conditions in Puerto Rico, where the population is more dense than in any other place on earth. The necessity of finding some way to feed these people has been brought out by the Secretary of the Interior. We do not wish to have Puerto Rico spoken of as the poorhouse of our country. The particular bill in question was given serious study by the committee, and it is our belief that it should be enacted.

At the time the bill was called on the calendar I was interrupted for the moment, and I did not make a defense of the bill as I should have done. I hope the bill may be considered and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. I object.

Mr. KING. I, too, object.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator be good enough to read the second page of the report on the bill? If he will do so, I think he will realize that the action proposed should be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

JURISDICTION OF THE COAST GUARD

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12305) to define the jurisdiction of the Coast Guard.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to explain it.

Mr. KING. The Senator will have a hard task.

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President; it will not be a hard task, because I have here a personal appeal from the Secretary of the Treasury asking that the bill be passed. The bill does not give any new powers at all to the Coast Guard. It has to do only with defining its jurisdiction. In view of the many decisions of the Supreme Court recently it has been found that the Coast Guard has been performing duties delegated to it by certain persons. The purpose of this bill is to make specific the duties which the Coast Guard heretofore has carried out.

Mr. WHEELER. Is the Senator discussing Calendar No. 2320, Senate bill 4495?

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President; I was speaking about Calendar No. 2322, House bill 12305.

Mr. WHEELER. Senate bill 4495 covers an entirely different proposition.

Mr. COPELAND. That is a bill having to do with the equipment of motorboats, such as the fog horns which they are required to carry in the interest of safety.

Mr. President, I ask that there be placed in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, the letter from the Treasury Department regarding the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

GENERAL COUNSEL,
TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 6, 1936.

Personal.
Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I apologize for bothering you, but I notice that the calendar is being called in the Senate today and that the bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury (H. R. 12305) "To define the jurisdiction of the Coast Guard", and reported out by your committee, will be called up for consideration. In view of this fact, and in an effort to be of assistance to you, I shall take the liberty of stating briefly the purpose and necessity for this legislation.

The bill does not enlarge the present authority of the Coast Guard but merely reaffirms the jurisdiction which it has been exercising for many years. Today it is enforcing all of the laws which this bill would authorize it to enforce. Its present authority is general, however, and this bill is necessary because of the Supreme Court decision holding that the Coast Guard must have specific authority to enforce the laws of the United States. The Coast Guard is our ocean and border water police and patrol force. If that service is not empowered to enforce the laws of the United States along our shores and in boundary waters, those laws are unenforcible, since there is no other agency of this Government equipped to enforce them. In enforcing any law pursuant to the authority conferred by this bill the officers of the Coast Guard would act as the agent of the executive department charged with administering the particular law and would be subject to all the rules and regulations promulgated by that law. For example, in enforcing the navigation laws the Coast Guard acts as agent of the Department of Commerce, and in enforcing criminal laws over the enforcement of which the Department of Justice has jurisdiction it acts as agent of the Department of Justice. It should be noted, however, that the Coast Guard is specifically authorized by statute to enforce many criminal laws over which the Department of Justice has no jurisdiction whatsoever.

The Department of Justice had some objection to this bill as it was originally drafted, since it was felt by that Department that the effect of the bill might be to infringe on the jurisdiction of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. At the suggestion of the Department of Justice, therefore, we drafted amendments which met their objections and were incorporated into the bill. The amendment which prevents any conflict between the jurisdiction of the Coast Guard and the Federal Bureau of Investigation is that commencing on page 1, line 9, and reading as follows:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to the inland waters of the United States, its Territories and possessions, other than the Great Lakes and the connecting waters thereof."

As a result of these amendments the bill received the approval of the Attorney General and, as the House committee report (which is incorporated in the Senate report) shows, a representative of the Department of Justice appeared before the House Merchant Marine Committee and testified that the Department of Justice approved the bill. A representative of the Department of Commerce also appeared in favor of the bill.

I understand that within the past few days some subordinate of the Department of Justice has objected to the bill on the ground that it conflicts with the jurisdiction of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Since then his attention has been directed to the fact that the bill was redrafted by the two Departments to meet any such possible conflict, and that the bill has the approval of the Attorney General. The subordinate, of course, was unaware of the facts in the case.

The bill is of real importance, because the Coast Guard is today enforcing laws it always thought it had general authority to enforce but which, under the Supreme Court decision, it would probably be held to be without authority to enforce. As stated above, when it enforces laws on the water which are administered by other departments it acts as agent of that department and must conform to such rules and regulations as may be promulgated by that department.

This bill passed the House unanimously.

Thank you so much for your interest in this matter.

Cordially yours,

C. M. HESTER,
Assistant General Counsel.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the bill under consideration is a very important one. Its passage is necessary because of a Supreme Court decision holding that the Coast Guard must have specific authority to enforce the laws of the United States. The Coast Guard is our ocean and border water police and patrol force. No other agency of the Government is equipped to enforce the laws along our shores and boundary waters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATIONS APPLYING TO SEAGOING MOTOR VESSELS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12419) to apply laws covering steam vessels to seagoing vessels of 300 gross tons and over propelled by internal-combustion engines.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill has to do merely with a technical matter. The present laws relate to steam-propelled vessels. Diesel engines also are now being used. The bill is merely to bring the Diesel engine under the same regulations by which steam engines are controlled.

Mr. KING. It does not attempt to exclude them?

Mr. COPELAND. Not at all.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE B. MARX, INC.

The bill (H. R. 7727) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of George B. Marx, Inc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to withhold his objection for a moment. I happened to be in the committee at the time the bill was considered.

Mr. KING. The Marx claim was for $76,000?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. It was fully considered by the committee. The Senator from Florida [Mr. LOFTIN] was asked to report the bill. He is here now, and can explain the bill.

Mr. LOFTIN. Mr. President, during the World War the claimant in this bill had a contract with the Government for furnishing carts. A large amount was due under the contract after the war. The claimant became involved on account of the cancelation of the contract and the delay resulting from the failure of the Government to pay the amount due under the contract. He was threatened with bankruptcy by his creditors, and he came down to Washington unrepresented by counsel. It was represented to him by officials of the Department that the amount he was paid was paid on account, and that the release he signed was not an absolute and unconditional release, but that he would have the right to claim the balance due him by the Government. The Government admits that there is justly due the claimant at least a certain amount; but, owing to the fact that he signed what appears on its face to be an unconditional and absolute release, he is not able to maintain his claim against the Government at the present time. The bill authorizes the waiver by the Government of this absolute release, so that the claimant may have his day in court in the Court of Claims.

The committee felt that the bill was meritorious and that the claimant should have the right to show that this amount is legally due him because of the misrepresentation of the Government officials who made the payments and secured the release.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOFTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator undoubtedly is aware of the fact that what is known as the Meade Act—I think that is the correct name of the act—was passed soon after the war for the purpose of adjudicating various claims of contractors having claims against the Government growing out of contracts entered into during the war. The Commission sat for a long time and investigated claims arising from contracts entered into during the war. Anyone having a claim was invited to present it. Millions of dollars of claims were passed upon and settlements made. Apparently Mr. Marx had full opportunity to present his claim. I find an adverse report on the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 9058) for the relief of the Baker-Whiteley Coal Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

IMPROVEMENT AND PROTECTION OF SEA BEACHES

The bill (S. 3505) for the improvement and protection of the beaches along the shores of the United States was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to assist in the construction, but not the maintenance, of works for the improvement and protection of the beaches along the shores of the United States, and to prevent erosion due to the action of waves, tides, and currents, with the purpose of preventing damage to property along the shores of the United States, and promoting and encouraging the healthful recreation of the people. As used in this act, the word "beaches" includes all those situated on the coasts of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the Gulf of Mexico, and the shores of the Great Lakes, and all estuaries and bays directly connected therewith.

SEC. 2. (a) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, through the Beach Erosion Board, organized under the provisions of section 2 of the Rivers and Harbors Act approved July 3, 1930, to make investigations with a view to determining the most suitable methods of beach protection and restoration of beaches in different localities; to advise the States, counties, municipalities, or individuals of the appropriate locations for recreational facilities; and to publish from time to time such useful data and information concerning the protection of beaches as the Board may deem to be of value to the people of the United States.

(b) All provisions of existing law relating to examinations and surveys and to works of improvement of rivers and harbors shall apply, insofar as practicable, to examinations and surveys and to works of improvement relating to shore protection; except that all projects having to do with shore protection shall be referred for consideration and recommendation to the Beach Erosion Board instead of to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors.

SEC. 3. The Beach Erosion Board, in making its report on any work or project relating to shore protection, shall, in addition to any other matters upon which it may be required to report, state its opinion as to (a) the advisability of adopting the project, (b) what Federal interest, if any, is involved in the proposed improvement, and (c) what share of the expense, if any, should be borne by the United States.

SAVANNAH RIVER BRIDGE, SYLVANIA, GA.

The bill (H. R. 12461) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Burtons Ferry, near Sylvania, Ga., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2511) to promote safety of employees and travelers on railroads by providing for the inspection and investigation of conditions prevailing in train-dispatching offices and for the promulgation of necessary rules and regulations governing the working conditions of train dispatchers was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over, at the request of another Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the Senator from Utah will let the bill be considered. I will be glad to explain it.

Mr. KING. In the absence of the Senator, who is attending the funeral of the late Speaker of the House of Representatives, and who asked me to object to the bill, I feel constrained to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 241) to declare December 26, 1936, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That December 26, 1936, is hereby declared to be a legal holiday in the District of Columbia for all purposes: Provided, That all employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia and all employees of the District of Columbia shall be entitled to pay for such holiday the same as on other days.

PUBLIC PROTECTION DURING INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 272) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the Presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1937, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable in like manner as other appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, is hereby appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to maintain public order and protect life and property in said District from January 15 to January 26, 1937, both inclusive, including the employment of personal services, payment of allowances, traveling expenses, hire of means of transportation, cost of removing and relocating streetcar loading platforms, for the construction, rent, maintenance, and expenses incident to the operation of temporary public-comfort stations, first-aid stations, and information booths, during the period aforesaid, and other incidental expenses in the discretion of the Commissioners. Said Commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to make all reasonable regulations necessary to secure such preservation of public order and protection of life and property, and to make special regulations respecting the standing, movements, and operating of vehicles of whatever character or kind during said period; and to grant, under such conditions as they may impose, special licenses to peddlers and vendors to sell goods, wares, and merchandise on the streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District of Columbia, and to charge for such privilege such fees as they may deem proper.

SEC. 2. Such regulations and licenses shall be in force 1 week prior to said inauguration, during said inauguration, and 1 week subsequent thereto, and shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia and in such other manner as the Commissioners may deem best to acquaint the public with the same; and no penalty prescribed for the violation of any of such regulations shall be enforced until 5 days after such publication. Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine of not to exceed $100 in the police court of said District, and in default of payment thereof to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than 60 days.

PERMITS ON OCCASION OF PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATION

Res. 273) authorizing the granting of permits to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect in January 1937, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, and such other officers of the District of Columbia and the United States as control any public lands in the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized to grant permits, under such restrictions as they may deem necessary, to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies to be appointed with the approval of the President-elect for the use of any reservations or other public spaces in the city of Washington under their control on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect in January 1937: Provided, That in their opinion no serious or permanent injuries will be thereby inflicted upon such reservations or public spaces or statuary thereon; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate for such and other purposes on the occasion aforesaid such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in said city of Washington under their control as they may deem proper and necessary: Provided, however, That all stands or platforms that may be erected on the public space, as aforesaid, including such as may be erected in connection with the display of fireworks, shall be under the said supervision of the said inaugural committee, and no stand shall be built on the sidewalk, streets, parks, and public grounds of the District of Columbia, not including the area on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue directly in front of the White House, except such as are approved by the inaugural committee and the building inspector of the District of Columbia, and no stands shall be built on the sidewalks or streets on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue directly in front of the White House, except such as are approved by the inaugural committee, the building inspector of the District of Columbia, and the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That the reservations or public spaces occupied by the stands or other structures shall after the inauguration be promptly restored to their condition before such occupation, and that the inaugural committee shall indemnify the appropriate agency of the Government for any damages of any kind whatsoever upon such reservations or spaces by reason of such use.

SEC. 2. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the committee on illumination, of the inaugural committee for said inaugural ceremonies, to stretch suitable overhead conductors, with sufficient supports wherever necessary, for the purpose of connecting with the present supply of light for the purpose of effecting the said illumination: Provided, That, if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illuminating or other purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia, the work of erection and removal of said wires shall be under the supervision of the official in charge of said park or reservation: Provided further, That the said conductors shall not be used for conveying electrical currents after January 24, 1937, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the streets and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before January 31, 1937: Provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or such other officials as may have jurisdiction in the premises, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced, that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public, and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: And provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removal of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia.

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to loan to the inaugural committee for the purpose of caring for the sick, injured, and infirm on the occasion of said inauguration such hospital tents and camp appliances, and other necessaries, hospital furniture, and utensils of all descriptions, ambulances, horses, drivers, stretchers, and Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the Government of the United States as in his judgment may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of the inauguration: And provided further, That the inaugural committee shall indemnify the War Department for any loss or damage to such hospital tents and appliances, as aforesaid, not necessarily incident to such use.

SEC. 4. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Secretary of the Interior be, and they are hereby, authorized to permit telegraph, telephone, and radio-broadcasting companies to extend overhead wires to such points along the line of parade as shall be deemed by the chief marshal convenient for use in connection with the parade and other inaugural purposes, the said wires to be taken down within 10 days after the conclusion of the ceremonies.

TAX EXEMPTION FOR ADMISSION TICKETS AT INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 274) to exempt from the tax on admission amounts paid for admission tickets sold by authority of the committee on inaugural ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect in January 1937 was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all amounts paid for admission tickets sold by authority of the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies of the inauguration of the President-elect in January 1937, said committee to be appointed with the approval of the President-elect, shall be exempt from the tax on admissions imposed by section 500 of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended, all the net proceeds from the sale of said tickets to be donated by the said committee to charity.

QUARTERING OF TROOPS IN DISTRICT DURING INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 275) to provide for the quartering in certain public buildings in the District of Columbia of troops participating in the inaugural ceremonies was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to allocate such space in any public building under his care and supervision as he deems necessary for the purposes of quartering troops participating in the inaugural ceremonies to be held on January 20, 1937, but such use shall not continue after January 22, 1937. Authority granted by this resolution may be exercised notwithstanding the provisions of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, approved April 28, 1902, prohibiting the use of public buildings in connection with inaugural ceremonies.

ISAAC GANS

The Senate proceeded to consider joint resolution (S. J. Res. 280) to ratify and confirm the appointment of Isaac Gans as a member of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board in the District of Columbia, which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appointment by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of Isaac Gans as a member of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board of the District of Columbia for a term of 4 years beginning February 4, 1936, is hereby ratified and confirmed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the joint resolution proposes to ratify and confirm the appointment of Isaac Gans as a member of the Alcoholic Beverage Board of the District of Columbia. It occurs to me, from the title of the joint resolution, that it is at least a very unusual measure.

Mr. KING. It is, Mr. President. It results from the rather peculiar provision of the law for the control of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia. I will call attention to a statement in the report.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I inquire if the only object of the joint resolution is to relieve the appointee from application of the age-limit provision of the law?

Mr. KING. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. KING. I may say that I was requested to introduce the joint resolution by the District Commissioners, and they are very much in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. RALPH CHARLES STUART

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4195) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ralph Charles Stuart, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission on Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ralph Charles Stuart, of Sangerville, Maine, in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of section 24 of the Healing Arts Practice Act, District of Columbia, 1928.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, why should there be special legislation to authorize the issuance to a particular doctor of a license to practice the healing art?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we have had three or four cases of this nature, as the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is a member of the committee, will remember. Two years ago Congress passed an act under the terms of which all practicing physicians in the District of Columbia had to obtain a license as of that date. A number of those who had been practicing here for years happened to be absent from the city within the prescribed limit—I have forgotten whether it was 3 months or 6 months—and did not return during that time to Washington. The Senate has passed on four or five measures in similar circumstances, relieving persons who did not happen to be here of the disability resulting therefrom. This is one of that class of cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETROLEUM PIPE LINES IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 4568) to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products in the District of Columbia was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered to grant permission to the Steuart Bros., Inc., a corporation organized in the State of Delaware, owner of that part of square 1024 bounded by L Street SE. on the north, Twelfth Street SE. on the west, Thirteenth Street SE. on the east, and the right-of-way of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad on the south, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, its successors and assigns, to lay down, construct, maintain, and use not more than five pipe lines for the carriage of petroleum and petroleum products from a point or points north of said railroad right-of-way within the square 1024, in and through Thirteenth Street SE. due south to the Anacostia River.

SEC. 2. That all the construction and use provided for herein shall be under such regulations and rentals as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may make and establish in connection therewith and all plans and specifications for such construction shall be subject to their approval. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have full authority to designate the location and to cause such repairs or relocation of said pipe lines as the public necessity may require, any such repairs or relocation to be at the expense of the Steuart Bros., Inc., its successors or assigns.

SEC. 3. That no permission granted or enjoyed hereunder shall vest any title or interest in or to the land within Thirteenth Street SE.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

NATIONAL UNION INSURANCE CO., OF WASHINGTON

The bill (H. R. 11522) to amend the charter of the National Union Insurance Co., of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charter of the National Union Insurance Co., of Washington, granted by an act of Congress approved February 14, 1865, and amended by an act of Congress approved May 11, 1892, is hereby further amended to permit the said insurance company to insure and reinsure risks in all the various forms authorized by section 3 of an act of Congress approved March 4, 1922, entitled "An act to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3958) to prevent the pollution of the navigable waters of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING and Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3959) to amend section 13 of the act of March 3, 1899, relating to the deposit of refuse in the navigable waters of the United States, and section 3 of the Oil Pollution Act, 1924, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4342) to create a Division of Stream Pollution in the Bureau of the Public Health Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3957) granting the consent of Congress to the States of Montana and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement for division of the waters of the Yellowstone River was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Let the bill go over.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hope the present occupant of the chair will withhold his objection. Let me say to the Senator, if he is not already familiar with the fact, that the engineers of both the State of Wyoming and the State of Montana have conferred and both have written, as I understand, asking that this proposed legislation be enacted. I understand further that both States are in favor of it. An amendment has been offered to remove the controversial portions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will ask that the bill go over until he may be on the floor.

IRRIGATION CHANNEL, CLEAR LAKE AND LOST RIVER, CALIF.

The bill (H. R. 6773) to deepen the irrigation channel between Clear Lake and Lost River, in the State of California, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete investigation with a view to determining whether any dams, waterworks, or other projects have been constructed in the Clear Lake Watershed, in the State of California, in violation of the water rights of the United States in such State, and (2) to report thereon to the Congress as soon as practicable.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from the reclamation fund the sum of $5,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this act, the amounts expended from such appropriations to be reimbursable under the reclamation law.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide for an investigation to determine whether the water rights of the United States have been violated in the Clear Lake Watershed, Calif., and for other purposes."

DEVELOPMENT OF FARM FORESTRY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4723) to authorize cooperation in the development of farm forestry in the States and Territories, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in order to aid agriculture, increase farm-forest income, conserve water resources, increase employment, and in other ways advance the general welfare and improve living conditions on farms through reforestation and afforestation in the various States and Territories, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, through the Forest Service, and in cooperation with appropriate Federal, State, and other agencies or directly, to produce, or procure, and distribute forest trees and shrub-planting stock; to make necessary investigations; to advise farmers regarding the establishment, protection, and care of farm forests and forest and shrub plantations and the harvesting, utilization, and marketing of the products thereof; and to enter into cooperative agreements for the establishment, protection, and care of farm or other rural trees and shrub plantings within such States and Territories; and, whenever suitable Government-owned lands are not available, to lease, purchase, or accept donations of land and develop nursery sites for the production of planting stock. No cooperative reforestation or afforestation shall be undertaken pursuant to this act unless the cooperator makes available without charge the land to be planted and the Government shall not contribute to the direct additional cost more than 50 percent of the estimated ultimate direct additional cost of establishing, protecting, and caring for any such tree or shrub plantation in accordance with the conditions and requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually such amounts as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act. This act shall be known as the Farm Forestry Act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this bill is short but of considerable importance. Its object is to give assistance to individual farmers in the growing of timber in a small way, to encourage the planting and growing of trees on farms, to give information as to the best kind of trees to plant, how they should be grown, and how they should be treated. Does that satisfy the Senator?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COOLIDGE DAM, SAN CARLOS PROJECT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11643) to amend certain provisions of the act of March 7, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 210–212), which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 7, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 210–212), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, are hereby amended so as to provide that the net revenues from the sale of surplus power developed at the Coolidge Dam and other generating plants of the San Carlos project and transmitted over existing transmission lines shall be devoted, first, to reimbursing the United States for the cost of developing such electrical power; second, to reimbursing the United States for the cost of the San Carlos irrigation project; third, to payment of operation and maintenance charges and the making of repairs and improvements on said projects: Provided, however, That all net power revenues from the sale of power transmitted over such additional transmission lines as may hereafter be constructed by the San Carlos Irrigation and Drainage District for the benefit of the San Carlos project shall first be devoted to the repayment of the construction costs of such additional transmission lines: Provided further, That the United States and the San Carlos Irrigation District shall enter into an appropriate contract in accordance with the terms of this act to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, which contract shall provide that the additional transmission lines hereafter constructed by the district shall, upon completion of construction, be conveyed to the United States: Provided further, That after reimbursement to the district from such net power revenues of the cost of constructing additional transmission lines the net power revenues received from the sales of power transmitted over additional transmission lines hereafter constructed by the district shall be applied as herein provided for the application of net power revenues from the sale of power transmitted over existing transmission lines.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what is the nature of this bill? There is nothing on the face of the record to show its object.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the title of the House bill does not set forth clearly its object. The bill proposes to amend a special statute authorizing the construction of a power plant at Coolidge Dam. Under that statute, unless modified, it is impossible for the water users under the project to secure a loan from the Rural Electrification Commission. The matter was brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior, and he recommended this change. The act referred to is known as the San Carlos Act and relates merely to this one project.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Arizona. Because of his knowledge of the pending Bonneville project bill——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator speak a little louder? It is impossible to hear him.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Arizona is very familiar with the terms of the pending Bonneville bill, which I hope we will be able to have passed by the Senate today. My only interest in the bill now before the Senate arises from the fact that it has something to do with the disposition, apparently, as I hastily read it, of the net revenues from some Federal electric-generating plant; and I am wondering if, in the light of the Senator's knowledge of the terms of the Bonneville bill, he thinks this measure in anywise would impinge upon it.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no relationship at all between the two.

Mr. BONE. Where is the Coolidge Dam?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is on the Gila River in Arizona.

Mr. BONE. I have no objection to this bill, the Senator will understand, but I was just wondering, because of its being a Federal project——

Mr. HAYDEN. It is my understanding that the bill to which the Senator from Washington refers, namely, the Bonneville Dam bill, is so drawn that it will not interfere with any Indian irrigation project in any manner; so that there is no conflict between the special statute relating to the one project and the general proposal which the Senator from Washington has in mind.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator understand that the changed provision authorizes the Federal Power Commission to control the rates?

Mr. HAYDEN. It does.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think we are entitled to hear the conversation on the other side. I have asked the Senator to speak louder. If we cannot be admitted into the council over there, the bill is not going to pass, because we will have to object to it in order to get anywhere.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the present law authorizes the construction of a power plant for the generation of electricity at the Coolidge Dam in Arizona and provides that all the proceeds from the sale of power shall be used, first, to reimburse the United States for the cost of that plant.

In order to carry the power to the farmers on the project—it is an Indian reservation—it is essential for them to obtain a loan from the Rural Electrification Commission for the erection of certain transmission lines. The existing statute provides that all receipts shall go to pay for the power plant, and under that statute it is not possible to secure loans from the Rural Electrification Commission to repay the cost of the transmission lines. This bill, if enacted, would modify the present law so that there really could be two uses of the receipts—one to pay for the power plant and the other to repay the Rural Electrification Commission for money loaned on account of the transmission lines.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the receipts coming in, instead of being used for paying the loan, are going to be partially used to pay something else?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any assurance that the Rural Electrification Administration would loan money and permit the payment of receipts to somebody besides itself?

Mr. HAYDEN. This bill would allow the receipts to be split, a part to go to the Rural Electrification Commission to reimburse them for the transmission lines, and the other part to go to pay for the cost of the power plant itself.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it not follow, necessarily, a part of the security for the loan to build the plant or the line being used for some other purpose, that the loan from the Rural Electrification Administration probably could not be properly secured?

Mr. HAYDEN. The building of a transmission line would increase the receipts. The bill was drafted after consultation with the Secretary of the Interior and the Rural Electrification Administration, and is satisfactory to both.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it compulsory on the part of the Rural Electrification Administration to make the loan?

Mr. HAYDEN. Not at all. It is within their discretion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEES OF ATTORNEYS UNDER CONTRACTS WITH INDIAN TRIBES

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 177) to define the term of certain contracts with Indian tribes, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That any contracts or agreements heretofore approved by the Secretary of the Interior between the authorities of any tribe, band, or group of Indians and their attorneys for the prosecution of claims against the United States, which provide that such contracts or agreements shall run for a period of years therein specified, and as long thereafter as may be required to complete the business therein provided for, or words of like import, or which provide that compensation for services rendered shall be on a quantum-meruit basis not to exceed a specified percentage, shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with section 2103 of the Revised Statutes (or sec. 81, title 25, U. S. C.): Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall limit the power of the Secretary of the Interior, after due notice and hearing and for proper cause shown, to cancel any such contract or agreement: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed to revive any contract which has been terminated heretofore by lapse of time, operation of law, or by acts of the parties thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, is the joint resolution recommended by the Department?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the purpose of the measure is to enable the Secretary to adjust and provide fees for attorneys who represent Indians before the Court of Claims. The Congress has passed many Court of Claims bills, practically every one providing a different method of determining the fee. Because of the irregularity and multiplicity of the provisions, the Department thought it wise to provide a general clause giving the Secretary ample authority to adjust fees under any conditions. That is the purpose of the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the amendment suggested by the Acting Secretary of the Interior been reported favorably by the committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It has been.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSIT AND INVESTMENT OF INDIAN FUNDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8588) to authorize the deposit and investment of Indian funds, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 11, in section 1, after the words "Interior on", to strike out "active checking accounts" and insert the words "any deposit which is payable on demand", and, at the top of page 4, to insert new sections

nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to withdraw from the United States Treasury and to deposit in banks to be selected by him the common or community funds of any Indian tribe which are, or may hereafter be, held in trust by the United States, and on which the United States is not obligated by law to pay interest at higher rates than can be procured from the banks. The said Secretary is also authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to deposit in banks to be selected by him the funds held in trust by the United States for the benefit of individual Indians: Provided, That no individual Indian money shall be deposited in any bank until the bank shall have agreed to pay interest thereon at a reasonable rate, except that the payment of interest may be waived in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior on any deposit which is payable on demand: Provided further, That no tribal or individual Indian money shall be deposited in any bank until the bank shall have furnished an acceptable bond or pledged collateral security therefor in the form of any public-debt obligations of the United States and any bonds, notes, or other obligations which are unconditionally guaranteed as to both interest and principal by the United States, except that no such bond or collateral shall be required to be furnished by any such bank which is entitled to the benefits of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, with respect to any deposits of such tribal or individual funds to the extent that such deposits are insured under such section: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act, or in section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, shall operate to deprive any Indian having unrestricted funds on deposit in any such bank of the full protection afforded by section 12B of said Federal Reserve Act, irrespective of any interest such Indian may have in any restricted Indian funds on deposit in the same bank to the credit of a disbursing agent of the United States. For the purposes of said acts, said unrestricted funds shall constitute a separate and distinct basis for an insurance claim: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior, if he deems it advisable and for the best interest of the Indians, may invest the trust funds of any tribe or individual Indian in any public-debt obligations of the United States and in any bonds, notes, or other obligations which are unconditionally guaranteed as to both interest and principal by the United States: And provided further, That the foregoing shall apply to the funds of the Osage Tribe of Indians, and the individual members thereof, only with respect to the deposit of such funds in banks.

SEC. 2. Section 28 of the act of May 25, 1918, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919", and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed as affecting the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act or regulations issued thereunder relating to the payment of interest on deposits.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to acquire in the State of Oklahoma, by purchase, relinquishment, gift, exchange, or assignment, any interest in lands, water rights, or surface rights to lands, within or without existing Indian reservations, including trust or otherwise restricted lands now in Indian ownership: Provided, That such lands shall be agricultural and grazing lands of good character and quality in proportion to the respective needs of the particular Indian or Indians for whom such purchases are made. Title to all lands so acquired shall be taken in the name of the United States in trust for the tribe, band, group, or individual Indian for whose benefit such land is so acquired, and while the title thereto is held by the United States said lands shall be free from any and all taxes, save that the State of Oklahoma is authorized to levy and collect a gross-production tax, not in excess of the rate applied to production from lands in private ownership, upon all oil and gas produced from said lands, which said tax the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid as provided by law.

SEC. 5. Whenever any restricted Indian land or interest in land, other than sales or leases of oil, gas, or other minerals therein, are offered for sale, the Secretary of the Interior shall have a preference right, in his discretion, to purchase the same for or in behalf of any Indian or Indians of the same or any other tribe, at a fair valuation to be fixed by appraisement satisfactory to the Indian owner or owners, or if offered for sale at auction said Secretary shall have a preference right, in his discretion, to purchase the same for or in behalf of any Indian or Indians by meeting the highest bid offered therefor.

SEC. 6. That at any time prior to the expiration of the existing period of trust or other restrictions against alienation of any lands, funds, or other property belonging to any Indian or Indians in the State of Oklahoma, whether held under a trust, tribal, or other form of patent, deed, or any ther instrument containing restrictions against alienation, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to extend such trust or other restricted period for such further period or periods as he may deem best: Provided, however, That during such trust or restricted period, or any extension or extensions thereof, the restrictions may be removed as hereinafter provided:

(1) On application by any Indian owner or owners of such restricted property, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to remove the restrictions, in whole or in part, from any such lands, funds, or other property whenever said Secretary deems it to be to the best interest of the Indian owner or owners so to do.

(2) Whenever the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that any adult Indian of less than one-half Indian blood, not under guardianship, is competent to manage his own affairs, said Secretary, in his discretion, without application from such Indian, after giving 60 days' notice in writing of his intention so to do, may remove the restrctions from all lands, funds, or other property belonging to such Indian: Provided, however, That in all cases where the restrictions are removed on the ground of competency without application of the Indian owner, such removal shall extend to all but not to a part only of the restricted property belonging to such competent Indian: Provided further, That during such 60-day period the Indian owner or owners of such property shall have the right of appeal to the Federal district court as to his or her competency in the same manner and to the same extent as provided in the next succeeding paragraph hereof, and the decision of the Federal court in such matters shall be final and binding on the Secretary of the Interior.

(3) In any case wherein a restricted Indian has applied to the Secretary of the Interior for the removal of his or her restrictions (on land, property, securities, or funds) and such application has been rejected, and in any case wherein the Secretary has acted to remove restrictions or issue a patent in fee without the consent of the Indian owner of the restricted property, if the application is for the removal of restrictions on land an appeal will lie to the Federal court under whose jurisdiction the land is located, and if the application is for the removal of restrictions on other property, securities, or funds only, then the appeal will lie to the Federal court having jurisdiction of the legal residence of the applicant. If the court shall find that the action of the Secretary of the Interior in denying such application was arbitrary and without due regard to the best interests of the Indian applicant, such court may, in its discretion, overrule the action of the Secretary of the Interior and the decision of the Federal court shall be final and binding. In all cases where appeals are authorized as provided herein, the applicant is entitled to have a certified copy of all papers, including the application and order of rejection, and such applicant shall pay all necessary expenses in connection with the preparation and certification of such transcript: Provided, That the compensation to be paid any attorney or attorneys for services rendered to Indians in connection with such cases shall be paid only in such sum or sums as may be fixed by the Federal court: Provided further, That in the event an appeal is denied by any Federal court, then the costs of such appeal shall be assessed and taxed against the applicant.

SEC. 7. Whenever any restricted Indian is a party to any suit or other proceedings involving his property or estate, either as plaintiff, defendant, or intervenor, in any court in the State of Oklahoma, the plaintiff therein shall within 10 days from the institution of such suit or other proceedings serve a certified copy of petition filed therein upon the superintendent or other official in charge of the agency having supervision over such Indian, and the filing of such notice and subsequent proceedings in such matters shall be in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act of April 12, 1926 (44 Stat. 239). The attorneys provided for by the act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. 312), and any other qualified legal representatives of the Secretary of the Interior may, and such officials are hereby given the right to, petition for the removal of such suit or proceeding to the Federal court at any time prior to the trial of such case by the State court. Whenever a transfer of the proceedings to the Federal court is had, the compensation to be paid any attorney or attorneys for services rendered to Indians in such case shall be paid only in such sum or sums as may be fixed by the Federal court, and such orders fixing attorneys' compensation shall be binding upon all parties in interest, including the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That nothing contained herein, nor in the act of January 27, 1933 (47 Stat. L. 777), shall be construed as changing prior laws insofar as such prior laws pertain to the approval of conveyances of lands inherited by or devised to Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, except that no interest in restricted lands inherited by or devised to any Indian of one-half or more Indian blood, enrolled or unenrolled, shall be sold without the approval of the proper county court in accordance with the provisions of section 8 of the act of January 27, 1933 (47 Stat. L. 777): Provided, That no guardian appointed by the courts of the State of Oklahoma for any person of one-half or more Indian blood shall have any jurisdiction or control over any restricted property belonging to such Indian except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, nor shall the restricted lands belonging to any minor Indian be sold during minority without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the proceeds derived from the sale of any restricted land belonging to any Indian of one-half or more Indian blood, as herein provided, shall be turned over to the Secretary of the Interior for supervision by him, as other individual Indian money, for the benefit of the Indian owner thereof.

SEC. 9. Exclusive jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Secretary of the Interior to determine, after notice and hearing under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the heirs of any deceased Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, enrolled or unenrolled, and to administer and distribute the restricted estate of such Indian in all cases where the aggregate value of the restricted lands, funds, or other property belonging to such an Indian at the date of his death does not exceed $1,000, such value to be fixed and determined by the Secretary of the Interior in such manner as he may prescribe.

SEC. 10. Any recognized tribe or band of Indians residing in Oklahoma shall have the right to organize for its common welfare and to adopt a constitution and bylaws, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. The Secretary of the Interior may issue to any such organized group a charter of incorporation, which shall become operative when ratified by a majority vote of the adult members of the organization voting: Provided, however, That such election shall be void unless the total vote cast be at least 40 percent of those entitled to vote. Such charter may convey to the incorporated group, in addition to any powers which may properly be vested in a body corporate under the laws of the State of Oklahoma, the right to participate in the revolving credit fund and to enjoy any other rights or privileges secured to an organized Indian tribe under the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984): Provided, That the corporate funds of any such chartered group may be deposited in any national bank within the State of Oklahoma or otherwise invested, utilized, or disbursed in accordance with the terms of the corporate charter.

SEC. 11. Any 10 or more Indians, as determined by the official tribal rolls, or Indian descendants of such enrolled members, or Indians as defined in the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), who reside within the State of Oklahoma in convenient proximity to each other may receive from the Secretary of the Interior a charter as a local cooperative association for any one or more of the following purposes: Credit administration, production, marketing, consumers' protection, or land management. The provisions of this act, the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior, and the charters of the cooperative associations issued pursuant thereto shall govern such cooperative associations: Provided, That in those matters not covered by said act, regulations, or charters, the laws of the State of Oklahoma, if applicable, shall govern. In any stock or nonstock cooperative association, no one member shall have more than one vote, and membership therein shall be open to all Indians residing within the prescribed district.

SEC. 12. The charters of any cooperative association organized pursuant to this act shall not be amended or revoked by the Secretary except after a majority vote of the membership. Such cooperative associations may sue and be sued in any court of the State of Oklahoma or of the United States having jurisdiction of the cause of action, but a certified copy of all papers filed in any action against a cooperative association in a court of Oklahoma shall be served upon the Secretary of the Interior or upon an employee duly authorized by him to receive such service. Within 30 days after such service or within such extended time as the trial court may permit, the Secretary of the Interior may intervene in such action or may remove such action to the United States district court to be held in the district where such petition is pending by filing in such action in the State court a petition for such removal together with the certified copy of the papers served upon the Secretary. It shall then be the duty of the State court to accept such petition and to proceed no further in such action. The said copy shall be entered in the said district court within 30 days after the filing of the petition for removal, and the said district court is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine said action.

SEC. 13. The Secretary is authorized to make loans to individual Indians and to associations or coporate groups organized pursuant to this act. For the making of such loans and for expenses of the cooperative association organized pursuant to this act, there shall be appropriated, out of the Treasury of the United States, the sum of $2,000,000.

SEC. 14. All funds appropriated under the several grants of authority contained in the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), are hereby made available for use under the provisions of this act, and Oklahoma Indians shall be accorded and allocated a fair and just share of any and all funds hereafter appropriated under the authorization herein set forth: Provided, That any royalties, bonuses, or other revenues derived from mineral deposits underlying lands purchased in Oklahoma under the authority granted by this act, or by the act of June 18, 1934, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and such revenues are hereby made available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior for the acquisition of lands for and for loans to Indians in Oklahoma as authorized by this act and by the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984).

SEC. 15. This act, save section 16, shall not relate to or affect Osage County, Okla.

SEC. 16. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $776,742.03, being the net amount received by the United States from the sale of land of the Osage Tribe of Indians in the State of Kansas under article 1 of the treaty of September 29, 1865 (14 Stat. L. 687), credited to the "Civilization fund" on the books of the Treasury of the United States and used for the benefit of Indian tribes other than the Osage, said Osage Tribe of Indians referred to herein now residing in the State of Oklahoma, as found by the Court of Claims in its opinion of May 28, 1928 (66 Ct. Cls. 64), in a case known as B–38, entitled "Osage Nation of Indians against United States of America", instituted under act of February 6, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1097).

Said amount, when appropriated, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Osage Tribe of Indians and distributed in accordance with the rules and regulations governing payment of moneys accruing to members of the Osage Tribe of Indians.

Said appropriation shall be in full, complete, and final settlement of the claim of the Osage Tribe of Indians against the United States arising under the treaty of 1865, above cited.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of said appropriation when made, the fees and expenses of the attorneys of record, in accordance with provisions and percentages in their contract as approved by the Secretary of the Interior May 5, 1931.

SEC. 17. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, inasmuch as the amendment is somewhat lengthy, I shall explain it briefly.

During the present session the Senate passed two Indian bills, one of which was an authorization for the payment to the Osage Indians of certain sums of money known as the civilization fund. Similar bills have passed the Senate on several occasions and have passed the House on different occasions, but the same bill has never passed both bodies at the same session.

The Senate has also at this session passed a bill known as the Oklahoma bill.

The two bills were sent to the House. The House committee reported the bills favorably, but, owing to parliamentary conditions in the House, it has not been possible to have the bills considered there. The Senate committee has added the two bills as amendments to the House bill now before us for consideration, and asks that the Senate attach the two Senate bills in order to send them to the House in such shape that action may be had on them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to authorize the deposit and investment of Indian funds, to promote the general welfare of the Indians of the State of Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

PERISHABLE AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8759) to amend the act known as the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act 1930, approved June 10, 1930, as amended, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 4 of section 2 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act of 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(4) For any commission merchant, dealer, or broker to make, for a fraudulent purpose, any false or misleading statement in connection with any transaction involving any perishable agricultural commodity which is received in interstate or foreign commerce by such commission merchant, or bought or sold, or contracted to be bought, sold, or consigned, in such commerce by such dealer, or the purchase or sale of which in such commerce is negotiated by such broker; or to fail or refuse truly and correctly to account promptly in respect of any transaction in any such commodity to the person with whom such transaction is had;".

SEC. 2. That paragraph (b) of section 4 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act of 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) The Secretary shall refuse to issue a license to an applicant (1) if he finds that the applicant has previously been responsible in whole or in part for any violation of the provisions of section 2 for which a license of the applicant, or the license of any partnership, association, or corporation in which the applicant held any office, or, in the case of a partnership, had any share or interest, was revoked; or (2) if he finds after notice and hearing that at any time within 2 years said applicant was responsible in whole or in part for any flagrant or repeated violation of the provisions of section 2; or (3) if he finds, in case the applicant is a partnership, association, or corporation, that any individual holding office or, in the case of a partnership, having any interest or share in the applicant, has previously been responsible in whole or in part for any violation of the provisions of section 2 for which the license of such individual, or of any partnership, association, or corporation in which such person held any office, or, in the case of a partnership, had any share or interest, was revoked; or (4) if he finds, after notice and hearing in case the applicant is a partnership, association, or corporation, that any individual holding any office or, in the case of a partnership, having any interest or share in the applicant, had previously, at any time within 2 years, been responsible in whole or in part for any flagrant or repeated violation of the provisions of section 2; or (5) if he finds that the applicant, subject to his right of appeal under section 7 (b), has failed, except in case of bankruptcy, to pay within the time limit provided therein any reparation order which has been issued, within 2 years, against him as an individual, or against a partnership of which he was a member, or an association or corporation in which he held any office, or, in case the applicant is a partnership, association, or corporation, that any individual holding any office, or, in the case of a partnership, having any interest or share in the applicant, subject to his right of appeal under section 7 (b), has failed, except in the case of bankruptcy, to pay within the time limit provided therein any reparation order which has been issued, within 2 years, against him as an individual, or against a partnership of which he was a member, or an association or corporation in which he held any office. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions, the Secretary, in the case of such applicant, may issue a license if the applicant furnishes a bond or other satisfactory assurance that his business will be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the act and that he will pay all reparation orders which may previously have been issued against him for violations, or which may be issued against him within 2 years following the date of the license, subject to his right of appeal under section 7 (b), but such license shall not be issued before the expiration of 1 year from the date of revocation of license or from the date of the Secretary's finding that the applicant has been responsible, in whole or in part, for any flagrant or repeated violation of section 2;".

SEC. 3. That paragraph (c) of section 7 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) Either party adversely affected by the entry of a reparation order by the Secretary may, within 30 days from and after the date of such order, appeal therefrom to the District Court of the United States for the district in which said hearing was held: Provided, That in cases handled without a hearing in accordance with paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 6 or in which a hearing has been waived by agreement of the parties, appeal shall be to the district court of the United States for the district in which the party complained against is located. Such appeal shall be perfected by the filing of a notice thereof, together with a petition in duplicate, which shall recite prior proceedings before the Secretary, and shall state the grounds upon which petitioner relies to defeat the right of the adverse party to recover the damages claimed, with the clerk of said court with proof of service thereof upon the adverse party by registered mail. The clerk of court shall immediately forward a copy thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall forthwith prepare, certify, and file in said court a true copy of the Secretary's decision, findings of fact, conclusions, and order in said case, together with copies of the pleadings upon which the case was heard and submitted to the Secretary. Such suit in the District Court shall be a trial de novo and shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that the findings of fact and order or orders of tthe Secretary shall be prima-facie evidence of the facts therein stated. Appellee shall not be liable for costs in said court, and if appellee prevails he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee to be taxed and collected as part of his costs. Such petition and pleadings certified by the Secretary upon which decision was made by him shall, upon filing in the district court, constitute the pleadings upon which said trial de novo shall proceed subject to any amendment allowed in that court;".

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the bill proposes to amend the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act of 1930. The two amendments proposed to that act are simple, but really of great importance. At present if the Department cancels the license of an individual for some violation of the act, such individual can immediately form a corporation and evade the provisions of the act by doing business as a corporation. One amendment would take care of that situation.

The other amendment provides that where adjudication has been made by the Department without a hearing, an appeal may be taken to the district court of the district in which the individual or corporation resides. At the present time they have to come to the District of Columbia. It is entirely unfair to force them to do that.

The two amendments are proposed at the suggestion of the Department, one of them to strengthen the enforcement of the act and the other simply to afford justice to people who are being unjustly treated at the present time.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe there is any provision in the bill which would act as an impediment to or restraint upon farmers or those who produce perishable fruits in finding markets for their commodities?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. None whatsoever.

Mr. KING. It would not be injurious to the farmers or the fruit growers?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I am satisfied it would not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as I understand, the bill is recommended favorably both by the Department and by the committee?

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, approved February 29, 1936, is amended by adding a new subsection as follows:

"(d) Any payment that would otherwise be made to any producer pursuant to the terms of this section shall be reduced as follows:

"In computing any such reduction, payment shall be computed separately with respect to performance in any State, Territory, or possession for each year. BILL PASSED OVER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a hasty reference to the report indicates that a similar bill was vetoed by the President of the United States. I wonder whether objections stated in the veto message, which I do not have before me, have been met in the bill which has just been stated?

In the absence of an explanation, I ask that the bill go over.

P. Bolack, of Tarrant, Ala., for disability alleged to have been incurred during the month of October 1918 while an employee of H. Koppers Co., subcontractors of the Birmingham Coke & By-Products Co., agents of the Ordnance Department, War Department, engaged in the construction of a byproducts plant at Boyles, Ala., and to consider his claim under the remaining provisions of said act: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I made the report on the bill. This is a case which at the present time is based on a claim under the Employees' Compensation Act, but is barred by the statute of limitations. The bill is intended to relieve Mr. Bolack from the operations of the statute of limitations. However, the bill is written in such manner that it does not give any benefits which may have accrued up to the time of the passage of the bill.

No objection has been filed by the War Department or by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission. I am sure the man was seriously and permanently injured. I am sure that at that time he would not have been in condition to make a report. I am certain the bill gives no authority except to investigate.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

ADDIE I. AND LORIN H. TRYON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2259) for the relief of Addie I. Tryon and Lorin H. Tryon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that bill. It seems to me it is lacking in merit. It remits the claim to the district court out in California. It seems to me, if the matter is worthy of going to court at all, it ought to go to the Court of Claims. If we are going to send claims, either growing out of tort or out of contract, to be tried in the various district courts within the various States, we might as well abolish the Court of Claims.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there have been 10 other cases involving precisely the same question which, by similar acts, have been submitted to the courts. The Government has lost in the lower courts in all of them, and they have not been appealed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I concede that he has a number of precedents; but for years, and until very recently, the Government was not sued in the various district courts. We set up the Court of Claims, and we had a bill prepared under the terms of which a special commission was set up for the purpose of considering all these claims against the United States. The Senator will see that the United States will be placed at a very serious disadvantage if it is to be sued in all parts of the United States, in the various courts, State and Federal, for actions based upon contract or upon tort. The sovereign, as a rule, does not permit itself to be sued; and this is a claim, as I recall, going away back to 1916 or 1917.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It is a war claim; yes.

Mr. KING. As I stated a few moments ago, the Meade Commission was set up for the purpose of passing upon all those claims; so full opportunity was given to the claimants to present their case at that time.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The purpose of the bill, in addition to conferring jurisdiction upon the court to hear the case, is to waive the statute of limitations. The evidence discloses that the delay in presenting the claim has been entirely due to the request upon the part of the Government through the years that suit be delayed until the Supreme Court of the United States should decide one of these cases; yet one by one the cases have been tried, and the Government has lost them, and the Government has failed to take the cases to the Supreme Court.

The report upon which this matter is based is dated back in 1932; and at that time the Secretary of Agriculture asked that further action be delayed until the Kraus case could be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States; and yet when the Government lost the Kraus case it did not take it to the Supreme Court.

In view of the fact that there are, I believe, 11 different cases, it seems to me these particular persons—I do not know who they are, and I have no interest in them—should have the same rights that the others have been allowed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will assent to this arrangement, I shall withdraw my objection. Let the bill be passed, but let the papers not be transmitted to the House for a couple of days, in order to give me an opportunity to confer with the departments. If I should receive such information as would justify me in moving to reconsider, I should ask the Senator to consent to that arrangement.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

M. Loeffler, West Mineral, Kans., the sum of $3,838.75, which sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for personal injuries sustained by the said F. M. Loeffler as a result of an accident involving a Civilian Conservation Corps truck, at Camp Messenger, Company No. 1711, West Mineral, Kans., on March 15, 1935: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire whether the Federal Government is assuming responsibility for all damages, torts, and accidents that occur in connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps camps. They have several thousand members.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the attitude of the Claims Committee on that point is that we permit the bills to go through, but uniformly provide that the money must come out of the appropriations made to the Civilian Conservation Corps organization, and not out of the ordinary Federal funds.

Mr. McGILL. And, Mr. President, that provision was made in the amendment to this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 13, on page 11, line 13, after the word "consumers" and the semicolon, to strike out the word "and", and after the word "welfare" to insert a semicolon and the words "and (5) the interests of irrigation in connection with projects being developed by Federal agencies", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. The power conferred upon the Federal Power Commission by the terms of this act shall be exercised without regard to the provisions of statutes heretofore enacted but with due regard to (1) the cost of construction, operation, maintenance, and replacement of power facilities properly chargeable to development, transmission and sale of power; (2) available markets; (3) the interest of the ultimate consumers; (4) the general public welfare; and (5) the interests of irrigation in connection with projects being developed by Federal agencies.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 14, on page 11, line 21, before the word "Federal", to strike out the word "authorized", so as to make the section read;

SEC. 14. In the absence of statutory designation, the President shall have authority to designate a Federal agency to construct, maintain, and operate such facilities as may be required for the development and sale of electrical energy from the water power created incidental to the construction of any Federal project and to authorize such agency to enter into contracts for the sale of the water power created or surplus electrical energy generated at such project.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 15, on page 12, line 5, before the word "water", to strike out the word "the", and after the word "users" to insert the words "during the period of such operations"; and on line 8, to add a proviso as follows: "Provided, That the exemption provided for in this section shall apply only during the period when the electric energy is being actually handled by the water users", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any Indian irrigation project or to any Federal reclamation project where the operation and maintenance thereof have been or shall hereafter be taken over by or on behalf of water users, during the period of such operations, or modify any rights conferred upon such water users by the Reclamation Act and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto: Provided, That the exemption provided for in this section shall apply only during the period when the electric energy is being actually handled by the water users.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this bill simply creates a legislative structure for the operation and administration of the Bonneville Dam, now in the course of construction between the States of Oregon and Washington on the Columbia River. This great enterprise will reach its completion next summer, and it is thought best by the President of the United States, the Board of Army Engineers, and the Federal Power Commission that legislation be enacted along this line at the present session of the Congress.

Some delays have occurred due to the consideration by various agencies of proposed uniform legislation on the subject. It is true that I reported the bill but yesterday, and I must say that great credit is due to the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] for the time he gave to the consideration of the various bills. Several have been introduced, but the one now before the Senate, which I reported from the Committee on Commerce, embodies the latest proposal. It has met with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, of the President of the United States, who urges its immediate enactment, of the Board of Army Engineers, and of the Federal Power Commission. It does not carry any appropriation. It merely directs the Board of Engineers to complete the construction of the dam, which includes the fishways and the navigation canal.

The Federal Power Commission are authorized to prescribe rates, determine the costs upon which they are based, and to conduct all matters with regard to the transmission and distribution of electrical energy.

This is a simple measure designed to meet a present situation, and I hope that no Senator will object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is a very important bill. I do not desire to object to its consideration, but I doubt whether the opportunity will be afforded for action on it by the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to call up the amendments which I offered yesterday, and which are on the table. I ask that they be inserted in their proper places.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The first amendment of the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 10, line 19, after the word "Dam", to strike out the words "no rights of the States of Arizona and Nevada under existing contracts shall be impaired, and such adjustments shall be made in the payments to the United States so as to leave unaffected the rights of said States under section 4 (b) of the Boulder Canyon Project Act" and to insert in lieu thereof "the rights of the States of Arizona and Nevada to the percentages of the profits as stated in section 4 (b) of the Boulder Canyon Act shall not be impaired thereby."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Wyoming state the effect of the amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Boulder Canyon Act provides that the State of Arizona and the State of Nevada shall be entitled to share to the extent of 18¾ percent each in the excess profits derived from the operation of the power plants. The pending bill proposes that certain contracts which have been entered into by those States may be modified by the Federal Power Commission, thereby reducing the profits to be derived from the operation of the project.

The Boulder Canyon Act also provides that the excess profits shall go into a separate fund for the development of the Colorado River Basin. Every one of the States in the basin is materially and vitally interested in the separate fund to be so created.

The language of the bill might be so construed as to increase the percentage allotted to the States of Nevada and Arizona, and the purpose of my amendment is merely to provide that in the event rates are changed the rights of the States of Arizona and Nevada shall be preserved to the exact percentages which they now have in the excess revenue.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, frankly I am not so much concerned about the amount of revenue the State of Arizona or the State of Nevada may obtain as I am that the rate at which power shall be sold in the two States shall be as low as possible. As the bill now reads, it provides that "no rights of the States of Arizona and Nevada under existing contracts shall be impaired", thereby preserving the status. As I heard the amendment read, that language is stricken out. Does the Senator's amendment strike out the words "no rights of the States of Arizona and Nevada under existing contracts shall be impaired"?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The amendment I have presented proposes to insert the words "the rights of the States of Arizona and Nevada to the percentages of the profits as stated in section 4 (b) of the Boulder Canyon Act shall not be impaired thereby."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I voted in the committee against reporting this bill because no opportunity had been afforded to study its provisions and to familiarize ourselves with it. The amendment just offered still further confuses the measure, and I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

SAWTOOTH NATIONAL FOREST

The bill (S. 4392) to add certain lands to the Sawtooth National Forest was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described areas be, and the same are hereby, included in and made a part of the Sawtooth National Forest, subject to all prior adverse rights, and that said lands shall hereafter be subject to all laws affecting national forests: Sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 16, 17, and 18, township 1 north, range 15 east, Boise meridian.

GAME-MANAGEMENT SUPPLY DEPOT AND LABORATORY, IDAHO

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) providing for establishment of a game-management supply depot and laboratory, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I have been requested by a Senator who is absent to have this bill go over.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection until I can explain the bill, so that the RECORD may show the situation, which might remove the objection of the absent Senator?

Mr. KING. The bill could not be considered and passed today.

Mr. POPE. No; but I should like to make a statement. There is now such a supply depot at Pocatello, and the Government is renting the building and paying $2,240 a year. The purpose is to construct a building of its own and thus save this expense. The amount saved would soon pay for the cost of construction.

Mr. KING. I doubt whether the bill could pass the House of Representatives, but I am sure that before we adjourn, when the absent Senator to whom I have referred returns, I can talk with him, and we may have an opportunity to consider the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

PORT NEWARK ARMY BASE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4737) for the sale of the Port Newark Army Base to the city of Newark, N. J., and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell to the city of Newark, N. J., on terms and conditions deemed advisable by him, the right, title, and interest of the United States in the Port Newark Army Base, N. J., including such equipment pertaining thereto as he determines is not required for military purposes, for the sum of $2,000,000, of which $100,000 shall be paid in cash and the balance in annual installments, on or before August 1 of each succeeding year, of $100,000 per year for the first 5 years and $200,000 per year thereafter, with permission to the city of Newark to anticipate payment of the deferred installments at any time: Provided, That said initial payment of $100,000 of the purchase price shall be made by the city of Newark to the Secretary of War not later than August 1, 1936, and possession delivered by the United States as of September 1, 1936, or as soon thereafter as practicable: Provided further, That title to the property shall pass to the city of Newark and a quitclaim deed delivered by the Secretary of War after receipt by him of the final payment: And provided further, That such conveyance shall be made upon the condition that the United States, in the event of war or of any national emergency declared by Congress to exist, shall have the right to take over said property and shall pay to the city of Newark as liquidated damages a sum equal to 3 percent per annum on the amount theretofore paid on the purchase price of the said property by the said city during each year or part thereof that the said property is occupied under such taking by the United States, the said property to be returned to the city of Newark upon the expiration of such war or national emergency.

SEC. 2. In the event the city of Newark shall not elect to acquire said property as provided in section 1 of this act, then the Secretary of War is authorized to offer said property at public sale to the highest responsible bidder on terms and conditions to be prescribed by him, which terms and conditions shall not be less favorable to the United States than those prescribed in section 1 of this act: Provided, That if the highest responsible bidder shall fail to enter into and consummate a contract of sale, the Secretary of War may award the contract to the next highest responsible bidder or, in his discretion, readvertise said property for sale in like manner.

SEC. 3. Any contract of sale shall be subject to the conditions that if the purchaser shall fail to pay any installment of the purchase price and interest, if any, as and when the same are due, or shall fail to comply with the other terms and conditions of the sale, then the Secretary of War may, at his election, declare such purchaser in default and reenter and repossess said property in the name of the United States and he may thereafter cause said property to be readvertised and resold at public sale in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. During any interval of time that the property may be in the custody of the Secretary of War, he may, in a manner that will best conserve the interests of the United States, lease said property, or, if unable to lease the same on satisfactory terms, may maintain and operate the same, or, in the discretion of the President, the property may be transferred by Executive order to the Department of Commerce for administration under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of June 5, 1920, as amended.

SEC. 5. All sums received as a result of the sale of said property, after deducing therefrom any costs of appraisal and other necessary expenses incident to sale, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is this bill approved by the various departments of the Government?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, the bill has been approved by all the departments concerned.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC CONDITION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 444) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally", approved August 27, 1935, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which House Joint Resolution 444 was passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, is the Senator opposed to the measure?

Mr. KING. If I understand it, I am.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from California has been called from the Chamber. He is very much interested in the joint resolution. It authorizes the continuance of an investigation which has already been undertaken by the Federal Trade Commission under Public Resolution No. 61 of the Seventy-fourth Congress. The title of that measure was:

Joint resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally.

The investigation has not as yet been completed; and, as I understand, the pending joint resolution includes a few other commodities to be investigated and extends to October 1, 1936, the time for filing the report. It makes unexpended balances available until October 1, 1936.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will there be a deficit?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator interrupted me. The joint resolution also increases the original authorization. Apparently, from a study of the House report, which is what the Senator from California left with me, the investigation has been only partially completed; and unless it is permitted to continue the money which has already been spent upon it will to some extent have been wasted.

I sincerely hope the Senator from Utah will be persuaded to permit the joint resolution to pass and to give it further consideration; and if later he desires reconsideration I feel certain that no one will interpose an objection.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Wisconsin consent to strike out, in line 19, page 4, the figures "$300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000"? That will give the Commission $50,000 additional. It now has $150,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am a little embarrassed by that suggestion, because I have not had any opportunity to consult with the Senator from California.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I interrupt at this point?

It is provided that there shall be made available any unexpended balance of the appropriation of $150,000. That sum is very considerably less than the amount of $150,000, although I have not the figures before me. Page 5 of the joint resolution makes clear just what the provision is.

Mr. KING. What is the additional appropriation which is desired?

Mr. McNARY. Sufficient to carry on the work.

Mr. KING. How much?

Mr. McNARY. The unexpended balance of $150,000.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to say that an additional appropriation is required. If no additional appropriation is required, I have no objection. If one is required, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The bill has been passed. Does the Senator ask that that action be reconsidered?

Mr. McNARY. I think this language on page 5, line 9, covers the matter:

It is hereby further provided that any unexpended balance of the appropriation of $150,000 made in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1936 in accordance with the authority contained in Public Resolution No. 61, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, is hereby made available for like purpose to and including October 1, 1936.

Mr. KING. I assume the Senator, then, is taking the position that no additional appropriation is required.

Mr. McNARY. That is my understanding.

Mr. KING. If no additional appropriation is required, I have no ojection. If an additional appropriation is required, I shall move to reconsider.

FRANK A. BOYLE

The bill (H. R. 993) for the relief of Frank A. Boyle was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES L. PARK

The bill (H. R. 3907) for the relief of James L. Park was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF TRAFFIC CONDITIONS

The bill (H. R. 10591) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report on traffic conditions with recommendations for corrective legislation was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I should like to know who asked that the bill be passed over.

Mr. COUZENS. I asked that it go over, because I find no statement in the report as to how the Secretary of Agriculture shall proceed to investigate traffic conditions all over the world. In addition to that, Mr. President, communities and States are duplicating the work of investigation of traffic conditions, and the amount carried by the bill is such that it will be necessary later to provide a further appropriation, because under no circumstances can the investigation be concluded with the amount proposed by the bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment, so that I may make a brief statement? The bill appropriates no additional amount of money out of the Treasury. It allows $75,000 of the administrative fund now available to the Bureau of Public Roads to be used for the investigation, which in reality is a coordination of the efforts that are being made throughout the Nation. Because of its intimate connection with the State highway departments throughout the country, the Bureau of Public Roads, as the Senator well knows, is one of the best-qualified and best-informed agencies of the Government to do the work. The Senator will observe that the bill was recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture in twice the amount carried by it. The House reduced the amount to $75,000.

By reason of the appalling loss of human life, traffic conditions throughout the country naturally have become a subject of deep concern and interest, as the Senator has indicated, in every State and every city. The measure in question is for the purpose of coordinating the information gathered throughout the country, in an effort to establish uniformity of traffic regulations.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I ask whether any hearings were held on the bill with regard to how the investigation is to be carried on?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not happen to have a copy of the House hearings.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EMANUEL BRATSES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3866) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Emanuel Bratses, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to insert at the end of the bill a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Emanuel Bratses for injuries and damages sustained in an accident in which he lost his leg at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., on May 27, 1933: Provided, That proceedings in any suit brought in the Court of Claims under this act, appeals therefrom, and payment of any judgment therein shall be had as in the case of claims over which said court has jurisdiction under section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended: Provided further, That the judgment, if any, shall not exceed the the sum of $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, ARROW ROCK, MO.

The bill (H. R. 11819) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Arrow Rock, Mo., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HELEN MAHAR JOHNSON

The bill (H. R. 8220) for the relief of Helen Mahar Johnson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSFER OF LAND TO TERRITORY OF HAWAII

The bill (H. R. 10712) to authorize the transfer of land from the War Department to the Territory of Hawaii was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSFER OF LAND TO KENTUCKY

The bill (H. R. 11916) to authorize the transfer of a certain piece of land in Muhlenberg County, Ky., to the State of Kentucky was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7293) to amend the act approved June 16, 1934, entitled "An act to provide relief to Government contractors whose costs of performance were increased as a result of compliance with the act approved June 16, 1933, and for other purposes", was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PROTECTION TO WORKMEN ON UNITED STATES PROPERTY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12599) to provide more adequate protection to workmen and laborers on projects, buildings, constructions, improvements, and property wherever situated, belonging to the United States of America, by granting to the several States jurisdiction and authority to enter upon and enforce their State workmen's compensation, safety, and insurance laws on all property and premises belonging to the United States of America, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the word "compensation", to strike out the comma and "safety, and insurance"; on page 2, line 2, after the words "authority to", to strike out "enter onto and upon" and insert "apply such laws to"; on the same page, line 6, after the word "State", to strike out "wherever required or necessary, to enforce and require obedience to the State workmen's compensation, safety, and insurance laws, and to enforce and require obedience to the orders, decisions, and awards of the constituted authorities of the State, on" and insert "and to"; on the same page, line 16, after the words "may be", to strike out the semicolon and the words "and the civil and criminal laws of the several States within whose exterior boundaries such place may be pertaining to and embracing the State workmen's compensation, safety, and insurance laws and pertaining to and embracing the orders, decisions, and awards of the constituted authority of the several States are hereby extended to and cover, for such jurisdictional purposes, the territory above described for criminal as well as for civil infractions thereof and liabilities incurred thereunder", so as to make the section read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whatsoever constituted authority of each of the several States is charged with the enforcement of and requiring compliances with the State workmen's compensation laws of said States and with the enforcement of and requiring compliance with the orders, decisions, and awards of said constituted authority of said States hereafter shall have the power and authority to apply such laws to all lands and premises owned or held by the United States of America by deed or act of cession, by purchase or otherwise, which is within the exterior boundaries of any State, and to all projects, buildings, constructions, improvements, and property belonging to the United States of America, which is within the exterior boundaries of any State, in the same way and to the same extent as if said premises were under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State within whose exterior boundaries such place may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 5, after the word "compensation", to strike out the comma and the words "safety, and insurance"; on the same page, line 12, after the word "compensation", to strike out the comma and the words "safety, and insurance"; and to insert at the end of the section a proviso, so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. For the purposes set out in section 1 of this act, the United States of America hereby vests in the several States within whose exterior boundaries such place may be, insofar as the enforcement of State workmen's compensation laws are affected, the right, power, and authority aforesaid: Provided, however, That by the passage of this act the United States of America in nowise relinquishes its jurisdiction for any purpose over the property named, with the exception of extending to the several States within whose exterior boundaries such place may be only the powers above enumerated relating to the enforcement of their State workmen's compensation laws as herein designated: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to modify or amend the United States Employees' Compensation Act as amended from time to time (act of Sept. 7, 1916, 39 Stat. 742, U. S. C., title 5 and supplement, sec. 751 et seq.).

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide more adequate protection to workmen and laborers on projects, buildings, constructions, improvements, and property wherever situated, belonging to the United States of America, by granting to the several States jurisdiction and authority to apply their State workmen's compensation laws on all property and premises belonging to the United States of America."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report (No. 2294) submitted by Mr. WALSH on June 5, 1936, is as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12599) to provide more adequate protection to workmen and laborers on projects, buildings, constructions, improvements, and property wherever situated, belonging to the United States of America, by granting to the several States jurisdiction and authority to enter upon and enforce their State workmen's compensation, safety, and insurance laws on all property and premises belonging to the United States of America, having considered the same, recommend that the bill do pass with amendments.

The purpose of the amended bill is to fill a conspicuous gap in the workmen's compensation field by furnishing protection against death or disability to laborers and mechanics employed by contractors or other persons on Federal property. The United States Employees' Compensation Act covers only persons directly employed by the Federal Government.

There is no general Federal statute applying the workmen's compensation principle to laborers and mechanics on Federal projects, and although the right of workmen to recover under State compensation laws for death or disability sustained on Federal property has been recognized by some of the courts, a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court (see Murray v. Gerrick, 291 U. S. 315) has thrown some doubts upon the validity of these decisions by holding that a Federal statute giving a right of recovery under State law to persons injured or killed on Federal property refers merely to actions at law. Hence it was held that this statute (act of Feb. 1, 1928, 45 Stat. 54, U. S. C., title 16, sec. 457) did not extend State workmen's compensation acts to places exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The Senate has recognized the desirability of correcting this situation by enacting two bills this session dealing with the problem, S. 3238 and S. 4671. Thus far the House has not acted on either of these bills, but passage of this bill in its amended form would accomplish in part the objectives sought to be attained by these other bills.

The committee have amended this bill in the form passed by the House by striking out all provisions subjecting Federal property to State safety and insurance regulations and also eliminating provisions authorizing State officers to enter upon Federal premises. These provisions were objected to by the procurement agencies of the Government inasmuch as such provisions would not only produce conflicts of authority between State and Federal officers but would also mark a wide departure from the well-established principles that Federal officers should have complete charge of any regulations pertaining to Federal property. It was the conclusion of the committee that the principal reform which this bill sought to achieve could be attained without the inclusion of these clauses.

The report (H. Rept. No. 2656) of the House Committee on Labor on H. R. 12599 is submitted herewith.

"[H. Rept. No. 2656, 74th Cong., 2d sess.]

"The Committee on Labor, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12599) to provide more adequate protection to workmen and laborers on projects, buildings, constructions, improvements, and property wherever situated, belonging to the United States of America, by granting to the several States jurisdiction and authority to enter upon and enforce their State workmen's compensation, safety, and insurance laws on all property and premises belonging to the United States of America, having had the bill under consideration, report it back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

"This bill is absolutely necessary so that protection can be given to men employed on projects as set out in the foregoing paragraph.

"As a specific example, the Golden Gate Bridge, now under construction at San Francisco, which is being financed by a district consisting of several counties of the State of California, the men are almost constantly working on property belonging to the Federal Government either on the Presidio Military Reservation on the San Francisco side of the Golden Gate, or the Fort Baker Military Reservation on the Marin County side of the Golden Gate.

"A number of injuries have occurred on this project and private insurance companies with whom compensation insurance has been placed by the contractors have recently discovered two decisions—one by the Supreme Court of the United States and one by the Supreme Court of California—which seem to hold that the State compensation insurance acts do not apply, leaving the workers wholly unprotected, except for their common-law right of action for personal injuries which would necessitate action being brought in the Federal courts. In many cases objection to the jurisdiction of the industrial accident commission has been raised over 1 year after the injury occurred and after the statute of limitations has run against a cause of action for personal injuries. This status of the law has made it possible for the compensation insurance companies to negotiate settlement with the workers on a basis far below what they would ordinarily be entitled. The situation existing in this locality is merely an example of the condition that exists through the United States wherever work is being performed on Federal property."

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF LACKAWANNA RIVER

The bill (H. R. 12002) to authorize a preliminary examination of the Lackawanna River with a view to the control of its floods was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I find a number of authorizations are sought for surveys, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce why provision was not made in the bill which we passed a few days ago with respect thereto. Scores if not several hundred authorizations were contained in that bill. It seems to me we should not begin again to provide for the investigation of streams for which we have already authorized investigation. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

DIVISION OF WATERS OF YELLOWSTONE RIVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate recur to Calendar No. 2342, being Senate bill 3957, granting the consent of Congress to the States of Montana and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement for division of the waters of the Yellowstone River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment at the end of the bill to add a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of Montana and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact, or agreement, not later than June 1, 1939, providing for an equitable division and apportionment between the States of the water supply of the Yellowstone River and of the streams tributary thereto, upon condition that one suitable person, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, shall participate in said negotiations as the representative of the United States and shall make report to Congress of proceedings and of any compact or agreement entered into: Provided, That such compact or agreement shall not be binding or obligatory upon either of the parties thereto unless and until the same shall have been approved by the legislatures of each of said States and by the Congress of the United States: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall apply to any waters within the Yellowstone National Park or shall establish any right or interest in or to any lands within the boundaries thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIVISION OF STREAM POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar No. 2316, being Senate bill 4627. The objection which was made at the time the bill was reached on the calendar has been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 4627) to create a Division of Stream Pollution Control in the Bureau of the Public Health Service, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the Bureau of the Public Health Service a Division of Stream Pollution Control. This division shall be in charge of a director, who shall be a commissioned engineer officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. Said engineer officer while serving as director shall have the rank of an Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, subject to the provisions of law applicable to Assistant Surgeons General in charge of administrative divisions in the District of Columbia of the Bureau of the Public Health Service.

SEC. 2. (a) For the administration of this act the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon recommendation of the Surgeon General, appoint such engineers, attorneys, experts, research assistants, examiners, and consultants as may be necessary and fix their compensation in the manner provided by law for appointment and compensation of such personnel of the Public Health Service; and the Surgeon General is authorized to transfer, assign, or detail to the division from any other division of the Public Health Service such professional and scientific personnel as may be available.

(b) Such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants as may be necessary to discharge the duties of said division shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and he shall prescribe rules and regulations with respect to their duties as he may find necessary.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury, with the consent of the Secretary of any other department of the Federal Government, may utilize such officers and employees of said department to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act. The appropriation from which they are paid shall be reimbursed from the appropriations made pursuant to section 9 of this act to the extent of their salaries and allowances for service performed while so engaged.

SEC. 3. The Division of Stream Pollution Control shall, in cooperation with the agencies of the several States authorized or designated by law to deal with water pollution, prepare a comprehensive plan for eliminating or reducing the pollution and improving the sanitary condition of the waters of the United States. In the development of such comprehensive plan due regard shall be given to the improvements which are necessary to conserve such waters and promote their use for public water supplies, propagation of fish and aquatic life, recreational purposes, agricultural, and other legitimate uses, and for this purpose the Division of Stream Pollution Control is authorized to make joint investigations with the aforesaid agencies of any State or States of the condition of any waters either navigable or otherwise and the discharges of any sewage, industrial wastes, or deleterious substances which may adversely affect such waters. Such comprehensive plan shall also be developed in cooperation with and shall be consistent with any general, national, or regional plan of water conservation recommended by the National Resources Committee or any duly empowered Federal agency, and with statutory regulation and provision of the States affected.

The Division of Stream Pollution Control shall encourage cooperative activities by the several States for the prevention and abatement of pollution; encourage the enactment of uniform State laws relating to water pollution; encourage compacts between the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution; collect and disseminate information; make available to State agencies the results of surveys, studies, and experiments conducted by it and other agencies, public and private; assign experts in its employ or, with the approval of the head of the department or agency concerned, in the employ of any other department or agency of the Government; and to furnish such assistance to State agencies as may be authorized by law.

SEC. 4. The Division of Stream Pollution Control, upon request of any State health authority or authorities, and subject to the approval of the Surgeon General, shall conduct investigations and make surveys of any specific problem of stream pollution confronting any State, drainage-basin authority, community, or municipality, with a view to effecting a solution of such problem or problems, and shall make definite recommendations for the correction or elimination of the conditions found to exist.

SEC. 5. The Public Health Service shall prepare and publish from time to time, reports of such studies, investigations, and surveys as shall be made under the authority of this act, together with appropriate recommendations with regard to the control of pollution of the waters of the United States.

SEC. 6. Any State, municipality, or other public body which is discharging untreated or inadequately treated sewage or waste into waters of any area is hereby declared to be eligible to Federal aid in the form of grants-in-aid and/or loans for the construction of necessary remedial treatment works, in accordance with plans approved by the respective State board or department of health and by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. Such loans and grants-in-aid shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the President may prescribe, subject to the following limitations: (1) Loans or grants-in-aid shall be made only upon the recommendation of the State board or department of health having jurisdiction and with the approval of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service; (2) no grant-in-aid shall be made in respect to any project of an amount in excess of — percent of the cost of the labor and materials employed upon such project including the cost of preparation of plans and the carrying of same into execution.

SEC. 7. Any private corporation discharging untreated or inadequately treated sewage or waste deleterious to the waters within any area is hereby declared to be eligible to Federal aid in the form of loans for the construction of necessary remedial treatment works in accordance with plans approved by the respective State board or department of health and with the approval of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. Such loans shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the President may prescribe, subject to the following limitation: (1) Loans shall be made only upon the recommendation of the State board or department of health having jurisdiction and upon approval of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service.

SEC. 8. The Surgeon General shall make estimates of the amount of moneys required each year for the extension of Federal aid in the form of grants-in-aid or loans to any States, municipalities, or other public bodies or in the form of loans to private corporations within any area. The Surgeon General shall transmit such estimates through the Secretary of the Treasury to the President, who shall transmit the same to the Congress, together with any recommendations he may deem advisable. The Congress thereupon may appropriate moneys to the Treasury Department to be allotted to such States, municipalities, or other public bodies or loaned to such private corporations under supervision of the Surgeon General in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the construction of remedial sewage or waste treatment works, in accordance with an approved comprehensive plan.

SEC. 9. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1936, and for each year thereafter, the sum of $300,000 to defray the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the Division of Stream Pollution Control in the Bureau of the Public Health Service and to be used for the hereinabove specified purposes of field investigations.

SEC. 10. ESTATE OF JOHN GELLATLY AND CHARLYNE GELLATLY, INDIVIDUALLY

The bill (H. R. 8824) for the relief of the estate of John Gellatly, deceased, and/or for Charlyne Gellatly, individually, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that bill will go over, but I wish to make a brief statement concerning it.

On May 7 of this year a similar bill was reported adversely, the report being of such a nature as to show that the claim has no foundation in fact or in law. I shall ask that the adverse report referred to be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I do not know why the bill was withdrawn from the Senate after it had been adversely reported and then subsequently a favorable report submitted to the effect that the committee had no recommendation to make regarding the merits of the claim. I shall insist that the bill go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. It is true, exactly as stated by the Senator from Arkansas, that the committee made an adverse report on this claim the second time it appeared before the committee. The first time the matter was presented the committee favorably reported it; the second time they made an adverse report, probably because I appeared as the attorney for the claimant and made such a poor presentation that naturally it fell by the wayside. Upon my request, however, the matter was presented again to the Committee on Claims, and Mrs. Gellatly was represented by her attorney, who knew all about the case as I did not. I have no interest in the matter beyond the fact that the surrogate judge of my city, Judge Foley, a very highly respected citizen of my community, urged me to present this matter to the Senate because a great injustice was being done which would not be permitted if his jurisdiction were sufficient to prevent it.

Mr. President, at the time I presented the matter there was put into the RECORD a letter which seemed to indicate this lady entered into an engagement with Mr. Gellatly after the transfer had been completed. The Senator from Arkansas called attention to the fact that Mr. Justice Hughes had reviewed the testimony and took the same view that is now held by the Senator from Arkansas. It became quite apparent, however, in the hearing that what Mr. Justice Hughes saw was the enormous record of a court proceeding somewhere or other; I do not know where.

Two affidavits were presented which indicated that this woman was engaged to the man in the case 2 years before the transfer of the property to the Smithsonian Institution. Under the laws of New York State that could not happen; a man entering into a contract of marriage with a lady in my State cannot divest himself of his possessions after the engagement.

The Committee on Claims, after hearing all the testimony, which I could not present, took the position that this is a meritorious case, at least, to the extent of permitting this woman to have her day in court, and I am very clearly of the opinion that she is entitled to that consideration.

This bill, if passed, would not confer any money upon her; it would simply give her an opportunity in a court of law to have her day in court, in order that she may present there all the facts and have a determination made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator permit me to say a very brief word about the case?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. As a member of the committee who voted the last time to favorably report the bill, I should like to give my understanding very briefly of this measure. I do not know what occurred during the previous consideration of the bill by the committee, but just before the last favorable report there was a hearing before the committee. As I understand, the claimant in this case was engaged to marry Mr. Gellatly, and during that engagement, before the marriage, the man, unknown to his fiancée, turned over to the United States a most valuable property, practically his entire estate.

Mr. COPELAND. An estate worth four or five million dollars.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; an estate worth four or five million dollars, which the United States now has. All this proposed legislation seeks to do is to permit this woman to go into the United States District Court of the State of New York, there to test the question of whether, in view of the relationship which existed under the contract of marriage, Mr. Gellatly had the legal right to divest himself of practically his entire estate and to deprive her of the rights which as a wife she has under the laws of New York. I felt that the Government of the United States ought not to interpose objection to a legal inquiry and a legal determination of her rights, and for that reason I voted to report the bill favorably.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will not claim the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of this case, for the bill must go over, but I will state that the facts as represented by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Maine are erroneous. The Chief Justice, who is Chancelor of the Smithsonian Institution; Mr. R. Walton Moore, whom every Senator knows; and I were appointed a committee of three, representing the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, to investigate this case. We heard evidence, we looked into it, and we reached the conclusion that there was no foundation in fact or in law for the claim.

I could discuss the case at great length. The only time a hearing was held of which I had any notice, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, Mr. Abbot, appeared, and the committee unanimously reported the bill adversely. The report was to the effect that the offer of marriage to the claimant was not made until sometime after the transfer of the property had been made to the Smithsonian Institution. The record, of course, is voluminous, but the Chief Justice and I went into it fully; we examined it for many days, and we reached the conclusion that the claim was invalid to the extent that it almost might be called fraudulent. I ask that the bill go over, and I request that the report to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8824) for the relief of the estate of John Gellatly, deceased, and/or Charlyne Gellatly, individually, having considered the same, report adversely thereon with the recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

By the terms of this bill jurisdiction would be conferred upon the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York to hear, determine, and render judgment on the claims of the estate of John Gellatly, deceased, and/or Charlyne Gellatly with respect to an art collection presented by the said John Gellatly to the Smithsonian Institution for exhibition in the National Gallery of Art for the benefit of the public.

From the investigations of your committee it appears that—

John Gellatly and his former wife, since deceased, had brought together a valuable collection of art objects. After the death of the former Mrs. Gellatly, the said John Gellatly, then a man of about 78 years of age, endeavored to place this collection where it could be shown for the benefit of the public, and offered it to Columbia University in New York City. It was not accepted by the university owing to certain conditions stipulated.

In 1929 the collection was offered to the Nation through the Smithsonian Institution for exhibition in the National Gallery of Art. This offer was accepted by the Institution in principle, pending the authorization of appropriation by Congress of approximately $20,000 a year for the maintenance of the collection in the Heckscher Building in New York City until the expiration of Mr. Gellatly's lease on the rooms in which it was installed. (The lease expired in 1933, when the collection was brought to Washington.) The appropriation of these funds having been granted by Congress the ownership of the collection was conveyed to the Smithsonian Institution by the said John Gellatly by deed of gift in June 1929. This disposition of the collection was highly gratifying to Mr. Gellatly and he later presented a number of other objects to the Institution under the same conditions as the original gift, which objects were offered to and accepted by the Institution in August 1930.

On September 2, 1930, an offer of marriage was made by the said John Gellatly to the claimant, to whom he was married on September 24, 1930. Since October 1930 Mrs. Gellatly has made repeated claims for the collection, both personally and by counsel. It appears that these claims have been carefully considered by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution (of which Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes is the Chancellor and Senator Joseph T. Robinson and Judge R. Walton Moore, Assistant Secretary of State, also eminent lawyers, are members), and these claims have been refused by the Regents on the grounds that Mrs. Gellatly has neither legal nor moral right to the collection in question.

The photostat copy of Mr. Gellatly's offer of marriage, dated September 2, 1930, submitted by the claimant herself, shows that Mrs. Gellatly not only was not married to the said John Gellatly, but was not even engaged to be married to him until after the ownership of the collection had been passed by Mr. Gellatly to and accepted by the Institution. It is the opinion of your committee, therefore, that she has no valid claim either legally or morally to the said collection. To require the Government to defend a suit for the possession of its property, to which it is apparent Mrs. Gellatly has no just claim, is entirely unwarranted.

Your committee, therefore, reports adversely on this measure and recommends that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is entirely within his rights, of course, in taking the position he does. He believes he is on firm ground, or he would not take that position. I am satisfied, after listening to the testimony and having examined the facts, that the Senator from Arkansas is mistaken. But whether the Senator from Arkansas is right or whether I am wrong, or whether the committee is right, does not make any difference. This woman has been divested of property worth four or five million dollars, in violation of law, in violation of decency, and she has a right to go into a court of law and find out whether she has any rights. Then, if the court decides that the property belongs to the Smithsonian Institution, very well and good; but I contend that it is proper that an American citizen should have the right to go into court and test the facts. I believe if that were done this woman's rights would be sustained, and in that event, in my opinion, the Smithsonian Institution would not have $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth of property which, in my judgment, it ought not to have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

Dak., to operate and maintain a tourist camp and certain amusement and recreational facilities on such islands, to make charges in connection therewith, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

R. 12033) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights-of-way over public lands and reserve lands to the city of Los Angeles in Mono County in the State of California was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

SAFETY OF EMPLOYEES AND TRAVELERS ON RAILROADS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar No. 2329, being Senate bill 2511.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2511) to promote the safety of employees and travelers on railroads by providing for the inspection and investigation of conditions prevailing in train-dispatching offices and for the promulgation of necessary rules and regulations governing the working conditions of train dispatchers which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 3, in section 1, before the word "act", to strike out the word "this" and insert the word "said"; and after line 19, to insert a new paragraph (e), so as to make the section read:

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act and for the purposes of this act—

(a) The term "Commission" means the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(b) The term "carrier" means any carrier by railroad subject to the Interstate Commerce Act (including any terminal or station company) and any receiver or any other individual or body, judicial or otherwise, when in the possession of the business of a carrier subject to said act: Provided, That the term carrier shall not include any street, interurban, or suburban electric railroad unless such railroad is operated as a part of a general railroad system of transportation.

(c) The term "train dispatcher" means any subordinate official, employee, or person who is primarily responsible for directing the movement of trains, on an assigned section of track, by train orders or otherwise, and who transmits such train orders or directions verbally or by means of the telegraph or telephone or any other device and/or keeps necessary records incident thereto or performs related work.

(d) The term "train-dispatching office" means any office, tower, place, or station at which a train dispatcher, as defined in this act, is employed or in which he performs his duties.

(e) The term "train-dispatching service" includes the work of controlling the movement of trains or motive power of any character, on an assigned section of track, by train orders or otherwise, which movement is made under the direction of a train dispatcher, or is directed from a train-dispatching office, or for which a train dispatcher is customarily responsible; and also includes the work of keeping the records necessary and incident to such control of such movement.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 3, line 5, before the word "investigator", to strike out the word "impartial", and in line 7, after the word "office", to insert the words "or train-dispatching service", so as to make the section read:

That upon complaint or upon its own motion the Commission or any investigator thereunto authorized by said Commission is hereby empowered to inspect and investigate any train-dispatching office or train-dispatching service of any carrier subject to this act with respect to all conditions under which train dispatchers work which in any way involve or affect the safety of the operation of trains.

Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. CONNALLY. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

$3,500 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized for such purpose.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Couzens	McGill	Sheppard
Barkley	Fletcher	McNary	Vandenberg
Bilbo	George	Maloney	Wagner
Black	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Bone	Hayden	Overton	White
Capper	King	Pittman
Connally	Lewis	Robinson
Copeland	Lonergan	Schwellenbach

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Twenty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The clerk will call the names of absent Senators.

The Chief Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. THOMAS of Utah answered to their names when called.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to reannounce the absence of Senators, and the reasons therefor, as given by me on the previous roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, unless there is objection, it is my intention to move an adjournment until 12 o'clock Monday. There are only 34 Senators present, and I do not think it will be practicable to proceed with the consideration of new legislation under the existing circumstances. There is not a quorum present.

I could, of course, move to direct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators; but it has been pretty well understood that no effort would be made to proceed with legislation after the conclusion of the order under which the Senate was proceeding. We have done a considerable day's work; and unless there are suggestions to the contrary I shall move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I did not understand that the request I was about to make would break any unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; there has been no unanimous-consent agreement, and I did not say there was. I said there was a kind of tentative understanding that nothing further would be done after the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

Mr. WAGNER. I was neither consulted about nor did I know of any such understanding. I am very anxious to have the housing bill passed.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New York understands that we cannot pass a bill with only 34 Senators present. If it is the wish of the Senate, I will move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. WAGNER. I was about to say to the Senator that I should not insist upon any such motion, nor should I myself make such a motion. I wish to make every parliamentary effort to secure the passage of the housing bill; and I think it would be a memorial to our neglect if we should permit the present session of Congress to adjourn without doing something to deal with the important subject of providing decent housing for the low-income group of our country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Debate is not in order.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded, and debate is out of order.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 8, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.
